NAAS (NORTH), a barony of the county of Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by North Salt; on the east, by South Salt; on the south-east, by co. Wicklow; on the south, by South Naas; and on the west, by Connell and Clane. Length, southward, 7 miles; breadth, from 2 to 6½; area, 25,579 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches,—of which 65 acres, 14 perches are in the river Liffey. The surface consists of, for the most part, a low, flat, rich, and pleasant portion of the east side of the basin of the Liffey; and is traversed by both the Grand Canal itself and one of its branches. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred two townlands of the parish of Rathmore, and part of a townland of Killishee, from South Naas to North Naas; pop., in 1841, 32.—North Naas contains part of the parish of Killashee, and the whole of the parishes of Bodenstown, Johnstown, Kardinestown, Naas, Rathmore, Sherlockstown, Tipper, and Whitechurch. The towns and chief villages are Naas, Sallins, and Johnstown. Pop., in 1831, 8,602; in 1841, 8,081. Houses 1,313. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 588; in manufactures and trade, 301; in other pursuits, 575. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 53; on the directing of labour, 615; on their own manual labour, 779; on means not specified, 17. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,616; who could read but not write, 718; who could neither read nor write, 1,171. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,250; who could read but not write, 964; who could neither read nor write, 1,437.—This barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Naas. The total number of tenements valued is 1,423; and of these, 790 were valued under £5,—187, under £10,—126, under £15,—60, under £20,—56, under £25,—26, under £30,—36, under £40,—23, under £50,—and 114 at and above £50.

NAAS (SOUTH), a barony on the east border of the county of Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by North Naas; on the east and south, by co. Wicklow; and on the west, by Kilcullen and Connell. Length, southward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 27,478 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches,—of which 178 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches are in the river Liffey. A small district in the east is mountainous, consists of spurs from the vast alpine region of Wicklow, and contains the two summits of Slieveroe and Bishop's-hill, with altitudes of respectively 1,094 and 935 feet above sea-level; and all the other districts are prevalently low, flat, and rich, and comparatively free from bog. The Liffey runs across the interior.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Kill and Killishee, and the whole of the parishes of Ballybought, Ballymore-Eustace, Brennontown, Carnaway, Coghlanstown, Giltown, Jago, and Tipperkerin. The towns are Ballymore-Eustace and part of Kilcullen-Bridge. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the whole of the parishes of Ballybought, Ballymore-Eustace, and Tipperkerin, from Uppercross, co. Dublin, to South Naas, co. Kildare,—pop., in 1841, 3,138; and two townlands of Rathmore, and part of a townland of Killishee, from South Naas to North Naas,—pop. 32. Pop. of the barony, in 1831, 4,377; in 1841, 7,608. Houses 1,219. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 800; in manufactures and trade, 210; in other pursuits, 310. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 22; on the directing of labour, 492; on their own manual labour, 767; on means not specified, 39. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,625; who could read but not write, 633; who could neither read nor write, 1,212. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 982; who could read but not write, 891; who could neither read nor write, 1,388.—South Naas lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Naas. The total number of tenements valued is 611; and of these, 308 were valued under £5,—73, under £10,—51, under £15,—28, under £20,—17, under £25,—14, under £30,—28, under £40,—11, under £50,—and 81, at and above £50.

NAAS, a parish in the barony of North Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. It contains the town of NAAS, and part of the village of SALLINS: see these articles. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,526 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches,—of which 15 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches are in the river Liffey. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 4,891, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 5,228; in 1841, 4,863. Houses 809. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,033. Houses 185. The surface is low and flat; and the land is, in general, above medium quality. The highest ground is on the east border, and has an altitude above sea-level of 365 feet. The Liffey flows along part of the western boundary; and a branch of the Grand Canal, and the roads from Dublin to Waterford, New-Ross, Cork, and Limerick, traverse the interior. The seats are Jegginstown-house, Bluebell-house, Millview-house, Roseborough-house, Maryfield-house, Osberstown-hill, Barstown-house, and Coolnoona-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kildare. Vicarial tithes composition, £164 1s. 9d.; glebe, £98 2s. 1d. Gross income, £401 19s.; nett, £328 10s. Patron, Thomas Burgh, Esq. of Oldtown. The incumbent holds also the benefice and prebend of Tipper in St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin, and the office of sequestrator and curate of Heinstown and Forenaughts adjoining Naas, in the dio. of Kildare. The rectorial tithes of Naas are inappropriate, and have been purchased as an endowment for the perpetual curacy of Upper Falls, in the dio. of Connor. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is of very ancient but unknown date; and was enlarged first in 1822, and again about 3 or 4 years ago. Sittings, previous to the latter enlargement, 300; attendance 400. The chapel in the gaol is under the care of the vicar of Bodinstown, perpetual curate of Sherlockstown, and stipendiary curate of Killishee. The Independent chapel has an attendance of from 50 to 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,300. In 1834, the parishioners of Naas—including the inhabitants of the parish or denomination of Osberstown, amounting to 518—consisted of 593 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, 6 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,050 Roman Catholics; 14 daily schools had on their books 300 boys and 157 girls; and 3 other daily schools were in operation, but made no proper returns of their attendance. Two of the schools were salaried with respectively £21 and £24 from the produce of some seats in the Roman Catholic chapel; one was aided with an unreported sum from the bishop and clergy of the diocese; and one had attached to it the office of parish clerk, and a salary from subscription of £40.

NAAS.

A market and post town, one of the two assize towns of the county of Kildare, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Naas, barony of North Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on a branch of the Grand Canal, and on the mail-roads from Dublin to Carlow, New Ross, Kilkenny, Waterford, Cork, and Limerick, 4½ miles south by east of Clane, 5 west-north-west of Blessington, 5½ east-north-east of Newbridge, 5½ north-north-east of Kilcullen-Bridge, 7½ south-west of Rathcoole, 9½ east-north-east of Kildare, and 15½ south-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The country immediately around Naas is a fertile and well-cultivated part of an extensive champaign district; and while sufficiently interplanted and ornamented with demesne-land, it is not a little rich in the quantity of its agricultural produce. Jegginstown-house, in the immediate southern vicinity of the town, is the ruin of one story of a domestic pile, commenced on an enormous scale by the unfortunate Earl of Strafford. The town consists principally of a main street, extending ¾ of a mile south-westward along the road from Dublin to Kilkenny; a cross street, of 540 yards in length, intersecting the main street at right angles; a street of about 250 yards in length, extending along the road to Sallins; and various subordinate streets and lanes, all of very brief extent. The main street, in consequence of its forming the place of junction of the leading roads from Limerick, Cork, Waterford, New Ross, and the many intermediate towns, to Dublin, has a stirring and lively appearance; but the town, as a whole, presents a character far beneath the tone of its great advantages of situation; and the rows of cabins in the outskirts are poor, miserable, and to a great extent ruinous.

Public Buildings.—A priory for canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, was founded at Naas in the 12th century; and its possessions were granted, at the general dissolution, to Richard Mannerling. An abbey for Dominican friars was founded about the year 1355, by the Eustace family, near the centre of the town; and, together with its appurtenances, it was granted at the dissolution to Sir Thomas Lutterell, and was afterwards sold by Lord Carhampton, Sir T. Lutterell's descendant, to Mr. Finlay of Dublin. A monastery for friars-eremites of the order of St. Augustine, was founded at Naas in 1484; and a lease of it was granted in the 26th year of Queen Elizabeth to Nicholas Aylmer. Some remains of the Augustinian monastery still exist. The old church, now incorporated with additions or enlargements, and constituting the parochial church of Naas, is an uninteresting edifice; and its unfinished steeple was erected by one of the Earls of Mayo. A pyramidal monument of black and white marble, situated within the walls of the church, was "erected by John, fourth Earl of Mayo, in memory of his grandfather, John, first Earl of Mayo, and his father, Joseph Deane, Lord Archbishop of Tuam and Earl of Mayo, who died in 1794." A small almshouse, for four poor widows, was founded in Naas by the family of Lattin. The large modern workhouse and the fever hospital will be noticed in connection with the Poor-law union. A strong square tower near the church, is called the Castle of Naas, belongs to the Burgh family of Oldtown, and was constituted the parsonage-house of Naas. A large moat at the upper end of the town is a remarkable object. A large new barrack stands in the western outskirts of the town; and the gaol and court-house stand between the town and the barrack. The gaol is a new structure; and contains 18 cells large enough, and heated with hot air from a stove or furnace, for separate confinement: its entire accommodation comprises 44 cells, and 8 beds in 4 other rooms; and, in 1843, the average number of prisoners was 51, the greatest number was 83, the total number, including debtors, was 330, and the total expenditure was £1,364 9s. 8½d. The old market-house stood in the centre of the main street; but the present market-house, much to the damage of the retail trade, is situated at the extremity of the town, toward the Canal.

Trade.—Naas has by no means prospered in proportion to the number and value of its advantages for trade; but, on the contrary, has experienced some decline, while the nearest markets, possessed of no kindred advantages, have been improving. The cut from the Grand Canal at Osberstown and Callan-Bridge to Naas, a distance of about 2 statute miles, was completed in 1789, at the cost of £12,300. The Grand-Trunk line of railway, as projected by the Public Commissioners, passes within 2½ miles of the north-west outskirt of the town. The public conveyances in 1838 were a car to Ballymore-Eustace, a caravan to Dublin, a car to Newbridge, a caravan in transit between Dublin and Kilcullen, three coaches in transit between Dublin and Kilkenny, a coach in transit between Dublin and Birr, a coach and a mail-coach between Dublin and Waterford, a coach in transit between Dublin and Thurles, a caravan in transit between Dublin and Roscrea, a coach in transit between Dublin and Clonmel, two mail-coaches in transit between Dublin and Cork, a caravan in transit between Dublin and Mountchar, a caravan in transit between Dublin and Mountmellick, a coach in transit between Dublin and Carlow, and a mail-coach and a coach in transit between Dublin and Limerick. A considerable quantity of agricultural produce is sold at the weekly markets on Monday, Thursday, and Saturday; and fairs are held on Jan. 16, Feb. 16, March 17, April 15, May 25, June 5, July 11, Aug. 10, Sept. 20, Oct. 20, Nov. 22, and Dec. 14.

Poor-law Union.—The Naas Poor-law union ranks as the 16th; and was declared on Feb. 12, 1839. It comprises parts of the counties of Kildare, Dublin, and Wicklow, comprehending an area of 199,335 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 51,731. Its electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, are Kill, 376; Bodenstown, 181; Naas, 1,033; Rathmore, 209; Killishee, 198; Carnalway, 127; Giltown, 338; Kilcullen, 530; Usk, 280; Clane, 454; Timahoe, 323; Downings, 303; Carragh, 196; Kilmegaw, 498; Old-Connell, 173; Newbridge, 376; Ratharnan, 282; Kildare, 638; Ballysax, 364; Moorfield, 266; Ballymore-Eustace, 614; Blessington, 463; and Boystown, 428. The baronies and portions of baronies, together with the number of valued tenements in each, included within the union, are Uppercross, 1; Clane, 1,276; Connell, 1,439; Kilcullen, 611; East Narragh and Rhenan, 171; North Naas, 1,423; South Naas, 1,225; East Ophaly, 1,023; West Ophaly, 85; South Salt, 376; and Lower Talbotstown, 890. The total number of valued tenements is 8,570; and of these, 5,087 were valued under £5,—1,138, under £10,—587, under £15,—300, under £20,—239, under £25,—141, under £30,—233, under £40,—168, under £50,—and 677, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £134,695 9s. 6d.; the total number of persons rated is 8,570; and of these, 2,556 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,043, not exceeding £2,—683, not exceeding £3,—525, not exceeding £4,—and 379, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in July, 1839,—to be completed in Dec., 1840,—to cost £5,550 for building and completion, and £950 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 5 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches, obtained for an annual rent of £26 12s. 7½d.,—and to contain accommodation for 550 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Aug. 4, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £6,690 12s. 11d.; and the total previous expenditure was £586 5s. 1d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 347. The medical charities within the union are the county infirmary at Kildare, fever hospitals at Naas and Kilcullen, and dispensaries at Blessington, Kilcullen, Naas, Newbridge, and Robertstown; and, in 1839-40, they received £477 9s. 6d. from subscription, £2,110 19s. from public grants, and £25 11s. from other sources, expended £518 1s. 10d. in salaries to medical officers, £132 0s. 5½d. for medicines, and £1,293 15s. 6½d. for contingencies, and administered to 873 intern and 7,924 extern patients. In 1839-40, the Naas fever hospital expended £364 12s. 6d., and admitted 234 patients; and the Naas dispensary served for an area of 8,814 acres, with a pop. of 5,712, expended £33 17s. 6d., and administered to 2,012 patients.

Municipal Affairs.—Naas is a borough of great antiquity, and probably by prescription; and it has charters of 2 Henry V., 11 Elizabeth, and 7 James I. The borough limits, according to the charter of Elizabeth, include "all the lands, tenements, rents, and services, and all and singular other hereditaments which then were known, accepted, or reputed as part and number of the town of Naas, or within the precincts thereof;" but they neither define the included lands, nor indicate how far they extend from the centre of the town; and though they certainly comprised a considerable district around the whole town, and possibly extended three miles northward and three miles southward, they have now, for a long period, been practically unknown. The corporation, according to charter, was styled, "The Sovereign, Provosts, Burgesses, and Commonalty of Naas;" and consisted of one sovereign, two provosts, and an indefinite number of burgesses and freemen. In 1833, no burgess and only 2 freemen were resident within the borough, only 8 burgesses and 7 freemen were anywhere in existence, and 6 of these burgesses and 3 of the freemen were members of Lord Mayo's family, while even the remainder were all his nominees and creatures. No instance was known, at the date of the Municipal Corporation Enquiry, of a Protestant dissenter, or a Roman Catholic having been admitted to the burgesship or the freedom. Two members were sent, nominally, from the borough, but actually from Lord Mayo, to the Irish parliament; and the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union, were paid to the Earl of Mayo and the Hon. and Rev. Richard Bourke, to be applied upon the trusts of his lordship's marriage-settlement. A borough court was at one time in existence, but has now been very long in desuetude. Naas is the seat of the spring assizes for the county of Kildare, of a half-yearly court of quarter-sessions, and of a weekly court of petty-sessions. The public peace is maintained by a party of the county constabulary. "The streets," says an official report in 1833, "are in a bad state of repair, although they form portions of the county roads, and should be kept in order by the trustees of the turnpikes. They are not often cleansed by the authorities, who, at the same time, prevent the inhabitants from doing so, as one of the portreeves claims the sweepings, which are valuable for manure. To such a length has this been carried, that persons have been fined for removing heaps of filth which had remained for days opposite their houses. No attempt has been made to introduce the provisions of the 9 Geo. IV., c. 82, for the purpose of lighting and paving the town." A considerable extent of property formerly belonged to the corporation; and the report now quoted says, in reference to a portion of this property which still remains: "Great poverty exists in this district, which might be materially alleviated by the application to public purposes of the property yet remaining to the corporation; and, if the management of that property were submitted to an efficient public control, a very considerable fund would be produced from it."

Statistics.—Area of the town, 188 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,808; in 1841, 3,571. Houses 590. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 14; in manufactures and trade, 211; in other pursuits, 462. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 37; on the directing of labour, 318; on their own manual labour, 331; on means not specified, 1. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 727; who could read but not write, 261; who could neither read nor write, 473. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 632; who could read but not write, 398; who could neither read nor write, 667.

History.—Naas was a place of considerable importance in the early ages of Irish history, and constituted a seat of the kings of Leinster. The town itself and the country around it formed, at the date of the Anglo-Norman invasion, the tynarchy or subordinate principality of the chief sept MacCallan; and, after the Anglo-Norman conquest, it first was granted to William Fitzgerald, the son-in-law of Earl Strongbow, and then passed to successively the families of De Londres and De Preston. Soon after the arrival of the English, the town was fortified; at various subsequent dates it was made the site of private embattled or military dwellings; in 1419, it was the scene of a meeting of parliament; in 1534, it was taken by the Lord-deputy Skeffington from Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, who was then in open rebellion; in 1577, it was to a great extent reduced to ashes, by an irruption of Rory-Oge-O'More, dynast of Leix; in 1650, it was captured by Cromwell, by Colonels Hewson and Reynolds; and, in 1798, at the very outset of the rebellion of that year, it sustained an attack from a body of insurgents, headed by a farmer of the name of Reynolds, but was successfully defended, at great loss to the assailants, by a body of the king's troops, under the command of Lieutenant-general Dundas.—Naas gives the title of Viscount to the Earl of Mayo.

NACHORE, a hill in the parish of Ardelinis, barony of Lower Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. It extends inward from the beetling promontory of Garron Point; forms a small ridge; and attains an extreme altitude of 1,179 feet above sea-level.

NACUNG, a lake in the parish of Tullaghobegley, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It measures 3 miles by 3 furlongs, has a surface-elevation of 188 feet above sea-level, and is nearly disverged into two parts, called Upper Nacung and Lower Nacung; yet it almost strictly forms one lake with Lough Dunlewy, which extends $\frac{1}{2}$ mile away to the east; and, viewed as including this lake, it stretches westward from the base of Errigal mountain to the source or rather formation of the Clady river.

NAFFOY, or NAFOOBY, a lake in the parish and barony of Ross, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies among the mountains of Joyce-Country, 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Cong. Length, eastward, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 630 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches; surface-elevation above sea-level, 96 feet. Its superfluous waters are carried off by the Finny rivulet, 2 miles eastward to an arm of Lough Mask; and on its shores are the hamlets of Shanafaraghaunmore and Shanafaraghaunbeg.

NAGLES MOUNTAINS, a range of mountains on the mutual border of the barony of Barrymore on the south, and the baronies of Fermoy and Condons and Clangibbon on the north, co. Cork, Munster. They extend about 9 miles westward from the immediate vicinity of the town of Fermoy; they form part of the south screen of the valley of the Blackwater, and of the great backbone mountain-range of co. Cork; and their chief summits, named from east to west, are Rathcoormack mountain, Knockinskea, Sechane, and Nagles. The loftiest of these summits is Knockinskea, which has an altitude of 1,388 feet above sea-level. A large portion of the Nagles mountains was formerly sheeted with forest; and a considerable extent of their declivities is still beautifully wooded.

NALLENROE, an alias name of Lough Carrowmore, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught.

NALTEEN. See NILTEEN.

NANNY WATER (THE), a rivulet of the county of Meath, Leinster. It rises about 3 miles east-south-east of the Boyne at the town of Navan, and flows 13 miles east by northward, along the boundary between the baronies of Lower Navan and Lower Duleek on the north, and the baronies of Skreen and Upper Duleek on the south, to the Irish sea, at a point 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of the mouth of the Boyne. In the course of its progress, it successively flows along the romantic glen of the Diamond-Rock, curves along the base of a pleasant amphitheatre of hills, expands into a beautiful lake within the ornate demesne of Somerville, and makes such comparative rapids as afford sites for three flour-mills and several grist-mills. The water of the stream has been reported peculiarly suitable for the purposes of bleaching.

NANTENANE. See NATENANE.

NANTINAN, or NANTENANT, a parish in the baronies of Shanid and Lower Connello, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by south of Askeaton, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Shanid section, 1,330 acres; of the Lower Connello section, 6,592 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,869; in 1841, 3,018. Houses 480. Pop. of the Lower Connello section, in 1841, 2,669. Houses 429. The entire surface, in a general view, consists of inferior land; the uplands being rocky, and the lowlands boggy and wasteful. Yet a considerable aggregate of good and even ornate ground exists; and the three seats of Nantinan, Thos. H. F. Royse, Esq., Stoneville, J. Massey, Esq., and Ballinvirrig, are situated in respectively the north, the south, and the east. The road from Adare to Shanagolden, and that from Askeaton to Rathkeale, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Limerick. The rectory is part of the benefice of LOUGHILL: which see. Tithe composition, £461 10s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Glebe, £3 15s. Gross income, £103 15s.; nett, £102 4s. 6d. Patron, the precentor of Limerick cathedral. The church was built in 1817, by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 100. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of about 110. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 425, and the Roman Catholics to 2,564, and a daily school was salaried with £5 a-year from subscription, and had on its books 22 boys and 11 girls.

NAPPAGH, an islet, immediately west of the island of Lettermullen, barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught.

NARIN, a post and fishing hamlet, on the north coast of the parish of Inniskeel, barony of Boylagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands opposite the island of Inniskeel, 5 miles north of Ardara, 13 north-north-west of Inver, and 118 north-west of Dublin. "Narin, if we can assign it a locality," says Mr. Fraser, "consists of a few wretched cabins, inhabited by poor fishermen, along the east coast of Gweebarra bay, near to the Island of Inniskeel, on which there are some monastic remains. There is a church, a glebe-house, and a Methodist chapel in the neighbourhood. The ocean sets in with great force in this part of the coast, and from the extent of drifted sand mingling with the rocks and moor-land, the shores have a wild and desolate appearance." Pop. returned with the parish.

NARRAGH and RHEBAN (EAST), a barony of the county of Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Kilcullen; on the east, by co. Wicklow; on the south, by Kilkea and Moone; and on the west, by West Narragh and Rheban and West Ophaly. Length, south by westward, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 21,374 acres, 10 perches. The surface consists, in the aggregate, of good champaign land; and its three loftiest grounds have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 574, 489, and 389 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Fontstown, Moone, Narraghmore, and Tankardstown, and the whole of the parishes of Davidstown, Timolin, and Usk. The chief villages are Timolin and Ballytore. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred one township of Narraghmore, containing a population of 13, from East Narragh and Rheban to West Narragh and Rheban. Pop., in 1831, 7,386; in 1841, 7,043. Houses 1,149

Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 905; in manufactures and trade, 218; in other pursuits, 143. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 35; on the directing of labour, 369; on their own manual labour, 830; on means not specified, 32. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,217; who could read but not write, 576; who could neither read nor write, 1,357. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 757; who could read but not write, 755; who could neither read nor write, 1,565.—East Narragh and Rheban is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Athy, Baltinglass, and Naas. The total number of tenements valued is 1,129; and of these, 604 were valued under £5,—137, under £10,—72, under £15,—46, under £20,—28, under £25,—26, under £30,—50, under £40,—26, under £50,—and 80, at and above £50.

NARRAGH AND RHEBAN (WEST), a barony of the county of Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by West Ophaly; on the east, by East Narragh and Rheban; on the south, by Kilkea and Moone, and by Queen's county; and, on the west, by Queen's county. Length, southward, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 22,126 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches,—of which 139 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches are in the river Barrow. A considerable district in the north is part of the great bog of Monavullagh. The rest of the surface consists, in general, of good champaign ground. The Barrow river and navigation pass through the interior.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Narraghmore, St. John's of Athy, and St. Michael's of Athy, and the whole of the parishes of Churchtown and Kilberry. The only town is Athy. Pop., in 1831, 8,389; in 1841, 9,033. Houses 1,408. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 638; in manufactures and trade, 341; in other pursuits, 754. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 63; on the directing of labour, 640; on their own manual labour, 933; on means not specified, 97. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,646; who could read but not write, 694; who could neither read nor write, 1,566. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,108; who could read but not write, 1,033; who could neither read nor write, 1,927.—West Narragh and Rheban lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Athy. The total number of tenements valued is 1,582; and of these, 1,015 were valued under £5,—202, under £10,—112, under £15,—60, under £20,—40, under £25,—27, under £30,—28, under £40,—24, under £50,—and 74, at and above £50.

NARRAGHMORE, a hamlet in the parish of Davidstown, barony of East Narragh and Rheban, co. Kildare, Leinster. It has a police barrack; and stands 2½ miles north-north-west of Ballytore, and the same distance south-south-west of Calverstown. Pop. returned with the parish.

NARRAGHMORE, a parish, partly in the baronies of West Narragh and Rheban and Kilkea and Moone, but chiefly in the barony of East Narragh and Rheban, 2 miles north-north-west of Ballytore, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, westward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the West Narragh and Rheban section, 1,921 acres, 34 perches; of the Kilkea and Moone section, 2,114 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches; of the East Narragh and Rheban section, 6,234 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 3,191, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,125; in 1841, 2,805. Houses 457. Pop. of the West Narragh and Rheban section, in 1831, 305; in 1841, 442. Houses 69. Pop. of the Kilkea and Moone section, in 1831, 307; in 1841, 333. Houses 51. Pop. of the East Narragh and Rheban section, in 1831, 2,579; in 1841, 2,120. Houses 337. The old forts of Carman or Mullamast, whose loftiest summit has an altitude of 563 feet above sea-level, are situated in the south: see CARMEN. Part of the extreme west is a portion of the bog of Monavullagh; and a small portion of the northern border also is unreclaimed bog. Excepting these districts and some moor and cut-out bog, jointly amounting to about one-fourth of the whole area, the parochial surface consists wholly of good, flat, arable land. The old demesne of Narraghmore, on the north border, and in the vicinity of the church, is now part of the estate of Robert Latouche, Esq. The other seats are Skerries-house, Youngstown-house, Kilmead-house, Ghassely-house, Ballindrun-house, Mullamast-house, Boakefield-house, Prospect, Treepark, Willowbrook, Battlemount-house, Oakfield, Poplerhall, and Blackrath-house. The chief antiquity additional to the forts of Mullamast, is Blackrath castle.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £646 3s. 1d.; glebe, £24. Gross income, £670 3s. 1d.; nett, £525 16s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the archdeaconry of Dublin, and the united benefices which constitute its corps; and he is resident, during half the year, in Narraghmore. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is of unknown date; and was not long ago repaired and put into excellent order by means of parochial assessment. Sittings 160; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapels at Crookstown and Kilmead have an attendance of respectively 1,000 and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 246 Churchmen, 9 Protestant dissenters, and 2,938 Roman Catholics; and two daily schools—one of which was aided with an unreported sum from subscription—were usually attended by about 102 children. In 1842, a National school at Old Grange had on its books 42 boys and 19 girls.

NARROW-WATER (THE), a river, partly of Leinster, but chiefly of Ulster. It is only 5½ miles in length; consists of the lower portion of the Newry river; runs south-south-eastward from the town of Newry to the head of Lough Carlingford at Warrenpoint; and flows wholly on the boundary between the county of Down on the left and the counties of Armagh and Louth on the right. It is all tidal, comprises a considerable area of tideway, and connects the Newry Canal navigation with the Irish sea. A rapid about 1½ mile above Warrenpoint obstructed the navigation of Narrow-water and injured the trade of Newry for centuries; but this was completely removed in 1831.

NARROW-WATER, a seat and an old castle, in the parish of Warrenpoint, 1½ mile north-west of the village of Warrenpoint, and on the banks of the Narrow-Water river, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. The mansion is the residence of the Hall family, and is a large modern edifice. The attached demesne comprises nearly 400 acres, extends into the parish of Clonallan, and is rich in wood, general decoration, and both home and distant scenery. The castle overhangs the river at a point where the stream is contracted by a projecting rock; it is supposed to have been built, in the 17th century, by the Duke of Ormond; it consists principally of a massive, square, battlemented tower; and, though converted to the inglorious uses of successively a salt-work and a dog-kennel, it forms a picturesque feature in the vale of the river, and commands a noble view of the gorgeous basin of Lough Carlingford, overhung by the mountains of Carling-ford and Mourne. A regular ferry exists at Narrow-Water, and connects Dundalk, Carlingford, and Flurry-Bridge with Warrenpoint, Rostrevor, and the road leading to Castlewells and Downpatrick.

NASH, a village in the parish of Owenduff, barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands 4½ miles south-south-east of New-Ross, on the road thence to Tintern. Fairs are held on June 24, Aug. 15, and Nov. 20. Pop. not specially returned.

NATENANE, or NANTENANE, a hamlet in the parish of Kilcoleman, barony of Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. Post-town, Milltown. Fairs are held on Whit-Tuesday and Wednesday. Pop. not specially returned.

NATHLASH (Str.), or NICHOLAS (Str.), a parish in the barony of Fernoy, 1½ mile south of Kildorrery, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of ROCKMILLS: which see. Length and breadth, each 1 mile; area, 1,024 acres. Pop., in 1831, 869; in 1841, 899. Houses 151. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 438. Houses 68. The surface consists of good land; and is drained by the river Funcheon, and traversed by the route of the projected railway from Dublin to Cork.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £120. The rectory of Nathlash and the vicarage of KILDORRERY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Nathlash. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 1½. Pop., in 1831, 2,848. Gross income, £279 11s.; nett, £253 2s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Ahern, in the dio. of Cloyne; and is non-resident in Nathlash. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d., and an allowance of £13 6s. 11d. for a house. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and was interiorly fitted up at the private expense of the late Richard Aldworth, Esq. Sittings 100; attendance 50. There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Kildorrery. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 62, and the Roman Catholics to 831; the Protestants of the union to 90, and the Roman Catholics to 2,880; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 27 children; and 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with an unreported sum from subscription—had on their books 44 boys and 11 girls.

NAUGHAVAL. See NOUGHAVAL.

NAULE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the north border of the barony of West Balrothery, and of the county of Dublin, Leinster. Length, southward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,627 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 758; in 1841, 756. Houses 126. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 542; in 1841, 539. Houses 89. The surface consists of middle-rate land. A height, whose western declivity is within the eastern boundary, has an altitude of 586 feet above sea-level. The Delvin river divides the parish from co. Meath. The seats are Westown and Reynoldstown. See WESTOWN. The road from Drogheda to Dublin, by way of Nag's-Head and Ballyboghil, passes through the interior. The village of Naule stands on this road, on the river Delvin, and on the road from Garristown to Balbriggan, 3½ miles east-north-east of Garristown, and 4 west-south-west of Balbriggan. Area, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 216; in 1841, 217. Houses 37. Fairs are held on March 16, April 26, May 21, Oct. 2, and Sept. 8. At the village are the parish-church, a Roman Catholic chapel, an old castle, and a police barrack. The adjacent country is beautiful and romantic in its scenery, and rich and sylvan in its dress. The vale of Naule or the Roches, traversed by the limpid waters of the Delvin river, is a picturesque glen, screened by a chain of expressively-featured hills, overhung at the height of about 150 feet by the Castle of Naule, enlivened with the cascade of the Roches, and enriched in scenic power and romance, with the intersection of rocks, and the perforation of numerous cavities and caverns, the constant resort of the fox and the hare. The Castle of Naule boldly crowns a rocky and precipitous height, and forms a striking feature in the landscape. This pile was probably erected by the Anglo-Norman family of De Genneville, who obtained from Hugh De Lacy, Lord of Meath, large grants of land within his ample principality; it passed by marriage, in the 14th century, to Sir Robert Cruise of Grallagh and Tyrrelstown, the descendant of a Danish family; it was forfeited, in 1641, by Christopher Cruise, Esq., the descendant of Sir Robert; and the manor connected with it afterwards became the property partly of the Hussey family of Westown, and partly of the Tennison family of Castle-Tennison, in co. Roscommon.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of HOLLYWOOD [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £16 8s. 2d., and the rectorial for £130 15s.; and the latter are inappropriate in William Dutton Pollard, Esq. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 100; attendance 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Hollywood and Clonmethan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 744; and a pay daily school had on its books 20 boys and 25 girls.

NAVAN (LOWER), a barony of the county of Meath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Upper Kells and Morgallion; on the north-east, by Upper Slane; on the east and south-east, by Skreen; on the south, by Upper Navan; and, on the west, by Lune and Upper Kells. Length, south-eastward, 8½ miles; extreme breadth, 6; area, 25,835 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches,—of which 82 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches are in the river Boyne. The surface is a low, flat, and prevalently fertile portion of the great plain of Meath. The Boyne flows along the eastern boundary.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Balrath-Boyne and Donaghpatrick, and the whole of the parishes of Ardbracon, Ardsallagh, Churchtown, Donaghmore, Dunmoe, Liscarton, Martry, Navan, and Rataine. The only town is the chief part of Navan; and the principal village is Bohermeen. Pop., in 1831, 16,234; in 1841, 15,873. Houses 2,572. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,708; in manufactures and trade, 763; in other pursuits, 365. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 60; on the directing of labour, 1,055; on their own manual labour, 1,567; on means not specified, 154. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,670; who could read but not write, 1,312; who could neither read nor write, 3,166. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,264; who could read but not write, 1,537; who could neither read nor write, 4,162.—Lower Navan lies partly within the Poor-law union of Navan, and partly within that of Kells. The total number of tenements valued is 2,743; and of these, 1,844 were valued under £5,—323, under £10,—146, under £15,—91, under £20,—90, under £25,—45, under £30,—68, under £40,—25, under £50,—and 111, at and above £50. The annual value of the property rated is £28,734 11s. 3d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer, 1841, was £943 18s.

NAVAN (UPPER), a barony of the county of Meath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Lower Navan; on the east, by Lower Deece; on the south, by Lower Moyfenragh; and, on the west and north-west, by Lunc. Length, eastward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 5; area, 17,651 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches,—of which 92 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches are in the river Boyne. The surface is low and flat, but fertile and ornate. The Boyne traces most of the southern boundary, and all the eastern boundary. The prevailing soil of the land is a rich earth of various depths, on a substratum of limestone gravel, limestone rock, and in some places ferruginous clay and gravel. But the lands along most of the immediate banks of the Boyne, downward from Trim, consist chiefly of a cold clay; and though they might be greatly and very facily improved by intermixture with the immediately subjacent stratum of limestone gravel, they are allowed to remain in too cold and retentive a condition.—This barony contains part of the parish of Trim, and the whole of the parishes of Bective, Clonmacduff, Kilcooley, Moymet, Newtownclonnan, and Tullaghanoge. The only town is part of Trim. Pop., in 1831, 4,857; in 1841, 4,800. Houses 836. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 509; in manufactures and trade, 170; in other pursuits, 90. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 28; on the directing of labour, 243; on their own manual labour, 583; on means not specified, 5. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 725; who could read but not write, 418; who could neither read nor write, 1,021. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 364; who could read but not write, 517; who could neither read nor write, 1,243.—Upper Navan lies partly within the Poor-law union of Trim, and partly within that of Navan. The total number of tenements valued is 836; and of these, 516 were valued under £5,—104, under £10,—37, under £15,—30, under £20,—16, under £25,—12, under £30,—22, under £40,—13, under £50,—and 86, at and above £50. The annual value of the property rated is £16,763 2s. 6d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer, 1841, was £567 7s. 6d.

NAVAN, a parish in the barony of Lower Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the greater part of the town of NAVAN: see next article. Length, north-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 2½; area, 3,544 acres, 3 roods,—of which 20 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 5,292; in 1841, 6,834. Houses 1,174. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 876; in 1841, 1,847. Houses 352. The Boyne traces the whole of the eastern boundary. The land is, for the most part, low, flat, and of medium quality. The principal rural seats are Belmont, Fairview, Leighsbrook, Brady's-Building, Millbrook, Blackcastle-house, and Petersville. The mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen, and the routes of the railways projected by the Public Commissioners from Dublin to Enniskillen and Armagh, pass through the interior.—This parish is nominally a vicarage, but practically a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £275; glebe, £65s. The nominal vicarages, but practical rectories of Navan, DONAGHMORE, and ARDSALLA [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Navan. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 5½. Pop., in 1831, 7,713. Gross income, £728 15s.; nett, £657 5s. 6d. Patron, the Crown. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1818, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. and a loan of £1,015 7s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 130, exclusive of military. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Robins-town in Bective. *In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 192 Churchmen, 6 Presbyterians, and 5,163 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 270 Churchmen, 6 Presbyterians, and 7,585 Roman Catholics; 12 daily schools in the parish had on their books 423 boys and 251 girls; and 16 daily schools in the union had on their books 506 boys and 317 girls. One of the schools in the parish was partly supported by an estate in Queen's co., worth £600 per annum, and bequeathed by Alderman Preston, for the support of this school, and of one at Ballyroan; each of two was salaried with £15 a-year from the National Board, and one of these two with £15 from collections in the Roman Catholic chapel; one was a Roman Catholic boarding and daily school; and one was attached to a convent, and taught by the nuns. In 1842, the Navan National male school was salaried with £23 from the Board, and had on its books 305 boys; the Navan National female school was salaried with £21 from the Board, and had on its books 256 girls; the Navan Commons National school was salaried with £14 from the Board, and had on its books 113 boys and 97 girls; and the Navan Workhouse National school had on its books 20 boys and 26 girls. There is also a Roman Catholic diocesan seminary at Navan.

NAVAN,

A post and market town, one of the chief towns of Meath, and formerly a parliamentary borough, partly in the parish of Athlumney, barony of Skreen, and partly in the parish of Donaghmore, barony of Lower Navan, but chiefly in the parish of Navan, barony of Lower Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the rivers Boyne and Blackwater, on the road from Mullingar to Drogheda, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen, 6 miles south-west of Slane, 6½ north-north-west of Trim, 9 south-east by east of Kells, 9 north-north-west of Dunshaughlin, 9 east-north-east of Athboy, 9½ south by east of Nobber, 10 north by west of Summerhill, 12½ west-south-west of Drogheda, and 22 north-west by north of Dublin.

General Description.—The surrounding country is an expanse of low and fertile land, considerably beautified by georgical improvements and demesne decorations. In the vicinity of the town are the seats of Athlumney, Peter P. Metge, Esq., Greenmount, the Rev. Robert Thomson, the villa of John Metge, Esq., Blackcastle, Richard Ruxton Fitzherbert, Esq., the well-wooded demesne of Swinartin, Ardmulchan, Robert Taaffe, Esq., and various agreeable villas and minor mansions; and several press quite close upon the town, while others stretch out such sheets of wood, as to render the environs pleasing. The town stands at the confluence of the Blackwater with the Boyne; and has a small section on the right bank of the Boyne, a larger section on the left bank of the Boyne and left bank of the Blackwater, and its principal section on the left bank of the Boyne and right bank of the Blackwater. The three sections of the town may be designated, in reference to their mutual position, respectively the eastern, the north-western, and the south-western divisions; and they are conveniently connected by bridges across both of the rivers. The eastern division consists of a very small but regularly aligned cluster of lanes, along the terminal part of the canal which completes to Navan the navigation of the Boyne. The north-western section consists principally of one street, extending 450 yards north-north-eastward from the bridge across the Blackwater, and another extending 180 yards west-north-westward from the middle of the preceding. The south-western division, or main body, consists principally of a central, triangular, open area,—a street extending 210 yards north-eastward from the central area to the bridge across the Blackwater,—a street extending 60 yards eastward from the central area to the bridge across the Boyne,—a street extending 500 yards south-south-eastward from the central area, in a line near the margin of the Boyne, and parallel with its course,—a street extending 900 yards south-westward from the central area, along the road to Trim, and forking, near its end, into the road also to Athboy,—a street extending north-westward and south-eastward, intersecting the middle of the preceding street at right angles, and leading out north-westward along the road to Kells,—and two irregular clusters of houses, the one leading out to the barrack, and the other straddling round the church and the Roman Catholic chapel. The eastern section of the town is the Athlumney division, and is often called Athlumney; the north-western section is quite modern, constitutes the Donaghmore division, and frequently bears the name of Polbwee; and the south-western section constitutes Navan-Propert, in the parish of Navan, and contains all the town's distinctive features. The houses of the principal streets are very irregularly built; those of the subordinate streets are very poor dwellings; and those in the town's outskirts are miserable huts.

Public Buildings.—An abbey for regular canons was founded at Navan, in the 12th century, by the family of Nangle; and in the 31st year of Henry VIII., it was surrendered to the Crown. In 1488, Richard Nangle or D'Angulo, the abbot of this establishment, took part with other ecclesiastics in the rebellious attempt to place Lambert Simnel on the throne; and he received from Henry VII. a pardon for his offence. Athlumney-castle, in the south-eastern outskirts of the Athlumney suburb, exhibits the extensive and picturesque ruins of a spacious mansion, in the style of domestic architecture which prevailed in the 17th century, combined with the harsher vestiges of a fortified building. A mound and the ruins of Athlumney church are situated in the vicinity of the castle. A remarkably high and extensive moat occurs in the western vicinity of Navan, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile west of the confluence of the Blackwater with the Boyne, and commands a good view of the town, and of the circumjacent expanse of rich and beautiful country. The parish-church is a commodious structure, situated on the west side of the street which extends near the Boyne, and parallel with its course. The Roman Catholic chapel is a very spacious Grecian structure, 170 yards west of the parish-church. The barrack occupies the site of the quondam abbey, on the right bank of the Blackwater. The bridewell possesses the usual accommodation, and is kept in a clean and orderly condition; and its keeper receives a salary of £40. The court-house and the market-house present no particular feature. The infirmary for the county of Meath is situated at Navan; and, in 1839-40, it received £3 3s. from subscription, £642 18s. 9d. from public grants, and £14 18s. from other sources, expended £221 16s. 10d. in salaries to medical officers, £177 6s. 7d. for medicines, and £707 5s. 4d. for contingencies, and admitted 337 patients. The Navan fever hospital serves principally for Navan Poor-law union, and, in 1839-40, it received £500 from public grants, expended £100 in salaries to medical officers, £40 for medicines, and £360 for contingencies, and admitted 542 patients. The Navan dispensary serves for a district of 33,033 acres, with a pop. of 16,440; and, in 1839-40, it received £164 10s., expended £164 16s., and administered to 2,724 patients.

Trade.—Navan, in consequence of the opening of the Boyne navigation hence to Drogheda, has become a place of considerable trade, and may be considered as in a steadily prosperous condition. Its advantageous situation in the centre of a great and rich agricultural country, commands for it a very extensive trade in farm produce; and its abundant supply of fresh water, and profusion of available water-power, cause it to figure largely in the flour trade. Among the mills and manufactures either in the town itself or in its immediate vicinity, are five corn-mills, two paper-mills, two distilleries, one tannery, and various appliances for brewing, for spinning, for frieze-making, and for sacking manufacture. Weekly markets are held on Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on the third Monday of Jan., Easter-Monday, Trinity-Monday, the fourth Monday of July, the second Monday of Sept., the fourth Monday of Oct., and the first Monday of Dec. Navan is the diverging point of the lines of proposed railway from Dublin toward respectively Enniskillen and Armagh; and it possesses an abundance of public conveyances. In 1841, the Navan Loan Fund had a capital of £1,504, circulated £7,785 in 1,854 loans, cleared a nett profit of £28 8s. 10d., and expended for charitable purposes £10.

Poor-law Union.—The Navan Poor-law union ranks as the 50th, and was declared on June 25, 1839. It lies wholly in co. Meath, and comprehends an area of 93,327 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 34,482. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are Navan, 9,799; Ardbraccan, 4,744; Bective, 1,041; Tara, 1,550; Ardmulcan, 1,459; Kentstown, 1,475; Painestown, 2,170; Donaghpatrick, 2,882; Castle-town, 3,042; Rathkenny, 1,995; Stockallen, 1,825; and Slane, 2,500. The number of elected guardians is 21, and of ex-officio guardians is 7; and of the former, 5 are chosen by the division of Navan, 3 by Ardbraccan, 2 each by Painestown, Donaghpatrick, and Castletown, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The following are the baronies whole or part of which lie within the union, together with the number of valued tenements in each: Lower Deece, 16; Lower Duleek, 586; Upper Kells, 93; Morgallion, 978; Lower Navan, 2,668; Upper Navan, 106; Skreen, 967; and Upper Slane, 1,178. The total number of tenements valued is 6,592; and of these, 4,262 were valued under £5,—600, under £10,—380, under £15,—222, under £20,—186, under £25,—98, under £30,—172, under 40,—85, under £50,—and 494, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £111,157 8s. 4d.; the total number of persons rated is 6,592; and of these, 3,168 were rated at a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,164, not exceeding £2,—506, not exceeding £3,—272, not exceeding £4,—and 207, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on July 30, 1840,—to be completed in Nov. 1841,—to cost £5,700 for building and completion, and £1,081 9s. 2d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches, obtained for £433 10s. 10d. of purchase-money, and £80 of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 500 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was May 4, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,133 3s. 10d.; and the total previous expenditure was £734 9s. 10d. The total expenditure in 1843 was £1,701 4s. 3d. The number of pauper inmates on Jan. 1, 1844, was 284. The medical charities within the union are the infirmary and the fever hospital at Navan, and dispensaries at Castletown, Kentstown, Navan, and Slane; and, in 1839-40, they received £296 5s. from subscription, £1,381 4s. 9d. from public grants, and £14 18s. from other sources, expended £685 16s. 10d. in salaries to medical officers, £323 7s. 11d. for medicines, and £1,123 18s. 4d. for contingencies, and administered to 879 intern and 5,080 extern patients.

Municipal Affairs.—Navan was incorporated by charter of 9 Edward IV.; and it also possesses charters of 9 Henry VII., 21 James I., 13 Charles II., and 4 James II. The limits defined by charter exclude a portion of the town on the side toward Drogheda, and extend about half-a-mile beyond it on the side toward Dublin, and nearly two miles beyond it on the side toward Trim. The corporation, according to charter, was called "The Portreeve, Burgesses, and Freemen of the Town or Borough of Navan;" and had as its officers one portreeve, and sometimes a deputy-portreeve, 12 burgesses, one town-clerk, and two sergeants-at-mace. The burgesses were elected for life from among the freemen; and, in 1833, they amounted to nine,—three of whom were brothers of Lord Tara, and two were Lord Ludlow and his land-agent, while only one was resident within the borough. No Protestant dissenter or Roman Catholic was ever admitted to the freedom. The corporation possessed no exclusive jurisdiction; and a borough court, which was presided over by the portreeve or his deputy, became extinct in 1820. Landed property, to the extent of about 1,200 acres, formerly belonged to the corporation, and was called the Commons of Navan; but it was from time to time encroached upon and enclosed by tenants of the neighbouring landlords, and its various portions passed, at the expiry of the leases of these tenants, into the landlords' own possession. A court of quarter-sessions is held in the town twice a-year; and a court of petty-sessions on every Monday. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary. The streets are neither lighted nor watched; the principal ones are treated as part of the county roads, and kept in repair by grand-jury presentment; but the smaller streets and the cross thoroughfares are not regarded as part of the county roads, and both they and the bridges are usually in a wretched condition. Navan sent two members to the Irish parliament from the second year of Elizabeth till the Legislative union; but Lords Tara and Ludlow practically possessed all its franchise, and they received, in equal portions, the whole of the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement.

Statistics.—Area of the Athlumney section of the town, 20 acres. Pop., in 1841, 33. Houses 6. Area of the Donaghmore section, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 608. Houses 99. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36; in manufactures and trade, 43; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 51; on their own manual labour, 40; on means not specified, 11. Area of the Navan-parish section, 132 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,416; in 1841, 4,987. Houses 822. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 347; in manufactures and trade, 448; in other pursuits, 210. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 439; on their own manual labour, 437; on means not specified, 113. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,026; who could read but not write, 370; who could neither read nor write, 917. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 532; who could read but not write, 467; who could neither read nor write, 1,203.

History.—Navan is said to have been one of the towns which were walled and rendered defensible by Hugh De Lacy, immediately after the Anglo-Norman conquest; and it was, during many subsequent ages, a place of considerable importance. An act of the 34th year of Henry VIII. directs that "every ploughed-land within the county of Meath and West-Meath, used to be charged with subsidie, and not free from imposition, shall be, during the term of 4 years, charged with the sum of 3 shillings and 4 pence, towards building the walls of the town of Navan." The Nangle family, at the sub-partition of Meath, obtained a grant of Navan, with attached palatinate privileges; and they took from this estate the title of baron. Dr. Beaufort, the author of the Ecclesiastical Map of Ireland, and of the Memoir explanatory of that map, held for some time the benefice of Navan, but resided within the county of Louth.

NAVAN, a large rath or very ancient earthwork, in the parish of Eglisli, barony and county of Armagh, Ulster. It is situated 2 miles west of the city of Armagh, on the north side of the road thence to Caledon and Tyman. "In its general character," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "it resembles the hill of Tara, and is more picturesque, though less extensive. It is said to have been the site of the palace of Eamhain, erected A.M. 3603; adjoining to it was a 'House of the Red-branch Knights,' and to this day every place in the neighbourhood retains a name similar to that which it might have borne before the Christian era; thus, for example, 'a townland close beside the hill is still denominated Creeve Roe,—a name which in English letters expresses the very sound designated in the Irish characters by the words Craobh Ruadh—the Red-Branch.' It is impossible to examine this rath without being fully convinced that, huge as it is, it was the produce of human labour. Various relics of antiquity are dug up from time to time in its vicinity; so numerous, indeed, that a cottager seldom occupies a day in delving a field without striking his spade against some record of long past ages,—arrow-heads, continually; sometimes a spear head, or a skeine, and now and then a brooch or ring of costly workmanship."

NEAGH (LOUGH), a great lake, an inland sea, in the centre of the eastern half of the province of Ulster. It is very nearly as large as the lake of Geneva; and is second in size to no other lake in Europe, except Lake Ladoga in Russia, and Lake Vener in Sweden. It extends from north to south between the county of Antrim in the east, and the counties of Tyrone and Londonderry on the west; and its foot belongs to Antrim, its head to Armagh, and a tiny portion of its south-east corner to Down. The baronies among which it is politically distributed are Upper Toome, Lower Massarene, and Upper Massarene, in Antrim; Lower Iveagh, in Down; East O'Neilland and West O'Neilland, in Armagh; Dungannon, in Tyrone; and Loughisholin, in Londonderry. Its length, from south to north, is 14 miles; its length, in diagonal lines from south-east to north-west, and from south-west to north-east, is respectively 15 and 16; and its breadth, from east to west, but exclusive of a contracted portion at its northern extremity, is from 6 to 8½. Its area, in the parochial portions in which the Ordnance Survey exhibits it, are, within the barony of Upper Toome and county of Antrim, 1,682 acres, 1 rood, 11 perches in the parish of Dunane, 11,471 acres, 2 roods, 23 perches in Drummaul, 2,691 acres, 2 roods in Cranfield, and 523 acres, 27 perches in Antrim; within the barony of Lower Massarene and county of Antrim, 1,518 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches in the grange of Muckamore, and 19,734 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches in the parish of Killead; within the barony of Upper Massarene and county of Antrim, 708 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches in the parish of Camlin, 9,219 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches in Glenavy, and 2,415 acres, 21 perches in Aghagallon; within the barony of Lower Iveagh and county of Down, 138 acres, 23 perches in the parish of Shankill; within the barony of East O'Neilland and county of Armagh, 223 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches in Shankill, 1,236 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches in Seagoe, and 12,178 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches in Montiaighs; within the barony of West O'Neilland and county of Armagh, 1,917 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches in Tartaraghan; within the barony of Dungannon and county of Tyrone, 2,940 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches in Clonee, 3,062 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches in Ballyclog, 21,000 acres, 39 perches in Arboe, and 322 acres, 22 perches in Ballinderry; and within the barony of Loughisholin and county of Londonderry, 2,978 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches in Ballinderry, and 2,181 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches in Artrea. The surface-elevation of the lake above low-water sea-level is 48 feet. The principal bays are Antrim bay at the north-east corner, Sandy bay and Burtin's bay in the east, and Washing bay in the south-west. The principal headlands are Grove Point at the west side of the entrance of Antrim bay; Ardmore Point, Gartree Point, Hog Park, and Tolan's Point, in the east; Ardmore Point in the south; Rooskey Point in the south-west; Black Point, Kiltagh Point, Arboe Point, Anneeter Point, and Mullian Point, in the west; and Tryad Point and Knockasurf Point in respectively the west side and the east side of the commencement of a bay which leads out on the north-west, to the exit northward of the lake's superfluous waters. The islands are few, very small, and all situated near the shores; and the chief are Ram's Island, crowned by a pillar-tower, in Sandy bay,—Bird's Island at the south-east corner,—Coney Island in the south-west, near the influx of the Blackwater river,—and Skady Island, and the Three Islands, in the north. The principal streams which flow into Lough Neagh are the Maine river, and the Six-Mile-Water into Antrim bay, the Crumlin and the Glenavy rivulets into Sandy bay, the Upper Bann river into nearly the middle of the south, the Blackwater river into the south-west, the Ballinderry rivulet into the west, and the Moyola rivulet into the north-west; and the whole of the superfluous waters are discharged northward from the north-west corner, and form there the Lower Bann river, which flows between Antrim and Londonderry, and across the north-east corner of the latter county to the northern Atlantic ocean. The depth of Lough Neagh in nearly all its central and its southern parts varies from 39 to 42 feet; its extreme depth occurs a little south of Skady island, and is 102 feet; its depth over a few "flats" or shoals in the central parts varies from 19 to 32 feet; and its depth over most of the south end, and near the eastern and western shores, varies from 2 to 26 feet. Several good landing-places and ports occur in each great sweep of shore, and are more or less used by numerous craft which navigate the lake; and the Lagan navigation or canal goes off from the south-east corner to carry vessels down to the sea at Belfast,—the Upper Bann river takes craft to the Newry canal, along which they are conveyed past Newry to the sea at Lough Carlingford,—and the Blackwater river communicates with both the short navigation to the Tyrone coal-field, and the new and long navigation by the Ulster canal to Upper Lough Erne. The waters of Lough Neagh usually attain a surface-elevation in winter about 7 feet higher than that of summer; and they, in consequence, effect wide-spread inundations every season,—covering upwards of 50,000 acres of good land, and a vast aggregate of bog-lands and morasses; while, about probably every 15 years, they achieve so great and expansive a flood as threatens to render a large portion of the peopled shores totally uninhabitable. Very much of the land on the immediate shores is so low and constantly morassy, as to be unimprovable except by considerably draining the lake; and even if a considerable draining could be effected, the reclamation of land would perhaps be dearly purchased by the damaging or destruction of the navigation. The shores all round, though occasionally a little bold, and somewhat curved and indented, never rise to any considerable elevation, and are, for the most part, so flat and tame as rarely to depart from almost a dead level. They, therefore, possess none of such expressive and imposing scenery as distinguishes most of the second-rate and many of the small lakes and sea-loughs of Ireland; and yet they boast some fine demesnes, and exhibit much of that kind of beauty which mere arboriculture and landscape gardening can produce upon a good soil, with an undiversified surface. Fish of various kinds, particularly perch, trout, bream, and the dollych or char, are abundant. Medicinal properties were at one time ascribed to the waters of the lake; but, if not quite imaginary, seem to have belonged to the influx of some mineral springs from the neighbouring land, and of course to have been confined to small and special localities. A petrifying power was long universally believed, and is still occasionally contended, to exist in the lake; but this power, so far as it is a reality, resides not in the water of the lake, but in the soil of some portions of the shores.

NEALE, a village in the parish of Kilmolara, barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Ballinrobe to Cong, 3 miles south of Ballinrobe, and 3 north-north-east of Cong. It is an airy and pleasant place, almost or altogether free from the squalidness which prevails in most Irish villages of its size. At the south end of it is a good schoolhouse; at the north end of it is the neat, small church of the benefice, ornamented with a small tower; and in its immediate vicinity is the demesne of Neale, the property but seldom the residence of Lord Kilmain, possessing some curious features, but presided over by an unimposing and neglected-looking mansion. The village is a constabulary station. Its site commands a fine view of the Plains of Ellintrin, the basin and bosom of Lough Mask, and the frontier heights as well as prospective summits of Joyce-Country. Fairs are held on Feb. 5, May 6, Aug. 4, and Nov. 5. The Neale and Cong dispensary is within the Ballinrobe Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 40,308 acres, with a pop. of 14,463; and, in 1840-41, it expended £59, and administered to 1,200 patients. The pious author of a recent popular Commentary on the New Testament, "by a Clergyman of the Church of Ireland," wrote and published that work while he was curate of Neale, and a resident in the village. Area of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 196. Houses 34.

NECARN, a demesne in the parish of Derryvullane, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south of Irvinestown, barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It is a pleasant and well-wooded expanse of ground, the property and residence of William D'Arcy, Esq.; and it is presided over by a small but handsome castle, of quite recent erection.

NEDDANS, or NEPDINS, a parish in the barony of West Iifa and Offa, 6 miles south-west by west of Clonmel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length and breadth, each 24 miles; area, 2,384 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 35 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches are in the river Suir. Pop., in 1831, 616; in 1841, 706. Houses 104. The surface consists of excellent arable land, and is traversed lengthwise or south-eastward by the Suir. The seats are Neddans-house, Monroe-house, Lacken-house, and Corabella-house. The antiquities are the ruins of a church, and the site of a castle.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDFINNAN [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £80; glebe, £4 4s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £105, and are impropriate in Mrs. Emily Cudworth of Clonmel. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

NEDEEN, a hamlet in the immediate vicinity of the small town of Kenmare, and on the north bank of the Kenmare river, co. Kerry, Munster.

NEIR, or SLIEVENEIR, one of the summits of the Mourne mountains, co. Down, Ulster.

NENAGH (THE), a river of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It rises in two headstreams among the western declivities of the Devil-Bit mountains; and runs about 12 miles north-westward, past the town of Nenagh, to Lough Derg.

NENAGH, a parish, containing a post and market town of the same name, in the baronies of Lower and Upper Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south by eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2. Area of the Lower Ormond section, 2,020 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches; of the Upper Ormond section, 1,861 acres, 2 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 9,159; in 1841, 9,540. Houses 1,477. Pop. of the rural districts of the Lower Ormond section, in 1841, 243. Houses 44. Pop. of the rural districts of the Upper Ormond section, in 1831, 693; in 1841, 679. Houses 105. The surface consists, in a general view, of prime land; it is watered by the Nenagh river, and traversed by the roads from Limerick to Birr and Dublin; and it is all champaign, and lies upon a basin of about 100 feet of mean elevation above sea-level. The chief rural seats are Monroe-house, Brook-Watson-house, Solsborough-house, Summerville, Ballintogher-house, and Castle-Willington,—the last the residence of John Willington, Esq. The ruins of a castle occur in the south-west; and other objects of interest will be noticed in connection with the town.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £350 0s. 11d.; glebe, £10. The rectories of Nenagh, and KILRICHA [see that article], constitute the benefice of Nenagh. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 10,606. Gross income, £666 10s. 6d.; nett, £606 18s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1810, by means of a loan of £1,200 from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £276 18s. 5½d. raised by subscription. Sittings 500; attendance 400. The Roman Catholic chapel has 4 officiates, and an attendance of 2,000. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 615 Churchmen, 32 Protestant dissenters, and 8,084 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 667 Churchmen, 33 Protestant dissenters, and 9,505 Roman Catholics; and 8 daily schools in the parish and union—one of which was connected with the National Board, and one salaried with £20 a-year from the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 459 boys and 122 girls. In 1842, the National Board had two schools in Nenagh, and one in Nenagh workhouse.

NENAGH,

A post and market town, and the capital of the north riding of the county of Tipperary, in the parish of Nenagh, baronies of Lower and Upper Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands near the Nenagh river, and on the joint road from Limerick to Birr and Dublin, 3½ miles south-east of Youghal bay in Lough Derg, 5½ west of Toomavara, 8 south by west of BORRIS-O'-KANE, 9 east-north-east of Killaloe, 15 south by east of Portumna, 15½ west-south-west of Roscrea, 19 south-west by south of Birr, 19½ north-east of Limerick, and 74½ south-west of Dublin.

General Description.—“Perhaps in the whole south of Ireland,” says a graphic writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, “there is not a more beautiful or valuable district than the baronies of Ormond, in the centre of which Nenagh stands, surrounded on all sides by mountains of grand and varied forms—some of which are highly metalliferous—bounded on the west by a broad and truly picturesque part of the Shannon, a most productive territory, equally good for tillage or pasture, abounding in woods, waters, and game. Never did foot of hound or hoof of horse sweep over a finer sporting country than what its dry and healthy champaign affords. Well might the Milesian O’Kennedys, and the O’Mearas, and the M’Egans, sigh when they surrendered to the Norman Butlers and Graces and Morrisises, these fine fields; and well might they, in their turn, according to the fate of war, retire in sorrow before its present Cromwellian possessors.” Numerous handsome villas and cottages ornées decorate the immediate vicinity of the town, and the district thence to the margin of Lough Derg. The town itself has a comparatively airy, clean, and comfortable appearance; it boasts regular alignment and tolerable edifying in its principal streets; it possesses less meanness, filth, and penury, than many other second-rate towns of Ireland; and it makes, on the whole, a decidedly favourable impression upon the mind of a general tourist through the kingdom.

The Castle.—Nenagh Castle—or as it is popularly called, Nenagh Round—is a conspicuous feature of the town, and, in spite of having been much dilapidated by some of the townspeople, continues to be a very fine monument of Norman military architecture. “Tradition,” says the writer already quoted, “assigns the erection of the fortress to King John; and it certainly bears all the characteristics of a structure of that period, when circular fortifications were almost exclusively used. And the commanding height and massive solidity of its donjon or keep, the wide circuit of its ballium, its well built curtain walls, strengthened by four other circular towers, its lofty and portullised gate, approachable by a high and well flanked causeway; all prove that royal power and royal wealth were required to erect a fortress, which, were it now standing in the fulness of its original design, might stand a comparison with some of the finest border castles of Scotland or Wales.” “Nenagh Castle, though admirably contrived by engineers who knew no other arms of attack than the arrow, the arbalest, or the battering ram, ceased, when gunpowder changed the art of war, to be the stronghold that the Norman power intended it to be; for, placed on the slope of a hill for the sake of securing a supply of water within the fort, it has been obliged to surrender to every commander who could drag ordnance to the heights above it. In the war of 1641, it was seized by the Irish under Owen Roe O’Neil, and again it was torn from his grasp by Lord Inchiquin. The terrible Ireton, when Cromwell left him as his deputy in Ireland, on his way to the siege of Limerick in 1651, battered it from the high ground to the east, and the garrison, finding it untenable, surrendered at discretion, when, as local tradition has it, Ireton caused its governor to be hung out of the topmost window of the keep. Though greatly dismantled, it remained garrisoned, as one of the Duke of Ormond's castles, until the war of 1688, when it fell into the hands of Jlong Anthony Carrol, the descendant of that ancient sept, that once ruled over the district north of Ormond, called Ely Carrol."

"Nenagh Castle was the centre of Carrol's operations; and though the curtain walls were battered down, the inferior towers almost levelled, and the keep unroofed, still he held it, to the great annoyance of the English, until it was found necessary to detach a brigade against it, under General Leveson, upon whose approach Carrol evacuated it after burning down the town. There is reason to believe that, after the war of the revolution was over, Nenagh Castle was still retained as a place of arms; and tradition speaks of a Sir William Hamilton, who, as its last seneschal, held it under the Ormond family. Like every monument of ecclesiastical or military antiquity in Ireland, this extensive ruin has suffered more from the work of man than the impression of ages. Indeed, the tower, from the massiveness of its structure and the durability of its material, seems almost to defy the tooth of time. But certainly the townsmen have done their worst in dilapidating, disfiguring, and rendering the present approaches to it as disagreeable as they are difficult."

Other Public Buildings.—In the year 1200, an hospital was founded at Nenagh for the sick and the infirm, and was placed under the care of canons regular of the order of St. Augustine. This institution was called Teach-lon, or St. John's House; it was largely endowed by Theobald Walter, the first Butler of Ireland; and it furnished to each sick person, who was admitted to its hospitality, a daily allowance of a good loaf, a plentiful bowl of ale from the cellar, and a dish of meat from the kitchen.—A monastery for Franciscans was founded at Nenagh, some say by one of the Butlers, others say by one of the O'Kennedys; it is reported to have been the richest house belonging to the Franciscans in Ireland; it was, in 1344, the meeting-place of a provincial chapter of the Franciscan order; and one of its friars wrote a historical work, which has acquired some note among antiquaries, and is often quoted under the name of the Annals of Nenagh. Some ruins of this monastery are still standing.—The modern public buildings, consisting of the parish-church, the Roman Catholic chapel, a large infantry barracks, a gaol, a court-house, a poor-law workhouse, and other public structures suitable to a large provincial town, the seat of a poor-law union, and the assize town of the moiety of a great county, have aggregately a somewhat imposing effect, but individually possess no remarkable feature.—The Nenagh gaol, or gaol for the north riding of the county of Tipperary, is a quite new structure, occupied for the first time in 1842; it possesses sufficient accommodation for all the purposes of classification and discipline, short of the system of total separation; it even contains 52 cells large enough for the practice of that system, but not yet treated as the law requires; and it contains, in total, 192 cells, 20 day or work rooms, 11 yards, a chapel, good separate hospitals, a tread-wheel, a public kitchen, laundry, and officers' apartments. During the year 1843, the average number of prisoners confined was 126; the highest number was 172; the total number, inclusive of debtors, was 1,109; the number of re-committals was 44; and the total expenditure was £2,268 8s. 11d.

Trade, &c.—Nenagh probably enjoys the presence of a larger portion of resident gentry than any other inland town of its size in Ireland, and is as prosperous as any Irish town of its population can be, without the aid of any manufacture, or of considerable trade. Dromineer, one of the Lough Derg stations of the Shannon Navigation Company, is situated 4½ miles north-west of Nenagh, and may be considered as its port. No projected railway, however, approaches nearer the town than the valley of the Upper Suir, or the east base of the Devil's-Bit mountains. In 1838, the public conveyances were a car to Borris-o'-kane, a coach to Limerick, a car to Roscrea, and a coach and a mail-coach in transit between Limerick and Dublin. Fairs are held on April 24, May 29, July 4, Aug. 1, Sept. 4, and Oct. 10. Nenagh has a savings' bank, a loan fund, and public branch-offices of the National Bank of Ireland and the Tipperary Joint Stock Bank; and it is the residence of two stipendiary magistrates, the head-quarters of the constabulary force for the north riding of Tipperary, and the seat of the assize-court for that riding, of a court of quarter-sessions, and of a weekly court of petty-sessions. A newspaper, called the Nenagh Guardian, is published in Nenagh on Wednesdays and Saturdays. In 1841, the Nenagh Loan Fund had a capital of £901; circulated £4,019 in 1,553 loans, and realized a nett profit of £11 11s. 7d.

Poor-law Union.—The Nenagh Poor-law union ranks as the 15th, and was declared on Feb. 9, 1839. It lies wholly within co. Tipperary, or in the baronies of Oweiny and Arra, Upper Ormond and Lower Ormond; and comprehends an area of 184,712 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 89,891. The number of elected guardians is 34; and that of ex-officio guardians is 14. The electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, is, in the barony of Oweiny and Arra, Castle-town, 514; Templekelly, 570; Youghal, 407; Kilmastulla, 204; Burgessbeg, 341; Kilcomenty, 334; Killoscully, 276; Killeuerath, 390; and Newport, 462;—in the barony of Upper Ormond, Kilmore, 698; Dolla, 257; Annanadale, 709; Templederry, 244; Ballymackey, 434; Lisbowey, 547; and Kilruane, 200;—and in the barony of Lower Ormond, Nenagh, 1,589; Knigh, 241; Cloghprior, 276; Ardcreney, 396; Kilbarron, 311; Torryglass, 307; Borris-o'-kane, 580; and CloghJordan, 805. The number of valued tenements in the Oweiny and Arra divisions is 3,488; in the Upper Ormond divisions 3,089, in the Lower Ormond divisions 4,505, in the whole union 11,082; and of this total, 5,773 were valued under £5,—2,212, under £10,—958, under £15,—585, under £20,—375, under £25,—227, under £30,—308, under £40,—155, under £50,—and 489, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £136,655 14s. 8d. The workhouse was contracted for to cost £8,320 for building and completion, and £1,580 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 7 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £50,—and to contain accommodation for 1,000 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was April 28, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,333 9s. 11½d., and the total previous expenditure was £2,302 19s. 5d. The expenditure for the year 1843 was £2,827 0s. 6d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 436; on Jan. 1, 1844, 457. The medical charities within the union are fever hospitals at Borris-o'-kane, CloghJordan, and Nenagh; and dispensaries at Birdhill, Borris-o'-kane, CloghJordan, Nenagh, Newport, Portroe, Silvermines, and Toomavara; and, in 1839—40, they received £687 11s. 6d. from subscription, £991 3s. from public grants, and £38 13s. 6d. from other sources, expended £759 10s. 6d. in salaries to medical officers, £228 13s. 6d. for medicines, and £903 15s. 5d. for contingencies, and administered to 1,265 intern and 15,251 extern patients. The Nenagh fever hospital contains 86 beds; it serves for a district containing a pop. of 20,690, yet admits all cases of fever which offer, no matter whence they come; and, in 1839-40, it expended £723 ls., and admitted 955 patients. The Nenagh dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 20,690; and, in 1839-40, it expended £187 15s., and administered to 4,033 patients.

Statistics.—Area of the Upper Ormond section of the town, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 833; in 1841, 857. Houses 144. Families dependent chiefly on agriculture, 95; on manufactures and trade, 56; on other pursuits, 31. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 74; on their own manual labour, 103.—Area of the Lower Ormond section of the town, 157 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,633; in 1841, 7,761. Houses 1,184. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 507; in manufactures and trade, 766; in other pursuits, 383. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 112; on the directing of labour, 780; on their own manual labour, 632; on means not specified, 132. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,535; who could read but not write, 465; who could neither read nor write, 1,141. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 894; who could read but not write, 821; who could neither read nor write, 1,941.

History.—On the subject of the history of Nenagh, we have only to state, in addition to the brief notices already made in connection with the castle and the monasteries, that, in 1370, Brien Oge Menevy O'Brien, in conjunction with the English under the Earl of Desmond, gained a sanguinary victory over his uncle Turlough; and in consequence of this event, his name is known among his countrymen as Brien Catha-an-Aonig.—'Brien of the battle of Nenagh.'

NEPHIN, a mountain in the parishes of Crossmolina and Addergeole, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles south by west of the town of Crossmolina, barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It soars to an altitude of 2,646 feet above sea-level, screens much of the west side of Lough Conn, contributes a chief and a grandly imposing feature to the scenery of that lake, and forms a noble and even sublime background to most of the landscapes of the valley of the Moy. Glen Nephin extends north-north-eastward, along the east base of the mountain, measures about 5 miles in length, and takes along the conjoint road from Newport and Castlebar to Crossmolina. The summit-ground at the head of this glen, separating it from the basin of Lough Beltra and the Newport river, is only about 142 feet above sea-level; so that an artificial navigation might easily be formed to connect Lough Conn at the foot of Glen Nephin, with Clew bay at the mouth of the Newport river. The name of Nephin mountains is often given to the whole of the north-eastern section of the great congeries of uplands which occupies the larger portion of Tyrawley, Erris, and Burrischoole.

NEPHINBEG, a mountain on the mutual border of the baronies of Erris and Burrischoole, 9 miles north by west of Newport, co. Mayo, Connaught. It soars to an altitude of 2,065 feet above sea-level; and often gives name to a large section of the north-western highlands of Mayo. The eastern or mountain road from Newport to Belmullet, passes close to its west base.

NETHERCROSS, a barony in the middle of the northern division of the county of Dublin, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Balrothery; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by the baronies of Coolock and Castleknock; and, on the west, by the county of Meath. Length, eastward, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 21,818 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches. The surface of the mainland consists, for the most part, of excellent arable land; and is all so low that a height of 100 feet above sea-level figures in the Ordnance maps as the principal elevation. The coast consists of the Portrairie and the Malahide estuaries, and the intervening peninsula,—the latter terminating in a bluff promontory of 35 feet in altitude. The Dun rivulet traces the boundary with Meath; and the Broadmeadow river flows eastward through the interior to the head of the Malahide estuary. Lambay Island, though not included in our statement of the barony's length, is included in that of its area, and has an altitude above sea-level of 418 feet. The Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 96, transferred the townlands of Ballymaguire, Balloch, Bishopland, West Baleally, Beau, Bettyville, Broomfield, Causestown, Collinstown, part of Corduff, Corduff Commons, Dunganstown, Dunganstown Common, Great Common, Johnstown, Knights-town, Lusk, Lough Common, New Haggard, Newtowncorduff, Navitt, Parnelstown, Big Rowans, Little Rowans, Rathmooniey, Rogeena, Rallekawstown, Raheny, Regles, Rogerstown, Racecourse Common, Little Tyrellstown, Twoman, Wimbeltown, and Walshestown, in the parish of Lusk, from Nethercross to East Balrothery,—pop., in 1841, 2,126; the whole of the parish of Clonmethan from Nethercross to West Balrothery,—pop. 509; the townlands of Drishoge, Lispopple, and Warblestown, in the parish of Killossory, from Balrothery to Nethercross,—pop. 112; the whole of the parish of Donabate, and the townland of Ballymadrough in the parish of Swords, from Balrothery to Nethercross,—pop. 576; the townlands of Swords glebe, in the parish of Swords, from Nethercross to Coolock,—pop. 5; the townlands of Brazil, Balculty, Boggy-heavy, Killossory, Leas, Mount-Stewart, Rath, North Suralstown, and South Suralstown, in the parish of Killossory, from Coolock to Nethercross,—pop. 212; the whole of the parish of Killeek from Coolock to Nethercross,—pop. 185; the whole of the parish of Kilsulaghan from Castleknock to Nethercross,—pop. 548; and the townlands of Baleskin, North Ballyboggan, South Ballyboggan, Ballygall, Bishopswood, Broghna, Cabragh, Cardiff-Bridge, Cardiff's-Castle, Charlestown, Coldwinters, East Finglass, West Finglass, Finglass-Wood, Glasnevin demesne, Glebe, Great Jamestown, Little Jamestown, Johnstown, Kildonan, Kilsane, Poppintree, Shallon, Springmount, Stang, Stockings, and Tolka, in the parish of Finglass, from Nethercross to Castleknock,—pop. 1,990.—Nethercross, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Donabate, Killossory, Killeek, Kilsulaghan, and Portrairie. The only town is Swords, and the chief village is Donabate. Pop., in 1831, 8,507; in 1841, 6,204. Houses 1,061. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 841; in manufactures and trade, 209; in other pursuits, 173. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 43; on the directing of labour, 363; on their own manual labour, 788; on means not specified, 29. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,082; who could read but not write, 613; who could neither read nor write, 1,077. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 759; who could read but not write, 658; who could neither read nor write, 1,291.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Balrothery, and partly within that of North Dublin. The total number of tenements valued is 1,308; and of these, 705 were valued under £5,—183, under £10,—93, under £15,—53, under £20,—25, under £25,—21, under £30,—36, under £40,—37, under £50,—and 155, at and above £50.

NEW-ABBEY, a demesne and a monastic ruin, on the banks of the river Liffey, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south-east of Kilcullen-Bridge, co. Kildare, Leinster. The monastery was founded in 1460, by Sir Rowland Eustace, for Franciscans of the strict observance; and, in 1582, it was granted to Edmund Spenser, the poet, for the yearly rent of £3 Irish. The steeple fell to the ground about the year 1764; and a large portion of the main body of the pile was employed in the erection of a Roman Catholic chapel; so that the ruins which remain are comparatively small and exceedingly broken. Some vestiges exist, amongst the mass of rubbishy architectural and overwhelmed monuments, of the effigies of the founder of the monastery and his lady,—Sir Rowland in armour, and his lady in the close pointed cap and girdle which were worn in the latter part of the 15th century.

NEW-ARRAN. See KILLEEN, co. Galway.

NEWARTH-BRIDGE, an inn, and a rather distinguished retreat of tourists, in the parish of Rathnew, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the river Vartrey, 1 mile north of the village of Rathnew, and 2 miles east-south-east of the commencement of the Devil's Glen. It stands in a tranquil and most beautiful part of the vale of the Vartrey, in the midst of the most luxuriant vegetation, and close to the late Mrs. Tighe's lovely residence of Rosanna.

NEWBAWN, a parish in the baronies of Bantry and West Shelmaliel, 6 miles south-east by east of New-Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $2\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Bantry section, 2,657 acres, 8 perches; of the West Shelmaliel section, 4,880 acres, 4 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,618; in 1841, 1,703. Houses 281. Pop. of the West Shelmaliel section, in 1841, 1,083. Houses 187. The surface consists of light, sharp soil, suitable for potatoes, oats, and barley, but unfavourable for wheat, meadow, or dairy pasture. The seats are Newbawn-house, Fary-house, Scullahogue-house, and Carricklowm-lodge. The chief antiquities are ruins of two castles, and sites of two churches. The hamlets are Newbawn, Knockroe, Carnacarrigeen, Courthoyle, Iligh-street, and Rochestown. The Newbawn dispensary is within the New-Ross Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 5,082; and, in 1839-40, it expended £51 17s. 4d., and administered to 762 patients. Newbawn figured with frightful prominence in the rebellion of 1798, and was the scene of the horrible tragedy of Scullahogue barn. See SCULLABOGUE. The road from New-Ross to Wexford passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ADAMSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £360 4s. 8d. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at the hamlet of Newbawn, and has an attendance of 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Adamstown and Horetown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 44, and the Roman Catholics to 1,594; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 35 boys and 11 girls.

NEWBERRY. See CASTLE-CARRERY.

NEW-BIRMINGHAM. See BIRMINGHAM (New).

NEWBLISS, a small market and post town, in the parish of Killeevan, barony of Dартry, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It stands on the road from Clones to Ballybay, 3 miles north of Drum, 4 east-south-east of Clones, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Monaghan, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Ballybay. It is a neat and pleasant place, and has a comfortable inn, two schools, a new church, and a Presbyterian meeting-house.

The church was quite recently built, wholly at the cost of private parties. Contiguous to the town is the agreeable demesne of Newbliss-house, the seats of Andrew Ker, Esq.; and in the vicinity are the residence of Glinch-lodge, and the small lakes of Feagh, Spectacle, Corlougharoe, Radeerpark, and Lisalea. Markets are held in the town every week, and are well attended; and fairs are held on the last Saturday of every month. The Newbliss dispensary is within the Clones Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £138 4s., and administered to 3,827 patients. In 1841, the Newbliss Loan Fund had a capital of £1,678, circulated £5,792 in 1,502 loans, and expended £3 for charitable purposes. Area of the town, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 497; in 1841, 566. Houses 99. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 20; in manufactures and trade, 65; in other pursuits, 25. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 70; on their own manual labour, 27; on means not specified, 5.

NEWBOROUGH, a seat of the Daunt family, on the east side of the creek of Oysterhaven, in the parish of Kilmongue, co. Cork, Munster. The present possessor is G. A. Daunt, Esq.

NEWBOROUGH, co. Wexford. See GOREY.

NEWBIDGE, a small market and post town, in the parishes of Great Connell and Morristown-Biller, barony of Connell, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the river Liffey, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Limerick, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Kilcullen-Bridge, $4\frac{1}{2}$ east-north-east of Kildare, $5\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by west of Naas, and 21 south-west by west of Dublin. Here are a large cavalry barrack, a police station, and a Roman Catholic parochial chapel; and in the near vicinity are the ruins of Great Connell abbey, and the seats of Piercestown, Rystown, Great Connell-lodge, Liffey-cottage, Great Connell-house, and Moorefield-house,—the two last the residences of respectively T. E. Power, Esq., and Ponsouby Moore, Esq. Fairs are held at the village on Jan. 1, May 2, Aug. 15, and Nov. 1. The Newbridge dispensary is within the Naas Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 5,715; and, in 1839-40, it expended £98 10s. 7½d., and administered to 2,159 patients. Newbridge derives its name from a bridge which here spans the Liffey; and it gives name to a Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin, and having chapels at Newbridge and Two-mile-house. Area of the Morristown-Biller section of the town, 25 acres. Pop., in 1841, 139. Houses 19. Area of the Great Connell section, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 577; in 1841, 653. Houses 92. Pop. of the whole town, in 1841, 792. Houses 111. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 45; in manufactures and trade, 69; in other pursuits, 50. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 76; on their own manual labour, 67; on means not specified, 17.

NEWBIDGE, a hamlet, in the parish of Castle-Macadam, barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the river Ovoca, and on the road from Rathdrum to Arklow, at the deflexion thence of the road to Ballyarthur and Shelton-abbey, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by east of Rathdrum, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by north of Arklow. Its site is in one of the most exquisitely lovely portions of the beautiful and splendid valley of the Ovoca; and in its near neighbourhood are Castle-Macadam church, Ovoca inn, the mines of Ballymurtagh and Croubane, and the seats of Bellevue, Tinnabinch, Ballygahan, Millmount, Ovoca-lodge, Cherrymount-house,—the last the residence of John Oliver, Esq. Newbridge acquires its name from a bridge upon the Ovoca; and it gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Dublin, and having chapels at Newbridge, Barniska, and Ardincary. Pop. of the hamlet returned with the parish.

NEUBRIDGE, a village in the parish of Hollywood, barony of Lower Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the road from Belfast to Donaghadee, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile east of Belfast, and $\frac{3}{4}$ south-west of Hollywood. It acquires its name from a bridge upon the rivulet called Conn's Water; and may be considered as a sort of extension of the long straggling, eastward street of BALLYMACARRET: see that article. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 405. Houses 59.

NEUBRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Ballyclough, barony of Duhallo, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the river Blackwater, at the forking of the road from Mallow toward respectively Kanturk and Mill-street, 3 miles south-east by east of Kanturk, and $\frac{5}{8}$ west of Mallow. It acquires its name from a bridge upon the Blackwater. Pop. not specially returned.

NEUBRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Rathkeale, barony of Lower Connello, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands upon the river Deel, at the intersection of the road from Askeaton to Rathkeale with that from Shanagolden to Adare, 2 miles south by east of Askeaton, $\frac{2}{3}$ north-north-west of Rathkeale, and $\frac{4}{5}$ east-south-east of Shanagolden. In its vicinity are the seats of Athavilla, Scart, Milltown, Boville, and Waterville. It acquires its name from a bridge upon the Deel. Pop. not specially returned.

NEUBUILDINGS, a village in the parish of Clondermot, barony of Tyrkeeran, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the river Foyle, and on the mail-road from Londonderry to Dublin, $\frac{2}{3}$ miles south-south-west of Londonderry bridge. Area 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 96. Houses 21.

NEUBASTLE, a barony in the south-west of the county of Dublin, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Castleknock; on the east, by Castleknock and Uppercross; on the south, by Uppercross and co. Wicklow; and, on the west, by co. Kildare. Length, southward, 8 miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 22,876 acres, 1 perch, 31 perches, —of which 54 acres, 3 rods, 26 perches are in the river Liffey. A district of 3 miles by 2 in the extreme south is hilly and mountainous, containing the Saggart mountains and their neighbouring heights, and lifting up summits of 584, 565, 663, 721, 592, 1,008, 1,049, and 1,308 feet of altitude above sea-level. The rest of the surface is cut into nearly equal parts by the Grand Canal; consists, in the aggregate, of rich and beautiful champaign ground; and is watered across the north end, by the river Liffey,—whose whole course, while in the barony, is most lovely and luscious. The Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 96, transferred the entire parish of Palmerstown from Newcastle to Uppercross,—pop., in 1841, 1,411; the townlands of Coldeut and Rowlagh, in the parish of Esker, from Newcastle to Uppercross,—pop. 19; the whole of the parish of Ballyfermot, from Newcastle to Uppercross,—pop. 346; the townlands of Butcher's-arms, part of Dolphins-barn, East Inchicore, West Inchicore, parts of East Goldenbridge, and West Goldenbridge, Kilmainham, and part of the village of Islandbridge, in the parish of St. James, from Newcastle to Uppercross,—pop. 3,133; a portion of the parish of St. James, from Newcastle to the City of Dublin,—pop. 3,344; the whole of the parish of Crumlin, from Newcastle to Uppercross,—pop. 1,024; the whole of the parish of Cruagh, from Newcastle to Uppercross,—pop. 579; one townland of the parish of Rathfarnham, from Newcastle to Uppercross,—pop. 75; the remainder of the parish of Rathfarnham, from Newcastle to Rathdown,—pop. 4,394; the whole of the parishes of Kilmabuddrick, Kilbride, and Rathcoole, from Uppercross to Newcastle,—pop. 1,596; and the townland of Blundelstown in the parish of Clondalkin, from Uppercross to Newcastle,—pop. 15.—The barony of Newcastle, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Clondalkin, Esker, and Leixlip, and the whole of the parishes of Aderrig, Kilbride, Kilmabuddrick, Kilmactalway, Lucan, Newcastle, Rathcoole, and Saggart. The towns and chief villages are Lucan, Rathcoole, Saggart, and Newcastle. Pop., in 1831, 21,594; in 1841, 7,397. Houses 1,254. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 966; in manufactures and trade, 203; in other pursuits, 200. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 51; on the directing of labour, 348; on their own manual labour, 928; on means not specified, 42. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,295; who could read but not write, 797; who could neither read nor write, 1,298. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 843; who could read but not write, 937; who could neither read nor write, 1,357.—This barony—measured, however, according to its limits in 1831, and including a portion of population within the parliamentary representation boundary of the City of Dublin—is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Baltinglass, Celbridge, North Dublin, and South Dublin. The total number of tenements valued is 3,025; and of these, 1,460 were valued under £5,—451, under £10,—212, under £15,—158, under £20,—97, under £25,—81, under £30,—134, under £40,—55, under £50,—and 377, at and above £50.

NEUBASTLE, a barony on the coast of the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Rathdown; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by Arklow; and, on the west, by North Ballinacor. Length, south-south-westward, $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 6; area, 52,296 acres, 39 perches,—of which 207 acres, 3 rods are in the Broad Lough. The surface is a beautiful portion of the county, aggregately rich in charming and romantic scenery; but much less mountainous, grand, or wild, than almost any other district of Wicklow. The Glen of the Downs is on the northern boundary, the Devil's Glen in the centre, and part of the vale of the Avonmore on the southern portion of the western boundary. The principal heights, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Carrick mountain, 1,252 feet; a height in the south-west corner, 925 feet; Moneystown hill, 1,272 feet; a height $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west-south-west of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, 1,193 feet; Dunran hill, 1,122 feet; and a height on the northern border, 1,232 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Calary, Derrylossory, Drumkay, Glenealy, and Kilcommon, and the whole of the parishes of Kilcoole, Killisky, Lower Newcastle, Upper Newcastle, and Rathnew. The only town is part of Wicklow; and the chief villages are Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Glenealy, Downs, Newcastle, Kilcoole, Killisky, Ballinalee, and Rathnew. Pop., in 1831, 15,770; in 1841, 16,444. Houses 2,474. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,775; in manufactures and trade, 539; in other pursuits, 375. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 108; on the directing of labour, 838; on their own manual labour, 1,600; on means not specified, 83. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,981; who could read but not write, 1,365; who could neither read nor write, 2,835. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write,

2,358; who could read but not write, 1,832; who could neither read nor write, 3,039.—Newcastle barony lies wholly within the Rathdrum Poor-law union. The total number of tenements valued is 2,642; and of these, 1,363 were valued under £5, —346, under £10,—198, under £15,—119, under £20,—90, under £25,—75, under £30,—98, under £40,—76, under £50,—and 280, at and above £50.

NEWCASTLE, or NEWCASTLE-LYONS, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the western border of the barony of Newcastle, and county of Dublin, Leinster. Length, southward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 4,282 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,098; in 1841, 1,108. Houses 193. The surface consists, for the most part, of excellent land. A hill in Athgoe demesne has an altitude of 584 feet above sea-level; and another, on the southern border, has an altitude of 721 feet. The seats are Athgoe-park, Newcastle-house, Skeagh-house, Colganstown-house, Hazelthatch-house, and Peamont. The Grand Canal passes across the northern district; and the mail-road from Dublin to Limerick passes across the southern district.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the archdeaconry of Glendelough, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £250; glebe, £80. Gross income, £330; nett, £289 1s. 4d.;—but these sums are exclusive of respectively £18 9s. 2d. and £15 13s. 10d. peculiarly belonging to the archdeaconry. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Killishin, in the dio. of Leighlin, but is resident in Newcastle. The church in use in 1837, was a very old building. Sittings 100; attendance 25. A new church was recently built at the cost of private parties. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Saggart. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 41, and the Roman Catholics to 1,067; and a daily school was salaried with £20 from subscription, inclusive of £5 from Lord Cloncurry, and £5 from Mr. Bagot, and had on its books 80 boys and 60 girls.

NEWCASTLE, or NEWCASTLE-LYONS, a village, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish and barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the road from Lucan to Naas, and on that from Oughterard to Dublin, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile from the transit of the Grand Canal, 2 from the transit of the proposed Grand-Trunk railway, 2 north-west of Rathcoole, 4 south-south-west of Lucan, and 8 west-south-west of Dublin. A charter of 11 James I. erected this place into a borough, created a corporation by the name of "The Portreeve, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Town of Newcastle," and conferred upon the Portreeve and free burgesses the right of sending two members to parliament. The corporation was the sheer tool of the Right Honourable David Latouche, and served no purpose but to seat two of his nominees in parliament; and he, accordingly, received the whole of the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union. A royal manor of Newcastle at one time existed; but, since the dissolution of monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII., this has formed part of the manor of Saggart. Grants of weekly markets were made for Mondays and Thursdays; and for fairs on St. Swithin's day, All-Saints day, May 9, and Oct. 8. The Newcastle dispensary is within the Celbridge Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 6,089 acres, with a pop. of 1,098; and, in 1839-40, it expended £40, and administered to 450 patients. The ruins of a "castle" no longer "new" exist at the village. The altitude of the village's site is 307 feet above sea-level.

Area of the village, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 395; in 1841, 281. Houses 61.

NEWCASTLE, a small sea-port town, in the parish of Kilcoo, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the head of the most westerly sweep of Dundrum bay, at the base of the north-eastern extremity of the Mourne mountains, and on the road from Kilkeel to Downpatrick and Ardglass, 2 miles south-east of Bryansford, $3\frac{1}{4}$ south-south-east of Castlewella, 5 south by west of Clough, $9\frac{1}{4}$ east by south of Rathfryland, $9\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Kilkeel, 10 south-west by south of Downpatrick, and $11\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Ardglass. "Those who have visited Newcastle," says a powerful writer in a defunct Irish periodical, "must have felt their attention attracted to the wild grandeur of the scenery which presents itself to the eye a little way beyond the southern extremity of the village. To the right rise the mountains of Mourne, at the foot of which lie an immense number of large blocks of granite, thrown together in such confusion, and in such quantities, that a fanciful person might suppose they had been collected for the purpose of building another link to the chain of mountains, but which nature, being too busy with the more animated portion of her works, had never found time to begin to. Here, far away from the haunts of man, and surrounded by wildness and desolation, 'the bitch fox hides her helpless brood,' rears them in safety, and steals out in the darkness of night to plunder the neighbouring hen-roosts, or rabbit-warrens; while higher up, among the cliffs or the mountains, amid the silence and solitude of nature, which is never broken save by the bark of her neighbour the fox, or by her own wild scream, the eagle builds her eyry, reigns undisturbed, and produces her royal birds securely; while to the left of the road, stretches out the broad expanse of the Irish sea, where, as far as the eye can reach, until the sight is bounded by the horizon, extends one level plain of dark blue waters, the monotonous appearance of which is only broken by the reflection of the sun upon the sails of some distant vessel as she glides across the bay, or by the white top of some distant billow, as it curls into foam, and sparkles in the light when descending from its momentary elevation to join its kindred waters. Such is the scene which presents itself after leaving Newcastle, now a thriving village, but which not very long since, with the exception of the castle which gives name to it, consisted of a few fishermen's huts scattered at random along the beach, wherever the convenience or fancy of the owner suggested. At this place, the shore, which has hitherto been a beautiful level sandy beach several miles in length, rises perpendicularly up to the height of more than 100 feet, in the shape of a rocky precipice, in whose rugged fall are several natural caves or excavations, one of which is said, by the fishermen, to run far into the mountains, and to stop directly under the highest point of Slieve Donard, and is therefore called 'Donard's Cave;' while another, called Armor's Hole, is a perpendicular gap, about 30 feet wide, and running from 30 to 40 feet deep, into the fall of the rock, thereby forming a chasm into the basin of which the tide beats with a roar sufficient to deaden the sense of hearing in any person who is hardy enough to approach the brink of the precipice, a task requiring both a stout heart and a steady head." Donard-lodge, the bathing villa of the Countess of Annesley, adjoins the town; a spa house and various villas are in the vicinity; and Tollymore-park, the magnificent seat of the Earl of Roden, is situated about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the north-west. The town has gradually and somewhat rapidly increased in importance since 1822; it has acquired much celebrity, and certainly possesses exquisite beauty and powerful attractions, as a watering-place; and it is now nearly a mile in length, and contains several places of worship, some schools, a comfortable inn, numerous pleasant and respectable bathing-places, several large and handsome private dwellings, and various other appropriate attractions. A castle, which gave name to the place, was built, in the reign of Elizabeth, by Felix Magennis, one of the lords of the barony of Upper Iveagh; and this pile was, not many years ago, in good preservation, and was rented by the Board of Customs for the accommodation of an officer of the revenue; but it was taken down, by order of the Earl of Annesley, to give place to the present commodious inn. A harbour, designed to be a place of rendezvous for the revenue cruisers in the neighbouring coast, was commenced with the aid of a parliamentary grant of £5,000; and an excellent and useful pier, well-suited to promote the local fisheries, and eminently advantageous to the purposes of general trade, has been completed at a total cost of about £30,000. Considerable quantities of granite from the neighbourhood are shipped at the port; some agricultural produce is sent to the larger towns; and the general trade of both port and market has materially increased. In 1835, the exports and the imports amounted, in estimated value, to respectively £3,081 and £3,156. Fairs are held in July and August. Area of the town, 64 acres. Pop., in 1831, 987; in 1841, 1,057. Houses 190. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 54; in manufactures and trade, 87; in other pursuits, 63. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 53; on their own manual labour, 106; on means not specified, 28. For further notices of the romantic, brilliant, and sublime scenery connected with the town, see articles SLIEVE-DONARD, SLIEVE-SNAVAN, SHIMNA, DUNDUM, and TOLLYMORE-PARK.

NEWCASTLE, a hamlet in the parish of Slanes, 3 miles east-north-east of Portlerry, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It acquires its name from a castle which stood boldly over the sea on a neighbouring neck of land. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWCASTLE, a parish, partly in the barony of Shanid, but chiefly in that of Glenquin, co. Limerick, Munster. The Glenquin section contains the village of CHURCHTOWN, and the greater part of the town of NEWCASTLE: see these articles. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Shanid section, 168 acres; of the Glenquin section, 5,257 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,434; in 1841, 4,191. Houses 550. Pop., in 1841, of the Shanid section, 15; of the rural districts of the Glenquin section, 1,720. Houses in these, respectively 2 and 213. The surface is a beautiful, diversified, and fertile portion of the basin of the Deel, and is watered by the Deel itself and some of its minor affluents. The western border forms the commencement of the vast highland region of Limerick, Kerry, and Cork. The principal seats are Chesterfield, Knockaderry, Ashgrove, Castlevue, Glenville, Cahirmoyle, Springfield-castle, and Courtmay-castle,—the two last the residences of respectively Lord Muskerry and the Earl of Devon. Courtmay-castle closely adjoins the town, and seems to have originally given it its name; it is part of an old military pile erected and occupied by a community of Knights Templars, but fitted up as a residence by the late Lord Courtmay; and the fine old trees which adorn its attached demesne, impart to the town a pleasingly rural appearance. The direct road from Limerick to Tralee, and that from Tarbert to Mallow, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £225; glebe, £68. The rectories of Newcastle and MONEGAY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Newcastle. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 9,147. Gross income, £869 18s. 6d.; nett, £827 0s. 14d. Patron, the Earl of Devon. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Mahonagh. A curate receives a salary of £100. The church is a neat structure, situated in the vicinity of Courtmay-castle, and built by the late Lord Courtmay, at his private expense. Sittings 350; attendance, about 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 3,000. There are two Roman Catholic chapels also in Monegay. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 200, and the Roman Catholics to 4,328; the Protestants of the union to 244, and the Roman Catholics to 9,192; 12 daily schools in the parish—one of which was a free-school, supported by the Earl of Devon, one an infant-school, and one a mathematical school—had on their books 447 boys and 330 girls; and 20 daily schools in the parish had on their books 631 boys and 426 girls. In 1842, the National Board had a school in the Newcastle work-house.

NEWCASTLE, a post and market town, in the parishes of Newcastle and Monegay, barony of Glenquin, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Limerick to Tralee, with that from Tarbert to Mallow, 1 mile west of the river Deel, 6 south-west of Rathkeale, 7½ south by east of Shanagolden, 10 north-east of Abbeyfeale, 15 north-west by west of Charleville, 20 south-west of Limerick, and 114 south-west by west of Dublin. It contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a market-house, and an infantry barrack; and it derives much embellishment from the immediate juxtaposition of the mansion and demesne of Castle-Courtmay. "The Knights Templars," says Archdall, "erected a castle here, hence its present name, adjoining which a walled town insensibly sprung up, and at length became a corporation; but in process of time it fell to decay, and is now in ruins." The town stands in the centre of the richest part of a very fertile and beautiful tract of country; and is watered by a pleasant and rippling little affluent of the Deel. Fairs are held on April 1, May 3, July 12, August 20, Oct. 1, and Dec. 16.—The Newcastle Poor-law union ranks as the 4th, and was declared on Dec. 28, 1838. It lies wholly within the baronies of Glenquin, Shanid, and Upper Connello, in the county of Limerick, and comprehends an area of 132,895 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 51,650. The number of elected guardians is 22, and of ex-officio guardians is 7. The electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, are, in the barony of Glenquin, Abbeyfeale, 570; Monegay, 733; Killougholehane, 262; Killeady, 508; and Mahonagh, 482;—in the baronies of Glenquin and Shanid, Newcastle, 709;—in the baronies of Glenquin and Upper Connello, Clouncah, 358;—in the barony of Shanid, Ardagh, 353; and Rathronan, 240;—and in the barony of Upper Connello, Castletown, 801; Drumcolloher, 406; Ballygarry, 1,082; and Killeady, 530. The total number of valued tenements in the Glenquin divisions, and parts of divisions, is 3,413;—in the Shanid divisions, 638;—in the Upper Connello divisions, 2,983;—in the whole union, 7,034; and of this total, 3,348 were valued under £5,—813, under £10,—607, under £15,—408, under £20,—358, under £25,—254, under £30,—459, under £40,—232, under £50,—and 555, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £113,218 10s.; the total number of persons rated is 7,037; and of these, 1,371 were rated for a value tion not exceeding £1.—1,097, not exceeding £2.—509, not exceeding £3.—306, not exceeding £4.—and 210, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Oct. 28, 1839, to be completed in Dec. 1840,—to cost £6,680 for building and completion, and £920 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 5 acres, purchased for £230,—and to contain accommodation for 550 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was March 16, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £5,035 0s. 7½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,250 19s. 2d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 347. The medical charities within the union are a fever hospital at Newcastle, and dispensaries at Newcastle, Abbeyfeale, Ashford, Ballygarry, Clonah, and Feenagh; and, in 1839-40, they received £460 12s. 6d. from subscription, and £256 9s. from public grants, expended £705 for salaries, £200 6s. 4d. for medicines, and £191 18s. 2d. for contingencies, and administered to 333 intern and 6,751 extern patients, exclusive of the extern patients administered to by two of the dispensaries. The Newcastle fever hospital is capable of accommodating 24 patients, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 11,826; and, in 1839-40, it expended £376 2s., and admitted 333 patients. The Newcastle dispensary serves for the same district as the fever hospital; and, in 1839-40, it expended £9 2s., and administered to 1,783 patients. Area of the Monagey section of the town, 17 acres; of the parish of Newcastle section, 31 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,906; in 1841, 2,917. Houses 416. Pop. of the Monagey section, in 1841, 651. Houses 105. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 80; in manufactures and trade, 41; in other pursuits, 24. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 37; on their own manual labour, 98; on means not specified, 11. Pop. of the parish of Newcastle section, in 1841, 2,268. Houses 311. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 110; in manufactures and trade, 243; in other pursuits, 128. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 37; on the directing of labour, 256; on their own manual labour, 151; on means not specified, 37.

NEWCASTLE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of West Liffa and Offa, 6½ miles south-west of Clonmel; co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 10,854 acres; 2 roods; 87 perches,—of which 21 acres, 2 roods; 28 perches are in the river Suir. Pop., in 1831, 2,435; in 1841, 2,933. Houses 447. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,700. Houses 400. The Suir traces the northern boundary eastward; and several affluents of it indigenous to the parish, descend from elevations of 528 and 783 feet above sea-level. The northern district, or that immediately upon the Suir, is excellent arable land; but the central and southern districts are wholly upland, and consist of part of the east end of the Knockmeadow range of mountains. The principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are West-Croghan, on the western boundary, 1,718 feet; and a height in the south-west corner, 1,846 feet,—and three heights in the interior, 961, 872, and 540 feet. The seats are Newcastle-house, Pasterville, and a mountain shooting-lodge. The hamlets are Pasterville, Corragh-cloney, Bohernagall, and Skeagh-tóoreen. The principal antiquities are the ruins of a church at Newcastle, and the ruins of a castle at Corraghcloney. The village of Newcastle stands on the Suir. Area, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, 253. Houses 47. A fair is held on Feb. 12. A dispensary here is within the Clogheen Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 8,287; and, in 1839-40, it expended £76, and made 2,700 dispensations of medicine. This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial title composition, £92 6s. 2d.; glebe, £2 8s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £129 7s. 10d.; and are appropriated to the trusteeship of Lismore cathedral. The vicarage of Newcastle, and the parsonage of Mullagh, (see that article), constitute the benefice of Newcastle. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 3,201. Gross income, £03 9s. 2d.; nett, £85 5s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of Tullaghmeelan; and is attended there by the Protestant inhabitants of Newcastle union. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Newcastle village, and has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Derrygrath. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and of the union amounted to 8; the Roman Catholics of the parish to 2,375; and the Roman Catholics of the union to 3,860; and 5 pay-daily schools in the parish and union had on their books 142 boys and 68 girls.

NEWCASTLE, a parish, 4 miles east by north of Kilmelshann, and partly in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, but chiefly in that of Middlethird, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, south-south-eastward, 4 miles; breadth, from ½ to 2. Area of the Decies section, 305 acres; 1 rood; 24 perches; of the Middlethird section, 3,656 acres; 1 rood; 5 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,124; in 1841, 1,337. Houses 197. Pop. of the Middlethird section, in 1831, 1,087; in 1841, 1,241. Houses 181. The Decies section consists of the townland of Lisahane, and prevails to a trifling extent under the Act 6 and 7 William IV. cap. 84, it belonged to the barony of Upperthird. Pop. in 1831, 87; in 1841, 90. Houses 163. A considerable portion of the parochial surface is bog; but the remainder consists, for the most part, of good land. The principal seat is Knockaderry. The main road from Waterford to Cork traverses the interior. This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Decies [which see]; in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial title composition, £90; glebe, £12. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £90 and are appropriated in the corporation of the city of Waterford. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay-daily school had on its books 49 boys and 25 girls.

NEWCASTLE, a village in the parish of Lower Newcastle, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the road from Bray to Wicklow, 2½ miles south of Killecole, and 2½ south-east of Newtown Mount-Kennedy. It is the site of the parish church, and of an old castle, from the latter of which the village, the parish, and the barony acquired their name. Fairs are held on April 1, July 10, Sept. 1, and Dec. 6. Area of the village, 25 acres. Pop., in 1841, 193. Houses 28. The Census of 1831 exhibits the village in two sections, under the names of Lower Newcastle and Upper Newcastle. Pop. of Lower Newcastle, in 1831, 130. Houses 19. Pop. of Upper Newcastle, in 1831, 80. Houses 10.

NEWCASTLE, a hamlet in the parish of Forney, barony of Abbeyshrule, co. Longford, Leinster. It stands on the river Lany, 1½ mile east of Ballymahon. In its immediate vicinity stands the mansion of Clon-cullow. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWCASTLE, a village in the parish of Enniskillen, barony of Morgallion, 13½ miles north-north-west of Nobber, co. Meath, Leinster. In its immediate vicinity are Newcastle Lake, and Newcastle house or mansion. The lake lies on the mutual border of the barony of Morgallion, and the barony of Lower Kells. Area within Morgallion, 18 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches; within Lower Kells, 27 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

NEWCASTLE, a village in the parish of Rahoon, barony and county of Galway, Connaght. It stands on the Corrib river, and on the road from Galway to Oughterard, 1 mile north by west of Galway. Here is a large distillery; and in the vicinity are Belmont, Newcastle-house, Newcastle-cottage, Rock-lodge, Ashley-park, and Villa-Abbanagh. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWCASTLE (Lower), a parish on the coast of the barony of Newcastle, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the village of NEWCASTLE: which see. Length, south-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,750 acres, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,399; in 1841, 1,226. Houses 165. A belt along the shore is unprofitable strand; and the rest of the surface is all low, and varies in yearly value from 10s. to 60s. per plantation acre. The hamlets are Leabeg, Middle Leabeg, Warblebank, Leamore, Coolsdroo, Ballyphilip, and Killadrunan. The seats are Ballydonaria-house, Bloomfield, Killmullin, and Woodstock,—the last the handsome residence of Lord Robert Tottenham. The chief antiquities are the ruins of a church at Killadrunan, and the ruins of a castle at Newcastle.—This parish, and that of UPPER NEWCASTLE [see next article], are a part-rectory and a vicarage in the dio. of Dublin. The part-rectory is a separate but sinecure benefice. Tithe composition and gross income, £287 10s.; nett, £270 12s. Patron, the Rev. Rosegrave Macklin and his heirs. Such of the rectorial tithes as do not belong to the part-rectory and sinecure benefice, are valued at £150; and are inappropriate in Earl Fitzwilliam. The vicarage is a separate benefice, with cure. Vicarial tithe composition, £276 18s. 5d.; glebe, £28. Gross income, £309 18s. 5d.; nett, £262 7s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. A portion of the territory of the benefice is included in the perpetual curacy of CALARY: which see. Pop., in 1831, of the remaining portions of the benefice, 3,870. The church is of unknown date; and was enlarged about 57 years ago by means of voluntary contributions. Sittings 330; attendance, from 60 to 300. A chapel-of-ease was commenced a number of years ago at Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, around which most of the population resides; but it was discontinued for want of funds; and, in 1837, a schoolhouse in that village was used as a parochial place of worship. Sittings 120; attendance 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to a chapel in the benefice of Delgany. In 1831, the Protestants of Lower Newcastle amounted to 430, and the Roman Catholics to 949; the Protestants of the whole district under the care of the vicar to 984, and the Roman Catholics to 2,886; 2 Sunday schools in that district were usually attended by about 96 children; and 6 daily schools in the district—one of which was salaried with £8 a-year from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and aided with the proceeds of a collection at a charity sermon, while another at Newtown-Mount-Kennedy was supported chiefly by subscriptions and the proceeds of a public collection—had on their books 149 boys and 120 girls.

NEWCASTLE (Upper), a parish in the barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the small town of NEWTOWN-MOUNT-KENNEDY: which see. Length, south-west by southward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,025 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 3,118, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,106; in 1841, 2,766. Houses 405. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,293; in 1841, 1,943. Houses 292. The surface consists variously of mountain, moor, bog, arable land, and demesne ground; and possesses a considerable aggregate of picturesqueness and beauty. The highest grounds are Dunran-hill on the southern boundary, and a height on the western border, whose summits have altitudes of respectively 1,122 and 1,193 feet above sea-level. The seats are Prospect-house, Monalin-house, Springmount, East-hill, Mount-Kennedy-house, Glendarragh-cottage, Glendarragh-house, Hermitage, and Mountjohn-house,—the last the residence of Graves Archer, Esq. The hamlet of Monalin, within the limits, had in 1831 a pop. of 38.—This parish is ecclesiastically consolidated with that of LOWER NEWCASTLE [see preceding article]; yet a portion of it is included also in the quoad sacra parish of CALARY: which see. In 1831, the inhabitants of the Calary portion consisted of 59 Protestants and 565 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the other portions consisted of 545 Protestants and 1,937 Roman Catholics.

NEWCESTON, or NUCESTON, a village in the parish of Moragh, barony of Kinnalmeaky, about 5 miles west by north of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. Fairs are held on Jan. 8, Whit-Tuesday, Oct. 15, and Dec. 14. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWCHAPEL, or MULLOGHNOGO, a parish in the barony of East Iffa and Offa, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Clonmel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,873 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,544; in 1841, 1,419. Houses 190. The surface consists, in general, of good land. The seats are Springmount, Jamestown, Chancellorstown-house, Bawn-house, Orchardstown-house, and Knockeevan-house. The hamlet of Clerihan, within the limits, had in 1831 a pop. of 230.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £162 3s. 4d.; glebe, £43 3s. 5d. Gross income, £505 6s. 9d.; nett, £450 5s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1819 by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 60; attendance 10. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 31, and the Roman Catholics to 1,593,—and a pay daily school had on its books 50 boys and 20 girls.

NEWCHURCH, a village in the parish of Ardes, barony of Portneinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Mountmellick, on the road thence to Emo. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWFERRY, a hamlet in the parish of Ballyscullion, barony of Loughinsolin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It is situated on the river Bann, a little below Lough Beg, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Bellaghy. Pop. not specially returned.

NEW-GENEVA. See GENEVA (New).

NEW-GLANMIRE, a village in the parish of Cahirlag, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It stands in the glen of the Glanmire rivulet, and in the vicinity of the village of GLANMIRE: which see. Area, 3 acres. Pop., in 1841, 200. Houses 24.

NEW-GRANGE, an unique and wonderful antiquity in the parish of Monknewton, barony of Upper Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. It is situated on the banks of the Boyne, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of the village of Slane; and has been the topic of several long and conflicting dissertations on the part of antiquaries, and some magniloquent but second-rate descriptions on the part of topographers. "If England," says a fugitive writer, whose anonymous paper places the object far more succinctly and powerfully before the mind than the imposing elaborations of some well-known authors—"If England may justly boast of her Stonehenge as the noblest monument of its kind now existing, Ireland can, with equal reason, feel proud of the sepulchral tumulus of New-Grange—a monument of human labour, only exceeded in grandeur by the tomb of Agamemnon, at Mycenæ, or the pyramids of the Egyptian kings, to both of which it is so nearly allied in many of its general features, and which, in point of antiquity, it probably rivals, or even possibly exceeds! The tumulus of New-Grange is one of the four great sepulchral mounds situated on the banks of the Boyne, between Drogheda and Slane, in the county of Meath, and which, we will not hesitate to say, may be justly termed the Pyramids of Ireland. It is the only one of the four whose interior is now exposed to human curiosity. The contents of the others are still unknown; but there is every reason to believe that, if explored, they would be found similar in their nature, and not inferior in rude magnificence to that of which we are about to give a description. This extraordinary monument or pyramid, which is now, as the learned antiquary, Governor Pownall, truly observed, but a ruin of what it originally was, covers 2 acres of ground, and has an elevation of about 70 feet; but its original height was not less than 100 feet, as it has been used for ages as a stone-quarry, for the making and repairing of roads, and the erection of buildings, &c., in the neighbourhood. It is formed of small stones, covered over with earth; and at its base was encircled by a line of stones of enormous magnitude, placed in erect positions, and varying in height from 4 to 11 feet above the ground, and supposed to weigh from 10 to 12 tons each. Of these stones, ten only remained about fifty years back; and one has since been removed. About a century ago, there was also a large pillar-stone, or stele, on the summit of the mount, now also destroyed. These stones, as well as those of which the grand interior chamber is built, are not found in the neighbourhood of the pyramid, but have been brought hither from the mouth of the river Boyne, a distance of 7 or 8 miles. The interior of the tumulus was first explored about the year 1699, when a Mr. Campbell, who resided in the neighbouring village of New-Grange, in carrying away stones to repair a road, discovered the entrance to the gallery, or passage leading into the chamber. This entrance was about 50 feet from the original side of the pyramid, and is placed due south and runs northward. The length of this passage to the entrance of the chamber is about 58 feet; its breadth at the opening, 3 feet; and its height, 1 foot 6 inches. At the distance of about 18 feet from the entrance, the passage gradually narrows, till it reaches a stone which is laid across in an inclined position, and which seems to forbid further progress. At this point the passage is narrowed to 1½ foot in height and breadth. Persons of moderate size, however, can overcome this obstacle by turning on their sides, and edging their bodies round by the assistance of their elbow and foot. This difficulty passed, the gallery presents no further obstacle, as it immediately expands again to the width of 3 feet, and to a height of 6 feet, which gradually increases to 10 feet 6 inches at the entrance of the dome. The chamber is an irregular circle, about 22 feet in diameter, covered with a dome of a bee-hive form, constructed of massive stones, laid horizontally, and projecting one beyond the other, till they approximate, and are finally capped with a single one; the height of the dome is about 20 feet; the chamber has three quadrangular recesses, forming a cross, one facing the entrance-gallery, and one on each side. In each of these recesses was placed a stone urn, or sarcophagus, of a simple bowl form, two of which remain; of these recesses, the east and the west are about 8 feet square, the north is somewhat deeper. The entire length of the cavern, from the entrance of the gallery to the end of the recess, is 81 feet 8 inches. The stones of which the entire structure consists are of great size; those which form the lintels or roof of the gallery are but six in number; and of these, the first is 12 feet 4 inches long, the third 18 feet, and the fifth about 12 feet; the breadth of these stones is not less than 6 feet. The tallest of the upright stones forming the entrance to the recess, is 7 feet 6 inches in height, and its companion 7 feet. The vase or urn within this chamber is 3 feet 8 inches in diameter; that in the opposite chamber is displaced from its supporter; these urns are of granite. A great number of these stones within the chamber, as well as in the gallery, are carved with spiral, lozenge-shaped, and zigzag lines; and in the west chamber there are marks which have been supposed to be an alphabetic inscription, but, as we are persuaded, without reason. To this general description we have only to add, that on the first examination of the interior of the sepulchre, a pyramidal or obelisk stone, 6 or 7 feet in height, is said to have stood in the centre, near which the skeletons of two human bodies were found, and that about the same period two gold Roman coins were discovered on the top of the mount, the one of the elder Valentinian, and the other of Theodosius. This most ancient, and, though rude, most magnificent monument, has been described and illustrated by Molyneux, Harris, Pownall, and Ledwich, all of whom, unwilling, apparently, to allow the ancient Irish the honour of erecting a work of such vast labour and grandeur, concur in ascribing it to the piratical Danes, who infested the island in the 9th and 10th centuries. We are well aware that the Danes, as well as all the other branches of the great Scythian stock, raised large sepulchral mounds; but where in the north of Europe does there exist a monument of the kind to rival this and its companions on the Boyne? And is it likely that Danish colonies, in a country in which they had never a secure settlement, would raise monuments exceeding in grandeur any which existed in their own country? Or if they might, is it to be believed that tradition would be silent, or that our annals, which are so minute in recording the works as well as deeds of those lawless robbers, would preserve no memorial of so vast a labour? No! it is to the anciently civilized south of Europe, not the barbarous north, that we must look for the prototypes of these grand monuments of the dead; which, equally with the brazen weapons and vessels, the Cyclopean forts, and other remains, identify the ancient inhabitants of Ireland with the most ancient Egyptians, and the Greeks of the heroic times. The arguments of those learned men above alluded to, in support of their hypothesis, are puerile, and scarcely deserve serious notice; we are not without historic evidence to prove that the Danes, so far from being the erectors of the monuments on the Boyne, were, as might be more rationally expected, their destroying plunderers."

NEW-HARBOUR, or RENVYLE, a marine inlet and a harbour in the parish of Oranmore, barony of Duikellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It is situated at the head of Galway bay, 2 miles south-west of the town of Oranmore; it measures a mile in length and ½ of a mile in breadth; it has a clean bottom, the inner part of which is mud, skirted with fine limestone gravel; and it forms a beautiful and safe harbour for small vessels, and is frequently resorted to in westerly winds and in winter by vessels from Galway roads. A pier was, not very many years ago, built in a completely landlocked bight on the north side of the harbour! it is 150 feet in length, with a return of 80 feet for boats, with a jetty and stair at the head, 15 feet at high water, and faced with hewn limestone; and this work has been of much use for vessels, running for shelter, and especially for careening and wintering.

NEW-INN, a village in the parish of Knockgrafon, barony of Clonwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the road from Cahir to Cashel, 4 miles north by east of Cahir, and 4½ south of Cashel. It contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a barrack; and the site of its church has an altitude of 338 feet above sea-level. In the vicinity are the seats of Lough-Kent-house, Outragh-house, Woodinstown-house, and Marl-Hill-house. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cashel and Emly takes name from New-Inn; and has chapels here and at Knockgrafon. A fair is held at the village on March 17. Area of the village, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 320; in 1841, 242. Houses 44.

NEW-INN, a hamlet in the parish of Lava, barony of Upper Loughbee, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen, 5 miles north-west by north of Virginia. Pop. not specially returned.

NEW-INN, a hamlet in the barony of Kilconnel, 4 miles west by south of the village of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Clonfert takes name from this hamlet, and has chapels here and at Bullane. Pop. not specially returned.

NEW-INN, the quadram name of the village of Innfield or Enfield, in the barony of Lower Moyferagh, county Meath, Leinster. See ENFIELD.

NEWMARKET, a post and market town in the parish of Clonfert, barony of Duballow, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the river Dullua, and at the intersection of the road from Mallow to Listowel with that from Charleville to Killarney, 4 miles north-west of Kanturk, 9 east-north-east of King-Williams-Town, 12 north by east of Mill-street, 12½ south-west of Charleville, 13½ west-north-west of Mallow, and 130 south-west of Dublin. Three glens which adjoin the town, or are situated in its immediate vicinity, possess a large aggregate of woodland, reclaimed ground, and cultivated territory; and they boast a comparatively crowded population, and a large amount of artificial embellishment. The large mansion and extensively planted demesne of Richard O. Aldworth, Esq., in particular, stand in close juxtaposition with the town, and very greatly enrich its environs. But immediately above the town commences that vast tract of wild, moorish, mountainous, unimproved country, which extends southward over all the western frontier of Cork, and westward and northward far into Kerry and Limerick, and, though nearly 1,000 square miles in area, contains only two small villages, and the mansions of only two resident proprietors. The Aldworth family are proprietors of Newmarket, and have of late years considerably improved it; and they are a descendant-branch from the Aldworths, formerly of Stanlake, in Berkshire. The town possesses one regular and pretty good street, some good-looking private dwellings, a dispensary, a fever hospital, a church, and a Roman Catholic chapel; and to the west of it, on the left hand of the road leading to Blackwater-bridge, stands Castle-MacAuliffe, formerly the chief seat of the sept of MacAuliffe. The fever hospital is within the Kanturk Poor-law union, and contains 10 beds, but is capable of accommodating 30 patients; and, in 1839-40, it expended £178 14s. 5½d., and admitted 192 patients. The dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 9,000; and, in 1839-40, it received £25 10s., and expended £18 15s. 11½d. Fairs are held on April 21, June 8, July 16, Sept. 8, Oct. 10, and Nov. 21. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cloyne takes name from Newmarket, and has chapels here and at Milon and Rockhill. The celebrated forensic orator, John Philpot Curran, spent his early years at Newmarket, received at a small school here his first instruction, rambled about the streets of the town "a little ragged apprentice to every kind of idleness and mischief," and while yet young, was, through the benevolent patronage of the Rev. Mr. Boyse, rector of Clonfert, removed hence to the school of Middleton. Curran's father filled the humble office of seneschal in the manor-court of Newmarket. In 1677, was born at Newmarket, William Clark, who has been extensively known as "the ossified man." In infancy he was never observed to turn his head round to or bend his body; in boyhood, he could not put his hands behind his back, or lift them higher than the level of his elbow; in mature life he received all his food through a fissure, caused by the accidental fracture of his front teeth; in old age—for he lived to the age of 67—he nearly lost all power of locomotion; and when his body was dissected after death, it was found to be one mass of bone from the top of his head to his knees,—to exhibit only one bone from end to end of the dorsal vertebrae,—and to display prevailing ossification in the very cartilages of the breast which served to maintain the play of respiration. An engraving of his skeleton is given in Dr. Smith's History of Cork. Area of the town, 75 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,437; in 1841, 1,800. Houses 311. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 119; in manufactures and trade, 110; in other pursuits, 113. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 153; on their own manual labour, 169; on means not specified, 6.

NEWMARKET, a village in the parish of Aghaviller, barony of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Higginstown to Kells, with that from Knocktopher to Pilltown, 1½ mile north by west of Higginstown, and 2½ south-west of Knocktopher. In the southern vicinity are the pillar-tower and the ruined castle of Aghaviller, and the noble demesne of Castle-Morris. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday and Nov. 7. The village has a Roman Catholic chapel. Pop., in 1831, 110. Houses 18.

NEWMARKET-ON-FERGUS, a post and market town, in the parish of Tomfinlough, barony of Lower Bunratty, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the south-west or lower road from Ennis to Limerick, 2 miles east of the nearest point of the Fergus, 3½ south by west of Quin, 4½ west-north-west of Six-mile-bridge, 4½ south-east by south of Clare-6½ south-east by south of Ennis, 11½ north-west by west of Limerick, and 10½ south-west by west of Dublin. In its vicinity are Carrigoran-house, the fine seat of Sir — Fitzgerald, Bart.; Ballycar, Mr. Colpoys; Dromoland, the magnificent seat of Sir Lucius O'Brien, Bart.; Joy-lodge; Rathlaheen-cottage; Rathlaheen-house; and Shepherdfield-house. Various interesting antiquities of both the feudal and the Druidical times exist in the neighbourhood. The town is a constabulary station. Fairs are held on Easter Monday and Nov. 7. A dispensary here is within the Ennis Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 7,534; and, in 1839-40, it received £119 12s., and expended £102 10s. 9d. Area of the town, 44 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,118; in 1841, 1,526. Houses 244. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 161; in manufactures and trade, 104; in other pursuits, 72.

Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 95; on their own manual labour, 206; on means not specified, 24.

NEWMILLS, a hamlet in the parish of Ross, western division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. In its vicinity are part of a Druidical circle, a cromlech, and a standing stone. The circle has no central stone, and has lost all the stones of its periphery except five. The cromlech consists of a covering stone and three supporters. The standing-stone is situated about 100 yards from the circle; and is similar in relative situation to the standing-stones of Stonehenge and Rollrich in England. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

NEWMILLS, a village in the parish of Tullansken, barony of Dunganon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-west of Coal-Island, and 3 north-north-east of Dunganon. Pop., in 1831, 105. Houses 20.

NEW PARK, one of five denominations of a bog on the north-west border of the barony of Middlethird, nearly midway between Cashel and Littleton, co. Tipperary, Munster. The other denominations are Erry, Coolea, Coolkip, and Ballytar-na. The bog is bounded on the north, by Aghnagunmane; on the east, by Gralla; on the south, by Coolea and Newpark; and on the west, by Ballytar-na and Erry. Area, 2,073 acres; maximum and minimum elevation above sea-level, 384 and 354 feet; average depth, 18 feet; greatest depth, 28 feet; least depth, 2 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £3,145-11s. 2d. The bog is traversed across the north end by the road from Cashel to Littleton; and it has, for a very long period, served as a chief turbarry for Cashel.

NEWPIER, the quondam name of the village of Liscaur, parish of Kilmacrehy, north shore of Liscaur bay, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles west of Ennistymon, barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster.

NEWPORT (THE), a river of the county of Mayo, Connaught. It issues from Lough Beltra, carrying off all the waters which rise within the large catchment basin of that lake; and it runs $\frac{5}{8}$ miles west-south-westward, chiefly through the parish of Burrishoole, and past the town of Newport-Pratt, to the north-east corner of Clew bay, or rather, to the head of a small arm of that bay often called Newport bay. Though the river is tidal over only $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile, and is navigable over even that distance only by boats, yet it falls only 61 feet from Lough Beltra, and less than 150 feet from the summit level of the country between Clew bay and Killaulla bay; so that it cuts the way for an easily constructible artificial navigation through the very centre of the north-western highlands of Mayo, from Clew bay to Lough Conn and the river Moy. The chief affluents of the Newport river are the Skeedagh, the Buckadon, and the Glenisland. The right of fishing in the river is the property of Sir Richard A. O'Donnell, Bart.

NEWPORT, or NEWPORT-PRATT, a small post, market, and sea-port town, in the parish and barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the Newport river, on the road from Castlebar to Achill and Belmullet, and on that from Westport to Crossmolina, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles north of Westport, 8 west-north-west of Castlebar, 14 south-south-west of Crossmolina, 29 $\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Belmullet, and 134 west-north-west half-west of Dublin. Both the site and the environs of the town are beautifully picturesque; and both the immediate and the remote views from vantage-grounds on the outskirts and in the near vicinity are full of character, romance, and power. The vale of the Newport river close to the town's skirts is very varied in surface, and quite bosky with wood; and it boasts, on the one side, the handsome and sylvan parsonage of Burrishoole, and on the other, the pleasant and beautiful seat of Sir Richard O'Donnell, Bart., the proprietor of an enormous extent of the highlands of Mayo, away to the extremity of Achill. The Newport river itself is playful and merry while trotting past the town; the shores of its small estuary are beachy and clean; the adjacent expanse of Clew bay is a perfect labyrinth of land and water,—the land all verdant and fertile; the neighbouring high-grounds arise frowningly aloft as the frontier ramparts of a vast region of wild uplands; the far-away views of Croughpatrick, Clare-Land, the Burrishoole mountains, and the alpine masses of Mount-Nephrin, form a sublime and impressive perspective; and Melcomb-Hill, in the near vicinity of the town, commands a panoramic prospect of these objects and landscapes, so rich, so varied, and so extensive—including the whole basin of Clew bay—as to be unsurpassed by any other great scenic view in the kingdom. The attractions of the town to at once the tourist, the sportsman, and the sea-bather, are both great and many. Yet, with all their advantages of soil and situation, and in spite of very valuable and extensive recent improvements, the town and its environs present to the eye very broad appearances of poverty and of comparative inattention and neglect. The hotel, however, is neat and comfortable; the cars for the accommodation of travellers are good; several good private houses have been built along the quay; and some large storehouses have been erected or were recently in progress. The church of Burrishoole in the town is a neat structure; and the Roman Catholic chapel is commodious; and two or three schoolhouses are remarkable for their neatness, their size, and especially their moral achievements. The main body of the town, consisting of a principal street and several deflecting lanes, has a squalid appearance. The quays are excellent and extensive; and the harbour is spacious, and of direct and easy entrance, and can bring up to the quays vessels of 800 or 400 tons burden. Considerable shipments of corn were formerly made at Newport, but they do not now exceed 1,000 tons a year,—most of the trade having been removed to Westport. Fairs are held on June 8, Aug. 1, Nov. 11, and Dec. 20: A dispensary here is within the Westport Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 86,553 acres, with a pop. of 24,383; and, in 1840-41, it expended £127 8s. 5d., and administered to 7,609 patients. Area of the town, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,235; in 1841, 1,091. Houses 180. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 68; in manufactures and trade, 104; in other pursuits, 34. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 129; on their own manual labour, 69; on means not specified, 5.

NEWPORT-TIP, or ST. JOHN'S OF NEWPORT, a benefice or parochial union, in the dio. of Cashel, and in the barony of Owney and Arra, co. Tipperary, Munster. It takes name from the town of Newport-Tip (see next article); is identical with the southern half of the barony of Owney and Arra; and consists of the parishes and rectories of Kilvolane, Killoscully, Kiberath, and Kilcomentry. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 11,878. Gross income, £1,423 1s. 8d.; nett, £1,269 4s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate for Killoscully receives a salary of £75; and one for the other parts of the benefice receives £45 10s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The church in the town of Newport-Tip was built about 77 years ago, by means of a gift of £415 7s. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and that in Killoscully was built about the year 1828, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. from the Board. Sittings in the two churches, 500 and 150; attendance 140; and about 40. The Roman Catholic chapels of Kilmottery of Kilmalane and of Four in Kilmethil have an attendance of respectively about 1400; between 500 and 600; and about 2,200; those of Killoewilly and Ballinahinch in Kilmalane have each an attendance of about 700; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, each of these sets of chapels is mutually united. In 1884, the inhabitants of the benches consisted of 538 Churchmen, 6 Protestant dissenters, and 11,939 Roman Catholics; and 49 daily schools had on their books 722 boys and 530 girls. NEWPORT, TIP., a small market and post town, in the parish of Kilmalake, barony of Owney and Arra, co. L. Tipperary. (Munster.) It stands on the Malakern rivulet, on the road from Silvermines to Limerick, on the road from Killaheen to Abington, and at the western termination of the Anglesy road among the Keeper mountains, 2½ miles east of the town of the Dublin and Limerick rail-road, 4 miles by east of Birdhill, 4 miles by west of Abington, 5 miles north-east of Castle-Cornell, 7½ miles west of Silvermines, 9½ miles east by east of Limerick, and 8½ miles south-west by west of Dublin. Its site is at the south-west base of the Keeper mountains; near the northern verge of the great rich plain, which extends across the county of Limerick to the Shannon. In its vicinity are the seats of Deryleagh; Castlewall, R. Waller, Esq.; Rockvale-house; Oakhampton-house, Mr. Anderson; Brook-lodge; Fortmell; Coole-house; Mount-Philip; William Philip, Esq.; Cregg-house; Annaholy-house; Ballymackeogh; Mount-Rivers; Fox-Hall; Drumree-house; Bloomfield; Barn-house; and Mount-Prospect. The town has a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a bride-well, and a dispensary; and the first of these stands on a site 208 feet of altitude above sea-level. The salary of the bride-well in 1815; and the cost of maintaining the bride-well during 1848 was £16 9s. 3d. The dispensary is within the Nenagh Poor-law union, and serves four districts containing a pop. of 8,905; and, in 1839-40, it expended £105, and administered to 3,000 patients. Fairs are held on March 25; April 27; Corpus Christi day, July 21; Oct. 23; and Dec. 27. Area of the town, 24 acres. Pop. in 1831, 852; in 1841, 972; of houses 157. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 77; in manufactures and trade, 93; in other pursuits, 83. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 90; on their own manual labour, 91; on means not specified, 12. NEW-QUAY, a fishing-village and a small harbour, in the vicinity of the village of Burry, and on the north coast of the barony of Burry, co. Clare, Munster. (See BURRY.) The quay whence the village acquires its name was originally called Burry Quay; and is a comparatively recent erection, lately constructed in heavy limestone, extending 105 feet along the shore, with a return of 72 feet for boats; and a jetty pier-head, 70 feet long, 15 feet high, extending to low water, with a good pier-head, and admitting coasting vessels. Much business is done here in shipping corn in landing turf, and in the fisheries; a packet sails regularly in summer, across Galway-bay to Galway. The wharf is commonly filled with crafts and some good houses have been built at the quay. In the vicinity are the celebrated oyster-banks of Burry. A Roman Catholic parish in the dioc. of Kilkenny takes name from New-Quay, and has a chapel at the village. The adjacent sea-board was, not very long ago, inaccessible to wheeled vehicles; but is now connected by excellent roads with Ennis and Kinvara. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

NEW-QUAY, co. Wexford. (See BALLYGARRY.) NEWRAITH, (See NEWRAITH.) NEW-ROSS, (See ROSS.) NEWRY, (THE), a river, chiefly of the county of Down, Ulster. It rises near Rathfriland, in the barony of Upper Neagh; and runs 7 miles southward, 10 miles westward, 3 miles north-north-westward, and 1½ mile westward in the interior of the county of Down; then proceeds 2½ miles southward, along the boundary line between the counties of Down and Armagh, to the town of Newry; and thence, under the name of Narrow Water, flows tidally between the county of Down on the left, and the counties of Armagh and Louth on the right, to the head of the bay or sea-lough of Carlingford. See NARROW WATER. This river supplies several bleaching fields and mills, and has become artificially identified with a great and important navigation: see next article.

NEWRY, a navigation, partly natural, but chiefly artificial, connecting the head of Lough Carlingford with the Upper Burn and Lough Neagh; Ulster. Narrow Water, or the lower and tidal portion of Newry river, was naturally so obstructed by a deposit of stones and mud, that it could bring up to the town of Newry, only vessels of small burden, and these only at high water; but partly by aid of deepening over its lower portion, and partly by aid of a canal cut along its upper portion, it now brings up large sea-borne vessels. The line of artificial navigation or strict canal, commences at Fathom, 1½ mile below Newry; it ascends to Newry by aid of one lock at Fathom, and another in the southern outskirts of the town; it ascends to Gerard's Pass, 4 miles above Newry, by aid of six locks; it ascends thence to the commencement of the summit-level, immediately north of Poyatz's Pass, by aid of four locks; it continues on the summit-level 3 miles, to the vicinity of Scarra, and passes alongside Lough Shark, whose surface elevation is 80 feet above sea-level; and it descends to the Burn, 3 miles above Portadown, by aid of three locks. The last 3 miles of the canal's course is north-westward within co. Armagh; but all the previous part of its course is northward, along the bottom of the long valley or dingle which separates co. Armagh from co. Down, and much the greater part of it is strictly on the boundary-line between these counties. The average breadth of the whole canal is 40 feet at the top; and the breadth of the locks is 15 feet in the clear. The work was completed entirely by means of parliamentary grants; and was placed under the control, originally, of a board of 21 members, including the noblemen and representatives of the counties of Armagh, Down, and Tyrone; but subsequently of both a managing body of resident Newry merchants, and a reviewing or superintending general board of navigation, and eventually in the Newry Navigation company. The navigation was for a long period so damaged and impeded as almost to occasion the ruin of the trade of Newry; but it is now in such a good condition as not only to promote the great and steady progress of the commercial interests of Newry, but to subserve the general purposes of the great inland carrying trade within the basin of Lough Neagh, and through the richest parts of the eastern and western section of Ulster. The toll exacted upon the canal is 1s. per ton either outwards or inwards; and the receipts amounted in 1830, to £2,309 1s. 7d.,—and in 1832, to £3,029 11s. 8d. The company is now engaged in constructing locks near Narrow Water, and proportionally deepening and widening the canal, with the view of admitting steamers of 600 tons burthen to the quays in the centre of the town.

NEWRY, a lordship, or peculiar jurisdiction, in the counties of Down and Armagh, Ulster. Its Down section is identical with the lordship or barony of NEWRY [see next article]; its Armagh section consists of a main body in the barony of Upper Orier, and detached districts in the barony of West O'Neilland; and the two sections are jointly identical with the parish of NEWRY: which see. This great territory formerly belonged to the Cistercian abbey of Newry; and along with some extraordinary privileges and immunities, both ecclesiastical and civil, it passed, through various changes, into the possession of the Earl of Kilmorey. The Earl, as superior of the lordship, is lay-abbot and ex-officio rector of the parish; he has the power of granting marriage licences and probates of wills; he receives the tithes with his rents, and pays a salary to a clergyman as his vicar; he holds courts baron and leet, and can command the sheriff not to carry his rod through his territories; and, in certain circumstances, he has the power, by his rescript, of discharging all recognizances to the Crown, which have been forfeited within his jurisdiction. The abbey, out of whose constitution and history arose such singular powers, will be noticed in our article on the town of NEWRY.

NEWRY, a lordship or barony in the counties of Down and Armagh, Ulster. It consists of a main body on the south-west border of the former county, and a small detached district, measuring about a mile in length and a mile in breadth, and lying $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of the northern extremity of the main body. The detached district is surrounded by Upper Iveagh; and the main body is bounded on the north, the east, and the south by that barony, and on the west by the county of Armagh. Length of the main body, south-south-westward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the whole barony, 17,158 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches,—of which 137 acres, 3 roads are tideway, and 104 acres, 3 roads, 5 perches are fresh water. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., transferred the townland of Shannaghan from the lordship of the barony of Newry to the barony of Upper Iveagh,—pop., in 1841, 379. The rest of the barony of Newry is identical with the co. Down section of the parish of NEWRY: see next article.—Pop., in 1831, 19,369; in 1841, 18,907. Houses 3,270. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,603; in manufactures and trade, 1,714; in other pursuits, 421. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 128; on the directing of labour, 1,722; on their own manual labour, 1,753; on means not specified, 137. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,723; who could read but not write, 1,791; who could neither read nor write, 2,312. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,241; who could read but not write, 2,937; who could neither read nor write, 3,705.—Newry barony lies within the Poor-law union of Newry. The total number of tenements valued in the rural districts is 1,859; and of these, 993 were valued under £5,—428, under £10,—866, under £15,—95, under £20,—60, under £25,—28, under £30,—24, under £40,—18, under £50,—and £26, at and above £50. Annual value of the property rated, £22,843 18s. 8d. Sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, £957 3s. 6d. and £791 0s. 6d.

NEWRY, or ST. MARY'S OF NEWRY, a parish, containing a borough of the same name, and partly identical with the lordship of the barony of Newry, co. Down, and partly situated in the barony of Upper Orier, co. Armagh, Ulster. The Upper Orier section, in a general view, lies compactly with the main body of the barony of Newry section, or is separated from it only by the Newry river and canal; yet it consists of three mutually detached districts,—one containing a portion of the borough of Newry, measuring $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles by 2, and extending from north to south along the Newry river,—one, commencing from 3 to 5 furlongs south of the former, measuring $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles by 1½, and extending along the Narrow Water,—and one lying $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile west of the first, and measuring $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile by $\frac{1}{2}$. Area of these three districts, or of the whole of the Orier section, 4,501 acres, 3 roads, 16 perches,—of which 206 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches are tideway, and 40 acres, 23 perches are fresh water. Length of the main body, south-eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the whole section, 968 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches. Pop. of the whole parish, in 1831, according to the Census, 25,117, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 24,557; in 1841, 25,168. Pop. of the rural districts of the co. Down section, in 1831, 9,845; in 1841, 10,008. Houses 1,840. Pop. of the rural districts of the Upper Orier section, in 1831, 1,304; in 1841, 2,005. Houses 360. The whole parish, in a general view, is beautiful and ornate in surface, and pleasant and prosperous in economical condition; and about three-fourths of its area consist of either good or excellent arable land. 'Overhanging the town in the west, though two miles distant from it in their summit-line, and situated partly in the parish of Newry and partly in that of Killybeg, are the Newry mountains, forming a noble feature in the landscape, and attaining an altitude of 1,385 feet above sea-level. In the co. Down section of the parish are frequent sheets of park scenery, numerous patches and sprinklings of villa-decoration, and the seats of Mount-Kearney, Sheepbridge-house, Ellenvale, Eden, Ashgrove, Ivy-lodge, Maryville, Loughborne-house, Traemount, Savanmore-house, Gelnivale, Benagh-lodge, Temple Gowran-house, Temple-Hill, and Greenwood-Park. The Upper Orier section contains the seats of Violet-hill, Turner-hill, Ashton, Fathom-park, and Derrymore-house.—This parish is a vicarage, territorially surrounded by the dio. of Down, but within the exempt jurisdiction belonging to the Earl of Kilmorey. Endowment by the Earl of Kilmorey, £400. Gross income, £406; nett, £146. Patron, the Earl of Kilmorey. A chapel-of-ease, called St. Patrick's, exists within the parish and town; and a third chapel has been recently erected on Lord Downshire's estate, in that part of the town called Corneyhaugh. Two curates, the one for the parochial church and the other for the chapel-of-ease, receive each a salary of £100. The parochial church, or St. Mary's, was built in 1811, at the cost of £12,566 15s. 4½d. for building, and £2,409 4s. 7½d. for site and incidental expenses,—of which £3,138 0s. 2½d. was a testamentary bequest from the late W. Needham, Esq., lord of the manor, £1,346 15s. 4½d. was a bequest from Sir Trevor Corry, £923 1s. 6½d. was a subscription from the Earl of Kilmorey, £461 10s. 9½d. was a subscription from General Needham, £2,520 was raised by the sale of pews, and £6,646 3s. 1d. was raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 700; attendance, from 200 to 500. The chapel-of-ease, or St. Patrick's, was originally the parish-church, but was converted by act of parliament in 1830 into a chapel-of-ease. Sittings 700; attendance, from 250 to 600. In 1834, one Synod of Ulster Presbyterian meeting-house was attended by from 500 to 700; one Secession Presbyterian meeting-house, by 180; one Synod of Ulster meeting-house in Donaghmore, by 550; one Scotch Seceding meeting-house in Ryan, by 70; one Independent meeting-house, by from 80 to 200; one Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by from 100 to 300; one Primitive Methodist meeting-house, by from 60 to 120; one Primitive Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by from 35 to 60; one Remonstrant Synod Presbyterian meeting-house, by 450; the old Roman Catholic chapel, by 1,350; the Roman Catholic chapel at Newtown, by from 800 to 1,650; and the Sheeptown Roman Catholic chapel, by 650. In the same year the parishioners consisted of 3,139 Churchmen, 7,213 Presbyterians, 75 other Protestant dissenters, and 14,699 Roman Catholics; and 13 daily schools had on their books 939 boys and 978 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £1 2s. from the London Hibernian Society, and £20 from subscription; one, with £18 18s. from subscription; one, with £3 from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £30 from the National Board, and £5 from subscription; one, with £10 from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £20 from the National Board, and £15 from a legacy; one, with £12 14s. from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £40 from subscription; one, with £12 from the National Board; one, with £4 from Dickenson, and £4 from Miss Corry; one, with £5 from the Marquis of Anglesea, and £5 from Mr. Parsons; and one, with £4 from Mr. Needham Thompson. In 1842, one National school at Crowreagh had on its books 81 boys and 37 girls; one at Grinan had 88 boys and 49 girls; one at Crowban had 48 boys and 47 girls; one at Loughorne had 43 boys and 27 girls; one at Sheeptown had 52 boys and 37 girls; one at Crowhill had 83 boys and 75 girls; one at Rockvale had 59 boys; another at Rockvale had 54 girls; one in High-street of the town had 510 girls; and one in Chapel-street of the town had 218 boys. Doctor Lennan, titular bishop of Dromore, bequeathed £200 5 per cents. to endow this latter school. At Violet-hill, the residence of Dr. Blacke, Roman Catholic bishop of Dromore, is a preparatory seminary for the college of Maynooth.

NEWRY.

A post and market town, a sea-port, and a parliamentary borough, partly in the lordship of Newry, co. Down, and partly in the barony of Upper Orier, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands on the Newry river and canal, and at the forking of the great north road from Dublin into the lines toward respectively Belfast and Armagh, 24 miles east by south of Camlough, 41 north of Flurry-Bridge, 51 north-north-west of Warrenpoint, 61 west by south of Hilltown, 7 south-west of Rathfriland, 81 south of Loughbrickland, 91 east by south of Newtown-Hamilton, 10 north by east of Dundalk, 10 south-east by south of Markethill, 101 south by west of Banbridge, 121 west-north-west of Kilkeel, 151 south-east of Armagh, 17 east by north of Castle-Blayne, 231 south-south-west of Lishurn, 261 north of Drogheda, 30 south-south-west of Belfast, and 50 north of Dublin.

Environing.—The country immediately around Newry on the north, the east, and the south, is low, fertile, ornate, and thickly studded with villas; and that on the west is boldly and wildly diversified, first with the Newry mountains, and next immediately beyond them, with the massive and soaring valley of the Shieragullion mountain. The gorgeous valley which brings down the river has the town in its centre, is screened in the east with the grand and romantic masses of the Mourne mountains, and passes off, as it approaches the sea, into the surpassing combination of power and beauty which so eminently distinguishes the basin of Lough Carlingford. Various heights in the vicinity of the town, but particularly the vantage-grounds of the Gap of Barnish on the road to Shieragullion, command exquisite views of the town, the valley, and the adjacent mountains.

The Interior of the Town.—The Down section of the town is pretty nearly compact, and extends southward immediately along the Newry river; and the Armagh section is partly compact and partly struggling, and is bounded, along the east, partly by the Newry river but chiefly by the canal,—the canal only in one place, over a distance of 350 yards, so far deviating from close juxtaposition with the course of the river as to permit the interposition of a number of houses. All the principal streets are airy, well-edified, and quite or nearly regular; and scarcely any of even the back streets or the outlets degenerate into meaness or extreme poverty. One principal street of the Down section proceeds at a mean distance of 85 yards from the river, and extends first 400 yards to the south-south-west, and next 530 to the south. Another proceeds parallel to the former, at a distance of from 90 to 180 yards to the east; and extends first 150 yards to the south-south-west, next 200 to the south, next 100 to the south-west, next 460 to the south, and next 500 to the south by east. Another proceeds 400 yards south-west by south, and falls upon the preceding at the point where it deflects to the south-west; another commences at the top of the last, and goes off some distance to the east; four come up from the river, intersect the first principal street at right angles, and fall at various points upon the second principal street; and numerous lanes and secondary streets both connect and wing all the principal streets. Four stone-bridges maintain the communication across the river, and are instantly succeeded by bridges across the canal. Three principal streets of respectively 560, 280, and 300 yards in length pass north-westward, westward, and west-north-westward from the river opposite the northern third of the Down section of the town, and form the main thoroughfares of the compact and chief part of the Armagh section; and two partially edified streets of 230 and 420 yards in length, proceed westward and south-westward from the two southern bridges, to fall upon a long but partially edified street which extends somewhat parallel with the canal. The older portions of the town were irregularly and inconveniently built on the side of a ridge; but the modern streets, on the low grounds, are comparatively regular, spacious, and well-edified. The houses are nearly all built of an excellent granite; and the character of the town, as a whole, whether as to street-alignment, architecture, or interior appearance, is pleasing to a stranger, and displays considerable resemblance to Belfast, Londonderry, and the other chief towns of Ulster.

The Abbey.—An abbey for Cistercians was founded at Newry in 1153, by Maurice MacLoughlin, monarch of Ireland, with the consent of the kings and peers of Ulster and Errigal. The charter of institution is a curious and unique document,—almost the only monastic charter hitherto discovered of a date prior to the Anglo-Norman invasion; and it was copied by Dr. O'Connor, from a manuscript in the British Museum, into his Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores, and has recently been translated and brought with abundant prominence before the notice of the public. The abbey formed the nucleus of the town of Newry, and became an institution of great monastic celebrity; and it was called popularly Nevoracense Monasterium, but in the charter Ibar Cyn Tracta, 'the flourishing head of a yew tree.' Tradition, to account for the latter name, says, that a celebrated grove of yew trees grew on the abbey's site, and that two remarkable yew trees shaded the abbey gates. "Hence," says antiquarian philology, "the place was called, in the plural number, the Newries or the Yews: in the Latin of that age, it is translated Monasterium de viridi ligno, from the Irish Na Jer." About 80 years after the founding of the abbey, it received from Hugh de Lacy, Earl of Ulster, a confirmation of its several endowments; and thence to the reign of Henry VIII., it flourished, and amassed considerable treasures. In 1543, the institution was transferred from an abbey into a collegiate church, for secular priests, consisting of a warden, and vicars choral; and in the 30th year of Henry VIII., it received, in its altered form, a confirmation of all its previous possessions, with the reservation only of an annual rent of four marks to the Crown; but a few years later, at the disruption of England from the papal see, it shared the fate of all similar institutions, and was dissolved. In the reign of Edward VI., Sir Nicholas Bagnal, marshal of Ireland, obtained a grant of the abbey, with its great landed possessions, and with all the immunities and privileges which had belonged to it as an ecclesiastical establishment; and he was permitted to use in his court the ancient seal of the charter, exhibiting a mitred abbot in his albe upon a chair, supported by two free trees, with the legend, Sigillum exemptis jurisdictionis Viridi ligni, alias, Newry et Mourne; The marshal adapted his new and beautiful territory as his residence, converted the abbey into his palace, re-edified and strengthened the town, colonized it with Protestant settlers, and built some castles and strong works, the vestiges of which were not long ago very distinct. The abbey territory, as it existed at the dissolution, and formed the grant to the marshal, included not only the lordship of Newry, but also the manor of Mourne, — the latter more extensive though less valuable than the former; and it was long enjoyed by the descendants of Sir Nicholas Bagnal, but at length became the joint property of two ladies, the one of whom carried the lordship of Newry to the family of Needham, and the other the manor of Mourne to the ancestor of the Marquis of Anglesey. A celebrated rath, with a large platform formed on its summit, marks the mutual boundary of the two properties about a mile from Newry; and is said to have been erected as a place of single combat between two princes, who were competitors for a royal territory, and hence is popularly termed the Crown-Rath. The grant to Sir Nicholas Bagnal excepts from the jurisdiction conveyed to him certain tenements in the town of Newry, and the whole of the townland and water-courses of Cornyhaugh previously granted to a person of the name of Patrick Grilly.

Public Buildings. — St. Patrick's church was built in 1578, by Sir Nicholas Bagnal; it was almost destroyed in 1641, by the insurgents; it remained a ruin till after the Restoration, and it was then repaired and roofed, and soon after raised higher than before, and enlarged by the addition of a gallery. This structure stands upon high ground on the north-east outskirts of the town, and almost inaccessible to carriages. St. Mary's church is a handsome edifice, of hammered granite, in the modern pointed style of architecture, surmounted by a tower 190 feet in height, and situated on low ground in a central part of the town, on the right bank of the river. The new Roman Catholic chapel is also a handsome structure, in the modern pointed style; and serves as the cathedral of the Roman Catholic diocese of Down. Two of the Presbyterian meeting-houses are elegant piles. The other public buildings, though comparatively numerous, do not possess many or strong features of individual interest; and consist principally of two additional Presbyterian meeting-houses, — an Independent meeting-house, — two Methodist meeting-houses, — the old Roman Catholic chapel, a convent of St. Clair, in High-street, for 18 nuns, — a neat custom-house, — a spacious Assembly-room, — the town-hall or market-house, — an infantry barracks, for the accommodation of 1,160 men, — a work-house for the Newry Poor-law union, — a new court-house, — a savings' bank, — two bridewells, — in respectively the Down and the Armagh sections of the town, — a fever hospital and dispensary, — and the monument to the memory of Sir Trevor Corry, recently completed, and constituting an ornamental structure. The bridewell in the Down section was strongly recommended in the official report of 1844, either to be enlarged, or to be superseded by a new structure; and the cost of maintaining it during 1843, was £90 18s. 1d. The bridewell of Ballybot, in the Armagh section, cost, during 1843, £27 11s. 10d. Population. — Poor-law Union. — The Poor-law union of Newry ranks as the 34th, and was declared on May 3, 1839. It includes portions of the counties of Down and Armagh, and comprehends an area of 157,911 acres, which, contained, in 1834, a pop. of 88,181, in 10 electoral divisions; together, with their respective pop., in 1881, are, in the county of Down, Newry, 10,004; Ouley, 2,974; Crobane, 3,601; Donaghmore, 2,378; the Glen, 2,985; Warrenpoint, 4,120; Upper Clonallan, 4,053; Rathfriland, 4,419; Drumgath, 2,693; Hilltown, 2,467; and Clonduff, 3,329; — and, in the county of Armagh, Ballybot, 5,831; Mullagblann, 2,244; Pointe-Pass, 5,311; Minnis Norrie, 3,276; Belleek, 3,193; Tullyhenny, 3,133; Ballymoy, 2,729; Jonesborough, 3,972; Killybeg, 4,199; Camlough, 4,572; Forkhill, 3,861; and Lathriget, 2,924. The number of ex-officio guardians is 10, and of elected guardians is 31, and of the latter, 4 are elected by the division of Newry, 2 by each of the divisions of Warrenpoint, Rathfriland, Ballybot, Pointe-Pass, and Camlough, and 1 by each of the other divisions. Newry division is in the borough of Newry, the barony of Newry, and the barony of Upper Lough; Ballybot division is in the borough of Newry, and the baronies of Upper and Lower Orier; the divisions of Ouley and Crobane are in the barony of Newry; the divisions of Donaghmore, Glen, Warrenpoint, Upper Clonallan, Rathfriland, Drumgath, Hilltown, and Clonduff, are in the barony of Upper Lough; the division of Pointe-Pass is in Lower Orier; the division of Mullagblann and Tullyhenny are in Lower Orier and Upper Orier; the divisions of Jonesborough, Killybeg, Camlough, Forkhill, and Lathriget, are in Upper Orier; the division of Belleek is in Upper Orier and Lower Fews; the division of Mount Norrie is in Lower Orier, and Lower Fews; and the division of Ballymoy is in Upper Fews. The number of valued tenements in the borough is 2,746, in Newry lordship, exclusive of the borough, 4,794; in the Upper Lough divisions, 5,542; in the Lower Fews divisions, 361; in the Upper Fews divisions, 530; in the Lower Orier divisions, 2,330; in the Upper Orier divisions, exclusive of the borough, 5,255; in the whole union, 18,567; and of this total, 10,427 were valued under £5, — 4,328, under £10, — 1,763, under £15, — 732, under £20, — 479, under £25, — 214, under £30, — 206, under £40, — 130, under £50, and 179, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated, is £134,876; the total number of persons rated, is 18,327; and of these, 2,367 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1, — 2,396, not exceeding £2, — 2,801, not exceeding £3, — 2,138, not exceeding £4, — and 1,590, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for, on Dec. 17, 1839, to be completed in June, 1841, — to cost £7,100 for building and completion, and £1,727 16s. 10d. for fittings and contingencies, — to occupy a site of 7 acres, 28 perches, obtained for £518 18s. 3d. of purchase money, and £433 5s. of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 1,000 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Dec. 16, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 16, 1843, was £3,635 1s. 9d.; and the total previous expenditure was £969 12s. 8d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 470. The medical charities within the union are a fever hospital and dispensary at Newry, and dispensaries at Forkhill, Meigh, Mullaghglass, Poyntz-Pass, Rathfriland, and Warrenpoint; and, in 1839, they received £363 9s. 6d. from subscription, and £363 5s. 6d. from public grants, expended £454 13s. in salaries to medical officers, £286 8s. for medicines, and £285 16s. for contingencies, and administered to 224 intern and 9,846 extern patients. The fever hospital in Newry is a good and recently established institution, contains a department for bad surgical cases, and serves for a district of 22,489 acres, with a pop. of 25,117; and, in 1839, it and the dispensary received £580 18s., expended £334 2s., and administered to 224 intern and 1,424 extern patients.

Trade.—The manufactories of Newry and the vicinity are cotton-mills, linen-factories, and yarn-factories, along the river; the appliances of a very extensive linen-trade; brass and iron foundries, and spade and shovel factories; two breweries and a large distillery; very extensive flour mills and oat-meal mills; cordage works; three coach and car manufactories; a tobacco-pipe manufactory, and a pottery; and appliances for various departments of manufacture connected with ship-building. Numerous stores situated along the canal impart to the town considerable appearances of a sea-port. The retail trade is extensive, in at once the sweep of country which it commands, the number of commodities with which it deals, the variety of resources it brings into play, and the aggregate annual value of its amount. The sales of dairy and agricultural produce in the town are very large, and command supplies from some districts of Monaghan and Louth, and from all the southern parts of Down and Armagh. The sales of butter exceed those of Belfast, and amount to upwards of 3,300 tons a-year. The sales of agricultural produce, in 1834-5, amounted to 7,710 tons of wheat, 3,610 tons of barley, and 23,850 tons of oats. The estimated annual amount of inland carriage to the town consists of 30,000 tons for exportation, 10,950 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 1,700 tons of agricultural produce for the use of breweries and distilleries, 100 tons of excisable articles not received by direct importation, and 10,950 tons of stone, lime, turf, and other heavy and cheap articles; and the estimated annual amount of inland carriage from the town consists of 81,300 tons of imported goods, 1,100 tons of produce of breweries and distilleries, and 18,000 tons of coals, manure, and other heavy and cheap articles. The importation of flax-seed is extensive, employs a considerable capital, and has of late years very materially increased. In 1835, the exports amounted, in estimated value, to £616,896; and their chief items were 24,867½ tons of corn, meal, and flour, 1,061½ tons of provisions, 267 tons of potatoes, 1,297 tons of flax and tow, 34 cwts. of feathers, 78 cwts. of tobacco, 5,300 gallons of spirits, 3,084,250 yards of linen, 79 tons and 18 cwts. of eggs, 3,551 cows and oxen, 898 horses, 30 sheep, 15,525 pigs, and an aggregate estimated value of £15,500 of miscellaneous articles. In the same year the imports amounted, in estimated value, to £568,711; and their chief items were 26,627 tons of coal, culm, and cinders, 2,200 tons of unwrought iron, 500 tons of cast iron, 2,000 tons of other iron, 160 tons of unwrought lead, 2,516 tons of stones and slates, 1,168 tons of oak bark for tanners, 35½ tons of mahogany and other wood, 351½ tons of corn, meal, and flour, 665½ tons of sugar, 145 tons of British refined sugar, 26 tons of hops, 230½ tons of tallow, 25 tons of hides, 32 tons of ashes, 24 tons of tin, 78,000 lbs. of cotton yarn, 700,000 lbs. of linen yarn, 100,000 lbs. of woollen yarn, 92,064 lbs. of wool and cotton, 181,364 lbs. of tea, 9,787 lbs. of coffee, 5,232 lbs. of pepper, 139,274 lbs. of tobacco, 4,000 lbs. of indigo, 3,200 barrels of herrings, 86,400 bushels of salt, 13,419 bushels of flax seed, 13,854 gallons of wines, 12,800 gallons of British spirits, 1,037 gallons of rum and other foreign spirits, 1,000 boxes of tinned plates, 60 packages of cotton manufactures, 1,100 packages of woollen manufactures, 60 packages of haberdashery and apparel, 600 packages of wrought iron and hardwares, 350 packages of machinery and millwork, 720 packages of glass and earthenware, 2,735 packages of leather, and an aggregate estimated value of £217,600 of other articles. In 1836, the gross receipts at the Custom-house was upwards of £58,806; in 1843, £38,577. The chief trade of the port is with Liverpool and Glasgow; but a considerable trade is also conducted with other parts of Great Britain, with the United States, with British America, with the Mediterranean, with Odessa, with the Baltic, and with Archangel. Steam vessels are regularly employed in the trade with Great Britain, but come no nearer Newry than to Warrenpoint; the large class merchant vessels also at present come only to Warrenpoint; smaller sea-borne vessels come up Narrow-Water, and its canal continuation to Newry; and barges ply up the canal to the Lower Bann and Lough Neagh. The vessels registered at the port, in Dec. 1843, were 159 sailing vessels, each under 50 tons, and aggregately 5,013 tons; 47 sailing vessels, each above 50 tons, and aggregately 6,345 tons, and 2 steam vessels of jointly 326 tons. During the year 1843, the number of sailing vessels inwards coastwise was 1,265, of aggregately 63,854 tons; the number of sailing vessels outwards coastwise, was 1,044, of aggregately 51,565 tons; the number of steam vessels inwards coastwise, was 155 of 28,074 tons; and of steam vessels outwards coastwise, was 158, of aggregately 27,706 tons. During the same year the number of sailing vessels inwards from the colonies was 43, of aggregately 6,945 tons; the number of sailing vessels outwards to the colonies was 22, of aggregately 3,262 tons; the number of British vessels inwards from foreign parts was 14, of aggregately 1,605 tons; the number of foreign vessels inwards from foreign ports was 8, of aggregately 1,193 tons; and the number of vessels outwards to foreign ports was 1 of 728 tons. The list of foreign shipping arrived and discharged in Newry from 5th October 1843 to 5th October 1844, contains 45 vessels of aggregately 12,338 tons register. Markets are held on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday; and fairs are held on April 20, and Oct. 29. The only banking office is that of the Bank of Ireland. The savings' bank, in 1844, had 2,726 depositors. The chief inns are the Victoria Hotel, in Hill-street; the Newry Arms, in Hill-street; the Commercial Hotel, in Hill-street; the Downshire Arms, in Hill-street; and the White Cross, in Margaret-street. The newspapers, at the close of 1844, were the Newry Commercial Telegraph, published on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday; and the Newry Examiner, published on Wednesday and Saturday. The office of the latter has, we believe, been recently removed to Dundalk. The public conveyances, in 1845, were a van to Monaghan; two vans to Drogheda, and two coaches to meet the trains from Dublin; a van to Dundalk; two coaches to Portadown; and a car to meet the trains; a van to Lurgan to meet the train in Belfast; two vans to Armagh, and two coaches to Dungannon; two coaches to Belfast; one car to Killeel, and one to Downpatrick. A line of railway has been surveyed, to connect the northern terminus of the Dublin and Drogheda railway, by way of Dundalk and Newry, with the Ulster railway in the vicinity of Portadown. A railway is projected to Enniskillen, via Armagh and Monaghan. Both these lines have been sanctioned by the Board of Trade.

Municipal Affairs.—Newry claims, but not on good grounds, to be a borough by prescription; it appears to have acquired the privilege of sending members to parliament, only by charter of 10 James I.; and it possesses also a charter of 4 James II. The borough limits were at one time in dispute, but came to be considered as including the townlands of Lisdrumiska, Drumalane, and Ballinlare, and a portion of Lisdrumgullion, in Armagh, and the townlands of Ballinacraig and Commons, and a portion of Cornyhaugh, in Down; and these limits—extending from about half-a-mile to $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the centre of the town, and comprehending an area of about 2,543 acres—were adopted by the Boundary Act of 2 and 3 William IV., cap. 89. A boundary much within the limits of the borough was adopted, in 1828, by the Commissioners under the Act for lighting and watching; and even this being found too extensive, another was adopted, restricting the taxable district to a smaller or more contracted area, nearly identical with the strictly compact parts of the town. The corporation was designated, by charter, "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Newry;" but it long ago became extinct. The paving, lighting, and cleansing of the streets are managed by 21 Commissioners, under the Act of 9 George IV., cap. 82. Number of houses of the annual value of £5 and under £10, rated at 6d. per pound, 512; of those of £10 and under £20, rated at 9d., 344; of those of £20 and upwards, rated at 1s., 458; total value of property rated, in 1843, £25,917. The Down section of the town is a constabulary station in the Rathfriland district; and the Armagh section or Ballybot is the head-quarters of one of the four districts of the Armagh constabulary. The seneschal of the lord-of-the-manor of Newry holds a court of pleas of debt to £10, and a minor court of pleas of debt to £3 6s. 8d. Irish. Quarter-sessions for the divisions of Newry are held in the Down section; and quarter-sessions for the division of Markethill are held in the Armagh section. Petty-sessions, except in cases of emergency, are held only once a-week. The borough sent two members to the imperial parliament; and it now sends one member to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in January 1842, 1,136; of whom 1,034 were £10 householders, and 102 were £5 householders.

Statistics.—Area of the Down section of the town, 295 acres; of the Armagh section, 334 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 13,065; in 1841, 11,972. Houses 1,914. Pop. of the Down section, in 1831, 9,524; in 1841, 8,809. Houses 1,430. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 366; in manufactures and trade, 1,151; in other pursuits, 366. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 99; on the directing of labour, 1,055; on their own manual labour, 616; on means not specified, 113. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,937; who could read but not write, 636; who could neither read nor write, 1,005. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,436; who could read but not write, 1,199; who could neither read nor write, 1,754. Pop. of the Armagh section, in 1831, 3,541; in 1841, 3,073. Houses 484. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 150; in manufactures and trade, 284; in other pursuits, 148. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 49; on the directing of labour, 296; on their own manual labour, 218; on means not specified, 19. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 733; who could read but not write, 199; who could neither read nor write, 308. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 614; who could read but not write, 389; who could neither read nor write, 479. The number of tenements within the borough valued for the poor-rate is 2,745; and of these, 1,326 are valued under £5.—629, under £10.—249, under £15.—120, under £20.—109, under £25.—58, under £30.—114, under £40.—59, under £50.—and 80, at and above £50.

History.—An important part of the history of Newry has already been summarily noticed in the section on "the Abbey." A castle was erected at Newry soon after the Anglo-Norman conquest, by De Courcey; it was destroyed by the Scottish invading army of Edward Bruce; it was rebuilt, and again destroyed, during the rebellion of Shane O'Neill; and, in common with the town, it was finally rebuilt by Sir Nicholas Bagnal. During the rebellion of 1641, the town suffered severely; and, in 1641, it was so much burned and so dreadfully damaged by the army of James II., under the Duke of Berwick, to secure their retreat to Dundalk from the forces of William III., under the Duke of Schomberg, that only the castle and six houses were left standing. Newry gives the title of Viscount to the Earl of Kilmorey. A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Ireland has its seat in Newry, exercises inspection over 19 congregations, and meets on the second Tuesday of February, May, August, and November. Two of the congregations under this presbytery are at Newry, two are at Drumbanagher, and the remaining fifteen are at Tullyallen, Mount-Norris, Newtown-Hamilton, King's-Mills, Dundalk, Cremore, Killeel, Mourne, Warrenpoint, Ryan, Poyntz-Pass, Annalong, Donaghmore, Castle-Bellingham, and Clark's Bridge.

NEWTOWN, a village in the parish of Shandrum, barony of Orrery and Kilmore, about 4 miles west of Charleville, co. Cork, Munster. Fairs are held on May 13 and Sept. 25. In the vicinity is Newtown demesne. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 175; in 1841, 237. Houses 35.

NEWTOWN, a village in the parish of Abbeyknockmoy, barony of Tyaquin, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop., in 1831, 216.

NEWTOWN, a quondam parish in the barony of Kilkea and Moore, co. Kildare, and dioc. of Dublin, Leinster.

NEWTOWN, a village in the parish of Lusmagh, barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. It stands $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Banagher, and 5 north-west of Birr. The castle of Feddaun formerly stood here; and in the vicinity are the hamlets of Lower Newtown and Stream. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 348; in 1841, 197. Houses 35.

NEWTOWN, a parish in the barony of Lower Kells, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of the town of Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,103 acres, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 217; in 1841, 174. Houses 27. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Navan to Bailieborough.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Title composition, £66. The rectories of Newtown, ROBERTSTOWN, ENLACH, and KILBRO [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Newtown. Length, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 2,379. Gross income, £402 10s.; nett, £355 13s. 4d. Patron, the Crown two turns, and the diocesan one turn. The church is an old building. Sitings 100; attendance 20.

There is a Roman Catholic chapel in Kilbeg. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 212; the Protestants of the union amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 2,420; and 3 daily schools in the union had on their books 121 boys and 78 girls.

NEWTOWN, barony of Upper Navan, co. Meath. See NEWTOWN-CLONBUN.

NEWTOWN, co. Down. See NEWTOWN-ARDRE.

NEWTOWN, a promontory in the parish of Drumcannon, barony of Middlethird, co. Waterford, Munster. It screens the west side of the entrance of Tramore bay, and has an altitude of 147 feet above sea-level. To direct the navigation of the adjacent dangerous coast, three towers have been erected on this promontory, while two have been erected on Brownstown Head, at the east side of the entrance of Tramore bay. The coast of the peninsula bay, all the way round between these headlands, a distance of about three miles, is sheer beach upon a dead level. Between Newtown Head and the town of Tramore are Newtown-house, Newtown-ledge, and Newtown-hill-cottage,—the first, the seat of Edward O'Neill Power, Esq.

NEWTOWN, a headland in the parish of Crook, barony of Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. It projects on the west side of Waterford Harbour, 2 miles south of Passage, and 2 miles north-north-west of Creaden Head; and it has an altitude of 79 feet above sea-level.

NEWTOWN, a village in the parish of Rosmire, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands 2 miles north-east by east of Kilmachomas, at the intersection of the road from Cork to Waterford, with that from Bonnahan to Carrick-on-Suir; and it has a loan fund, a National schoolhouse, a burying-ground, and a Roman Catholic chapel. In 1841, the Loan Fund had a capital of £1,060, circulated £1,327 in 366 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £3 1s. The village was originally intended to be a town; its streets were marked out and paved; but only a few houses were erected, and, with one exception, they all went to decay; and the village, as it now stands, is all of quite recent construction. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN, a Roman Catholic parish in the county and diocese of Kerry, Munster. Its post-town is Tarbert; and it has chapels at Murhir and Knockanure. See NEWTOWN-SANDER.

NEWTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Kilmore-Erris, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands in the peninsula Within-the-Mullet, 4 miles south-south-west of Binghamstown. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN, a quondam curacy, now the eastern district of the parish of Monasterboice, barony of Ferrard, co. Louth, Leinster. Its seat was a hamlet, now called Newtown-Monasterboice, and situated 3 miles east by south of Collon.

NEWTOWN, a village and a quondam chapelry in the barony of Upperros, co. Dublin, Leinster. The village stands on the eastern verge of the barony, and on a head-stream of the Dodder, 2 miles south by west of Rathfarnham. In its vicinity are a paper-mill, two cloth-mills, and the seats of Woodtown, Airmount, Rockbrook, Delanain-cottage, Tibraden-house, Cloragh-house, Cloragh-cottage, Marymount, Holly-park, Edmonstown, Marley-house, Catherine-park, Baden-park, Sabine-cottage, Springfield, Hayfield, Scholarstown, Woodtown-ledge, Laurel-hill, Springmount, and Woodtown-house. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN, a hamlet in the south-west corner of the barony of Loughrea, 5½ miles north-north-east of Gort, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN, a hamlet on the west border of the barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands 2½ miles north-north-west of Athleague, on the road thence to Castlereagh. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN, a hamlet ¾ of a mile south-east of Strokestown, barony and county of Roscommon, Connaught. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN, or NEWTOWN-FARTULLAGH, a parish, partly in the barony of Fartullagh, but chiefly in that of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The Fartullagh section contains part of the town of TYRREL'S-PASS, and the Moycashel section contains the villages of BALLINAGORE, KILLAVALLY, and NEWTOWN-LOE: see these articles. Length of the parish, westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Area of the Fartullagh section, 3,399 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches; of the Moycashel section, 6,848 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,752; in 1841, 3,010. Houses 491. Pop. of the rural districts of the Fartullagh section, in 1831, 635; in 1841, 761. Houses 118. Pop. of the rural districts of the Moycashel section, inclusive of Newtown-Loe, in 1831, 1,388; in 1841, 1,509. Houses 264. The surface comprises a considerable quantity of bog; and elsewhere consists of light land. The highest grounds, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Knockmore, in the vicinity of Ballinagore, 404 feet; Gallow-hill, in the vicinity of Tyrrel's-Pass, 383 feet; and a height at Newtown-Loe, 368 feet. The river Brosna flows along the western boundary. The seats are Cornahir, the residence of Archdeacon Vignoles; New-Forest, the residence of H. Daniel, Esq.; and Toor-house, the residence of Mr. Pilkington. The mail-road from Dublin to Galway passes through the interior. "The country on either side of the road for some miles," says Mr. Fraser, in reference to the central and the western districts of the parish of Newtown, "is agreeably diversified by the various low, detached, gravel ridges or eskers, assuming, in many cases, pleasing and fantastic outlines, and more or less covered with a browsed copse of alder, oak, hazel, and white-thorn. They are well circumstanced for planting, equally as regards profit, shelter, and effect in this denuded country. To the right, amongst the most interesting group of these eskers, is New-Forest."—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £237 6s. 1½d.; glebe, £25 15s. 9d. Gross income, £263 1s. 10½d.; nett, £212 10s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also some other ecclesiastical situations, but is resident in Newtown. A curate receives a salary of £60. The church is a quite recent erection; and was built by means of a gift of £1,000 from the late Board of First Fruits, and a donation of £370 from the incumbent, and was subsequently enlarged by means of a contribution of £66 from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Sittings, previous to the enlargement, 350; attendance 130. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castletown-Kindelan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 644, and the Roman Catholics to 2,155; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £12 a-year from the rector—had on their books 72 boys and 47 girls.

NEWTOWN-ABBAY. See NEWTOWN-CLONBUN.

NEWTOWN-ANDERSON, a village in the parish of Calry, barony of Carbery, 1¼ mile east of

Sligo, co. Sligo, Connaught. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 135. Houses 30.

NEWTOWN-ARDES, a parish in the baronies of Ardes and Lower Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It contains, on the mutual border of its two sections, the town of NEWTOWN-ARDES; see next article. Length, east-south-eastward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Area of the Ardes section, 8,222 acres, 3 roads, 28 perches; of the Lower Castlereagh section, 6,580 acres, 3 roads, 32 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 9,981; in 1841, 13,886. Houses 2,578. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ardes section, in 1831, 3,570; in 1841, 4,081. Houses 763. Pop. of the rural districts of the Lower Castlereagh section, in 1831, 1,969; in 1841, 2,184. Houses 366. The southern boundary, to the extent of 3½ miles, is identical with the extreme north shore of Lough Strangford; but over all the distance of identity between this parish and the lough, the tides recede to a comparatively great distance, leaving a very broad band of beach at low water. The surface of the interior is less tumulated than that of many other parts of the country; yet consists of fertile land, and has a rich and beautiful appearance. Scrabo Hill, on the south-western boundary, has an altitude of 534 feet above sea-level, and commands a fine view of the surrounding country. The principal rural seats are Whiskey-hall and Millercross-lodge. The road from Belfast to Grey-Abbey, and the south road from Belfast to Donaghadee, pass through the interior.—This parish is a perpetual inappropriate curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Glebe, £27. Gross income, £91 12s. 3d.; nett, £88 7s. 7½d. Patron, the Marquis of Londonderry. The incumbent holds also the chancellorship of Kilfenora cathedral, together with the united benefices which constitute its corps; but he is resident in Newtown-Ardes. The church was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, a loan of £3,692 6s. 1½d. from that Board, and a donation of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Marquis of Londonderry. Sittings 250; attendance 110. Six Presbyterian meeting-houses have attendances of respectively 220, 800, 200, 300, 240, and 150. A Methodist meeting-house of the old connection is attended by 280; and a Methodist meeting-house of the new connection by 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 100. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 500 Churchmen, 9,013 Presbyterians, 362 other Protestant dissenters, and 443 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were in operation; and 20 daily schools had on their books 707 boys and 370 girls. Five of the daily schools were salaried with respectively £8, £8, £8, £10, and £12, from the National Board; one, with £10 Irish from the Marquis of Londonderry, and £20 certain and £10 conditionally from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one, with £14 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one, with £5 from Lord Dufferin; and two were connected with the London Hibernian Society. In 1842, the National Board had two schools at Ballyblack, two at Newtown-Ardes, one in Newtown-Ardes workhouse, and eight at respectively Drumawley, Ballyrogan, Ballycullen, Cullyburn, Craigtilet, Green-Graves, Killyneather, and Lough-erries-Cowse.

NEWTOWN-ARDES,

A post and market town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Newtown-Ardes, baronies of Ardes and Lower Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the road from Bangor to Downpatrick, and on that from Belfast to Donaghadee and Grey-Abbey, 3½ miles north-north-east of Comber, 3½ south by west of Bangor, 5½ north-west of Grey-Abbey, 7 south-west by west of Donaghadee, 8 east of Belfast, and 88 north-north-east half-north of Dublin.

Enviros.—The district around Newtown-Ardes, as well as the site of the town itself, is the property of the Marquis of Londonderry; and as to at once the condition of its georgy, the appearance of its farm-houses, and the artificial embellishment of its surface, is one of the best managed and most flourishing estates in Ireland, and may bear comparison with many a landed property in the richest and most luscious districts of England. "The county of Down," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "is pre-eminent for good landlords, and the Marquis of Londonderry ranks among the best of them. We encountered only admirably constructed farm-houses, well furnished with barns and byres, corn-fields and pasture-lands, the natural riches of which had been enhanced by industry and well applied science; every dwelling bore numerous tokens of comfort; every peasant looked cheerful and happy; and we found, by after inquiry, that these signs of prosperity were not merely superficial, but that the noble owner of the soil, and his agents, under his directions, invariably act under the principle of 'live and let live.'"

Interior of the Town.—Newtown-Ardes is one of the few first-class towns of the county of Down, as to size and importance; and one of the most attractive towns of the north of Ireland, as to neatness, regularity, architecture, and convenience. The Market-square, in the centre of the town, is a handsomely edificed rectangle, of about 120 yards by 90. The principal street is 1,500 yards in length,—airy, spacious, well-built, and straight; it extends eastward and westward, passing along the north side of Market-square; and it bears the name of Regent-street to the west of the square, and that of Frances-street to the east. The street next in importance begins farther east than the termination of Frances-street,—extends 1,150 yards westward, through and past the south end of Market-square,—and then slowly defects, and proceeds 540 yards to the south-west; and, over most of its extent, but especially toward the ends, it is much inferior in character to Regent and Frances streets. Two streets ramify from the preceding, at a point nearly 200 yards east of the square, and proceed respectively south-eastward and east-north-eastward; but the one is only 100 and the other 280 yards in length. A street, straight and regular, and 600 yards in length, but not very spacious, runs parallel to Regent and Frances streets, at the distance of about 85 yards to the north. A street, straight, regular, and 500 yards in length, intersects all the eastward and westward streets at right angles, and extends from north to south through the centre of Market-square, or rather is dis severed by the square's great open area into a larger portion on the north and a smaller portion on the south. Two other streets, each 360 yards in length, run northward and southward, parallel to the preceding, the one on the east side, the other on the west, and each at a distance of about 80 yards. Even the remaining portions of the town, though consisting only of lanes and short subordinate streets, are straight and regular, and run parallel to the principal thoroughfares. The late Marquis of Londonderry took great interest in the improvement of the town, and was successful in imparting to it an unusually pleasant appearance. The stone of which much of the town is constructed, and which figures advantageously in the best of the modern public buildings, is a sandstone, raised in extensive quarries within the parish, and possessing a much finer grain and closer texture than the most of sandstones.

Public Buildings.—Nearly in the centre of the town stands the lofty and sumptuous pedestal of an ancient cross—a handsome octagonal structure of hewn stone, decorated with canopied niches, and bearing inscriptions, that the structure was erected in 1630, and that certain armorial sculptures upon it, supposed to have been those of the Montgomery family, were thrown down and defaced by the rebels in 1653, and were replaced by the 'loyal borough' of Newtown-Ardes in 1665. In the vicinity of this structure are the ruins of a mansion, not long ago used as a yarn-mill, but locally celebrated as the place in which the late Marquis of Londonderry was born. The old parish-church, a very beautiful piece of architecture, built by the first of the Montgomeries, has been allowed to sink rapidly into decay; and, though still exhibiting an elaborately sculptured round-arched ancient doorway, is exposed to coarse treatment, and used as a session-house. 'The old church of Newtown,' says a description of this pile, written exactly a century ago, 'is a large building, divided into aisles, by four handsome stone arches of the Doric order. It was finished, or at least repaired and adorned, in 1632, as appears by an inscription on the pulpit. Another inscription on a stone over the north entrance shows that the people was finished in the year 1636. The door, which affords an entrance under the steeple, is an arch curiously ornamented with carved work in stone, where may be seen the arms of the Montgomeries, under which, over the portal, are these letters in cipher, N. A. The steeple is but moderately high, yet neatly built; and a spire of hewn stone erected lately on it gives it a handsome appearance. A large tomb of the Colville family, to a descendant of which the town now belongs, stands in the north aisle, raised 5 or 6 feet above the floor, but naked of any inscription.' An old castle of the O'Neills stood at Newtown-Ardes; and, though reduced to a mere 'stump' at the date of the plantation of Ulster, was fitted up as a residence for the first Sir Hugh Montgomery, the builder of the old church, and the re-founder of the whole town; but the old mansion thus re-edified, and used as the family mansion of Sir Hugh's descendants, was, upwards of a century ago, destroyed by fire. A monastery for Dominican friars was founded at Newtown-Ardes in 1344, by some of the Savage family; in 1293 and 1312, it was the meeting-place of provincial chapters of the Dominican order; at the dissolution of monasteries, it was granted to James, Viscount Claneboyes; and, afterwards, it passed by assignment to Montgomery, Viscount Ardes. Another old monastic establishment stood in the vicinity of the town, at Moville; which see. The present parish-church is a handsome structure; but the other places of worship are remarkable more for their number than for their architecture. The market-house is built of cut stone, and surmounted by a cupola.

Poor-law Union.—The Newtown-Ardes Poor-law union ranks as the 69th, and was declared on Sept. 3, 1869. It lies wholly in co. Down, and comprehends an area of 93,924 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 53,873. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are Newtown-Ardes, 5,668; Mount-Stewart, 1,983; Grey-Abbey, 2,858; Kirkcubbin, 2,984; Ballyhalbert, 3,100; Donaghadee, 5,036; Carradmore, 2,770; Ballywalter, 1,700; Bangor, 9,355; South Newtown-Ardes, 3,172; Comber, 3,511; Ballymagliff, 1,696; Moneyreagh, 2,205; Ballygowan, 2,919; Kilmood, 3,003; and Tullynakill, 1,743. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians is 24; and of the latter, 4 are elected by the division of Bangor, 2 by each of the divisions of Newtown-Ardes, Donaghadee, South Newtown-Ardes, Comber, and Kilmood, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Newtown-Ardes, Mount-Stewart, Grey-Abbey, Kirkcubbin, Ballyhalbert, Donaghadee, Carradmore, and Ballywalter, are in the barony of Ardes; the division of Bangor is in Ardes and Lower Castlereagh; the divisions of South Newtown-Ardes, Comber, Kilmood, and Ballymagliff, are in Lower Castlereagh; the divisions of Ballygowan and Moneyreagh are in Lower Castlereagh and Upper Castlereagh; and the division of Tullynakill is in Ardes, Lower Castlereagh, and Duferin. The number of valuated tenements in the Ardes districts is 8,430,—in the Lower Castlereagh districts, 4,340,—in the Upper Castlereagh districts, 183,—in the Duferin district, 58,—in the whole union, 13,017; and of this total, 8,560 were valued under £3,—1,419, under £10,—856, under £15,—500, under £20,—401, under £25,—272, under £30,—446, under £40,—227, under £50,—and 336, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £119,138 8s.; the total number of persons rated is 18,355; and of these, 2,726 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—2,768, not exceeding £2,—1,914, not exceeding £3,—781, not exceeding £4,—and 510, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Feb. 22, 1840,—to cost £4,835 for building and completion, and £1,035 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 8 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches, purchased for £890,—and to contain accommodation for 600 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Jan. 4, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,710 6s. 5½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £520 8s. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 198. The only medical charity within the union is a dispensary at Donaghadee.

Trade.—The weaving of muslin employs a large number of the male population; and the embroidering of muslin, for the manufacturers of Glasgow, employs many of the female population. The town has a large brewery; and it conducts an extensive retail trade. Large sales of agricultural produce are made at the weekly markets; and fairs are held on Jan. 23, May 14, and Sept. 23. In the town is a branch office of the Belfast Banking Company. The public conveyances in 1838 were 4 caravans and 2 cars to Belfast, a car in transit between Grey-Abbey

* Mr. and Mrs. Hall say, respecting the Montgomeries of Newtown-Ardes, 'The original settlement of this ancient family is lost in the singular and romantic. They trace their ancestry to 3 races to the ages of Pepin and Charlemagne, and among them were many famous men, in especial that Gabriel Montgomery, whose renown in arms led to an unfortunate catastrophe. When Henry II. succeeded to the throne of France, and during the ceremonies of his marriage, he appointed a tournament to be held in Paris. After having survived many of his opponents' lances, the king proposed to tilt with the celebrated Montgomery, an honour which the knight desired to decline. The king, however, insisted upon trying his skill, and Montgomery, whose lance had been broken in the first shock of their encounter, omitted, in the agitation of the moment, to throw the fragment aside. In the next charge he struck the king, and a splinter passed through the visor and entered his eye, inflicting a wound, of which he died a few days afterwards, having first, however, acquitted Montgomery of all blame, and earnestly exhorting that no harm should come to him in consequence of the accident. But, disdaining the temper of Catherine de Medici, Montgomery thought it prudent to remove to England; some years afterwards, he was taken by the implacable Catherine, put to the torture, and beheaded, with the additional penalty of having his children degraded to villagers. On his way to execution, he pronounced this noble and memorable sentence in reference to the punishment inflicted on his children:—'If they have not the sense of raising themselves again, I consent to their degradation.' If the same gallant race was that Sir Hugh Montgomery, who, about the year 1680, obtained estates in the north of Ireland, he was the 'sixth lord of Bradingstone,' and 'Sixth Viscount.' I, from Scotland to Westminster, Irish fire, found ready being then plenty enough, Mr. Hugh coveted a share, and managed to get it over with the free consent of the guardianship.'

and Belfast, a mail-car in transit between Donaghadee and Belfast, and a coach and a mail-car in transit between Portaferry and Belfast. In the town are two inns and posting establishments.

Municipal affairs.—A charter of 11 James I. incorporated Newtown-Ardes, and appointed its corporation to consist of a provost, 12 free burgesses, and freemen, and to be called, "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Newtown." Ascendency over the borough, previous to the Legislative Union, was obtained and maintained by successively the family of Colville, the family of Stuart, the family of Ponsonby, and the family of Alexander; and, at the Legislative Union, the head of the last of these families, the Earl of Caledon, received the whole of the £15,000 of compensation for the annulling of the borough's right to send members to parliament. The Ponsonby family sold the municipal rights of the borough to the Alexander family in 1787; and the latter family, after the Legislative Union, exchanged them with Lord Londonderry for those of Newtown-Linavaddy. A borough court formerly existed, but fell into disuse in the course of last century. A peculiar court, authorized by the charter, and called the Quarter Court, is composed of the provost and 23 of the inhabitants, serving as grand jurors; holds an annual meeting between Michaelmas and Christmas; proceeds somewhat in the manner of a court-leet to elect a number of officers; and exercises the power of presenting money to be levied off the borough for various municipal purposes. The seneschal of the manor of Newtown-Ardes, appointed by the Marquis of Londonderry as lord of the manor, exercises within the borough the usual jurisdiction of manor courts, both by attachment of goods according to the course of the common law, and by civil bill under the statutes in personal actions to the extent of £10 Irish. A court-leet for the manor is held by the seneschal once a-year. A court of quarter-sessions for the division of Downpatrick is held by the assistant barrister of the county twice a-year. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Saturday.

Statistics.—Area of the Ardes section of the town, 235 acres; of the Lower Castlereagh section, 130 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,442; in 1841, 7,621. Houses 1,449.—Pop. of the Ardes section, in 1831, 3,117; in 1841, 4,924. Houses 927. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 199; in manufactures and trade, 705; in other pursuits, 87. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 36; on the directing of labour, 530; on their own manual labour, 405; on means not specified, 20. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,152; who could read but not write, 575; who could neither read nor write, 176. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 898; who could read but not write, 1,235; who could neither read nor write, 269.—Pop. of the Lower Castlereagh section, in 1831, 1,325; in 1841, 2,697. Houses 522. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 167; in manufactures and trade, 353; in other pursuits, 54. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 19; on the directing of labour, 241; on their own manual labour, 306; on means not specified, 8. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 658; who could read but not write, 273; who could neither read nor write, 105. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 501; who could read but not write, 611; who could neither read nor write, 189.

NEWTOWN-BARRY, or ST. MARY'S OF NEWTOWN-BARRY, a parish on the western border of the barony of Scarawalsh, and of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It contains the town of NEWTOWN-BARRY: see next article. Length, eastward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 8,284 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches,—of which 29 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches are in the river Slaney. Pop., in 1831, 3,502; in 1841, 3,723. Houses 635. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,162; in 1841, 2,286. Houses 395. The west end of the parish is wholly mountainous, and has on its southern boundary the summit of Blackrock mountain, whose altitude above sea-level is 1,971 feet, and at its south-west extremity the summit of Mount Leinster, whose altitude above sea-level is 2,610 feet. All the other districts consist of good pastoral and arable land, annually worth from 10s. to 60s. per plantation acre; and the eastern district in particular, is a rich, beautiful, and well-wooded portion of the valley of the Slaney. The rivulet Clady traces most of the northern boundary, from an elevation of 724 feet, down to inosulation with the Slaney; and the rivulet Glasha comes in from Templeshambo, and flows across the south-eastern district. The principal rural seats are Ryland-villa and Millview-cottage. The road from Dublin to New Ross, and the road from Dublin to Wexford, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 7d.; glebe, £28 7s. Gross income, £397 11s. 7d.; nett, £272 4s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the adjoining benefice of Clonegall, in the dio. of Ferns. The church was built about the year 1775, and subsequently enlarged by means of subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 400; attendance 550. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,030; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clonegall. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 591, and the Roman Catholics to 3,204; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £12 from Lord Farnham, and one with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and £10 from Lord Farnham—had on their books 332 boys and 266 girls. In 1842, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school at Newtown-Barry.

NEWTOWN-BARRY, or BUNCLODY, a small market and post town, in the parish of Newtown-Barry, barony of Scarawalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the north-western verge of the county, at the confluence of the Clady with the Slaney, and at the intersection of the road from Dublin to New Ross and Wexford, with that from Carnew to Goresbridge, 3 miles south of Clonegall, 6½ north-west of Ferns, 6½ south-west of Carnew, 8½ south-south-east of Tullow, 10 north-north-west of Enniscorthy, 12½ east-south-east of Leighlin-Bridge, and 48 south-south-west half-south of Dublin. The immediate environs of the town consist of one of the most superb portions of the valley, or rather basin of the Slaney, and possess a profusion of charms, both natural and artificial, such as make a strong and permanent impression on the mind of a tasteful tourist. The lodge and the beautifully planted grounds of Lord Farnham's demesne, immediately adjoining the town,—the sheets, and clumps, and rows of wood which warmly feather nearly all the low grounds of the valley,—the sprinkling and glittering of villas and villa-gardens,—the meanderings of the Slaney,—the diversified contour of its banks,—the detached conical hills backward from the stream,—the Wicklow mountains on the east, and the lofty ranges of Mount Leinster and the Blackstairs mountains in the west,—compose a landscape, both near and distant, of uncommon brilliance and power. The principal neighbouring villas, additional to those within the parish, are Ransford-lodge, Ballinapark, and Clobamen-lodge. Lord Farnham's lodge stands on a rising ground near the town; and the lawns dependent on it sweep down to the margin of the river. A little to the west of the town, adjacent to the road to New Ross, are some slate-quarries of considerable extent and celebrity, but producing only slates of inferior quality. The town is built in the form of an irregular square, and possesses a prevailing character of attractive neatness. Its houses are, for the most part, white-washed; and they include many ornamented and most desirable cottage-dwellings. Its inn is comfortable, and has an establishment of good post-horses. Its parish-church is a handsome structure, erected at the cost of the Maxwell or Farnham family; and its churchyard is one of the most beautiful rural cemeteries in the United Kingdom. "This little earthly elysium," says Mr. Brewer, respecting the burying-ground, "is situated on a gentle declivity, overhanging the river Clady, which rolls its murmuring flood in appropriate plaintive sounds below. The burial-ground is said by the Chevalier de Montmorency, to resemble the cemetery of Pere le Chaise, near Paris, except that it is much inferior in extent. Several walks, shaded by forest trees, and planted with shrubs, conduct to the venerated regions of the dead; and many of the tombs are composed of marble, and executed with considerable skill. The whole cemetery acquires a charm at once simple and potent from the custom which prevails of decorating the graves with flowers and evergreens, the mingled emblems of decay and perpetuity. These pious offerings of tender friendship, and of filial, conjugal, and paternal love, divest the precincts of the tomb of all that is appalling in solemnity, and impart to the scene a soothing calm favourable to the reception of religious and moral impressions." A fever hospital and a dispensary in the town are within the Poor-law union of Enniscorthy; but no statistics of them have been returned. Fairs are held on Jan. 4, Feb. 1, March 1, April 29, May 23, June 17, July 22, Aug. 20, Sept. 26, Oct. 13, Nov. 4, and Dec. 14. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Saturday. In 1577, Alderman James Barry, who was then sheriff of Dublin, and from whom descended the Barons of Santry, began to raise the miserable hamlet of Bunclody into the smart market town of Newtown-Barry. Judith, the only daughter and the heiress of James Barry, probonotary of the Court of Common Pleas, married John Maxwell, first Lord Farnham, and conveyed the Newtown-Barry estate into the possession of the Maxwell family. Area of the town, 51 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,430; in 1841, 1,437. Houses 240. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 72; in manufactures and trade, 150; in other pursuits, 58. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 108; on their own manual labour, 90; on means not specified, 17.

NEWTOWN-BELLEW, a village in the parish of Moylough, barony of Tyaquin, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the stage-coach road from Tuam to Ballinasloe, 3 miles west-north-west of Mount-Bellew, and 10 east by south of Tuam. It contains the parish-church of Moylough, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a constabulary barrack; and in its vicinity are the seat of Summerville, the ruins of a Roman Catholic chapel, and the ruins of Moylough castle. Area of the village, 26 acres. Pop., in 1841, 249. Houses 40.

NEWTOWN-BELLEW, one of three denominations of a series of bogs, from 1 mile to 4 miles north of the village of Newtown-Bellew, and principally in the parishes of Moylough and Kilkerrin, barony of Tyaquin, co. Galway, Connaught. The other denominations are New-Forest and Gartnadeeve. Area of the whole, 11,063 acres; estimated cost of reclamation, £12,013 14s. If the area be stated in Irish acres, it amounts to 6,830; and it is naturally divided into 6,010 acres of red bog, and 820 acres of low bog. "This extensive tract of bog," says Mr. Griffith, its official surveyor, "is bounded, on the north and north-east, by Slieve-Rae, and the road from Kilkerrin by Ballyhard to Creggs; on the west, by the road from Kilkerrin to Mount-Bellew, and on the south and south-east, partly by the road from Mount-Bellew to Windfield, and partly by the bye-road which passes along the southern base of Mount-Mary, between Kentstown and Creggs. These bogs are very much divided by small streams and steep limestone ridges, between which the bogs are deep, and generally very wet. The mode of improvement which I should recommend, is similar to that of other deep bogs; and the efficacy of the system is fully exemplified by the improvements made by Mr. D'Arcy at New-Forest, which have been already described. The Mountain Bog at the summit of Mount-Mary, which I have included in this tract of bogs, as being connected with them, is very differently circumstanced from any of the others, partly in its very elevated situation, and partly from the substratum being composed of greyish white coarse grained sandstone, or of a thin bed of yellow or blue clay, mixed with fragments of sandstone rock. The bog on the summit of the hill is fifteen feet deep, and is very compact in its nature; but on the declivity it seldom exceeds three feet in depth. Some improvements have been made by small farmers on the shallow part; and as they all proceed regularly in taking in and improving a small portion of the bog every year, we may expect at no very distant period to see the whole southern face of the hill changed from its present wild and barren state to valuable pasture or meadow ground."

NEWTOWN-BREDA, a village in the parish of Knockheda, barony of Upper Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the road from Belfast to Saintfield, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile east of the Lagan, and 3 miles south by east of Belfast. It contains a neat parish-church; its houses have sloping gardens to the rear; its immediate western environs, all down to the Lagan, are occupied by Sir Robert Bateson's beautiful demesne of Belvoir Park; and both its site and its entire vicinity form a lively and romantic portion of the brilliant environs of the metropolis of Ulster. In the near neighbourhood are Fort-Breda, Knock-breda parsonage, Lisnabreny-house, Bloomingdale, Cairn's-Hill, Beech-Hill-house, Fairview, Fanny's cottage, Laganvale, Cherryvale, Rosella, Leadhill, a meeting-house, a cromlech, and the remarkable antiquity called the Giant's Ring. A court of petty-sessions is held on the first and the third Saturdays of every month. Area of the village, 25 acres. Pop., in 1841, 384. Houses 88.

NEWTOWN-BROWN, a hamlet in the barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands $\frac{5}{8}$ miles south-south-west of Swineford, on the road thence to Balla. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN-BUTLER, a village in the parish of Galloon, barony of Coole, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the east road from Enniskillen to Cavan, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile east of the Enniskillen and Dublin mail-road, 3 miles east by north of the Earl of Enniskillen's sumptuous demesne of Crum castle, $\frac{3}{4}$ north of Wattle-Bridge, $\frac{4}{5}$ south-south-east of Lisnakea, and $1\frac{3}{4}$ south-east by south of Enniskillen. It contains a church, two Methodist meeting-houses, a Roman Catholic chapel, several schools, a constabulary bulary barrack, a bridewell, and a dispensary; and it is the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter held on the second Wednesday of every month. The bridewell contains 5 cells and 2 day-rooms, and is kept in a clean and orderly condition. The dispensary is within the Clones Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 30,404 acres, with a pop. of 13,531; and, in 1839-40, it expended £123 14s. 1d., and administered to 4,032 patients. Fairs are held on May 12, and the second Friday of each of the other eleven months. The village is sufficiently near the recently opened navigation of the Ulster Canal to acquire from its facility of communication an impetus to trade; and it would be not a little benefit were the line of railway constructed which the Public Commissioners projected to connect Enniskillen with Dublin. Newtown-Butler gives the title of Baron to the Earls of Lanesborough. Area of the village, 42 acres. Pop., in 1831, 412; in 1841, 541. Houses 85. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 19; in manufactures and trade, 52; in other pursuits, 33. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 56; on their own manual labour, 32; on means not specified, 7.

NEWTOWN-BUTLER, a village in the parish of Oranmore, barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. The greater part of it is a miserable collection of miserable huts. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 405. Houses 71.

NEWTOWN-CLONBUN, a parish in the barony of Upper Navan, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile east of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south by eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$ furlongs; area, 566 acres, 7 perches,—of which 4 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 373; in 1841, 298. Houses 52. The surface consists chiefly of arable land, is bounded along the south end by the Boyne, is traversed near that end by the road from Trim to Navan, and has upon that road the small village of Newtown-Trim. The chief residence is Newtown-cottage; but closely adjacent on the east, though within the parish of Killooly, is the demesne of Newtown-Park. At the south end of the parish, on the banks of the Boyne, stand the picturesque ruins of what is usually called Newtown-abbey,—a priory of regular canons, of the congregation of St. Victor, founded, about the year 1206, by Simon Rochfort, the first Englishman who held the see of Meath. This prelate substituted the church of Newtown-abbey for the church of Clonard, as the cathedral of the united dioceses of Meath, Clonard, and Trim; and in 1216, he held here a synod, the constitutions and canons of which are still extant. The superior of the priory was a lord of parliament; and Laurence White, the last prior, surrendered the establishment, with its rich endowments, in the 31st year of Henry VIII. The remains of the cathedral or priory church evince the pile to have been spacious and massive, but not highly ornamented. Among several monuments which it contains is one of Sir Lucas Dillon, of Newtown and Moymet. This gentleman was one of the ablest lawyers of the reign of Elizabeth, and long filled the office of Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and he was son and heir of Sir Robert Dillon, attorney-general to Henry VIII, and grantee of Newtown-abbey at the dissolution.—This parish is a rectory; and part of the benefice of TRIM [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £46 3s. 1d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 372; and a hedge-school had on its books 54 boys and 31 girls.

NEWTOWN-CONYNGHAM, or NEWTOWN-CUNNINGHAM, a village in the parish of All-saints, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the road from Letterkenmy to Londonderry, within 3 furlongs of the head of a bay of Lough Swilly, $\frac{1}{4}$ miles north-east of Manor-Conyngham, and $\frac{1}{2}$ west of Londonderry. It is surrounded by romantically outlined hills; it contains a constabulary station, a meeting-house, and a parish-church; and it is the seat of a monthly court of petty-sessions. Fairs are held on Feb. 12, June 1, Aug. 25, Oct. 29, and Nov. 16. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 186. Houses 29.

NEWTOWN-CROMMOLIN, or NEWTOWN-CRUMLIN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, 3 miles north-east by east of Clough, barony of Kilconway, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 3,445 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 727; in 1841, 799. Houses 142. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 175. Houses 30. Two-thirds of the parochial surface consist of mountain and bog; and the general quality of the land is of an inferior description. The road from Cushendall to Killea and Portlone passes through the interior. Fairs are held at the village on Aug. 9, Nov. 5, Feb. 5, and May 11.—This parish was formerly part of the parish and rectory of Dunaghy, but is now a perpetual curacy and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition belonging to the perpetual curate, £30; glebe, £8. Gross income, 104; nett, £100 13s. Patron, the incumbent of Dunaghy. The church was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £800 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 66. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 287 Churchmen, 283 Presbyterians, and 182 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 220 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £4 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and one with £26 from the Wesleyan Missionary Society—had on their books 178 boys and 68 girls.

NEWTOWN-DALY, a hamlet on the east border of the barony of Leitrim, 3 miles east-south-east of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN-DROGHEDA. See NEWTOWN-STALABAN.

NEWTOWN-FARTULLAGH. See NEWTOWN, co. Westmeath.

NEWTOWN-FORBES, a small post-town in the parish of Clongesh, barony and co. of Longford, Leinster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Longford, 7 south-south-east of Drumod, and 62 west-north-west of Dublin. The surrounding country is a flat and fertile tract; and the western environs, away to Lough Forbes and the Shannon, are wholly occupied with the beautiful and well-wooded demesne of CASTLE-FORBES; which see. The village contains a police barrack, a Roman Catholic chapel, a Methodist meeting-house, and a parish-church; and is the seat of a court of petty-sessions, on every alternate Tuesday. A tract of land immediately to the south, bears the name of the Scotch Quarter, in consequence of having been colonized in the 17th century by a number of settlers from Scotland. Area of the village, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 537; in 1841, 478. Houses 78. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 18; in manufactures and trade, 43; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 55; on their own manual labour, 22; on means not specified, 6.

NEWTOWN-FORTESCUE, a village in the parish of Grangegeeth, barony of Upper Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north of Slane, on the road thence to Ardee; and is the site of a school and a Roman Catholic chapel. Pop. returned with the parish.

NEWTOWN-GIRLEY, a village in the parish of Girley, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands 3 miles north of Athboy, on the road thence to Kells; and has a constabulary station, a school, and a Roman Catholic chapel. Pop., in 1831, 105. Houses 23.

NEWTOWN-GLEN. See CUSHENDALL.

NEWTOWN-GORE, a village in the parish and barony of Carrigallen, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It stands on the road from Ballinamore to Killeshandra, half-a-mile east of Lough Garadice, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Carrigallen, and 5 east-south-east of Ballinamore. A fair is held on Dec. 5. In the northern vicinity is the demesne of Woodford. Area of the village, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 207; in 1841, 187. Houses 34.

NEWTOWN-GORE, a ruined mansion in the parish of Calry, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. The mansion was the residence of the ancestors of the present Sir Robert Gore Booth, Bart.; and the ruins are an interesting object, on the north shore of the beautiful Lough Gill, a little east of Holywell, and surrounded by the most charmingly romantic hills.

NEWTOWN-HAMILTON (THE), a rivulet of the county of Armagh, Ulster, and the county of Louth, Leinster. It rises among the mountains north of the town of Newtown-Hamilton; runs southward past that town, through the Fews mountains in Creggan, and near the village of Crossmaglen; and then enters the county of Louth, and proceeds south-eastward, to the formation of the Castletown river, a little above Dundalk. The Newtown-Hamilton bears, in different parts of its course, the names of Tullyvallen river, and Greaghan river.

NEWTOWN-HAMILTON, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Upper Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. Length, south by westward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 12,404 acres, 2 roads, 8 perches,—of which 29 acres, 2 roads, 28 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,253; in 1841, 7,538. Houses 1,350. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 6,233; in 1841, 6,307. Houses 1,117. The County Water runs on the western boundary; and the Newtown-Hamilton river drains most of the interior. Lough Kiltybane lies on the southern boundary, and Lough Lisleirim on the southern border. The parochial surface is partly mountainous, prevailing hilly, and to a large extent romantic. The highest ground, Dangry mountain, is situated a little north-west of the town, and has an altitude of 1,003 feet above sea-level. The arable lands, though not suitable for wheat, produce excellent crops of oats; and both they and the pasture-grounds have been much improved by georgy, and are in a comparatively good condition. Among the seats are Millview, Tullyvallen, Tullyardguill, and Harrymount,—the last the residence of Henry Barker, Esq. The ruins of Blackbank-castle stand about two miles from the town; a large fort or extensive encampment, said to have been one of the residences of the O'Neills, occurs in the extreme south-west; and some interesting antiquities and historical associations are connected with JOHNSTOWN'S-FEWS, which see. The interior is traversed by the middle road from Dublin to Armagh, and by the road from Mount-Norris to Castleblaney.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £537 18s. 7d.; globe, £38 15s. Gross income, £576 13s. 7d.; nett, £516 3s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of the town, and was built in 1775, out of funds provided by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 240. A school-house in the town is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 150. The Presbyterian meeting-houses at Altamahar, Newtown-Hamilton, and Cortamlet, have an attendance of respectively 200, 350, and 600. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Creggan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,265 Churchmen, 2,174 Presbyterians, and 4,092 Roman Catholics; and 5 pay daily schools at Carraganawoddy, Altamahar, Newtown-Hamilton, and Dromalt, had on their books 143 boys and 46 girls. In 1842, the National Board had two schools at Mullaghduff, two at Tullyvallen, and one at Cortamlet.

NEWTOWN-HAMILTON, a post and market town in the parish of Newtown-Hamilton, barony of Upper Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands on the middle road from Armagh to Dublin, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Mount-Norris, 5 south-east of Keady, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Markethill, $8\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Newry, $9\frac{1}{2}$ south by east of Armagh, 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Dundalk, and $52\frac{1}{2}$ north by west of Dublin. It occupies a romantic situation; and, though not interiorly interesting, pleases the eye in connection with the surrounding country. It was founded so late as about the year 1770, and after attempts to raise towns at Blackbank and Johnstown's-Fews had failed; and, in common with the circumjacent country, it is in an improving condition. It contains a meeting-house, two school-houses, a new market-house, a sessions-house, a police-barack, a bridewell, and a dispensary; and in its near vicinity are a Roman Catholic chapel and a spa. The bridewell is very well kept; and during 1842, it cost £18 16s. The dispensary is within the Castle-Blaney Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 25,000 acres, with a pop. of 13,354; and, in 1839, it expended £60, and administered to 820 patients. The town is the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions,—the latter held on the last Saturday of every month. A market is held weekly; and fairs are held on the last Saturday of every month. Area of the town, 51 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,020; in 1841, 1,231. Houses 233. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 57; in manufactures and trade, 152; in other pursuits, 40. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 158; on their own manual labour, 73; on means not specified, 8.

NEWTOWN-LENNAN, a parish in the baronies of Slieveadagh and East Ifa and Offa, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Carrick-on-Suir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south by eastward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 2. Area of the Slieveadagh section, 1,618 acres, 6 perches; of the East Ifa and Offa section, 4,156 acres, 16 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,931; * in 1841, 1,806. Houses 268. Pop. of the East Ifa and Offa section, in 1841, 1,276. Houses 191. The surface forms part of the extreme east border of the county; and is divided from Leinster, along the east by the rivulet Lingane. The Lingane, while on the boundary, descends from a surface-elevation above sea-level of 257 feet to nearly the tidal-level of the Suir; and a rivulet which traces the northern boundary, descends, while there, from an elevation above sea-level of 435 feet. The highest ground in the parish is on the boundary-line between the two sections or baronies, and has an altitude above sea-level of 980 feet. The greater part of the surface consists of good arable land. The principal seats are Cregg-house and Knockroe-house; and the hamlets are Newtown and Cregg.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CLONEGANE [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £441 9s. 5d.; glebe, £6 9s. 3d. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated a little south of the hamlet of Newtown, and has an attendance of 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Carrick-on-Suir. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and two pay daily schools were usually attended by about 60 children.

* The Census of 1831 places the whole of the parish in East Ifa and Offa, and states its pop. at 1,842.

NEWTOWN-LIMAVADDY,

A post and market town in the parish of Drumachose, barony of Kenaught, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the right bank of the river Roe, and on the road from Londonderry to Coleraine, 2 miles east by south of the south-east extremity of Lough Foyle, 3½ south-south-east of the mouth of the Roe, 2¼ east by north of Ballykelly, 7½ north of Dungiven, 11½ west-south-west of Coleraine, 12½ east-north-east of Londonderry, 17½ north-west by north of Maghera, 57 north-west of Belfast, and 13¼ north by half-west of Dublin.

Enviros.—The site of the town is in a warm, fertile, well-wooded, and very beautiful portion of the rich vale of the Roe, near the line where that vale glides out from the character of glen and dell, and expands into the luxuriant and fructiferous plain of Myroe. In the east and south-east environs are the seats of Streeve, Gortgarn, and Fruit-hill,—the last the charming residence of M. MacCausland, Esq.; in the south are Roe-park and Drumnagasker,—the former the fine residence of E. C. MacNaghten, Esq., in the immediate vicinity of the town, but sending a broad sheet of wood far up the Roe; in the west are Bessbrook, Finlagan, Sheephill, Drummond, and Walworth, and the village of Ballykelly; and, in the north, are Ardargle, Rush-hall, Culmore, and Outlands, and, at 3¼ miles, the verdant mountain of Benyevenagh, with its beautifully columnar cliffs, and its panorama-viewing summit, overhanging Lough Foyle, the desert shores of Magilligan, and the opulent strath of Myroe. See BENYVENAGH. "We recommend the traveller who is interested in the topography of this part of the country and the adjacent coast," says Mr. Fraser, "to ascend Benyevenagh, whose verdant summit is 1,260 feet above the sea. From it, and even from many of the less prominent parts of its beautiful cliffy sides, under favourable circumstances, with the map, he will learn more of this mountain-district and its shores, from Fair-head to Innishowen-head, than from the most minute and lengthened description."

Interior of the Town.—A stone bridge carries the thoroughfare, and the road from Coleraine to Londonderry, westward across the Roe. Catherine-street, a straight and remarkably spacious street, commences a few yards east of the bridge, and extends 330 yards to the north-east. A straight but greatly narrower street goes off from the middle of the north-west side of Catherine-street, and extends 180 yards to the north-north-west. Main-street commences at the north-north-west end of the preceding; and first extends straightly and with singular spaciousness, 360 yards to the north-east,—then begins to contract, and extends 120 yards to the north-north-east,—and finally proceeds, with much irregularity, 230 yards to the east. A street of 380 yards in length, nearly straight, but not spacious, begins near the middle of the south-east side of the spacious part of Main-street, and extends south-south-eastward past the north-east end of Catherine-street. The other streets are few, short, and little, if any, superior to lanes; and the outskirts, though straggling, are not extensive. The church is a handsome structure; the market-house is not conspicuously ornamental; the meeting-houses, and other more prominent structures, possess no arresting feature; and the private houses, though including a number of cabins, and of large but poor tenements, are aggregately much better than those of most second-rate towns in Connaught, Munster, or even Leinster.

The Poor-law Union.—The Poor-law union of Newtown-Limavaddy ranks as the 70th, and was declared on Sept. 21, 1839. It lies wholly in co. Londonderry, and comprehends an area of 150,623 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 41,031. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are Newtown-Limavaddy, 3,610; Fruit-hill, 2,699; Keady, 1,048; Lislane, 1,875; Gelvin, 2,135; Straw, 1,930; Drum, 2,601; Dungiven, 2,941; Glenshane, 1,704; Owenreagh, 1,615; Feeny, 1,802; Fore-Glen, 1,992; Faughanvale, 2,575; Ballykelly, 2,235; the Highlands, 2,714; Myroe, 1,919; Aghanloo, 2,102; Bellerena, 1,900; and Benone, 1,634. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians is 24; and of the latter, 2 are elected by each of the divisions of Newtown-Limavaddy, Drum, Dungiven, Feeny, and Faughanvale, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Fore-Glen and Faughanvale are in the barony of Tyrkeeran; the divisions of Ballykelly and Feeny are in Tyrkeeran and Kenaught; and all the other divisions are in Kenaught. The number of valued tenements in the Tyrkeeran districts is 569;—in the Kenaught districts, 3,797,—in the whole union, 4,366; and of this total, 1,174 were valued under £5,—1,172, under £10,—710, under £15,—366, under £20,—257, under £25,—201, under £30,—229, under £40,—106, under £50,—and 151, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £65,580: the total number of persons rated is 4,366; and of these, 153 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—296, not exceeding £2,—229, not exceeding £3,—261, not exceeding £4,—and 290, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on June 18, 1840,—to be completed in Aug. 1841,—to cost £5,982 for building and completion, and £1,309 5s. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 7 acres, 14 perches; purchased for £708 15s.—and to contain accommodation for 500 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was March 15, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,000 12s. 6d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,283 5s. 6d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 100. The medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Newtown-Limavaddy, Dungiven, and Magilligan; and, in 1839, they received £136 from subscription, and £136 10s. from public grants, expended £154 4s. in salaries to medical officers, £107 11s. for medicines, and £23 15s. for contingencies, and administered to 3,818 patients. The Newtown-Limavaddy dispensary serves for a district of 42,440 acres, with a pop. of 15,754; and, in 1839, it expended £105 17s., and administered to 1,515 patients.

Trade.—The linen-trade of Newtown-Limavaddy was at one time of considerable extent; and, though it dwindled away to littleness, it gives promise of reacquainting its former importance. There are two distilleries. The great impulse given for some time past to the agriculture of all the surrounding country, has occasioned a large, rapid, and steady increase to the prosperity of the town. Wheat, though not very many years ago imported for home consumption, is now raised in considerable quantities throughout the neighbouring districts; and flax, after having for a considerable period fallen exceedingly off as an article of culture, has, for 9 or 10 years past, been so large a crop as to occasion of itself a very large trade. "The great increase in the culture of flax," says an official report in 1837, "is the principal cause of the prosperity of Newtown-Limavaddy; and such has been the extent of this produce, that it was found expedient to open a market in the town for its disposal within the last twelve months, where the average weekly sales now amount to from 15 to 17 tons, and to the value of £1,000 sterling; and it is considered that this amount will rather increase than diminish." The sales of agricultural produce, at the weekly markets, and the general retail trade for the supply of the surrounding country, are comparatively very large. Fairs are held on the second Monday of Feb., and on March 28, June 13, July 12, and Oct. 29. The town has a comfortable inn, and branch-offices of the Belfast Banking Company, and the Northern Banking Company. The public conveyances in 1838 were a mail-coach in transit between Londonderry and Belfast, and a car in transit between Londonderry and Coleraine. It is proposed to execute a branch-railway to this place from the projected railway betwixt Coleraine and Londonderry.

Municipal Affairs.—A charter of 11 James I. erected Newtown-Limavaddy into a borough, and appointed its corporation to consist of a provost, 12 free burgesses, 2 sergeants-at-mace, and a commonalty, and to be called "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Lymavady." The borough limits are not known to have been at any period more accurately defined than as "the town and precincts of Lymavady." The Earl of Londonderry was patron or proprietor at the time of the Legislative Union; and he received the whole of the £15,000 of compensation for the annulling of its right of sending members to Parliament. The corporation fell into neglect immediately after the disfranchisement, ceased to perform any corporate act about the year 1808, and has long been entirely extinct. A borough court, authorized by the charter, was discontinued about the year 1734; and a manor court, held by the seneschal of the surrounding manor, has also been a long time in desuetude. A court of quarter-sessions is held twice a year; and a court of petty-sessions on every alternate Tuesday. The public peace is preserved by a party of the county constabulary. The bridewell is kept in a clean and satisfactory condition; and, during 1843, it cost £24 16s. 8d. A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland has its seat in Newtown-Limavaddy, exercises inspection over 13 congregations, and meets on the first Tuesday of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov. Two of the congregations under this presbytery are at Newtown-Limavaddy, two are at Dungiven, and the other 9 are at respectively Ballykelly, Magilligan, Ballygagh, Largy, Drumachose, Seriggan, Derrymore, Bovevagh, and Myroe.

Statistics, &c.—Area of the town, 515 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,428; in 1841, 3,101. Houses 566. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 152; in manufactures and trade, 319; in other pursuits, 118. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 55; on the directing of labour, 277; on their own manual labour, 241; on means not specified, 16. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 674; who could read but not write, 350; who could neither read nor write, 239. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 465; who could read but not write, 713; who could neither read nor write, 318.—Newtown-Limavaddy, then called the Dog's Leap, was at one time the chief residence of the O'Cahans, the ancient toparchs of the central and the eastern parts of the territory which now constitutes the county of Londonderry; and, from the date of the Anglo-Norman conquest down to the period succeeding the Protestant settlement of Ulster, it shared in most of the greater events which occurred within the county. See LONDONDERRY (COUNTY OF).

NEWTOWN-LOE, a village in the parish of Newtown, barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Galway, 2½ miles west by south of Tyrrel's-Pass, and 2½ east of Kilbeggan. It is the site of a church and a school; and in its near vicinity are a Roman Catholic chapel, and Archdeacon Vignoles' seat of Cornahir. A height at the village has an altitude of 368 feet above sea-level; and, in spite of being so far inland, and so comparatively low, forms a marked feature in the midst of a vast flat country. Pop. of the village returned with the parish.

NEWTOWN-MOUNT-BELLEW. See NEWTOWN-BELLEW.

NEWTOWN-MOUNT-KENNEDY, a small market and post town, in the parish of Upper Newcastle, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Wexford, 2 miles south of the Glen of the Downs, 2½ west of the shore of the Irish Sea, 2½ south by west of Delgany, 6 north by west of Rathnew, 7½ south of Bray, 8 north-north-west of Wicklow, and 17½ south-south-east of Dublin. It does not possess in its own site, or interior character or groupings any of the elements of picturesqueness or romance; yet it is surrounded by scenery the most beautiful and charming, and forms an excellent central-point or headquarters for a series of easy excursions among the most admired landscapes of the north of Wicklow. "From this place as a centre," says the author of the 'Guide to Wicklow,' "the visitor could strike off upon pleasant short excursions each day, and return to dinner. The Glen and demesne of Dunran, the Devil's Glen, Glenmore Castle, Kiltymon Glen, the demesnes of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Altadore, and Hermitage, with many others, are within easy distances. There is a very comfortable inn in the town, where the traveller is certain of being treated with great courteousness, and where the charges are very moderate." Within a circumference described upon a radius of two miles are three hills of respectively 1,122, 1,193, and 1,232 feet of altitude, and the seats of Trudder-house, Killadreenan-cottage, Prospect-house, Mount-John-house, Kiltymon-house, Dunran-house, Kilmartin, Newcastle-house, Bloomfield, Ballyphilip, Coodross, Woodstock-house, Warblebank, Kilmullen, Kilquod-house, Ballyronan-house, Springfarm, Derraghville, Laurel-lodge, Searscow, East Priory, Mount-Kennedy-house, Rockfield, Dromin-lodge, Glenbrook, Mount-Pleasant, Down's-Lawn, Dromin-house, Holywell, Toomon-house, Down's-lodge, Bromley-house, Nassau-lodge, Bellfield-house, Glendarragh-cottage, Altadore-house, Hermitage, Glendarragh-house, East-hill, Tithewer, Springmount, and Monalin-house. The mansion of Mount-Kennedy, or Newton-Mount-Kennedy, stands nearly ¼ of a mile north by west of the town, and, together with the grounds around it, is noticed in the following terms by the author of the 'Guide to Wicklow: 'The house and demesne of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy are well worthy the attention of the inquisitive tourist; the demesne is extensive, highly improved, and beautifully situated. This whole tract of land about fifty years ago, was totally wild and barren; about this period it was purchased by General Cunningham, afterwards Lord Rossmore, who then retired from public life. This demesne, as well as that of Dunran, were planted by his lordship, and the soil of valleys and lowlands, hitherto useless, reclaimed by that energetic and sagacious nobleman, principally by the application of marl and limestone gravel. So paramount was this excellent man's taste and ability for agricultural improvement, that, beginning from fifty acres, he extended his demesne and farms from Newtown-Mount-Kennedy to the southern extremity of Dunran, nor ceased till he had expended £64,000 in improvements. This house is a large square building of great simplicity and elegance; it is in the Ionic order, and after a design by Wyatt, executed by Mr. Cooley, also a very eminent artist. From the portico there is a charming view of the improvement and woods, terminating in the mountains; and from the east front is a commanding prospect of a highly cultivated country, bounded at the distance of 2 miles by the sea.' The property received its name, and the town of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy its origin, from a mercantile family of Dublin, one of whom, George Kennedy, was an alderman of the city in 1590. The manor passed by inheritance from the last male of the Kennedys to Mr. Barker; it was purchased from Mr. Barker by General Conyngham, afterwards Lord Rossmore; and it descended from Lord Rossmore to the family of Gunn of Rattoo in the county of Kerry.—A court of petty-sessions is held in the town on the second Saturday of every month. Fairs are held on Feb. 2, April 18, June 29, Aug. 15, Oct. 30, and Dec. 21. In 1841, the Newtown-Mount-Kennedy Loan Fund had a capital of £908, circulated £3,595 in 896 loans, cleared a nett profit of £52 9s. 9d., and expended for charitable purposes £65. A dispensary in the town is within the Rathdrum Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 25,630 acres; with a pop. of 12,201; and, in 1839-40, it received £150 15s., and expended £137 12s. 11½d. In 1798, a body of rebels was defeated at Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, by a body of the King's troops under Lords Rossmore and Kingsborough. Area of the town, 49 acres. Pop., in 1831, 825; in 1841, 828. Houses 113. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 53; in manufactures and trade, 77; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 63; on their own manual labour, 82; on means not specified, 5.

NEWTOWN-PARK. See NEWTOWN-CLOXBUN.

NEWTOWN-PLATTEN, a village in the parish of Duleek, barony of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands 2 miles south-west of Drogheda, on the road thence to Rosnaree. In its vicinity are the seats of Mount-Granville and Platten. Pop., in 1831, 116. Houses 21.

NEWTOWN-REGAN, a hamlet in the barony of Kiltartan, co. Galway, Connought. It stands 1½ mile south-west of Gort, on the road thence to Kilmaduaigh. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN-SANDES, a village in the parish of Murhir, barony of Iraghticonnor, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands on the road from Listowel to Glin, 4½ miles south of Tarbert, and 5 north-east of Listowel. A dispensary here is within the Listowel Poor-law union, and, in 1839-40, it received £55 17s. from subscription, and £55 17s. from public grants. The church of Murhir stands about a mile to the south-west. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 375; in 1841, 314. Houses 54.

NEWTOWN-SAVILLE, a quoad sacra parish, 4½ miles north of Clogher, barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length and breadth, each 4½ miles; area, about 13,768½ acres. Pop. not separately returned. It consists of the northern district of the quoad civilia parish of Clogher; and is traversed northward by the road from Clogher to Omagh. The land is variously good, light, indifferent, mountainous, and waste; but in no case is prime. The hamlet of Newtown-Saville is the site of the church and the glebe-house; and near it are a Roman Catholic chapel, and two schools,—one of the latter connected with the National Board. Fairs are held on the last Monday of every month.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Glebe, £15. Gross income, £75; nett, £72 5s. Patron, the dean of Clogher. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Baron of First Fruits, and a donation of £156 18s. 5½d. from the Rev. Francis Gervais, the proprietor of the estate on which it stands. Sittings 180; attendance 120. The number of members of the Established church within the quoad sacra parish is about 1,150. All the other statistics are mixed up with those of the quoad civilia parish of Clogher.

NEWTOWN-SMYTH. See GALWAY.

NEWTOWN-STALABAN, a village in the parish of Tullyallen, barony of Ferrard, co. Louth, Leinster. It stands 1½ mile north-east of Drogheda, on the road thence to Termonfeckan. Adjacent to it on the east is Newtown-house. Pop. not specially returned.

NEWTOWN-STEWART, a post and market town in the parish of Ardstraw, barony of Strabane, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands on the river Mourne, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry, 5 miles west of Gorton, 7 north-north-east of Drumquin, 7½ east of Castle-Derg, 7½ south-south-east of Strabane, 8 north-north-west of Omagh, 19 south of Londonderry, and 94½ north-north-west of Dublin. The Struel and the Moyle or Gleniff rivers form the Mourne a few perches east of the town. The hill of Mary Grey is situated 1½ mile to the east-south-east, and has an altitude of 826 feet above sea-level. The hill of Bessy Bell is situated 2 miles to the south-south-west, and has an altitude of 1,366 feet above sea-level. The Marquis of Abercorn's magnificent demesne of Baron's-court, commences 1½ mile to the south-west, and extends upwards of 2 miles south-south-westward, profuse in natural beauty, rich in wood, and largely gemmed with the chain of ornate lakes called Loughs Mary, Fanny, and Catherine. Within a circumference described upon a radius of two miles are Pigeon-Hill, Castle-Moyle, Oldcastle, Harvey Avery's Castle, and Woodbrook. These agreeable objects in the environs, the convergence of vales at the town, the broad valley of the Mourne below, and the periphery of verdant, picturesque, and sheltering hills, render the situation of Newtown-Stewart greatly more pleasant than that of most of the other inland towns of Ireland. 'Its sheltered position,' remarks the Rev. Dr. Fitzgerald, 'softens the rigour of every wind that blows. The fertile and extensive valley that fronts it to the north, and through the centre of which the river Mourne takes its course, is encompassed on every side by gently swelling hills, backed by corresponding mountains of different altitudes, of which Bell and Grey, to the south and east, are the nearest and most beautiful; the lofty top of the former serves as a barometer to the surrounding country; when overhung with clouds or enveloped with mist, it is a sign of approaching rain, but when clearly seen, it indicates fair weather. The temperature of the climate may be inferred from this circumstance, that snow in the valley here mentioned disappears a few days earlier than in the more exposed districts towards Strabane and Derry."

Newtown-Stewart was originally called Lislis; and it acquired its present name from Sir William Stewart, to whom it was granted by Charles I. In consequence of its commanding a great pass from the valley of the Foyle, and the northern sea-board of Donegal and Londonderry to the centre and the south of the kingdom, it was long an important military post; during the Revolution it was burned by order of James II.; and during 30 or 35 subsequent years, it lay in a state of ruinous prostration. The modern improvement of the town, for some unexplained reason, has not been so great and rapid as either its own fine situation or the progress of other towns in the north might have led a stranger to expect. Yet, though irregular in its plan and poor in some of its architecture, it exhibits around its centre some series of good houses. Its principal public buildings are a church, two Presbyterian meeting-houses, two Methodist meeting-houses, and a Roman Catholic chapel. At the foot of Main-street stands the house in which James II. slept on his way to Londonderry; and in the vicinity is a remarkable castle, noticed in the following terms by the Rev. Dr. Fitzgerald:

"It stands on a high hill a little to the south-west of the town, and has two round towers and a platform. The towers, except on the north side, are entire. This castle belonged to Henry O'Neal, who, according to tradition, was king of Ulster in the fifth century; he was called by a name which signifies in Irish 'cross' or 'wicked,' as characteristic of his temper. Of this the following anecdote is a singular instance:—He had a sister who is represented as having an elegant person but the head of a swine; and thence called the female monster. Henry, anxious to get rid of an object that mortified his feelings and his pride, adopted the plan of offering her in marriage to any person who should seem inclined to propose for her, but on condition that, after having seen her, he should either marry or hang. Accordingly, nineteen persons, among whom was a captive prince, who had agreed to the condition, were all executed on the platform before his castle; and tradition says, the twentieth and last person who proposed for her was the son of his own cowherd, who was tempted by the magnitude of her dowry, but who, on seeing her, immediately exclaimed, 'Cur sours me, cur sours me; that is, 'hang me! hang me!' The young man, however, was spared, and the unfortunate princess put to death." Other old castles in the vicinity are noticed in the article ARDSTRAW: which see.—A dispensary in Newtown-Stewart is within the Strabane Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 44,794 acres, with a pop. of 18,662; and, in 1830, it expended £105, and administered to 1,541 patients. Fairs are held on the last Monday of every month. A court of petty-sessions is held on the third Thursday of every month. Area of the town, 61 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,737; in 1841, 1,405. Houses 273. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 62; in manufactures and trade, 182; in other pursuits, 57. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 161; on their own manual labour, 114; on means not specified, 9.

NEWTOWN-TRIM, a village in the parish of Newtown-Clonban, and on the left bank of the Boyne, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile east of Trim, barony of Upper Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop. returned with the parish.

NICHOLAS (St.), a parish on the southern border of the barony of Ballaghkeen, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,213 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 311; in 1841, 316. Houses 49. The land is of a rather light description. In the centre stands the hamlet of Garrylough. This parish is an inappropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of ARDCOLM [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £27 7s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £39 1s. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and are inappropriate in Lord Portsmouth. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 288; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

NICHOLAS (St.). See NATHLASH, DUBLIN, COBK, LINCRICK, GALWAY, and CARRICK-ON-SUIR. NICHOLASTOWN, a quondam parish, now treated as merely a townland, on the north border of the barony of Killea and Moore, 24 miles south-east of Athy, co. Kildare, Leinster.

NIEB (THE), a grand mountain rivulet of the county of Waterford, Munster. It issues in various head-streams from small Alpine lakes, two of which have a surface-elevation of upwards of 1,200, and one of 1,650 feet above sea-level, among the central and loftiest heights of the Cummerragh mountains; and it rolls, and leaps, and tumbles about 9 miles westward to the Suir, at the point where that river makes its sudden and final deflexion from a southerly course, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Ardnaman.

NILTEEN, or NALTERN, a grange in the barony of Upper Antrim, 3 miles east of the town of Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, west-south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,737 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,169; in 1841, 1,191. Houses 218. The land is of superior quality. The road from Antrim to Dough runs nearly along the northern boundary; and that from Belfast to Connor passes across the interior.—This grange is practically a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DONEGORE [which see], in the dio. of Connor. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £124 0s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d., and the rectorial for £248 1s. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; and the latter are claimed by James Moore, Esq. of Cloverhill. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 63 Churchmen, 1,046 Presbyterians, and 65 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 120 children; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 65 boys and 41 girls.

NINE-MILE-HOUSE, a village in the parish of Templemichael, barony of Slieveardagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the east margin of the province, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Clonmel and Cork, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of the summit of Slievenaman, 6 south-south-west of Cullin, and 11 north-east by east of Clonmel. It has a small posting establishment. Fairs are held on March 25, May 20, and Nov. 1. In the immediate vicinity are Rockview-house, and the commencement of the defile past the east base of Slievenaman. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 160. Houses 26.

NOBBER, a parish, partly in the barony of Lower Kells, but chiefly in that of Morgallion, co. Meath, Leinster. The Morgallion section contains the villages of NOBBER and BALLINKE: see these articles. Length, south by eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Lower Kells section, 1,088 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches; of the Morgallion section, 9,399 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which 70 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches are in Lough Whitewood, and 6 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches are in small lakes. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,092; in 1841, 3,757. Houses 639. Pop., in 1841, of the Lower Kells section, 384; of the rural districts of the Morgallion section, 2,877. Houses in these, respectively 66 and 493. The townland of Rathe was formerly in the barony of Lower Slane, but was transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, to the barony of Morgallion. The parochial surface is part of the north border of the great plain of Meath, and has an undulated character, and a rich and ornate appearance. Gallows Hill, the highest ground, has an altitude of 308 feet above sea-level, and commands a noble panoramic view of the surrounding country. Immediately west of the village of Nobber is Brittas, the well-wooded and fine old demesne of Edward Bligh, Esq.; and on the west border, north of Brittas, is the conspicuous demesne of Whitewood, the property and occasional residence of Viscount Gormanstown, adorned with Lough Whitewood, whose superfluous waters form the nascent river Dee. The other principal seats are Spiddal, Marl-Hill, Rockfield-house, Julianstown-house, Castlefield, Mullandeggan, Prestonvale, and Cornabrock. The road from Dublin to Kingscourt and Clones passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. The tithes are compounded for £480 12s. 4jd., and are appropriated to the see of Meath, and held under lease of the diocesan. The parishes and appropriate curacies of Nobber and LOUGHBRACAN (see that article), constitute the perpetual curacy and the benefice of Nobber. Glebe, £70. Gross income, £125 7s. 8jd. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated at the village of Nobber, and was built about the year 1771, by means of parochial cess. Sittings 120; attendance, from 30 to 35. The Roman Catholic chapel is also situated at Nobber, and has an attendance of about 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Cruicetown. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 121, and the Roman Catholics to 3,976; the Protestants of the union to 129, and the Roman Catholics to 4,478; and 2 daily schools in the parish and union—one of which was chiefly supported by £20 a-year and other advantages from Lord Gormanstown—were usually attended by about 158 children.

NOBBER, a post-village in the parish of Nobber, barony of Morgallion, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Clones, 5 miles east-north-east of Moynalty, $\frac{5}{8}$ south-south-east of Kingscourt, $\frac{6}{8}$ north-east by north of Kells, $\frac{7}{8}$ west-south-west of Ardee, $\frac{9}{8}$ north by west of Navan, and $\frac{3}{4}$ north-west by north of Dublin. The church and the Roman Catholic chapel at the village are neat structures. The remains of a priory stand in the churchyard. The dispensary of Nobber is within the Poor-law union of Kells, and serves for a district of 19,069 acres, with a pop. of 7,168; and, in 1839-40, it expended £122 16s. 7d., and administered to 1,212 patients. A fair is held on April 25. In 1670, Turlough O'Carolan—popularly known as Carolan, the last of the Irish minstrels—was born, in humble circumstances, at Nobber. "He was deprived of his sight by the ravages of the small-pox, at so early a period of life, that he remembered no impression of colours." He was accustomed to say, when speaking of this calamity, that his eyes were transplanted into his ears; and so apparent became, even during childhood, his acute sensibility to the concord of sweet sounds, that his friends procured him a professional instructor on the harp, before he had completed the twelfth year of his age. He was, however, a natural genius of the first rank, and was born to create rather than to practise. Although his harp was rarely unstrung, he, in general, as is observed by Mr. Walker, only used it to assist him in composition; his fingers wandered amongst the strings in quest of the sweets of melody. At an early age Carolan became enamoured of a lady, by name Miss Bridget Cruise; and the song addressed by him to that fair object of his wishes, is supposed to be his chef d'œuvre. Miss Cruise, however, refused his hand; but the sympathy remaining true, although the object might change, he shortly found a solace in marriage with a young woman of a respectable family, named Mary MacGuire, by whom he had seven children. He now fixed his residence on a small farm near Moshill, in the county of Leitrim; but the fate of genius followed him to his little habitation. He prosecuted his studies in music and poetry with great care, but quite neglected, in the ardour of such pursuits, and in the pleasures of an unbounded hospitality, a due attention to prudential concerns. He consequently soon abandoned a farm that was an encumbrance rather than a source of emolument, and commenced the life of an itinerant musician." Some further notices of Carolan are given in the article KILRONAN; which see. Area of the village of Nobber, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 379; in 1841, 349. Houses 57.

NOCK-LYON, or KNOCKLYON, a hamlet in the parish of Tallaght, barony of Uppercross, 4 miles south-south-west of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Adjacent to it is Knocklyon-house. Pop. not specially returned.

NOGGINSTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Killeckill, barony of Leitrim, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles north-east by east of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop. not specially returned.

NOHOVAL, NOGHEVAL, NOUGHAVAL, or NOUGHILL, a parish 44 miles north-west by west of Ballymore, and partly in the barony of Kilkenny-West, co. Westmeath, partly in the baronies of Ratheline and Abbeyshruel, co. Longford, Leinster. The Abbeyshruel section contains a small part of the town of BALLYMAHON; which see. The Westmeath section consists of two mutually detached districts, the lesser lying from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile west of the greater, and including a considerable portion of Lough Ree. Length of the greater district, north-westward, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{2}{8}$. Length of the lesser district, westward, $\frac{3}{8}$; breadth, from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{2}{8}$. Area of the whole of the Westmeath section, 11,588 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches,—of which 2,391 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches are in Lough Ree, and 181 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are in small lakes and the Inny river. The Ratheline and the Abbeyshruel sections in co. Longford also lie mutually detached, the former 5 furlongs west of the latter, and including a small portion of the north-eastern extremity of Lough Ree. Length and breadth of the Ratheline section, each $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile; area, 331 acres, 2 roods, 35 perches,—of which 36 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are in Lough Ree, and 10 acres, 3 perches are in the river Inny. Length of the Abbeyshruel section, westward, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,232 acres, 3 perches,—of which 28 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches are in the river Inny. The Ratheline section formerly belonged to Abbeyshruel, but was transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84. Pop. of the whole parish, in 1831, 4,154; in 1841, 4,480. Houses 793. Pop., in 1841, of the Westmeath section, 2,868; of the Ratheline section, 26; of the rural districts of the Abbeyshruel section, 1,482. Houses in these, respectively 514, 4, and 257. The Abbeyshruel section is bounded on the north and west by the river Inny, and contains the seats of Cartron and Rathmore. The western district of the Westmeath section contains the islands of Innisboffin, Innisturk, Leveret, Red-island, Reman's and Hlog, and the greater part of Lough Creggan. The eastern district of the Westmeath section is cut into nearly equal parts by the Craggy rivulet, and contains the village of ABURN [which see], the greater part of Lough Doona, a police station, the seats of Little-town-lodge, Van-Dieman-lodge, Long-lodge, Rock-land-house, Nohoval-house, Lisquill-house, Kilcormac-lodge, Longfield-house, and Ardnacran-house; and the ruins of an abbey and a castle. The prevailing quality of the land throughout the parish is good.—This parish is an appropriate rectory, and part of the perpetual curacy and benefice of FORNEY [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Glebe belonging to the perpetual curate, £18 18s. The tithes are compounded for £450, and are appropriated to the see of Meath, and held under lease from the diocesan. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated in the eastern district of the Westmeath section, and has an attendance of from 900 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tubberclare, in the parish of Kilkenny-West. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 144, and the Roman Catholics to 4,113; and 7 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 237 children.

NOHOVAL, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the coast of the barony of Kinnalea, 4 miles east of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,508 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,200; in 1841, 1,175. Houses 202. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1841, 142. Houses 27. The land, though light, is productive. The greater part is under tillage, and the whole is conveniently situated for both lime and sea-manure. The road from Kinsale to Robert's Cove passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Peter's, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £140. The parishes of Nohoval and KILMANOGH [see that article], constitute the perpetual curacy and the benefice of Nohoval. Pop., in 1831, 2,477. Tithe composition belonging to the perpetual curacy, £75; glebe, £4 11s. 7d. Gross income, £102 13s. 7d.; nett, £95 6s. 1d. Patron, the archdeacon of Cork. The church was built upwards of a century ago; but the cost of its erection is not known. Sittings 120; attendance, from 30 to 60. A schoolhouse in Kilmanog is also used as a parochial place of worship. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tracton. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 1,259; the Protestants of the union to 151, and the Roman Catholics to 2,400; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 15 children; a pay daily school in the parish had an average attendance of about 100 children; and there were three daily schools in Kilmanog.

NOHOVAL, or NOUGHVAL, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Burren, 2½ miles north-east of Killynora, co. Clare, Munster. Length, north-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 4,661 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 408; in 1841, 450. Houses 65. The hamlet of Nohoval had, in 1831, 10 houses, and 64 inhabitants. The proportion of tillage or meadow land is very small; and that of limestone rocky pasture is very large, and quite predominant. The tillage lands produce potatoes, oats, and bere; the pasturable mountain amounts to about 80 Irish acres; and the extent of bog is about 20 Irish acres. The highest ground is on the northern boundary, and has an altitude above sea-level of 635 feet. The seats are Lismoher-house and Lismoher-lodge; and the principal antiquities are the cross and the ruined church of Nohoval, three cromlechs, three Danish forts, and the ruins or vestiges of Ballygunner, Ballymurphy, and Binroe castles. Lough Aleanaun lies in the east. The roads from Killynora to Ballyvaughan and Kinvarra pass through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Killynora. Vicarial tithe composition, £35; glebe, £32 10s. The vicarages of Nohoval and CARRUNE [see that article], constitute the benefice of Nohoval. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 4½. Pop., in 1831, 1,453. Gross income, £100 10s.; nett, £100 13s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. There is no church. The Nohoval and the Carrune Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 100 and 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, all the inhabitants of both the parish and the union were Roman Catholics; a hedge-school in the parish had on its books 20 boys and 15 girls; and 3 daily schools in the union had on their books 110 boys and 74 girls.

NOHOVAL-DALY, a parish, 6½ miles north-west by west of Mill-street, and partly in the barony of Duballow, co. Cork, partly in the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Cork section, 11,544 acres; of the Kerry section, 5,829 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,229; in 1841, 3,954. Houses 623. Pop. of the Cork section, in 1831, 1,925; in 1841, 2,350. Houses 351. The surface consists of a portion of the glen or vale of the river Blackwater, almost immediately below that river's source, and portions of the mountainous screens of the vale within both Cork and Kerry. About one-third of the whole is arable and pasture land; and the remainder is either bog or waste mountain. The glen or low ground district is warmed and embellished with a considerable quantity of wood; and its chief localities are Mount-Infant, Farrankeel, Knocknafeeth, Knockagree, and Knockasee. The extreme north is part of the crownlands of Pobble O'Keefe, and has already been noticed in the article on KING-WILLIAM'S-TOWN: which see. The principal bogs are situated in the south-east, and within the Cork section; they lie in slight hollows on an aluminous sandstone; they require only surface draining in order to be fully available for cultivation; they cover an area of 1,814 acres; and as they existed about 30 years ago, they required an expenditure of only about £672 in order to their complete reclamation. The Kerry section of the parish forms part of the district popularly, but not politically, known under the name of the East Fraction.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DRISHANE [which see], in the dio of Ardfer and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £140; rectorial tithe composition not reported. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 821; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Drishane. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and 2 hedge-schools were usually attended by about 92 children. In 1842, the National Board had two schools at Knockagree.

NOHOVAL-KERRY, a parish in the barony of Trughenackmy, 2½ miles west of Castle-Island, co. Kerry, Munster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 3,204 acres. Pop., in 1831, 853; in 1841, 944. Houses 133. Most of the surface is part of the beautiful and generally fertile valley at the north base of Slieveemish; yet it consists of land of various qualities, from good to indifferent. The road from Castle-Island to Tralee passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLYMACCELLIGOT [which see], in the dio. of Ardfer and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £68 9s. 10d.; glebe, £18. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 851; and a hedge-school had on its books 25 boys and 18 girls.

NONANE. See TEMPLEMOLOGA.

NORE (THE), a river, partly of the county of Tipperary, Munster, but chiefly of Queen's county and the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It rises among the Devil-Bit mountains in co. Tipperary, at a point $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Moneygall, and flows $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by eastward, to within 2 miles of Mount-rath,—5 miles south-eastward to within 2 miles of Abbeyleix,—8 miles south-south-eastward to the immediate vicinity of Ballyragget,—4 miles southward to the foot of the vale of Freshford,—and 25 miles south-south-eastward, and south-east by southward, to a confluence with the Barrow at a point $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above New-Ross. Its principal tributaries are the Tannet, the Erkin, the Dinane, the King's river, the Ballyduff, the Dubbin's Mill rivulet, Jerpoint rivulet, and Thomastown rivulet. The towns on or quite near its banks, are Borris-in-Ossory, Mountrath, Abbeyleix, Durrow, Ballyragget, Kilkenny, Stonyford, Thomastown, and Innistogue. "The river Nore," says Mr. Tighe, the talented and judicious statish of the county of Kilkenny, "passes through a country of low varied hills to Ballyragget, but, as it approaches Kilkenny, the banks become higher; from an eminence called the Eagle Rock, nearly opposite the mouth of the Dinan, a grand and extensive prospect is presented; the river winds beneath; beyond is a cultivated and uneven plain, with distant hills; part of the wooded demesne of Jenkinstown adds to the scene, which is interspersed with several country houses and plantations. From the eastern bank above Kilkenny, the view of that city is grand and striking; its ruined monasteries, some of its towers, its cathedral on one eminence, and its commanding castle on the other, are placed on the attitudes. Below the town, the banks are often steep and in a state of great neglect; but the soil, though poor, is capable of improvement, either for pasture or plantation. One small wood at Kilferna ornaments this part, and many mills and buildings convey the idea of trade, which seems to contend against the disadvantages of an unnavigable stream, and an expensive land-carriage. Having joined the King's River, and passed some country seats and improvements, the Nore flows into the centre of the grand demesne of Mount-Juliet, where a variety of rising grounds are judiciously covered by connected plantations; beneath a green carpet spreads to the river, on whose opposite margin rises the mansion-house, having the bank which it crowns decked with young trees, and enriched with old scattered oaks. The whole of its course from hence to Ross, by Thomastown and Innistogue, presents picturesque scenery, varied by ruined castles and abbeys, by rocks that turn the course of the river, by green meadows that skirt its banks, or by steep hills clothed in foliage." The river is navigable for boats from Innistogue to Thomastown; and it was at one time proposed to be made subservient to a more important navigation. See KILKENNY (COUNTY OF). The fishery of the Nore is claimed, under patent, by Lord Ormond, Mr. Tighe, and some other parties. The mills on the Nore, the lock on the Barrow, and especially the building, about 37 years ago, of Scotch weirs, have occasioned a gradual decline in the amount and value of the salmon fishery.

NORTH ROCKS, a long range of dangerous rocks, off the east coast of the barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. They cover or lie opposite Cloghy bay; and are situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east by north of Slane's Point, at the south side of the entrance of that bay, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Ballyquinstin Point, at the north side of the entrance of Lough Strangford. They are covered at half-flood; at which time the stream in shore turns to the north. They range north-north-eastward to the extent of at least a league; and some offshoots of them lie sunk at low water so near the shore, that a vessel cannot, in general, navigate the strait between them and the mainland without danger. A seat of stone on one of the Rocks is popularly called St. Patrick's Chair, and has occasioned the whole group to be sometimes called St. Patrick's Rocks.

NUCETOWN. See NEWCESTON.

NUN'S-CROSS, or KILVEA, a hamlet in the parish of Killiskey, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the river Vartrey, and on the road from Wicklow to Ananmore, immediately below the debouch of the Devil's Glen, $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile west-north-west of Ashford, and 4 miles north-west of Wicklow. An elegant church for the parish of Killiskey was built here in 1817, by Francis Synge, Esq., and here also stand the ruins of a previous church. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

NURNEY, a parish, partly in the baronies of Forth and Carlow, but chiefly in the barony of East Idronne, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by east of Leighlin-Bridge, co. Carlow, Leinster. The East Idronne section contains the village of Nurney. Length of the parish, west by southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Forth section, 142 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches; of the barony of Carlow section, 785 acres, 28 perches; of the East Idronne section, 1,795 acres, 18 perches,—of which 10 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 975; in 1841, 905. Houses 148. Pop. of the Forth section, in 1831, 18; in 1841, 22. Houses 4. Pop. of the barony of Carlow section, in 1831, 153; in 1841, 171. Houses 30. Pop. of the rural districts of the East Idronne section, in 1831, 520; in 1841, 496. Houses 75. Area of the village of Nurney, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 284; in 1841, 216. Houses 39. The surface is bounded on the west by the Barrow, and consists of a beautiful and fertile portion of that river's basin. The highest ground is on the northern boundary of the barony of Carlow section, and has an altitude above sea-level of 642 feet; and the next highest ground is at the church, and has an altitude of 344 feet. The seats are Knockthomas-house and Orchard-house. The ruins of Ballytarm-castle are situated in the east. The road from Carlow to Baginbunstown passes across the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the 'dio.' of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £230 15s. 4d.; nett, £200 5s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated at the village, and was built in 1791, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and a donation of £646 3s. 1d. from Col. Bruen. Sittings 200; attendance 70. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 114, and the Roman Catholics to 851, and two Protestant parochial schools were supported by subscription, and had on their books 32 boys and 40 girls.

NURNEY, a parish in the barony of Carbery, 3 miles north-north-west of the village of Carbery, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, north by westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,130 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 685; in 1841, 651. Houses 110. The surface includes a considerable proportion of bog; yet preëminently consists of arable land; and averages in annual value about 26s. per plantation acre. The highest ground is on the northern boundary, and has an altitude of 403 feet above sea-level. The extremity of a northward wing is touched by the river Boyne, and the main body is drained southward by the rivulet Garr. The seats are Nurney-house and Williamston-house. The chief antiquities are the ruins of one castle and the site of another.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CASTLE-CARBERY [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £22 3s. 3d., and the rectorial for £44 10s. 8½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Cadamstown and Ballinadrimna. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 44, and the Roman Catholics to 647; and a daily school was salaried with £8 from the National Board, and had on its books 64 boys and 54 girls.

NURNEY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of West Ophaly, 3½ miles south by west of Kildare, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 1½ mile; area, 1,798 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 920, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 622; in 1841, 735. Houses 122. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1841, 139. Houses 21. The surface prevailing consists of light land, but has a well cultivated, wooded, and a warm appearance. The demesne of Nurney-house is the principal feature, and a height in that demesne, 280 feet in altitude above sea-level, is the highest ground. The road from Kildare to Athy, and that from Calverstown to Monastereven, intersect each other in the interior. In the vicinity of the village is an old castle.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £37 13s. 9½d. The rectories of Nurney, KILDANGAN, and WALTERSTOWN [see these articles], constitute the benefice and prebend of Nurney. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 1,042. Gross income, £198 18s. 0½d.; nett, £182 4s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the offices of first canon in the cathedral of Kildare, and surrogate in Kildare consistorial court. A curate receives a salary of £75. A new church was recently completed in Walterstown. The Roman Catholic chapels of Nurney and Kildangan have an attendance of respectively 600 and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Monastereven. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 51, and the Roman Catholics to 581; the Protestants of the union to 65, and the Roman Catholics to 995; and there was no school.

NYPH-BANK, a great fishing-bank off the south coast of Munster. It lies at the mean distance of about 7 leagues from the shore; and extends from 14 to 20 leagues east-north-eastward, from a point opposite Cape Clear and Mizzen Head, in co. Cork, to a point south-east of the harbour of Dungarvan, in co. Waterford. It is supposed to afford an inexhaustible supply of cod, ling, and other fish; and, if properly fished, might be made to yield a great accession of wealth to the southern parts of the kingdom.

OAGHILL, or OCHILL, a village in the island and parish of Arranmore, barony of Arran, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands a little north of the centre of the island, 1½ mile west-north-west of Kilronan; and is the site of a Roman Catholic chapel, and of the lighthouse of the Arran islands. Pop. not specially returned.

OAKPORT, a lake in the barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It is an expansion of the Boyle river, midway between Lough Key and the Shannon; it measures 2 miles in length, and ½ a mile in extreme breadth; and it lies chiefly in the parish of Ardara, but partly between that of Tumna on the left and that of Killukin on the right. The demesne of Oakport, William Molloy, Esq., and a chain of small lakes, called Derreen, Launary, and Black, lie along the right side of Lough Oakport. This lake forms part of the Boyne navigation, which was proposed by the Shannon Commissioners to be made practicable for river-craft to the near vicinity of the town of Boyle.

O'BRAZIL. See HY-BRAZIL.

O'BRENNAN, a parish in the barony of Trughacumy, 3½ miles north-west by north of Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, south-south-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 6,547 acres. Pop., in 1831, 847; in 1841, 992. Houses 154. Most of the surface consists of part of the Stacka mountains.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardref and Aghadoe. Tithe composition and gross income, £69 4s.

7d.; nett, £65 9s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. There is no church or chapel; but the parishioners are sufficiently near Tralee to have easy access to the places of worship in that town. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 18, and the Roman Catholics to 811.

O'BRIEN'S-BRIDGE, a parish in the barony of Lower Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It contains the villages of BRIDGETOWN and O'BRIEN'S-BRIDGE; which see. Length, southward, 6 miles; breadth, from ½ to 3¼; area, 11,425 acres, 29 perches,—of which 2,772 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches form a detached district of 3 miles by 2, lying ¾ of a mile west-south-west of the south-western extremity of the main body, and 56 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 4,905; of the rural districts, 4,349. Houses in the whole, 814; in the rural districts, 700. The northern and narrow district of the main body, down to a point a little south of the centre, is almost wholly mountainous and waste; and contains three heights of respectively 1,729, 1,458, and 1,181 feet of altitude above sea-level. The western part of the detached district is also considerably upland, and has at its extremity a height of 875 feet of altitude above sea-level. The other districts, though occasionally warmed into pleasantness with wood and cultivation, prevailing consist of poor and sandy land. The Shannon bounds the east side of the main body over a distance of 1½ miles; and contains the island of Innisklosky. The Inchalughe-rivulet bounds the northern extremity of the main body; and runs there upon an elevation of 675 feet above sea-level. A rivulet which bounds most of the east side of the main body to the Shannon, descends, while on the boundary, from an elevation of 518 feet. The hamlets in the parish are Ballyvoursker, Monagee, Ballydaw, and Ballinamona, in the main body, and Trough in the detached district. The seats are Clonboy-house, Fahy-house, Ross-house, Millview, Fisher's-lodge, and Millbrook, in the main body, and Trough-cottage in the detached district. The principal antiquities are the ruins of Aharinagh-castle, of another castle, of Redfield-house, and of a church. The road from Killaloe to Limerick passes through the interior.—This parish was formerly part of the parish of Killaloe, but is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Glebe, £4 10s. Gross income, £73 15s. 1d.; nett, £71 18s. 1d. Patrons, the dean and chapter of Killaloe. The tithes are appropriated to the patrons. The church is situated at the village of O'Brien's-Brigge, and was built in 1820, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 150; attendance 95. The Roman Catholic chapels at Bridgetown and Trough have an attendance of respectively 960 and 300. All the other statistics are mixed up with those of the parish of KILLALOE: which see.

O'BRIEN'S-BRIDGE, a village in the parish of O'Brien's-Brigge, barony of Lower Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the eastern verge of co. Clare, on the right bank of the river Shannon, and on the road from Killaloe to Limerick, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of Bridgetown, $\frac{2}{3}$ north of Castle-Connel, 4 south-south-west of Killaloe, and $\frac{6}{10}$ north-east by north of Limerick. The bridge which gives name to the village stands across the Shannon, and has at its east end, in co. Limerick, the village of MONTPELIER: which see. The arches of the bridge are 14 in number, and of various forms and sizes, from 19 to 28 feet in span; the piers are from 7 to 9 feet in thickness, and appear to have been founded upon the surface of the bed of the river, without any piling, and at different depths; and the roadway is 18 feet in width, roughly paved with pebbles, and protected by a parapet varying from 3 to 4 feet in height. The whole bridge is built of rubble stone, in rude workmanship; yet it has, for several centuries, withstood the action of both the current and the atmosphere. "The velocity of the current at this bridge during the month of November last," says an official report of the engineer, Mr. Rhodes, in 1832, "was upwards of 3 miles per hour, calculating 800 feet above and 750 feet below the bridge, which was performed in six minutes. Immediately under the bridge, the velocity was 5 miles per hour, and the fall about 10 inches. The 4 arches next the north abutment being so very narrow (viz. 19, 23, 23, and 26 feet), renders the navigation exceedingly dangerous to lives and property, and it is surprising that no more accidents happen. Vessels laden with merchandise are obliged to stop here for a considerable time, for the purpose of being warped up through the arches by a capstern, which is placed upon a pier projecting into the river 50 feet; and by means of a block affixed to a floating buoy in the river, leading in a line with the large or fourth arch: a rope is dropped through this arch and fastened to the vessel, and being already attached to the capstern, she is by 8 or 10 men (according to the resistance of the water), hauled through the arch; this mechanical operation causes great delay, and not without serious risk. To remedy this great inconvenience and risk to lives and property, I would propose taking down the four arches at the north end of the bridge with the land abutment, and the three intermediate piers towards the centre; to dredge the bed of the river to at least 7 feet below the lowest summer-water, and build the land abutment and track-way for horses, and a centre pier, capable of receiving two arches of 60 feet span each, composed of timber or iron. These arches should be flat, and the segment of an ellipse which would be capable of allowing the canal vessels to pass at all heights of the river: I should also propose to take away the capstern and its pier, deepening the side of the river from the bridge to about 200 feet above this pier, and bringing the retaining wall forwards, or into the river 10 feet at the bridge, and diminishing to the present line at 700 feet upwards." All these recommendations have not been carried into effect; but, in the course of 1844, 7 arches at the co. Limerick end of the bridge were removed, and 6 of 27 feet span each substituted for them. A quay 700 feet in length was also completed, and a lay-by formed. Fairs are held at the village on July 25, and Nov. 7. Area, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 350; in 1841, 435. Houses 73. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 38; in manufactures and trade, 32; in other pursuits, 14. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 34; on their own manual labour, 41; on means not specified, 5.

ODAGH. See ODOGH.

ODDER, a quondam parish in the barony of Skreen, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Tara, and 4 north-west by north of Dunshaughlin, co. Meath, Leinster. It was an impropriate rectory, in the dio. of Meath; but is now identified with the southern district of the parish of Tara. Two objects which still bear its name are Odder-castle and Odder-cottage. A nunnery for regular canonesses of the order of St. Augustine, was founded here by the family of Barnewall; and it had annexed to it several cells in co. Meath. Margaret Silke, the last abbess, surrendered the nunnery and its possessions in the 31st year of Henry VIII.

ODOGH, or THREE-CASTLES, a parish, 3 miles east-south-east of Freshford, and partly in the barony of Fassadinin, but chiefly in that of Cranagh, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{2}{3}$. Area of the Fassadinin section, 428 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches; of the Cranagh section, 4113 acres, 26 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 1,323, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,367; in 1841, 1,402. Houses 230. Pop. of the Cranagh section, in 1841, 1,189. Houses 191. The surface consists of a fertile and pleasant part of the valley of the Nore; and is drained southward, nearly through the centre, by that river,—and eastward, along part of the northern boundary, by the rivulet Nuenna. The only seat is Odogh, or Three-Castle-house, the residence of Mr. Lawrenson. The chief antiquities are the ruins of two churches and two castles. The road from Freshford to Kilkenny passes through the interior, and is overlooked by a constabulary station.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £100; glebe, £60. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £200; and are impropriate in the Tynte or Colville family. The vicarages of Odogh and DONAGHMORE, and the rectory of COOLCRAHEEN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Odogh. The united parishes are not mutually contiguous. Pop., in 1831, 4,644. Gross income, £430; nett, £330 7s. 6d. Patron, alternately the Crown and the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the perpetual curacy of St. Mary's of Kilkenny, and is resident in that city. A curate for Odogh receives a salary of £37, and the use of house, garden, and 16 acres of glebe. The church was built in 1796, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and repaired in 1826, by means of a loan of £106 3s. 0½d. from Robert Lennigan, Esq. Sittings 150; attendance, from 50 to 80. The Three-Castle Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Freshford and Tullaroan. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also at Ballyragget in Donaghmore. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 1,354; the Protestants of the union to 123, and the Roman Catholics to 4,627; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 20 children; 6 pay daily schools in the parish—one of which received some aid from the incumbent—had an average attendance of about 230 children; and there were 13 daily schools in the two other members of the union.

O'DONOHUE'S-PRISON, a perpendicular rock, rising 30 feet above the surface of the water, in the Lower Lake of Killarney, 2½ furlongs east of Innisfallen, and 1½ mile south-west of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. It does not seem to possess sufficient soil for the support of any larger plants than lichens; yet its summit displays a luxuriant growth, and a rich and matted foliage of the ash, the holly, and the arbutus, shooting from the fissures of the rock. "The tradition relative to O'Donohue," says the author of the Guide to Killarney, "states him to have been a man of gigantic stature, warlike boldness and great bodily strength: upon this rock the most obstinate of his enemies were doomed to perish by cold or famine, or were bound in fetters until they acknowledged submission to his will. His native historians relate, that being pursued by a number of enemies, upon one occasion, his charger, in attempting to cross his morass, sunk below the saddle-bow, upon which the herculean rider dismounted, and placing a stone under each of his feet, palled his gallant steed completely out by the ears. The memory of his snow-white steed is perpetuated by a rock, not unlike a horse drinking, near the shores of Murrus, which preserves the name of O'Donohue's horse."

O'DORNEY, a parish in the barony of Clannamurragh, 4½ miles north of Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the village of ABNEYDORNEY: which see. Length, south-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 7,227 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,966; in 1841, 3,142. Houses 443. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,648; in 1841, 2,724. Houses 386. The surface includes part of the northern skirts of the Stack's mountains, and a large portion of the upper section of the vale of the Brick. An old abbey of some monastic celebrity stood in the parish, but has been noticed in the article on ABNEYDORNEY. In 1537, Edmund, the 11th Lord of Kerry, was created Baron of O'Dorney, and Viscount Kilmalee.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory and vicarage, in the dio. of Ardret and Aghadoo. There is no church; and the occasional duties are performed by the curate of Kilflyn. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 3,160; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 145 boys and 50 girls.

OFFA. See IFA.

OFFALY. See OPHALY.

OFFERLANE, a parish in the barony of Upperwoods, 3½ miles west-south-west of Mountrath, Queen's co., Leinster. It is identical in extent with the barony of Upperwoods, and contains the villages of CASTLETOWN and COOLRAIN: which see. Length, south-south-eastward, 9½ miles; extreme breadth, 8; area, 48,926 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 9,915; in 1841, 10,491. Houses 1,670. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 9,224; in 1841, 9,895. Houses 1,571. The western and the northern borders, each to the breadth of from 1 to 2 miles, consist of a main portion of the eastern division of the Slievebloom mountains; and at their extremities, or on the boundary-lines of the parish, are three summits of respectively 1,676, 1,681, and 1,733 feet of altitude above sea-level. The southern border is hilly or rather moorish, and has a summit of 469 feet of altitude above sea-level. The eastern border and some portions of the interior contain a considerable aggregate of bog. The remaining districts consist of arable and pasture lands of various qualities, and present considerable tracts of pleasantly-featured and agreeably-dressed surface. The river Nore runs across the southern districts, and, though here but a brief way below its source, and not unjustly characterized as a rapid and turbulent stream, it enters the parish upon an elevation of only 323 feet above sea-level. The chief of the numerous rivulets which rise among the Slievebloom mountains, and descend from the western and the northern borders to the Nore, are the Tonnet, the Detour, the Gortin, and the Mountrath. The principal seats are Rockview-house, Springhill-house, Castletown, Mannin-house, Newtown-house, Moorfield-house, Rush-hall-court, Peasfield-house, Brookfield-house, Mondrehid-house, the Lodge, Danesfort-house, Hazelpit-house, Laurel-hill, Altavilla, Shanderry, Coolrain-house, Coolmagour, Badgerhill-house, Derrynaseera, Grossbrook, Mount-Salem, Giltfield-house, Tinnakill-house, Northgrove-house, Ashgrove-house, Lacka-house, Deerpark-house, Cardtown-house, Mountain-house, Moran's-grove, Sallybrook, Westfield-farm, Dinore, and Roundwood.—the last three the seats of respectively J. R. Price, Esq., M. W. Despard, Esq., and Mr. Hamilton. The principal antiquities are the ruins of the castles of Strahan, Mondrehid, and Castletown. Sir Oliver Morres, the quondam possessor of these castles, and lord of the portion of ancient Ossory in which they are situated, is the subject of a morceau of history intimately connected with the name of the modern district of Offerlane. "Sir Oliver Morres, styled MacMorres, Lord of Mainagh of Lateragh, &c., and Baron de Montemarisco by descent," says Mr. Brewer, "was a person of much power in the county of Tipperary, and chief of the Anglo-Norman family of Montmorency. He married Lady Ellice, daughter of Peter, Earl of Ormond, and was actively engaged in suppressing the sept of Fitzpatrick, under the auspices of the noble house with which he had formed an alliance. Sir Oliver was eldest son and heir of Sir John, and grandson of Sir James Morres, of Thorny, Lateragh, Knockagh, &c., Knight Banneret, by Lucia, daughter to Edmond Arundel, styled Lord Arundel of the Stronde, county of Cork, a younger brother of Sir John Arundel, Lord-marshal of England, and the son of Sir John Arundel the elder, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter to Sir Oliver Carminow, of Cornwall and Devonshire, Knt. by Elizabeth his wife, daughter to John Holland, Duke of Exeter, and Elizabeth Plantagenet, daughter to John, Duke of Lancaster and king of Castile, fourth son of King Edward III. Sir Oliver MacMorres is described as having been a man of gigantic stature, and of surprising bodily strength; which circumstances, joined to an undaunted courage, procured for him the lasting Irish soubriquet of Fear- leoghan-agus-Laghan, 'the broad man lion.' Even at this time the portion of Ossory, formerly possessed by Sir Oliver, and in which the castle of Castletown is situated, is often called O'Farlaghan parish. It may be observed, that to this period of history we must refer the war-cries or mottoes of the Fitzpatricks, and of the Morres family of Ballyrickard-Morres and Rathlin, in the county of Tipperary, Sir Oliver's sole descendants; the former being Fear-ladur-aboo, 'the strong man uppermost,' and the latter Fear-leoghan-aboo, 'the man lion uppermost.' Amongst many tales of marvel, still locally current respecting the strength and courage of Sir Oliver, we are told that, shortly after he had gained possession of this castle, the dynast of Ossory, Barnaby Fitzpatrick entered the place by stratagem, at the head of a party of his vassals. The completion of Fitzpatrick's design was, however, defeated; for scarcely had he passed the castle-gate, when the lion chief seized him in his arms, and hurled him down the tremendous precipice upon which the fortress stands, overhanging the river Nore. It is added that he cast his horse down after him."

This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £300; glebe, £318 8s. 9d. Gross income, £818 8s. 9d.; nett, £584 14s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefices and rectories which constitute the corps of the deanery of St. Canice's cathedral; he holds likewise the sinecure prebendorship of Waterford cathedral; and he resides in the city of Kilkenny. The rectorial tithes of Offarlane are compounded for £600, and are appropriated to the deanery of St. Canice's cathedral. Two curates receive each a salary of £75. The church was quite recently built, by means of contributions of £1,211 7s. 3d. from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £324 from private parties. Sittings 400; attendance 200. Another place of meeting is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 80. The Roman Catholic chapels at Comross, Castletown, Rush-hall, and Killenore, have an attendance of respectively 1,300, 1,000, 700, and 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, they are mutually united, and are under the care of 3 officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,334 Churchmen, 46 Protestant dissenters, and 8,788 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 75 children; and 8 daily schools—one of which was aided with £8 a-year from the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and £5 from the dean of Ossory, one with some advantages from Mr. Kemans, one with £8 from the National Board, and £8 from the Ladies Fitzpatrick, and 2 were in connection with the Kildare Place Society—had on their books 393 boys and 237 girls. The Offarlane dispensary is within the Abbeylix Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 7,315; and, in 1839, it expended £136 6s. and administered to 2,100 patients.

OGASHIN, a sinecure benefice in the county of Clare, and diocese of Killaloe, Munster. It consists of the rectories of QUIN, CLONIE, DOWRIE, KILLAGHTER, KILMURRYNEGAL, TEMPLENALY, and TULLA: see these articles. Gross income, £405 13s. 10½d.; nett, £458 10s. 4d. Patron, the Earl of Egremont.

OGHILL. See OAGHILL.

OGONNELLOE, or O'GONILLOE, a parish in the barony of Lower Tulla, 31 miles north by west of Killaloe, co. Clare, Munster. Length, south by westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 9,925 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches,—of which 3,353 acres are in Lough Derg. Pop., in 1831, 2,966; in 1841, 3,162. Houses 497. The limits include the south side of Scariff bay, and the west side of the lower part of Lough Derg, from that bay down to within 2½ miles of Killaloe. The territorial surface consists, for the most part, of land of a light gravelly soil, tolerably good for tillage; but, to some extent, is either boggy ground, or cold, mountainous upland, but a degree superior to mere wilderness. Knockmilleka, and another height on the western boundary, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 818 and 1,019 feet; and a height at the Roman Catholic chapel has an altitude of 600 feet. The principal islands in Lough Derg belonging to Ogonnelloe are Cahir Island, Lashog-Rocks, Crow Island, Illaunaskagh, Swan Island, Cormorant Island, and Goat Island. The chief seat is Tinarna-house; the chief hamlets are Annearrigna and Carnagnoe; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of a castle and of Aghenish-house. The road from Killaloe to Scariff passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £58 3s. 1d.; glebe, £10 10s. Gross income, £102 19s. 1d.; nett, £73 16s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are divided into two portions, the larger of which is compounded for £78 9s. 2½d., and appropriated to the sinecure benefice of O'Mullood, while the smaller is compounded for £38 15s. 4d., and appropriated to the economy fund of Killaloe cathedral. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 128, and the Roman Catholics to 3,056; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 35 children; and 4 pay daily schools had on their books 190 boys and 105 girls.

OGORMUCK. See DRONCKLIFE.

O'GRADY, or OGRAM, a lake on the mutual border of the parishes of Tomgraney and Kilnoe, 1½ mile west-south-west of Scariff, barony of Upper Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It measures 7 furlongs by 5½; and has a surface-elevation above sea-level of 122 feet. It receives the united streams of the Grauey and the Clogham rivulets, and discharges its superfluous waters by the Scariff river.

OGRAM. See O'GRADY.

OGULLA, a parish in the barony of Roscommon, 4½ miles south-south-west of Elphin, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It contains the post-village of TULSK; which see. Length, south-south-eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 6,213 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches,—of which 753 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches lie detached 2 miles to the east, and 116 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,832; in 1841, 1,828. Houses 308. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,693. Houses 282. The land is, for the most part, excellent. The lakes Annaghmore and Corraslira lie on the boundaries of the detached district. The road from Roscommon to Boyle, and that from Strokestown to Castlereagh, intersect each other in the interior of the main body. The principal seats are Toomana and Cargin.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ELPHIN [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £201 4s. 6d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 29, and the Roman Catholics to 1,917; and a hedge-school had on its books 20 boys and 10 girls.

OILGATE, or OYLGATE, a village in the parish of Edermine, barony of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the road from Enniscorthy to Wexford, 1½ mile east of the Slaney, 5 south by east of Enniscorthy, and 6½ north-north-west of Wexford. It has a Roman Catholic chapel and a constabulary station; and gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dioc. of Ferns. The other chapel of the parish stands at Glanbrian. Fairs are held at Oligate on March 5, May 21, Aug. 13, and Dec. 10. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 66; in 1841, 115. Houses 24.

OLAVE (Str.). See WATERFORD (COUNTY OF THE CITY OF).

OLDBAWN, a hamlet in the parish of Tallaght, barony of Upperross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on a small affluent of the Dodder, 3 furlongs west of that river, and $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile south by west of the village of Tallaght. Here are a paper-mill and the villa of Mountainview. Pop. returned with the parish.

OLDBRIDGE, a village in the parish of Donore, barony of Lower Dulceek, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the northern verge of the county, and on the right bank of the Boyne, immediately below the eastward deflection which that river makes in receiving the Mattock, and $\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of Drogheda. It is celebrated as the scene of some of the most stirring actions of the battle of the Boyne. See BOYNE. Pop., in 1831, 107. Houses 20.

OLDCASTLE, a fishing-harbour on the east coast of Clare Island, off the mouth of Clew bay, co. Mayo, Connaught. The natural harbour is a cove; and the artificial harbour consists of a break-water, a boat-slip, and a quay,—the last formed by cutting a mural face upon a sloping or shelving rock in situ. The central position of this harbour, near the great fishing-bank which extends from Achill to Lismishoffin, and on a lee-shore from the prevailing westerly and north-westerly winds, renders it of great importance for the accommodation of the fishery, and entitles it to rank in the first class of fishery harbours.

OLDCASTLE, or CLOTTINGE, a parish on the north border of the barony of Demifore, and of the county of Meath, Leinster. It contains the post-town of Oldcastle: see next article. Length, west-north-westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,907 acres, 3 roads, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,718; in 1841, 5,079. Houses 843. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,132; in 1841, 3,571. Houses 599. The surface consists, in general, of very good land. The highest ground is at the church, and has an altitude of 372 feet above sea-level. The seats are Millbrook, Stonefield-house, Mostfield-house, and Newcastle-house,—the last the residence of Thomas Battersby, Esq. The road from Dublin to Enniskillen, by way of Mount-Nugent, Killeshandra, and Swanlinbar, passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dioc. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £231 3s. 3d.; glebe, £12. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £184 16s. 8d., and are impropriate in the Marquis of Westmeath. The vicarages of Oldcastle and KILBRIDE (see that article), constitute the benefices of Oldcastle. Length, 12 miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 9,376. Gross income, £691 13s.; nett, £636 16s. 8d. Patron, Lord Dunsany. Two curates, for the two parishes of the union, receive each a salary of £75. The church of Oldcastle was built in 1816, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; attendance, about 200. There is a church also in Kilbride. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of from 30 to 140. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 2,000 to 3,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Loughcrew. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 506, and the Roman Catholics to 4,368; a Methodist Sunday school was usually attended by about 98 children; and 6 daily schools—one of which was a free school for boys and girls, built on a free site from Mr. Napier of Loughcrew, and supported by about £760 per annum, arising from a bequest in property from Laurence Gilson, Esq.—had on their books 604 boys and 525 girls. In 1842, the National Board had a school in Oldcastle workhouse.

OLDCASTLE, a small market and post town in the parish of Oldcastle, barony of Demifore, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Killeshandra, and on that from Castle-Pollard to Ballinborough, 5 miles south-east of Mount-Nugent, $5\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Virginia, $7\frac{1}{2}$ north-east by north of Castle-Pollard, 10 west-north-west of Kells, 13 north-west of Athboy, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-west of Dublin. The estates of Mr. Napier around the town exhibit results of patriotic care and agricultural improvement, which both have greatly enhanced their own value and appearance, and are acting benignly by way of example upon surrounding properties. The town contains a comfortable inn and a good posting establishment; and may be advantageously adopted as head-quarters for visiting the lakes of Westmeath, and the interesting country within their catchment basins. The public buildings are the parish-church, the Methodist meeting-house, the Roman Catholic chapel, and the endowed school-houses,—the last forming a fine architectural feature in the town, containing accommodation for about 1,000 children, and offering their advantages to families of all religious denominations. Near the town are extensive corn-mills. A weekly market is held on Monday, and is the largest for yarn in the county; and fairs are held on Feb. 27, April 10, May 15, June 12, July 10, Oct. 28, and Dec. 18. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. The town has a savings' bank and a loan fund; and, in 1841, the latter possessed a capital of £1,190, circulated £5,623 in 1,640 loans, cleared a nett profit of £129 6s. 9d., and expended for charitable purposes £55 5s.

The Oldcastle Poor-law union ranks as the 90th, and was declared on Jan. 6, 1840. It comprises portions of the counties of Meath, Westmeath, and Cavan, amounting to an area of 108,568 acres, and containing, in 1831, a pop. of 45,000. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Meath, Crossakeel, 1,828; Killallon, 1,753; Loughcrew, 1,344; Moylagh, 2,401; Killeagh, 2,221; and Oldcastle, 5,060;—in co. Westmeath, Castle-Pollard, 3,392; and Fore, 3,212;—and in co. Cavan, Munterconnaught, 2,990; Virginia, 6,387; Castle-Raghan, 5,180; Ballyjamesduff, 4,444; and Kilbride, 4,039. The number of ex-officio guardians is 7, and of elected guardians is 21; and of the latter, 3 are elected by the division of Virginia, 2 by each of the divisions of Oldcastle, Castle-Pollard, Fore, Castle-Raghan, Ballyjamesduff, and Kilbride, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Oldcastle, Killeagh, Moylagh, Loughcrew, and Killallon, are in the Meath barony of Demifore; Crossakeel is in Demifore and Upper Kells; Castle-Pollard is in the Westmeath barony of Demifore; Fore is in Demifore and Delvin; Munterconnaught, Virginia, and Castle-Raghan, are the barony of Castle-Raghan; Ballyjamesduff is in Castle-Raghan and Upper Loughree; and Kilbride is in Clonmahan. The number of valued tenements in the Castle-Raghan districts is 2,427, in the Clonmahan districts 540, in the Upper Loughree districts 30, in the Meath Demifore districts 1,570, in the Upper Kells districts 81, in the Delvin districts 173, in the Westmeath Demifore districts 884, in the whole union, 5,669; and of this total, 2,480 were valued under £5,—1,412, under £10,—606, under £15,—356, under £20,—195, under £25,—99, under £30,—142, under £40,—66, under £50,—and 244, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £79,841; the total number of persons rated is 5,669; and of these, 639 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—592, not exceeding £2,—403, not exceeding £3,—409, not exceeding £4,—and 392, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Sept. 8, 1840,—to be completed in Dec. 1841,—to cost £5,975 for building and completion, and £1,119 16s. 10d. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 7 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches, obtained for £562 10s. of purchase-money, and £42 13s. 2d. of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 600 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Aug. 12, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,481 8s. 8d.; and the total previous expenditure was £287 9s. 2d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 258. The medical charities within the union are a fever hospital at Castle-Pollard, and dispensaries at Ballyjamesdoff, Castle-Pollard, Crossakeel, Mount-Nugent, Oldcastle, and Virginia; and, in 1839-40, they received £381 2s. 3d. from subscription, and £316 16s. 3d. from public grants, expended £374 in salaries to medical officers, £160 1s. 6d. for medicines, and £125 18s. 4d. for contingencies, and administered to 62 infants and 7,277 extern patients. The Oldcastle dispensary serves for a district of 26,970 acres, with a pop. of 11,026; and, in 1839-40, it expended £103, and administered to 825 patients.—Area of the town of Oldcastle, 48 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,331; in 1841, 1,508. Houses 244. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 88; in manufactures and trade, 154; in other pursuits, 50. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 155; on their own manual labour, 117; on means not specified, 8.

OLD CONNELL. See CONNELL (OLD).

OLDCOURT, a demesne in the parish of Bray, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south of the town of Bray, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is the property and residence of Major Edwards, the descendant of Richard Edwards, Esq., a Welsh gentleman, to whom it was granted in the reign of Charles II. An old and lofty square tower, which gave name to the demesne, overhangs a pleasant and romantic brook, and forms a picturesque object. Sir Thomas Mulso, the builder of this tower, was an English knight in the reign of Henry VI.; he obtained a grant of a district of land in the territory of the O'Tooles, then called the Marshes of Dublin, and now the County of Wicklow, on condition of bringing it into subjection to the English government; and he took forcible possession of the district, and built upon it a castle and a small town; but he was killed in a skirmish with the Irish, and his followers were expelled from the lands which he had conquered. The castellated pile which he built was originally called, in honour of himself, Mulso's Court.

OLDERFLEET, an old and ruined castle, at the extremity of the small peninsula of Carran, and at the right side of the entrance of Lough Larne, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of the town of Larne, barony of Upper Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster.—As seen from Larne, it has a bold and picturesque appearance; but on being nearly approached, it quite loses its imposing character. "The castle," says the author of the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "is now an insignificant ruin; but the advantage and dignity of its situation can never fail of attracting the visitor. It is supposed to have been erected by one of the Bissets, a powerful Scotch family, upon whom Henry III. bestowed large possessions in the barony of Glenarm, some of which were forfeited by Hugh Bisset in the reign of Edward II. for rebellion. James M'Donnell, Lord of Kintyre, asserted his claim to this land in right of the Bissets; but his son Aeneas was content to accept of them on conditions approved of by Elizabeth; viz., that he would not carry arms under any but the kings of England, and would pay an annual tribute of hawks and cattle. It was on the peninsula of the Curraah that Edward Bruce effected his landing in 1315, with the expectation of making himself king of Ireland, which vain and foolish ambition caused so much bloodshed through the east of Ireland, and was productive of such dreadful calamities to the English settlers particularly. The castle of Olderfleet became important as a defensive fortress against the predatory bands of Scots who infested the north-eastern coasts, and was generally under the direction of a governor. In 1569, we find Sir Moyes Hill held this office; but in 1598, being thought no longer useful, it was abolished. After changing proprietors several times, the castle was finally granted to Sir Arthur Chichester, in 1610, by James I. At Olderfleet will be found a ferry-boat, which plies regularly between that point and Island-Magee.

OLD-HEAD,—popularly The Old Head of Kinsale,—a promontory in the barony of Coumreys, co. Cork, Munster. It screens the west side of Courtmaesberry bay, projects 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-eastward from the prevailing line of the adjacent coast, and terminates at a point 7 miles east-north-east of the cape of Seven Heads. Its extremity is high and steep; and, as seen from the sea either to the east or to the west, it appears as if it were an island. On the summit of this extremity is a lighthouse which exhibits a fixed light, and which cost, during 1840, for some repairs and building, and for general maintenance, the sum of £1,131 5s. 10d.; and on both sides is anchoring ground in almost any desirable depth of water. A mile from the extremity is an ancient castle of the Lords of Kinsale, built from the one side of the isthmus to the other; and formerly constituting a complete defence of all the land towards the cape. This place was anciently called Dunearna, and was a seat of the old Irish kings. The isthmus is completely perforated by the working of the sea, and presents a stupendous arch, underneath which a small boat may pass from sea to sea.

OLD-HEAD, a fishing harbour in the parish of Kilgeever, barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is situated at the head of a small cove, on the south side of Clew bay, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-north-east of Lewisburgh, and $\frac{3}{4}$ west by south of Westport. A pier was commenced in 1822, but not completed for a number of years later; it cost nearly £2,000, the greater part of which was contributed from government funds, and the lesser part by the Marquis of Sligo; and it both accommodates a party of the coast-guard, and ranks among harbours of the first class for subserviency to the fisheries. An official report, written while the work was in progress, says, "The numerous fishing craft of Clew bay and the adjacent shores will acquire most beneficial accommodation by a harbour so far to windward, and so much nearer to the fishing-grounds than Westport, or the natural shelter afforded by the islands at the eastern end of the bay, across the mouth of which, for many leagues both north and south, the great western fishing banks and the sunfish bank extend." Adjacent to the harbour is the villa of Old-Head-lodge. A coast-guard station takes name from Old-Head; and, in 1836, the fishing-craft within its district consisted of 5 open sail-boats, worked by 20 men, and 100 row-boats, worked by 400 men.

† OLD-LEIGHLIN. See LEIGHLIN (OLD).

† OLD-MERRION, a scattered villa, or series of pleasant residences, in the parish of Donnybrook, barony and county of Dublin, Leinster. It is situated on the south shore of Dublin bay, and at the eastern extremity of the parish of Donnybrook, 3 miles south-east of Dublin-castle. Here are Merriion-parade, Merriion-castle, Merriion-hall, the ruins of a church, and some vestiges of a castle.

OLDMILLS, a village in the parish of Carnacastle, barony of Upper Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. Area, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 117. Houses 26.

† OLD ROSS. See ROSS (OLD).

† OLDTOWN, a village in the parish of Clonmethan, barony of West Balrothery, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the road from Kilsallaghan to Naul, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile west by north of Ballyboghil, and 4 south by west of Naul. Within a mile of it are Clonmethan church, the hamlet of Wren's-Nest, and the seats of Murragh, Westphalstown, Newtown, Wyanstown-house, Trillic-lodge, Jordanstown-house, and Brown's-Cross-house. A Roman Catholic chapel stands at the village, on a site 108 feet of altitude above the level of the sea. The Oldtown dispensary is within the Poor-law union of Balrothery, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 4,369; and, in 1839-40, it expended £102, and administered to 900 patients. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 156. Houses 27.

OLDWEIR-BRIDGE, an interesting locality immediately above Turk Lake, and on the river which brings down the superfluous waters of the Upper Lake of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. The bridge which gives name to the locality, bestrides the river over a very violent rapid; and it consists of two arches of equal span, one of which must be shot by every boat returning with tourists from the Upper Lake. So powerful is the rapid directly below the bridge that the slightest confusion among the passengers in a boat, would destroy the little vessel's equilibrium, and most probably cause it to strike against a rock. Almost immediately above the bridge is the singularly romantic scenery of the EAGLE'S-NEST; which see.

† OMAGH, a barony of the county of Tyrone, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Donegal and the barony of Strabane; on the east, by the barony of Dungannon; on the south, by the barony of Clogher, and the county of Fermanagh; and on the west, by the counties of Fermanagh and Donegal. Its length, in the direction of west by north, is 31 $\frac{1}{4}$ miles; its breadth, in the opposite direction, is from 3 to 12 miles; and its area is 224,674 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches,—of which 1,155 acres, 18 perches are water. The central district forms the basin of several of the headstreams of the Struel and the Mourne rivers; and is hilly, tumulated, and of very diversified surface, and aggregately pleasant and ornate appearance. The eastern district is part of the great bleak, tame, central moorland district of the county, and has two summits of respectively 911 and 908 feet of altitude above the level of the sea. The western district is crossed by the river Derg, and partly bounded by the rivulet Mournebeg; it contains some valley ground, but pre-eminently constitutes a portion of the vast congeries of mountains in north-eastern Ulster; and it lifts ten summits to the altitude of respectively 1,260, 909, 808, 541, 601, 870, 1,117, 628, 1,110, and 980, feet above the level of the sea. The soil of the barony is, for the most part, of a light friable nature, and of a brown colour, superincumbent on a firm loamy subsoil, mixed with gravel, and, in some places, on sandstone, or on slaty rocks; but, in the vicinity of bogs, which abound in all parts of the barony, it is of a moorish or peaty nature, superincumbent on a clay subsoil. "The agriculture of this barony," says an official report of the year 1836, "is very far behind that of the county of Armagh, or any we have visited. The principal landlords are absentees, and do not encourage improvement; many of the farmers are ignorant of the cultivation of turnips, clover, rape, or mangel-wurzel; some of them say they are aware of the advantage they would receive by these plants, but they are too poor to get time, manure, or sand, to begin the system. Their plan is to grow a succession of oat crops (sometimes five) after potatoes, till the land can no longer produce; and in that exhausted state it is left to rest, as they term it, till it is ready for a repetition of this scourging process. The pasture afforded in the interim, left, as it is in many or most cases, to spontaneous production, is poor in the extreme; some few sow a little white-grass. Rye-grass and timothy-grass are sown in a very few instances, and a little clover. It is said there is no agricultural society in the county of Tyrone. The farms average about twelve acres Irish measure. Two-thirds are ordinarily under the plough. The rent of the arable land, keeping the high land near the mountains, is £1 10s. per acre Irish, the tithe 1s. to 2s. 6d., the county cess 3s. to 4s. per acre. Many have leases, but without any instruction for proper cultivation; and, on the other hand, without any condition on the part of the landlord to assist the tenant in draining, liming, building, fencing, &c., as is the usual practice in many parts of England. The old Irish breed of cattle prevails here almost exclusively, no improved breed having been introduced. Sheep are rarely seen. The pigs are of a good description. The horses are also useful, and adapted to the country and the small farms. The car is still in use here with the revolving axle-tree and solid wheels; there is also a species of carriage quite novel to me, viz., a sledge, or as it is here called, a sled or slide; it consists of the shafts of a cart, having nailed to each of them at the lower end a piece of crooked wood, a yard or four feet long, to slide upon the ground; upon these shafts a basket is placed to carry turf, hay, &c.; these sledges are used on the mountain sides, being lighter to draw up the steepness of the hills, and less subject to be overturned. They do not appear to be aware of the convenience so general in England of what are called shelvings, viz., a simple slight projecting rail, extended round the cart for the purpose of carrying a load of hay or straw. The ploughs have been much improved; the old clumsy wooden plough, with its wooden mould board, has given place to the Scotch and iron plough, with a pair of horses abreast. Their spades and shovels differ from the English in having handles 5 or 6 feet long, which are certainly calculated for keeping the body more erect, and for ease in their use, and in some cases may be as useful, but the English spade and shovel are in my opinion calculated for doing more work in a given time. Although the roads in every direction were receiving great injury from the accumulation of water and mud upon them, we did not see half-a-dozen men employed at them during the ten days we were residing in and travelling in the barony; that is, we did not six times see any man employed upon them. It is notorious that so many poor men are forced to be idle, though so anxious to get a day's work that they would travel six or seven miles for it. Very little attempt appears to be made to cultivate the surface of the bog lands; what is done is chiefly by hand labour; no horses are used upon the mosses or bogs, with patters to prevent them sinking, as practised in Laneshire. Potatoes are not grown on the ridge or lazy-bed method; not a single instance occurred where the plough was used. Wheat is very little grown, which may be in part accounted for by the distance to any port or water course; what is produced is carted to Caledon or Derry, a distance of thirty Irish miles; many parts of the barony and county are well adapted to its growth under proper cultivation. At Omagh there is a good market for oats. Very few orchards are to be found. Many of the enclosures are large for the size of the farms, and the fences so bad that they are obliged to bring all their cattle into the house at night, often without food, and attend them by day. In more parts quickset fences have taken the place of whins and mounds of earth; but in those cases the tenants have even had to purchase the thorns and plant them; which are not very dear, say 3s. to 5s. per thousand. It is allowed by all that the farmers are becoming very poor, and less able to make any improvement; the situation of the cottiers is deplorable; involving, or more properly, merely possessing an existence in poverty, rags, and wretchedness, in dwellings that fit for a human being, frequently without windows or chimneys; built of sods or mud, 12 or 14 feet square, imperfectly covered with rushes or straw, the smoke issuing out of the door and various parts of the roof.

The barony of Omagh contains part of the parishes of Cappagh, Donaghewy, Magheracross, and Termonmaguirk, and the whole of the parishes of Cloghewy, Dromore, Drumragh, Kilskeery, East Langfield, and West Langfield, Skirts of Urney and Ardstraw, and Termonmaguirk. The towns and chief villages are Omagh, Baragh, Seekinore, Dromore, Trillick, Drumquinn, Castlederg, Six-Mile-Cross, and Termonrock. Pop., in 1831, 72,577; in 1841, 76,045. Houses, 15,133, 162. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 9,690; in manufactures and trade, 2,882; in other pursuits, 744. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 257; on the directing labour, 3,854; on their own manual labour, 9,333; on means not specified, 112. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 11,994; who could read but not write, 7,320; who could neither read nor write, 13,235. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,649; who could read but not write, 10,456; who could neither read nor write, 16,181. This barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Omagh, Castlederg, Enniskillen, and Coleraine towns. The total number of tenements has value is 9,906; and of these, 4,199 were valued less under £5, 3,141, under £10, 1,302, under £15, 527, under £20, 281, under £25, 167, under £30, 158, under £40, 60, under £50, 46, and 69, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated in West Omagh is £16,633 16s. 5d., and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £1,634 16s. 6d. and £1,606 2s. 8d., and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £1,751 6s. 10d. and £1,669 10s. 7d. The total net annual value of the property rated in East Omagh is £48,436 15s. 7d., and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840, were £4,518 1s. 1d. and £4,827 5s. 10d., and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £4,867 3s. 6d. and £4,167 11s. 10d. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred two townlands of the parish of Magheracross from the barony of Tyrone, co. Tyrone, to the barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone. Pop. in 1841, 204.

OMAGH.

A post and market town, and the capital of the county of Tyrone, in the parish of Drumragh, barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the northern verge of the barony, on the road from Enniskillen to Coleraine, on the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry, and at the formation of the Strule river by the confluence of the Camowen and the Drumragh rivulets, 6 miles east by south of Drumquinn, 6½ north of Fintona, 6½ west-north-west of Six-Mile-Cross, 7 south-south-west of Gortin, 7 north-east of Dromore, 8 south-south-east of Newtown-Stewart, 12½ north-west of Ballygawley, 15½ south-south-east of Strabane, 27 south of Londonderry, 68 west of Belfast, and 86½ north-north-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The site of the town is a declivity or rapid slope upon the side of one of a numerous series of tortuous vales and sinuous dells, which cut all the circumjacent country into a labyrinth of hillocks, ridges, hills, and hollows; yet it is both sufficiently low in itself, and sufficiently uncommanded by surrounding walls and eminences, to be fully and very pictorially seen from the Dublin and Londonderry mail-road—at a considerable distance—lying like a bright and variegated gem upon a rich ground-work of green and golden colouring. The ground plan or outline of the town may be represented by the letter Y; the main street being figured by the trunk of the letter, and the only other two streets of any importance by its arms or branches. The main street is very spacious, well-edified, and cheerful; and it contains the principal inns, most of the principal shops, and all the areas of public marketing; but it descends the slope on which the town stands with such a rapidity of gradient as to be decidedly inconvenient for wheeled vehicles, and even not a few pedestrians. The county court-house confronts the upper end of this street, or stands at the point of its forking into the two other streets; and this structure arrests attention not more by the conspicuousness of its position than by the chaste beauty and the Grecian elegance of its architecture. The county goal of Tyrone is a large modern building on the north side of the town; it contains 63 single cells, 18 other dormitories, 12 day-rooms, 6 work-rooms, 10 cells for solitary confinement, and other though usual appliances of prison discipline; it is a well-kept prison, and possesses sufficient conveniences for such discipline as was a few years ago esteemed the best, yet has so capacity for the introduction of the separation system; and, during 1842, the maximum number of its prisoners was 553, the average number was 118½, the total number, including debtors, was 684, the number of recommissions was 33, and the total expenditure was £1,992 17s. 6½d. The other public buildings are a church, four Protestant dissenting meeting-houses, a Roman Catholic chapel, a barracks, an infirmary, a fever hospital, and a Poor-law union workhouse. An ancient castle gave name to the town, which originally was Oigh-Magh; the seat of the chief, but this structure was nearly destroyed by fire in 1743, and was afterwards rebuilt. A religious foundation of some kind is assigned to the town about the year 792; and this was succeeded, so late as the 15th century, by a monastery for Franciscan friars of the third order.

Poor-law Union.—A poor-law union, which takes name from Omagh, and has its workhouse at the town, ranks as the 40th, and was declared on May 8, 1839. It lies wholly in co. Tyrone, and comprehends an area of 174,603 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 60,388. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are Omagh, 5,464; Fast Mountjoy Forest, 1,981; West Mountjoy Forest, 2,353; Gortnacraagh, 1,087; Dunbreen, 2,079; Mountfield, 1,553; Killybegh, 1,410; Loughmacrory, 1,238; Carrickmore, 1,073; Creggan, 660; Atherry, 1,876; Six-Mile-Cross, 2,852; Mullaghasla, 1,904; Camowen, 2,372; Beragh, 2,484; Derrybeg, 1,983; Seskinore, 2,811; Derryhard, 2,488; Tattymoye, 2,502; Fintona, 3,395; Fallagharn, 2,464; Tullyclanagh, 2,464; Dromore, 2,527; Ormeau, 2,195; Camdetry, 1,804; Drumquinn, 2,509; Mallingham, 2,470; Chumloggon, 2,183; and Loughmacrory, 2,739. The number of ex-officio guardians is 9; and of elected guardians is 30; and of the latter, 2 are elected by the division of Omagh, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Seskinore, Fallagharn, and Tattymoye are partly in the barony of Clogher and partly in that of Omagh; the division of Omagh is partly in the barony of Strabane and partly in that of Omagh; the divisions of Derryhard and Fintona are in the barony of Clogher; the divisions of Fast Mountjoy Forest, West Mountjoy Forest, Gortnacraagh, Dunbreen, Mountfield, and Killybegh, are in the barony of Strabane, and all the other divisions are in the barony of Omagh. The number of valued tenements in the barony of Clogher districts, is 1,478;—in the barony of Omagh districts, 6,130;—in the barony of Strabane districts, 1,490;—in the whole union, 9,104; and of this total, 4,094 were valued under £5, —2,707, under £10, —1,118, under £15, —446, under £20, —281, under £25, —154; and under £30, —145; under £40, —54; under £50, —and 67, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £56,041 10s.; the total number of persons rated is 8,294; and of these, 219 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1, —616, not exceeding £2, —634, not exceeding £3, —697, not exceeding £4, —and 569, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for in January 20, 1840, —to be completed in March, 1841, —to cost £6,537 for building and completion, and £1,343 for fittings and contingencies, —to occupy a site of 6 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £30, —and to contain accommodation for 800 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Aug. 24, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £4,663 14s. 4d.; and the total previous expenditure was £408 13s. 2d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 263. The medical charities within the union are the county infirmary and a fever hospital at Omagh, and dispensaries at Dromore, Drumquinn, Fintona, Omagh, and Termonmaguirk; and, in 1839, they received £392 13s. from subscription, £1,566 8s. 3½d. from public grants, and £11 1s. 3d. from other sources; expended £548 2s. in salaries to medical officers, £231 16s. 3d. for medicines, and £1,590 9s. 4½d. for contingencies, and administered to 487 internal and 7,821 external patients. In 1834, the county infirmary at Omagh contained only 20 beds; but between that date and 1839, it was enlarged at the cost of about £4,000; and it is now capable of containing 105 beds; but though commodious, expensively fitted up, and furnished with a multiplicity of appliances within, and a garden and airing-grounds without, it is very far from being duly comfortable to patients, or in some respects tolerably suitable to its purposes. In 1839, this institution received £1,200 13s. 6½d., expended £1,634 18s. 2½d., and admitted 272 patients. The fever hospital at Omagh is a county institution, and in 1839 it received £267 13s. 6d., expended £286 1s. 5d., and admitted 223 patients. The Omagh workhouse serves for a district of 57,692 acres, with a pop. of 24,871; and, in 1839, it received £83

Trade, &c.—Omagh is the central or market town for an extensive linen trade; and has long been known, in particular, for its bulky sales of brown linen. Its corn trade and its general retail trade are also of comparatively great extent. The weekly markets are well attended; and fairs are held on the first Tuesday of every month. The town has a branch office of the Provincial Bank of Ireland; and is the residence of a stipendiary magistrate, the head-quarters of the county constabulary, the head-quarters of one of the five districts of the county constabulary, the depot of the north-west military district, and the seat of the courts of assize for Tyrone, of courts of quarter-sessions, and of monthly courts of petty-sessions. In 1841, the Omagh loan fund had a capital of £3,460, circulated £16,052 in 3,985 loans, realized a net profit of £146 17s. 8d., and expended for charitable purposes £51. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a coach to Dublin, a coach to Londonderry, and a mail-coach in transit between Dublin and Londonderry. In 1830, the town was garrisoned by troops left in it by James II., and was burned by them with the view of its being rendered useless to the troops of William III.; and in 1743, it was a second time, but accidentally, burned, and was on this occasion so dreadfully damaged that only two of its houses were left entire. The town, as it now stands, has a quite modern, and a very cleanly, orderly, and neat appearance.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 73 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,211; in 1841, 2,947. Houses 382. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 84; in manufactures and trade, 273; in other pursuits, 137. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 42; on the directing of labour, 276; on their own manual labour, 145; on means not specified, 30. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 664; who could read but not write, 227; who could neither read nor write, 371. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write 443; who could read but not write, 375; who could neither read nor write, 377.

O'MEATH, a hamlet in the parish of Carlingford, barony of Lower Dundalk, Leinster. A church was recently built here at the cost of private parties; and in the vicinity is the villa of O'Meath.

OMEY, an island in the parish of Omey, barony of Ballinablinch, co. Galway, Connemara. It lies not more than 3 furlongs west of the nearest part of the mainland, opposite the hamlet of Loughavee, and about 5 miles north-west of the town of Clifden. It measures ½ mile in length, and 1 in breadth; and it contains Lough Fahy, Corcaun burying-ground, and the ruins of Omey-house.

OMEY, OMAY, URNA, or UMOND, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ballinablinch, co. Galway, Connemara. It contains the town of CLIFDEN; which see. Length, west-north-westward, 10½ miles; extreme breadth, exclusive of islands, 3½; area, 20,835 acres, 2 roads, 38 perches, —of which 513 acres, 7 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 6,721; in 1841, 7,938. Houses 1,303. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831; 5,464; in 1841; 6,444. Houses 1,121. The surface contains a very large proportion of boggy and waste land; but, though prevalently moorish and upland, is not strictly mountainous. The western skirts of the Binabola mountains descend upon the eastern boundary, but contribute no great altitude to the area within that boundary; and the chief heights in other districts, are two of 540 and 700 on the northern boundary, and one of 576 feet ½ mile west-north-west of Clifden. The river Owenglin flows along the southern boundary to the head of Ardhear bay. The principal lakes are Annagh, 207 feet of superficial elevation above sea-level.—Nabillia, 511 feet.—Cregg.—Nambracka.—Shannavear.—Glenbrickeen.—Fahy.—Courthor.—Atalia.—and Aughruskbeg. The coast is exceedingly broken and very deeply intersected by the bays of Claggan, Sellerna, Kingstown, Streamstown, Clifflen, and Ardhear,—the last two, intimately connected with each other, and lying on the southern boundary. The principal islands are Gooreen, Roe, Dog, West Ferroonagh, East Ferroonagh, Cuddoo, Friar, High, Carrickawhilla, Carrickaloo, Omey, Croonagh, Glinsk, Innisturk, Beshal, Turbot, Wavermore, Wavervbeg, East Carricklahan, and West Carricklahan. The Cummennara coast-road passes through the interior. The principal hamlets are Loughawce, Drumgaroe, Connaucullew, and Streamstown. The chief rural residences are Streamstown-house, Glenowen-house, and Clifflen-castle.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £50 15s. 4d. The church is situated at Clifflen, and was built in 1812 by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance, from 70 to 100. The Roman Catholic chapels of Clifflen and Claddagh-dhu have an attendance of respectively from 500 to 1,200, and from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Ballindoon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 191, and the Roman Catholics to 7,009; and 6 daily schools—one of which was aided with £7 from the Tuam Diocesan Society and some advantages from Mr. D'Arcy—were usually attended by about 220 children. In 1842, the National Board had schools at Clifflen and Silerno.

OMORTAGH. See MORRAGE.

OMULLOD, a sinecure benefice in the dio. of Killaloe, and co. of Clare, Munster. It consists of the rectories of KILSEILY, KILFINGHAGHTY, KILLURANE, KILNOE, KILLOKENNEDY, CLONLEA, OGONNELLOE, and FEAKE: see these articles. Gross income, £747 15s. 2½d.; nett, £688 13s. 6½d. Patron, the Earl of Egremont. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Lackeen, in the dio. of Killaloe, and co. of Tipperary.

ONAGHT. See ONOUGHT.

O'NEILLAND (EAST), a barony in the north-east of the co. of Armagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by Lough Neagh; on the east, by the county of Down; on the south, by the barony of Lower Orior; and on the west, by the barony of West O'Neilland. Its length, north-north-westward, inclusive of 2 miles on Lough Neagh, is 9½ miles; its extreme breadth is 5½; and its area is 34,498 acres, 2 roods, 21 perches,—of which 14,136 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches are water. The northern district is a chief part of the low, flat, tertiary-formation district along the head of Lough Neagh; and the southern district is part of the undulated, fertile, beautiful, and thickly-peopled region which constitutes the main territory of the counties of Armagh and Down. By far the greater part of the water area of the barony is in Lough Neagh; and the remainder is in Loughs Gullion and Lurgan and the river Bann.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Magheralin and Shankill, and the whole of the parishes of Segoe, and Montiazhs and Islands. The towns are Lurgan and part of Portadown; and the chief village is Charlestown. Pop., in 1831, 19,961; in 1841, 23,391. Houses 3,843. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,587; in manufactures and trade, 2,430; in other pursuits, 254. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 90; on the directing of labour, 2,634; on their own manual labour, 1,519; on means not specified, 28. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write; 4,009; who could read but not write, 2,589; who could neither read nor write, 3,447. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,145; who could read but not write, 3,777; who could neither read nor write, 4,296.—East O'Neilland lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Lurgan. The total number of tenements valued is 4,224; and of these, 2,668 were valued under £5,—804, under £10,—362, under £15,—113, under £20,—70, under £25,—43, under £30,—50, under £40,—10, under £50,—and 44, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of this property rated is £19,557 3s. 3d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrant of spring and summer, 1841, were £1,179 6s. 1d. and £907 12s. 7d.

O'NEILLAND (WEST), a barony in the north of the county of Armagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the county of Tyrone; on the north by Lough Neagh; on the north-east and east, by the barony of East O'Neilland; on the south-west, by the barony of Lower Orior; on the south, by the barony of Lower Fews; and, on the west, by the barony of Armagh. Its length, south by westward, including 2½ miles on Lough Neagh, is 11½ miles; its greatest breadth is 8; and its area is 59,502 acres, 28 perches,—of which 2,424 acres, 2 roods are water. The northern district is low and flat, and contains a large proportion of bog; but the central and the southern districts are tumulated, undulated, richly varied in character, very opulent in soil, and singularly ornate in wood and cultivation. The river Blackwater traces all the boundary with the county of Tyrone; and the river Callan traces all the lower part of that with the barony of Armagh. By far the greater part of the water-area is in Lough Neagh; and most of the remainder is in Loughs Annagarriff, Gall, and St. Patrick.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Drumcree and Tartaraghen, and part of the parishes of Newry, Armagh, Clonfalee, Grange, Killyman, Kilmore, Loughgall, and Mullaghbrack. The towns and chief villages are Richhill, Loughgall, Derryscollop, Maghery, Milltown, and part of Portadown. Pop., in 1831, 43,388; in 1841, 47,173. Houses 8,461. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,217; in manufactures and trade, 4,036; in other pursuits, 442. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 176; on the directing of labour, 4,672; on their own manual labour, 3,785; on means not specified, 62. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 8,255; who could read but not write, 5,055; who could neither read nor write, 6,747. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,540; who could read but not write, 8,042; who could neither read nor write, 8,534.—West O'Neilland is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Lurgan, Banbridge, and Armagh. The total number of tenements valued is 9,144; and of these, 5,550 were valued under £5,—1,850, under £10,—822, under £15,—338, under £20,—209, under £25,—93, under £30; 120, under £40,—55, under £50,—and 87, at and above £50. The nett annual value of the property rated is £45,048 4s. 11d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, were £3,108 17s. 2d., and £2,718 13s. 8d.

ONOUGHT, or ONAGHT, a village in the island and parish of Arranmore, barony of Arran, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the north coast, and near the west end of the island, 4½ miles west-north-west of Kilonran. Adjacent to it are the hamlets of Creggacarran and Struafan, and the ruins of a castle; and half-a-mile to the south-west is the hill of Dun-Onought, whose summit has an altitude of 354 feet above sea-level. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

ONREAGH. See OWENREAGH.

OOLA, ULLA, or ULLOR, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Coonagh, 3½ miles east-south-east of Pallas-Green, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 6,869 acres. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 2,952, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 2,735; in 1841, 3,377. Houses 470. Area of the village, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 192; in 1841, 398. Houses 64. The surface lies on the east margin of the county, is part of the rich plain called the Golden Vale, and possesses more wood than much of the neighbouring portions of that plain. The chief seats are Newtown-Ellard and Castle-Lloyd, the latter the seat of H. Lloyd, Esq. The road from Tipperary to Limerick passes through the interior; and the proposed railways from Limerick to Dublin and Waterford pass so near the north boundary, that, if formed, they would be of great value to the inhabitants.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Emly. Vicarial tithe composition, £168 17s. 2d.; glebe, £139 15s. Gross income, £308 12s. 2d.; nett, £287 6s. 8d. Patron, the Earl of Kenmare. The incumbent holds also the united benefices which constitute the corps of Kilpeacon prebend in the cathedral of Limerick, and is resident in Kilpeacon. The rectorial tithes of Oola are compounded for £90, and are inappropriate and reported to belong to Mr. Massey. There is no church; the Protestant inhabitants attend the church of Cullen; the occasional duties of Oola are performed by the curate of the adjoining benefice for a salary of £10; and a room in Castle-Lloyd-house is sometimes used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 60; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Sollohid. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 2,839; and a daily school was partially supported by Captain Lloyd, and had on its books 26 boys and 16 girls.

OONT, a small lake in the parish of Clones, barony of Darrtry, 1½ mile west-south-west of Smithborough, co. Monaghan, Ulster.

OPHALY, or OFFALY (EAST), a barony in the county of Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Carbery; on the east, by Connell and Killeen; on the south, by Killeen and West Ophaly; and on the west, by West Ophaly and King's county. Its length, north-west by northward, is 12½ miles; its extreme breadth is 5½; and its area is 47,029 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches. The greater part of the bog of Maddenstown is in the south; the greater part of the very large bog of Lulliamore is in the north; and the whole of the Curragh of Kildare is in the south-east. The highest grounds are a height of 539 feet above sea-level, 2½ miles east of Rathangan, and the summit-ground of the Curragh, 404 feet of altitude above sea-level. The rest of the surface is either low and fruitless, or flat and tame valley along the course of the streams. The Mountmellick and Athy branch of the Grand Canal passes through the interior.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballyshannon, Feighcullen, Kildare, Kilmeague, Moone, Rathangan, and Tully, and the whole of the parishes of Ballymany, Ballysax, Carn, Cloncurry, Dunmurry, Grangechare, Lulliamore, Pollardstown, and Thomastown. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred one townland of the parish of the parish of Moone from Upper Philipstown, King's co., to East Ophaly, co. Kildare,—pop., in 1841, 97; 17 townlands of the parish of Rathangan, and 7 townlands of the parish of Ballysax, from West Ophaly to East Ophaly,—pop. 3,207. The only towns, or even considerable villages, are Kildare and Rathangan. Pop., in 1831, 7,072; in 1841, 10,584. Houses 1,780. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,323; in manufactures and trade, 376; in other pursuits, 201. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 54; on the directing of labour, 600; on their own manual labour, 1,204; on means not specified, 42. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,838; who could read but not write, 995; who could neither read nor write, 1,858. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,177; who could read but not write, 1,349; who could neither read nor write, 2,155.—East Ophaly lies partly in the Poor-law union of Naas, and partly in that of Edenderry. The total number of tenements valued is 1,714; and of these, 1,100 were valued under £5,—213, under £10,—82, under £15,—44, under £20,—42, under £25,—38, under £30,—48, under £40,—20, under £50,—and 118, at and above £50.

OPHALY, or OFFALY (WEST), a barony on the west of the county of Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by King's county and East Ophaly; on the east, by East Ophaly and Killeen; on the south-east, by East Narragh and Rheban; on the south, by East Narragh and Rheban and West Narragh and Rheban; and, on the west, by Queen's county and King's county. Its greatest length, north-westward, is 13½ miles; its breadth is from 4 to 5½; and its area is 40,603 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches,—of which 21 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches are in the river Barrow. Most of Ummerus bog is in the north-east; about one-third of Monavullagh bog is in the south; a part of Maddenstown bog is in the east; and several smaller bogs are in the interior. The three highest grounds in the barony have altitudes of only 361, 308, and 239 feet above sea-level. The Mountmellick and Athy branches of the Grand Canal pass across the north-west district; and the river Barrow describes a considerable stretch of the western boundary. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred 17 townlands of the parish of Rathangan, and 7 of the parish of Ballysax, from West Ophaly to East Ophaly,—pop., in 1841, 3,207; 14 townlands of the parish of Ballybracken, the whole of the parish of Harristown, 9 townlands of the parish of Fontstown, and one townland of the parish of Dunany, from Upper Philipstown in King's co., to West Ophaly in co. Kildare,—pop. 2,661.—The barony of West Ophaly, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Ballyshannon, Fontstown, and Rathangan, and the whole of the parishes of Ballybracken, Dunany, Harristown, Kildangan, Kilrush, Knavinstown, Luckagh, Monastereven, Nurney, and Waterstown. The only town is Monastereven; and the only tolerable village is Nurney. Pop., in 1831, 12,055; in 1841, 11,213. Houses 1,840. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,289; in manufactures and trade, 311; in other pursuits, 367. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 56; on the directing of labour, 573; on their own manual labour, 1,297; on means not specified, 41. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,070; who could read but not write, 1,084; who could neither read nor write, 1,908. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,346; who could read but not write, 1,366; who could neither read nor write, 2,209.—West Ophaly is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Athy, Edenderry, and Naas. The total number of tenements valued is 1,609; and of these, 836 were valued under £5,—272, under £10,—123, under £15,—73, under £20,—61, under

ORAN, a parish in the barony of Ballymoe, 53 miles north-west of Roscommon, co. Roscommon, Connaught.—Length, south-eastward, 33 miles; breadth from 3 to 3; area, 5,181 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches,—of which 11 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches are in the river Suck. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 2,136, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,560; in 1841, 2,114. Houses, 330. The surface consists for the most part of good land; lies all at a comparatively small altitude above sea-level; and is traversed by the road from Roscommon to Ballymoe. The rivulet Suck, traces a small part of the western border, and expands, immediately afterwards, into the small lake called Lough Peter. The seats are Ballydooley-lodge and Temp-house. The chief hamlets are Islands, Emlaghagrace, and Churchpark.—Oran was originally called Huaran-Highlavach; and is alleged by monastic writers to have been the site of one of the churches founded by St. Patrick, and the place in which the mortal remains of its alleged first bishop, St. Cethlegus, were interred. The ruins of an old church still exist; a cemetery, adjacent to the high road, is still a favourite place of burial, and forms a resort of Roman Catholic pilgrims; and a piece of a pillar-tower stands within the cemetery, and is noticed, in the following terms, by Mr. Weld, “The tower at Oran, about 12 feet only in height, seemed to me rather to wear the appearance of not having been ever completed, than of having fallen, or been thrown down. The diameter of the interior is 11 feet 3 inches, and the walls are 4 feet 6 inches in thickness. The stones, laid in regular even courses, are extremely well cut, and fit closely. Those of the lower part consist of cellular and stalactitic limestone; whilst in the upper courses, they are of a more compact texture. The quarry from which they are supposed to have been raised, is situated at a moderate distance, in the slope of the hill towards the Suck.”—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £146. The rectory of Oran, and the vicarage of DRIMTEMPLE [see that article], constitute the benefice of Oran. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 3,943. Gross income, £179 6s. 8d.; nett, £159 4s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in Drimtemples, and has an attendance of 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the two nearest chapels. In 1834, the Protestants of Oran parish amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,648; the Protestants of the union to 60, and the Roman Catholics to 4,166; a hedge-school in the parish had on its books 42 boys and 22 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had on their books 194 boys and 99 girls.

ORANBEG, a village in the parish of Oranmore, barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands 1 mile east by north of the town of Oranmore, on the road thence to Athenry. Immediately north of it are the hamlet and the mansion of Frenchport.

ORANMORE, a parish in the baronies of Galway and DUNKELLIN, co. Galway, Connaught. The barony of Galway section contains the villages of MENLOUGH and GLANROE; and the Dunkellin section contains the town of ORANMORE, and the villages of RENVILLE and NEWTOWN-BUTLER: see these articles. Length of the parish, west-north-westward, 9 miles; extreme breadth, 4½. Area of the barony of Galway section, 9,349 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches,—of which 1,638 acres, 3 roods are in Lough Corrib,—and 193 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches are in small lakes and the river Corrib. Area of the Dunkellin section, 9,989 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,993; in 1841, 7,892. Houses 1,327. Pop. of the rural districts of the barony of Galway section, in 1841, 2,196. Houses 300. Pop. of the rural districts of the Dunkellin section, in 1841, 3,017. Houses 481. The parish extends from the head of Renville bay to the foot of Lough Corrib, and from a point 2 miles east of Galway to a point 1½ mile east of Oranbeg. The district in the north-west or adjacent to Lough Corrib is prevaillingly morassy, very low, quite flat, and not a little repulsive; the district in the south-west or upon Galway bay is pleasantly diversified, yet nowhere strictly hilly; and all the districts, except that upon Lough Corrib, consist, for the most part, of very good land. Brier Hill, on the west border near Galway bay, has an altitude above sea-level of 234 feet. Most of the sea-board territory commands brilliant views over the bosom and athwart the shores and screens of Galway bay; and some parts of it, particularly in the west, are rich in close views of wood and park scenery. The Corrib river flows, in a divided channel, along the northern part of the western boundary; and Oranmore bay projects and ramifies from the north-east extremity of Galway bay, and greatly enlivens the landscape around the town of Oranmore. Merlin-Park, the seat of Mr. Blake, is a warm and pleasant feature on the north shore of Galway bay; and Renville, the seat of Mr. Asley, is an agreeable feature on the east shore. The other seats are Oran-castle, Frenchfort, Renville-lodge, Rockhill-house, Mount-Vernon-cottage, Ross-Hill-house, Killoon-house, and a number of neat villas and cottages graced. The hamlets are Oranbeg, Frenchfort, Moneymore, Knockanastillegau, Park-roe, Cartron, Glenscall, Kiltullagh, Doughiska, Ballintemple, Breandaghaun, Cloghagh, Twomleditch, Cloonaacuneen, Carrowtowne, Ballindooly, and Ballygarraun. The mail-roads from Galway to Dublin and Limerick, and the road from Tuam to Gort and Ennis, pass through the interior. The quarries of Galway or Menlough marble are situated in the north-west. See GALWAY.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice, wardenship, and peculiar jurisdiction of Galway. Tithe composition, £300. Yet Oranmore, in another view, is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Tuam; and, in this view, possesses what are called the quarter parts of the tithes. Tithe composition and gross income, £80 5s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is also one of the four vicars of Galway. The church is a neat structure, built in 1834. Attendance, from 35 to 80. The Roman Catholic chapel at the town of Oranmore, and a private house at Frenchfort, used as a Roman Catholic chapel, have an attendance of respectively 2,000, and from 100 to 150; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Ballinacourty. A private house at Menlough, used as a Roman Catholic chapel, has an attendance of from 300 to 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castlegar, and a chapel in the parish of St. Nicholas. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 76, and the Roman Catholics to 7,450; 3 pay daily schools had on their books 90 boys and 48 girls; and another pay daily school was usually attended by about 50 children. In 1842, the National Board had a boys' school and a girls' school at Oranmore.

ORANMORE, a small post-town in the parish of Oranmore, barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands at the head of Oranmore bay, at the forking of the road from Galway toward respectively Athenry, Dublin, and co. Clare, and on the road from Tuam to Ennis; 4½ miles east of Galway, 6 west by south of Athenry, 7½ west-north-west of Craige-well, 8½ north of Kilmorra, 12½ north by west of Bort, and 100½ west of Dublin. Though enclosed principally with cabins, it has a comparatively clean, neat, and orderly appearance. The parish-church is a fine feature. The Roman Catholic chapel is remarkable chiefly for its size. Oran Castle is a small, old, inhabitable edifice, belonging to Mr. Blake. The site of the village is washed and enlivened by the ramified bay or creek of Oranmore, and commands charming views of the bay of Galway. The creek is shallow and rocky, and unfit to admit large sea-borne vessels; but a small quay, the private property of Mr. Blake, and situated at the castle, accommodates small vessels, and is the scene of a considerable amount of stir and traffic, in the landing of turf and sea-manure. The town possesses liveliness and some prosperity from being so great a thoroughfare; and it commands a little interest also in the fisheries. Fairs are held on May 23, and October 20. The castle of Oranmore formerly belonged to the Earl of Clanricarde, and was a not unimportant military strength. In 1641, it was strongly garrisoned by the Earl; in 1643, it was surrendered by Capt. Willoughby without the Earl's consent or knowledge; and, in 1651, after having been again garrisoned, it was taken by Sir Charles Coote. The town gives the title of Baron, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Browne of Castle-Margaret in the county of Mayo; the Right Hon. Dominick Browne of Castle-Margaret having, in 1806, been created Baron Oranmore and Browne. Area of the town, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 673; in 1841, 842. Houses 130. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 69; in manufactures and trade, 61; in other pursuits, 19. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 61; on their own manual labour, 77; on means not specified, 4.

OREGAN, a parochial union or ecclesiastical benefice, in Queen's co., and dio. of Kildare, Leinster. It consists of the vicarages of ROSENALLIS, ROYMORE, KILMANAN, and CASTLEBRACK: see these articles. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 13,047. Gross income, £637 10s. 1d.; net, £574 15s. 1d. Patron, Thos. Kemmes, Esq., of Shann. The places of worship belonging to the Establishment are a church in Rosenallis, a chapel-of-ease at Mountinlick, and a church in the perpetual curacy of Clonsalee; the places of worship belonging to other bodies of Protestants are a Quakers' meeting-house and three Wesleyan Methodist meeting-houses; and the chapels belonging to Roman Catholics are two in Rosenallis and one in Castlebrack. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 2,064 Churchmen, 194 Protestant dissenters, and 19,614 Roman Catholics, and 21 daily schools had on their books 626 boys and 524 girls. But this statement, so far as it regards at once the number and classification of the inhabitants, the dissenting places of worship and the daily schools, is exclusive of the perpetual curacy of Clonsalee.

GRIEL. See LOUGH (COUNTY OF).

ORIER, or ORTON (LOWER), a barony on the middle of the east side of the county of Annagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by West O'Neilland; on the north, by East O'Neilland; on the east, by the county of Down; on the south, by Upper Fews; and on the west, by Lower Fews and West O'Neilland. Its length, southward, is 10½ miles; its greatest breadth, is 5½; and its area is 32,535 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches,—of which 103 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches are water. The surface is hilly, undulated, rich, and beautiful; and the soil, though light and not very calcareous, is brisk and fertile, and yields excellent crops, under the stimulant of lime. The Newry navigation is nearly coincident with the whole of the eastern boundary. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred two townlands of the parish of Killybeg from Lower Orier to Upper Orier,—pop., in 1841, 526.—The barony of Lower Orier, as at present constituted, contains the whole of the parish of Ballymore, and part of the parishes of Forkhill, Kileclooney, Killybeg, Kilmore, and Loughgilly. The only towns are Tandragee and part of Poyntz-Pass; and the chief villages are Acton and Mount-Norris. Pop., in 1831, 25,052; in 1841, 26,705. Houses 4,337. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,391; in manufactures and trade, 1,816; in other pursuits, 257. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 95; on the directing of labour, 2,454; on their own manual labour, 1,879; on means not specified, 36. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,417; who could read but not write, 2,258; who could neither read nor write, 3,349. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,273; who could read but not write, 4,008; who could neither read nor write, 4,357.—Lower Orier is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Armagh, Banbridge, and Newry. The total number of tenements valued is 4,724; and of these, 2,440 were valued under £5,—1,095, under £10,—500, under £15,—246, under £20,—159, under £25,—67, under £30,—78, under £40,—130, under £50,—and 40, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £30,299 8s. 5d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1841, were £1,573 1s. 2d., and £1,396 15s. 5d.

ORIER, or ORTON (UPPER), a barony in the south-east of the county of Armagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Lower Orier; on the east, by the county of Down; on the south-east and south, by the county of Louth; and on the west, by the barony of Upper Fews. Its length, southward, is 10 miles; its greatest breadth is 7½; and its area is 45,397 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches,—of which 371 acres, 7 perches are water. A large portion of the surface is mountainous, containing the lofty summits of the Slievegullion and the Newry mountains, and the spurs and offsets of both groups; and the remainder of the surface has, for the most part, a light yet generous soil, and is in a comparatively high state of improvement and cultivation. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred 9 townlands of the parish of Loughgilly from Lower Fews to Upper Orier,—pop., in 1841, 1,660; and 2 townlands of the parish of Killybeg from Lower Orier to Upper Orier,—pop. 526.—The barony of Upper Orier, as at present constituted, contains the whole of the parish of Jonesborough, and part of the parishes of Forkhill, Killybeg, Loughgilly, and Newry. The only town is part of Newry; and the chief villages are Forkhill, Jonesborough, and Belleek. Pop., in 1831, 29,378; in 1841, 33,647. Houses 6,147. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,340; in manufactures and trade, 1,485; in other pursuits, 507. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 128; on the directing of labour, 1,639; on their own manual labour, 4,430; on means not specified, 81. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,922; who could read but not write, 2,395; who could neither read nor write, 7,919. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,833; who could read but not write, 2,922; who could neither read nor write, 10,267.—Upper Orier lies partly in the Poor-law union of Newry, and partly in that of Castle-Blaney. The total number of tenements valued is 5,424; and of these, 3,700 were valued under £5.—1,179, under £10.—298, under £15.—99, under £20.—60, under £25.—24, under £30.—26, under £40.—16, under £50.—and 22, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £29,737 3s. 9d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, were £1,385 2s. 6d. and £1,388 15s. 8d.

ORITOR, a village in the parish of Kildross, barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the east margin of the parish, 2½ miles west by north of Cookstown, on the road from that town to Newtown-Stewart. A fair is held on the second Monday of July. A little to the west are a meeting-house and the seat of Wellbrook. Pop. of the village returned with the parish.

ORMEAU, the demesne of the Marquis of Donegal, in the parish of Knockbreda, barony of Upper Castleknock, co. Dublin, Ulster. It is situated on the river Lagan, immediately above the town of Belfast; but, in spite of its possessing a luxuriant soil, boasting a noble proprietor, and presiding over one of the most brilliant estates in Ireland, it is a very plain piece of park scenery, and displays a surpassingly plain, great mansion. Ormeau, in its proprietorial relation to the adjoining town, exhibits a total converse to almost all other noble or aristocratic residences of Ireland; and instead of giving any importance to the town, very largely borrows importance from it. Yet so paramount is the industrial position of the noble owner that to borrow the rather outre simile of Mr. Atkinson—"it is a matter of very little moment to Lord Donegal whether the body clothes of Ormeau be embroidered in the Spanish fashion, or as plain as those of a late celebrated barrister, whose diamond was not robbed of its water, his eye of its piercing radiance, nor his tongue of its magic powers, by a beard of four days' growth, or a costume that would have suited a poor farmer in the Wicklow mountains."

ORMOND, an ancient principality, or petty kingdom, on the left bank of the Middle Shannon, and in the middle of the northern part of Munster. It nearly corresponded with the present baronies of Upper Ormond, Lower Ormond, and Owny and Arva, in the county of Tipperary; but it figured surpassingly less as a principality of the Irish period, than as an earldom of the period of the Anglo-Normans; and in the latter connection, its history is strictly identical with that of the Earls and Dukes of Ormond, a brief outline of which is sketched in our article on the city of Kilkenny. See KILKENNY.

ORMOND (Lower), a barony in the extreme north-west of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It is bounded, on the north and east, by King's county; on the south-east and south, by the barony of Upper Ormond; on the south-east, by the barony of Owny and Arva; and on the west, by the county of Galway. Its length, south-south-westward, is 18 miles; its greatest breadth is 11½; and its area is 135,723 acres, 32 perches,—of which 8,40 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches are water. The river Shannon and its grand expansion of Lough Derg constitute the whole of the western boundary; and they contain very nearly all the great water-area. The Little Breena traces a large portion of the boundary with King's county; and the Nenagh rivulet and other small streams drain the interior westward to Lough Derg. The territorial surface of the barony is one of the richest and most beautiful champagne districts in Ireland; it is enlivened along all the west border by pleasant views of Lough Derg and its lofty western screens; and it preëminently lies upon a basis of so little elevation above sea-level that the only noticeable summit, grounds, or hill-tops are three; in respectively the north, the west, and the east, which have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 948, 484, and 696 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Kilbarron, Kilruane, Monaca, and Nenagh, and the whole of the parishes of Aglish-Cloghane, Ardcrony, Ballingarry, Borris-o-Kane, Cloghfrid, Dorrha, Drompicer, Finnee, Killoedman, Knigh, Lorrha, Loughkeen, Moireeny, Terryglass, and Skane. The towns and chief villages are Borris-o-Kane, Goatstown, Puckam, Lorrha, Ballyloughnane, Cloghfrid, and part of Nenagh. Pop. in 1831, 45,006; in 1841, 50,001. Houses 8,137. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6,512; in manufactures and trade, 1,615; in other pursuits, 688. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 288; on the directing of labour, 2,000; on their own manual labour, 6,684; on means not specified, 348. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 8,497; who could read but not write, 3,901; who could neither read nor write, 4,223. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,225; who could read but not write, 5,774; who could neither read nor write, 12,511. Lower Ormond lies partly in the Poor-law union of Nenagh, and partly in that of Parsonstown. The total number of tenements valued is 6,164; and of these, 3,234 were valued under £5.—1,184, under £10.—521, under £15.—815, under £20.—211, under £25.—123, under £30.—186, under £40.—89, under £50.—and 301, at and above £50.

ORMOND (Upper), a barony of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by Lower Ormond; on the north-east, by King's county; on the east, by Kerry; on the south-east and south, by Upper Kilmarnagh; and on the south-west and west, by Owny and Arva. Its length, westward, is 12 miles; its greatest breadth is 11½; and its area is 79,471 acres; 8 roods, 26 perches. The southern district, to the extent of about 35 square miles, is so very mountainous as to lie on a basis of not less than about 700 feet of mean elevation above sea-level; it consists of a large section of the eastern portion of the Keuper conglomerates of mountains; and it sends up four summits of respectively 1,296, 1,312, 1,218, and 1,607 feet of altitude above sea-level. The central and the northern districts, though possessing some waste lands, and lying aggregately 100 or 150 feet higher than the barony of Lower Ormond, exhibit much resemblance to that beautiful territory, in at once character of surface, richness of soil, and luxuriance of vegetation.—Upper Ormond contains part of the parishes of Kilruane and Nenagh; and the whole of the parishes of Aghnamadee, Ballygibbon, Ballymackey, Ballinaclosh, Dolla, Killicarry, Kilmore, Kilmacneave, Latteragh, Lisbunny, Templecerry, and Templedowney. The towns are Toomavara, Silvermines, and part of Nenagh. Pop. in 1831, 24,807; in 1841, 26,530. Houses 4,279. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,431; in manufactures and trade, 456; in other pursuits, 571. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 73; on the directing of labour, 1,196; on their own manual labour, 3,164; on means not specified, 23. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,377; who could read but not write, 2,107; who could neither read nor write, 5,137. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,031; who could read but not write, 2,794; who could neither read nor write, 6,608.—This barony lies wholly in the Poor-law union of Nenagh. The total number of tenements valued is 3,089; and of these, 1,448 were valued under £5.—612, under £10.—276, under £15.—198, under £20.—133, under £25.—83, under £30,—95, under £40,—54, under £50,—and 190, at and above £50.

ORRERY, an ancient barony in the north of the county of Cork, Munster. It is now united to the barony of Kilmorah [see next article]; and, in consequence of having, for a long period, chiefly belonged to the family of Barry, it was formerly called Ormaria Barria. It gives the title of Earl to the noble family of Boyle; but this title is now united to that of Earl of Cork. Roger, the fifth son of the first Earl of Cork, commonly called the Great Earl, was created Lord Broghil while an infant, and is known by that title in many a stirring scene of the civil wars which commenced in 1641; he resided long in Scotland; and, at Cromwell's death, he took an active part in the restoration of Charles II., and was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Orrery. Roger, the second Earl, and son of the first, succeeded to the title in 1679; Lionel, the third Earl, and son of the second, succeeded in 1682; Charles, the fourth Earl, and brother of the third, succeeded in 1703; and John, the fifth Earl, and son of the fourth, succeeded in 1731, and also inherited the earldom of Cork in 1753. Both the fourth and the fifth Earls were persons of considerable literary celebrity; and the former, in particular, devoted the later years of his life to philosophical investigations, and patronized an ingenious watchmaker, of the name of George Graham, who invented the well-known machine or instrument which represents the composition, motions, and phases of the planetary system, and called it, in honour of his patron and benefactor, an orrery. Rowley, a mathematician of Litchfield, has often, in consequence of a mistake of Dr. Johnson and Sir Richard Steele, been regarded as the inventor of Graham's machine.

ORRERY AND KILMORE, a barony in the north of the county of Cork, Munster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the county of Limerick; on the east and south-east, by the barony of Fermoy; and on the south-west and west, by the barony of Duballow. Its length, south by eastward, is 23 miles; its greatest breadth is 9; and its area is 60,346 acres. The surface is hilly, tumulated, and otherwise much diversified; and it presents, for the most part, a fertile and beautiful appearance. The whole anciently belonged to the O'Kiefs' principality of Fermanagh; see FERRY (Barony of). The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred one township of the parish of Hackmays from Small County, co. Limerick, to Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork.—pop., in 1841, 25; one township of Imphrick from Fermoy to Orrery and Kilmore,—pop. 191; six townlands of Castle-Magner from Orrery and Kilmore to Duballow,—pop. 806; and one township of Ballyboy from Orrery and Kilmore to Fermoy,—pop. 95.—Orrery and Kilmore barony, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Ballycough, Ballyboy, Churchtown, Oronahide, Mackmays, Imphrick, Kilbolane, and Tuillylease, and the whole of the parishes of Aglishdrinagh, Bregogue, Butevant, Cooliney, Drowdowney, Kilbroney, Kilgogan, Kilmacdine, Lackeen, Liscarrol, Rathgogan, and Shandrum. The towns and chief villages are Charleville, Liscarrol, Butevant, Ballycough, Churchtown, Milford, Dromina, and Newtown. Pop., in 1831, 32,374; in 1841, 31,134. Houses 4,635. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,090; in manufactures and trade, 1,026; in other pursuits, 403. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 100; on the directing of labour, 1,822; on their own manual labour, 3,148; on means not specified, 153. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,823; who could read but not write, 1,748; who could neither read nor write, 3,042. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,036; who could read but not write, 1,868; who could neither read nor write, 9,215.—This barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Kilmallock, Kanturk, and Malinbeg. The total number of tenements, valued is 3,394; and of these, 1,649 were valued under £5,—354, under £10,—183, under £15,—144, under £20,—133, under £25,—97, under £30,—172, under £40,—139, under £50,—and 521, at and above £50.

ORRISBEG, a hill in the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. See next article.

ORRISMORE, a large, boggy moor, profusely spotted with lakes and ponds, in the parishes of Ballindoon and Moyrus, from 2 to 7 miles south-south-east of Clifden, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. "This tract," says Mr. Nimmo, "is about 7 miles by 4, and generally speaking, is a plain, not much elevated above the sea; it is, however, intersected by many low ridges of mica slate, and in the hollows between them are a multitude of lakes. I have an exact survey of the moor, and find the number of lakes to be about 143, of different sizes, many of them having numerous and intricate arms. When viewed from an elevation, this appears to be a complete labyrinth, in which it is difficult to perceive the direction of the drainage. A low ridge of rough ground passes northward from the hill of Orrisbeg to near Imlaghmore, and from thence turns westward to the bay of Ardbear. I know of no limestone having been found to the south of that ridge; nearly the whole of the tract to the west of it falls by the stream of Ballinahinch, collecting the waters of numerous lakes into the bay of Ardbear. The western side falls partly into the Bunowen bay at Emly bridge, partly into Mannin bay at Derryginlah. The ridges aforesaid prevent any navigation from being easily led into these lakes from the limestone tract, but in the event of an extended cultivation, something of that kind might be effected; for example, a dam upon the stream near Ballinahinch would throw it into one narrow sheet of water to the upper end of Lough Fadda, with various arms penetrating the moor, so that limestone or calcareous sand loaded at Ballinahinch, might be transported over most of a tract of about 2 miles long. A similar instance occurs on the north of Orrisbeg hill, where a great congeries of lakes are all nearly on one level, and from which a navigable cut might be brought very near to the Roundstone bay, where lime, coral, and sea-weed may be easily procured; other lines of junction might appear if the tract were levelled over. With the exception of a few of the smaller lakes, which are mere bog pools, and may be easily bled, the most of them are high in the bank, and have rocky mouths, so that they cannot be drained at a moderate expense; and where so much land is still to be reclaimed, such an application of labour would at present be unadvisable. The best purpose to which they can now be applied, is, by the judicious position of farm-steadings, to derive all the benefit possible from them in the way of water-carriage, through the arable grounds. And in the meantime it is obvious that they greatly facilitate the business of drainage and enclosure. A similar observation may be applied to all the great flats of Cummevara. The quantity of red bog in Orrismore is 14,000 Irish acres."

ORWELL, a hamlet about 3 miles south-west of Stranorlar, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. A loan fund here and at Burreigh serves for the estate of Sir Edmond Hayes, and, in 1841, it had a capital of £812, circulated £3,527 in 1,372 loans, realized a net profit of £16 8s. 1d., and expended for charitable purposes £35.

OSBERSTOWN, a quondam parish in the barony of North Naas, 14-mile north by west of the town of Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. It now forms the northern district of the parish of Naas; it has on its north margin a part of the village of Sallins; and it is traversed by the Naas branch of the Grand Canal, and by the road from Naas to Clane. Two localities, which still retain the parochial name, are Osbertown-house and Osbertown-hall. Pop., in 1831, 518. Houses 81.

OSSORY, an ancient principality or petty kingdom, in the south-western part of the present province of Leinster. It situated in extent, and cannot be very accurately defined; but may, in a general view, be regarded as identical with the south-west district of the present Queen's county, and the north district of the present county of Kilkenny. The principalities of Ossory and Leix were strictly in mutual alliance, and made a stronger resistance to the Anglo-Normans than any other territories of either Leinster, West-Munster, or South-Ulster; and, at the time of the Anglo-Norman invasion, they were ruled principally by the septs of Mac-Giolla-Phadraig, O'More, and O'Dempsey,—the first, the Servus Servorum Sancti Patricii, afterwards converted into the Anglo-Norman Fitzpatrick, —and subordinately by the tributary toparchs of O'Dunne, O'Regan, O'Dullany, O'Lawler, O'Redy, MacGilfoyle, and MacHaffy. "The Strongbowian invaders," says Mr. Brewer, "found it a more perilous and difficult task to obtain a footing in this district than in any other quarter of the island; as the inhabitants, naturally warlike, were greatly favoured in their resistance by the boggy intricacies of the territories they defended. The Fitzgeralds and the De Berminghams, partly by force, but more, perhaps, through the policy of effecting intermarriages with the native septs, acquired possession of certain portions of land whereon they speedily erected castles. On the other hand, the Carews, barons of Idrome, the Mortimers, Earls of March, and other distinguished English families, obtained repeated grants from the crown of large tracts of land in Leix and Ossory, which grants were rendered nugatory by the intrepid and persevering resistance of the ancient proprietors. The powerful family of Butler, towards the latter part of the fifteenth century, made a well-organized and successful attempt to wrest from the turbulent Fitzpatricks, their most troublesome neighbours, the territory of Ossory, comprising at that period the most valuable part of the district now denominated the Queen's county. Open war was accordingly commenced between Peter, Earl of Ormonde, and the dynasty of Ossory, the former being supported by his relations, friends, and followers, and the latter aided by those contiguous septs which believed their own security to be involved in the issue of the contest. The Earl was ably assisted by his Countess, the Lady Margaret Fitzgerald, one of the most celebrated females of her age, who possessed a masculine genius and an invincible courage, to which qualities must be added, by the impartial historian, a conscience of great latitude, well suited to the exigencies of the times with those who aspired to an increase of possession and dignity. This lady had augmented the strength and resources of her family, by contracting alliances between her children and the most potent of the nobility connected with Ireland. To advance the object of his triumph over the Fitzpatricks, the Earl, who stood in high favour at the British court, proposed to partition fairly between the friends who assisted him in the undertaking, such lands and possessions as might be yielded to their united arms. To prevail over opposition was, however, found more easy than to retain possession of the tract nominally conquered; and it would appear that the onerous task of keeping down the Fitzpatricks, devolved, according to the terms of his family alliance with the Earl, upon Sir Oliver Morres, whose name is, consequently, one of the most conspicuous in the annals of Ossory relating to this disturbed and sanguinary era." Ossory formerly gave the title of Earl, first to a branch and next to the main stem of the Ormond family; see KILKENNY.

OSSORY, a diocese in the ecclesiastical province of Dublin, and civil province of Leinster. It comprehends very nearly the whole of the county of Kilkenny, a considerable part of Queen's county, and a small part of King's county. Dr. Beaufort, estimating its area at 346,000 Irish acres, and computing it to contain 136 parishes and 36 churches, assigns 281,900 acres, 120 parishes, and 28 churches to the county of Kilkenny, 60,000 acres, 15 parishes, and 7 churches to Queen's county, and 4,100 acres, 1 parish, and 1 church to King's county. The diocese is alleged to have been founded, in the fifth century, by St. Keiran, at Saigar or Sagir; and its seat is said to have been removed successively to Aghaboe and to Kilkenny. The alleged series of bishops at Saigar and Aghaboe, however, amounts, according to its own advocates, to only "a sort of succession, not perfect," and is spoked into form, rather into existence, only by the aid of a critical attempt to make "the terms abbot and bishop, as used by ancient writers, synonymous terms." The bishops who have sat at Kilkenny, together with the date of their respective appointments, are Felix O'Dullany, 1178; Hugh Rafus, 1202; Peter Manneis, 1218; William of Kilkenny, 1229; Walter De Brackell, 1232; Geoffrey of Turvell, 1244; Hugh De Mapleton, 1251; Hugh Third, 1257; Geoffrey St. Leger, 1260; Roger of Wexford, 1267; Michael of Exeter, 1289; William Fitzjohn, 1302; Richard Ledred, 1318; John of Tatevale, 1360; Alexander Balseot, 1371; Richard Northalis, 1386; Thomas Peyrell, 1397; John Griffin, 1398; John Waltham, 1399; Roger of Appleby, 1400; John Volcan, 1404; Thomas Snell, 1405; Patrick Ragged, 1417; Dennis O'Dea, 1421; Thomas Barry, 1428; David Hacket, 1490; John O'Hedian, 1479; Oliver Cantwell, 1488; Milo Baron, 1527; John Bale, 1552; John Thomey, 1559; Christopher Gaffney, 1566; Nicholas Walsh, 1577; a vacancy of 9 months, in 1585; John Horsfall, 1586; Richard Deane, 1609; Jonas Wheeler, 1613; Griffith Williams, 1641; John Parry, 1672; Benjamin Parry, 1677; Michael Ward, 1678; Thomas Otway, 1679; John Harstonge, 1693; Sir Thomas Vesey, Bart., 1714; Edward Tenneson, 1731; Charles Este, 1735; Anthony Dopping, 1740; Michael Cox, 1743; Edward Morris, 1754; Richard Porocke, 1756; Charles Dodgson, 1763; William Newcombe, 1773; John Hotham, 1779; Hon. William Beresford, 1782; Thomas Lewis O'Beirne, 1795; Hugh Hamilton, 1799; John Kearney, 1806; and Robert Fowler, 1813. The act of 1833 united the diocese of Ossory to the dioceses of Leighlin and Ferns; and the seat of all the three dioceses is now the episcopal palace, and St. Canice's cathedral at Kilkenny. The present bishop is Dr. James Thomas O'Brien. Two of the bishops of Ossory were Lord-justices of Ireland; four were Lords Chancellors; three were Lords Treasurers; one was an Ambassador; one was Chancellor of the Exchequer; and three were translated to archbishoprics. Bishop Hugh De Mapleton lavished so much expense on the cathedral of St. Canice, as occasioned him to be called the founder of the fabric; Bishop Geoffrey St. Leger finished what Bishop De Mapleton left incomplete, and has been called the second founder of the cathedral; Bishop Ledred prosecuted some persons to the death on the iniquitous tion of sorcery, and was himself subjected to imprisonment and other inconveniences at the instance of some of his intended victims; Bishop Bale is usually styled the first Protestant occupier of the see, and was a very voluminous author;* Bishop Williams experienced great privations and sufferings during the rage of the civil war; Bishop Otway founded a library in the churchyard of the cathedral; and Bishop Pococke is popularly and favourably known as the author of a 'Description of the East and some other Countries,' in two folio volumes.

The gross and the nett amount of episcopal income connected with the see of Ossory, upon the average of three years ending on Dec. 31, 1831, are £3,859 0s. 6½d., and £3,322 11s. 0½d. The dignitaries of the cathedral, together with the gross amount of income connected with the benefices which constitute the corps of their respective dignities, are the dean, £2,236 3s. 11½d.; the precentor, £213 13s. 10½d.; the chancellor, £455 10s.; the treasurer, £180; the archdeacon, £700; the prebendary of Agboure, £800 18s. 10½d.; the prebendary of Killeenry, £285; the prebendary of Tascoslin, £200; the prebendary of Clonemore, £365; the prebendary of Blackrath, £128 16s.; the prebendary of Mayne, £250; and the prebendary of Kilnashagh, £643.

Length of the diocese, southward, 36 miles; breadth, 23. Pop., in 1831, 202,037. Number of parishes, 128; of benefices, 59; of benefices consisting each of one parish, 32; of benefices consisting of parochial unions, 27; of resident incumbents, 38. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £22,454 11s. 2d.; glebes, £4,310 13s. 4½d. Gross income, £27,248 14s. 2½d.; nett, £22,687 10s. 9½d. Patron of 10 benefices, the Crown; of 80, the diocesan; of 2, incumbents; of 12, laymen and corporations; of 3, alternate parties. Appropriate tithe compositions, £2,871 1s. 1d.; inappropriate tithe compositions, £5,850 16s. 8½d. Number of stipendiary curates, 39; amount of their salaries, £2,500 13s. 10½d., exclusive of additional advantages enjoyed by 4. Number of benefices with churches 46, without churches 13. Total of churches, 49; sittings 9,170. Cost of building 35, building and enlarging 1, and enlarging 2 of these churches, £28,092 19s. 11½d.; of which £12,073 16s. 10½d. were gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £12,757 1s. 6½d. were lent by that Board, £2,175 were private donations, and £1,087 1s. 6½d. were raised by parochial assessment. But since the date of the report whence the statistics are derived, three churches have been built at Offelane, Slerkyran, and Kells, and the church at Kilcullibeg has been enlarged, chiefly by means of aid from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Total of places of worship belonging to Protestant dissenters, 4; of Roman Catholic chapels, 94. In 1834, the inhabitants consisted of 12,361 Quakers, 6 Presbyterians, 108 other Protestant dissenters, and 209,843 Roman Catholics; 4 benefices contained no member of the Established church; each of 5 contained not more than 20 members of the Established church, each of 12 not more than 30, each of 8 not more than 100, each of 15 not more than 200, each of 13 not more than 300, each of 4 not more than 1,000, and each of the remaining 2 not more than 2,000; 277 daily schools which made returns of their attendance had on their books 11,489 boys, 7,198 girls, and 221 children whose sex was not specified.—31 daily schools which made no returns were computed to be attended by 2,108 children.—220 of the total number of schools were supported wholly by fees,—and of the remaining 88, which were supported or aided by endowment or subscription, 18 were in connection with the National Board, 5 with the Association for Discontinuing Vice, 1 with the Board of Fraternities, 3 with the Kildare Place Society, and 3 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Ossory is still unannexed; and is divided into three districts, and subdivided into 31 parishes. The bishop's residence is at Kilkenny; and his parish is St. Mary's of Kilkenny. The number of parochial clergy is 30, and of resident clergy or curates 55. The monastic establishments are a Presentation convent at Kilkenny, a Presentation convent at Castlecomer, a Presentation convent at Moinecoin, a Capuchin convent at Kilkenny, an Augustinian convent at Callan, a Carmelite convent at Knocktopher, and a Dominican convent at Kilkenny. The designations of the 31 parishes, and the sites of the chapel or chapels in each, are: 1. Gulinoy, —Gulinoy, Johnstown, and Crosspatrick; 2. Offelane, —Commaris, Castle town, Rushall, and Killinure; 3. Durrige, —Durrige and Cullahill; 4. Aghavee, —Foxroek, Borris, Knockree, and Cool; 5. Ballyragget, —Ballyragget and Ballyuskilly; 6. Castlecomer, —Castlecomer; 7. St. Kyrans, —St. Kyrans and Fantrath; 8. Lisdowney, —Lisdowney, Clontubrid, and Whitegate; 9. Clough, —Clough, Gazebo, and Conahy; 10. Rathdowney, —Rathdowney, Grogan, and Kilmistie; 11. Urlingford, —Urlingford, Graac, and Clomanto; 12. St. Mary's Kilkenny, —St. Mary; 13. St. Canice's Kilkenny, —St. Canice; 14. Muckalee, —Muckalee, Coon, Ballyroyle, Smithstown, and Lisnafanchon; 15. Ballycallen, —Ballycallen, Kilmagh, and Kilmaloe; 16. Freshford, —Freshford, Tullaroan, and Three Castles; 17. Danesfort, —Danesfort, Ladyswell, Grange, Kells, and Belmont's Bridge; 18. Callan, —Callan, Coolagh, and Newtown; 19. Gowran, —Gowran, Pits, Dunganran, and Freneytown; 20. St. Patrick's Kilkenny, —St. Patrick's, and Foulkes town; 21. St. John's Kilkenny, —St. John's, Johna well, and Dunmore; 22. Moinecoin, —Moinecoin, Carrigeen, and Kiltinspug; 23. Innistogue, —Innistogue, Rower, and Clonemore; 24. Dunmagin, —Dunmagin, and Kilnagney; 25. Windgap, —Windgap, and Tullagh; 26. Ballyhale, —Ballyhale, Hughestown, Newmarket, New Chapel, and Stoneford; 27. Fiddown, —Owning, Piltown, and Templecoran; 28. Kilnasow, —Kilnasow, Mullinavat, and Bigwood; 29. Sillevagh, —Glenmore, Sillevagh, and Slip Chapel; 30. Rosbercon, —Rosbercon, Tullagher, and Mullinagilly; and 31. Thomastown, —Thomastown, Tullrotherne, Kilininch, and Mongin.

OSSORY (UPPER), a quondam barony in Queen's county, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Timinehob; on the east, by West Maryborough, and by Callinagh; on the south, by the county of Kilkenny; and, on the west, by the county of Tipperary and King's county. Its greatest length, south by westward, is 18 miles; and its breadth, from 3½ to 13½. It was recently divided into three baronies of UPPERWOODS in the north, CLANMALLACK in the south-east, and CLANDONAGH in the south-west; see these articles. Pop., in 1831, 37,167. Houses 6,161. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 5,084; in manufactures and trade, 798; in other pursuits, 685.

O'SULLIVAN'S CASCADE, a celebrated waterfall, in the parish of Knockree, barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. It occurs in the simultaneous course of a little rivulet on the eastern declivity of Tomies mountain, and on the western screen of the Lower Lake of Killarney, 1½ mile west by south of Imisfallen; and 3½ west-south-west of Killarney.

* A list of Bishop Bale's works is given in his book 'Surveys Illustrative Majoris Britanniae,' and also in Warr's 'Writers of Ireland.'

A tourist, approaching it from the bosom of the lake, lands on a small rude quay at the head of a little bay, and ascends a winding path, along the bank of a foaming torrent, and through an almost impenetrable forest. "The roaring of the torrent dashing with violent agitation from rock to rock, kindles expectation to the highest, and the water-fall retires so far into the bosom of a wooded glen, that, though almost deafened by its roar, you do not catch even a glimpse until it bursts at once upon the view. The cascade consists of three distinct falls; the uppermost passing over a ridge of rock, falls about twenty feet perpendicularly into a natural basin beneath, then, making its way between two banging rocks, the torrent hastens down a second precipice into a similar receptacle, from which second depositary, concealed from the view, it rolls over into the lowest chamber of the fall. Beneath a projecting rock, overhanging the lowest basin, is a grotto, with a seat rudely cut in the rock.

From this little grotto the view of the cascade is peculiarly beautiful and interesting; it appears a continued flight of three unequally elevated foamy stages. The recess is encompassed by rocks, and overshadowed by an arch of foliage, so thick as to interrupt the admission of light; the height of the cascade is about seventy feet, and the body of water so considerable, that the noise soon becomes intolerable. Such a combination of circumstances can hardly fail to produce the effect of grandeur and sublimity in a very striking manner. The stranger not infrequently sits down to rest within the grotto of O'Sullivan, to contemplate and reflect upon the beauties and the works of nature; and, unless his nerves be of considerable strength, he may chance to be somewhat startled by the sudden appearance of visitors on each side of him; these are the inhabitants of the glens and valleys in the mountain's bosom, who, perceiving the boat making for the shore, hasten to greet the stranger in the rustic cave, and present him with the wild fruit of their happy vales. The appellation of 'O'Sullivan' is bestowed upon this fall, from an illustrious family of the name, who were proprietors of the barony of Dinkerrin, formerly called O'Sullivan's country, and were styled princes by the Irish." [Guide to Killarney.]

O'SULLIVAN'S PUNCH-BOWL, a curious eddy near Old Weir Bridge, and on the most rapid part of the river between the Upper Lake and the Middle Lake of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. It closely resembles the whirlpools called the Swillies in the vicinity of Bangor Ferry.

OUEL. See OWHEL.

OUGARNEE, or OWENGARNEY, a small river of the eastern district of co. Clare, Munster. It rises a few perches south of Lough O'Grady, and runs 12 miles south-south-west past Six-Mile-Brigge to the Shannon, at a point very nearly opposite the mouth of the Maig.

OUGHAVALL. See AGHAVALL.

OUGHTER (LOUGH), a lake in the baronies of Tullaghanohy, Upper Loughitee and Lower Loughitee, co. Cavan, Ulster. Its length is 3½ miles; its breadth is 3 miles; and its area comprises 74 acres, 19 perches in the parish of Killeshandra; 2,154 acres in the parish of Kilmore, 452 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches in the parish of Urley, 643 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches in the parish of Drumlane, and 10 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches in the parish of Kildallon. Its surface-elevation above sea-level is 100 feet. It expands along the course of the river Erne; but, on the one hand, is so far and often intersected by bold headlands, wooded promontories, and large fertile islands, and, on the other, is so closely flanked by the series of small lakes which give so labyrinthine a character to the country around Killeshandra, Crossdoney, Farnham, and Kilmore, that it looks both to the eye and on a map as if it were a numerous cluster of lakes. Its shores are, in the highest degree, intricate; and its scenery, though neither powerful nor strictly romantic, is interesting and beautiful. Its principal islands are Inch Trinity and Eonish; and the residences on its shores, or within a mile of its margin, are Castle-Hamilton, Gartnassill-cottage, Drumgoon-house, Lahard-house, Portliff-house, Damesfort-house, Kilmore-palace, Richhill-house, Tully-house, Nixon-lodge, and Ashgrove. In 1237 or 1240, an abbey of Premonstratensian canons was removed from an island in Lough Key in co. Roscommon, to an island in Lough Oughter; and, in 1570, it was granted by Queen Elizabeth to Hugh O'Reilly for 21 years at the rent of £2 5s. 8d. Irish.

OUGHTERAGH. See OUTRAGE.

UGHTERANY. See KEATHY.

OUGHTERARD, a small market and post town in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the rivulet Feagh, on the west shore of Lough Corrib, and on the road from Galway to Clifden, 8 miles south by west of Cong, by boat across Lough Corrib, 14 north-west by north of Galway, 26 east by south of Clifden, and 119 west of Dublin. The surrounding country is wild and romantic; the portions of it immediately adjacent to the town have recently undergone much georgical improvement; the nearest shores of Lough Corrib, though low and tame, form the foreground of an extensive and very pleasing landscape; and the perspective toward the interior of Connemara is grand, powerful, and imposing. The town itself straggles at such length along the Feagh, as to lose all compactness, and to constitute two parts or divisions of powderings and little strings of houses; but it is clean, airy, and, for so very remote a place, not a little agreeable and pretending. The Feagh forms a series of rapids, almost amounting to cataracts, immediately above the town; it trots and dances, in the most limpid current, and in the merriest mood, from end to end of the town; and it finally dives into the earth, and passes through a natural tunnel of limestone into Lough Corrib. Near the series of rapids is Clareville, the lodge of A. F. St. George, Esq., the proprietor of the town; immediately below the rapids is the large Roman Catholic chapel; farther down is the small, but neat parish-church; a little north of the foot of the town is a considerable infantry barrack; and in the near vicinity are the seats of Corribdale, Robert Martin, Esq.,—Lemonfield, T. H. O'Flaherty, Esq.,—Corribview,—Portacaim, Mr. Nolan,—and Sandy-mount. Fairs are held in the town on Jan. 1, March 25, June 24, and Oct. 15. Trade can be carried on with Cong and Galway by small boat navigation upon Lough Corrib. Some good marble occurs in the vicinity, and might be largely quarried. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Thursday of every month; and courts of quarter-sessions are held for the west riding of the county. The town is the residence of a stipendiary magistrate, and the head-quarters of both the whole west riding, and one of its 7 districts, of the constabulary force. A dispensary in the town is within the Poor-law union of Galway, and serves for a district of 138,000 acres, with a pop. of 12,000; and, in 1840-41, it expended £131 10s. 6d., and made 4,320 dispensations of medicine to 3,201 patients. Oughterard gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Galway. Area of the town, 57 acres. Pop., in 1841, 718.

Houses 115. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 50; in manufactures and trade, 46; in other pursuits, 36. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 49; on their own manual labour, 58; on means not specified, 8.

OUGHTERARD, a parish in the barony of South Salt, 5 miles north-east of Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 2,819 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 223; in 1841, 400. Houses 73. The surface lies on the eastern margin of the county, possesses a diversified contour and character, and is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Limerick, Cork, and Waterford. A height on the eastern boundary has an altitude of 608 feet above sea-level; and a height at the old church and pillar-tower has an altitude of 458 feet. The seats are Bishops-court-house, Castlewarden-house, and Huttonroad,—the second the residence of Mr. Palliser, and the first the handsome residence of Mr. Ponsonby. A town called Cloneglis is said to have formerly stood in the vicinity of the church; but, if it ever existed, it has completely disappeared. The church is small, and a ruin; it is stated to have been rebuilt in 1606, upon the site of a very ancient chantry; and under the west end of it is an old crypt, used as the burying-place of the Ponsonby family of Bishops-court. A mutilated pillar-tower stands not more than 30 feet from the ruins of the church. "The door faces the east, and is 10 feet from the ground. The head of this door is round, and the arch is formed of 9 massive blocks of stone. At the height of 20 feet on the south side is a window of the same shape and dimensions as the door. Within are the remains of brackets designed for the support of lofts."—This parish lies within the dio. of Kildare, and seems to have been at one time a rectory; but it is not now recognised as a parish in the ecclesiastical divisions.

OUGHTERLEAGUE, or BILL, a parish 3¼ miles north by west of Golden-bridge, and partly in the barony of Clanwilliam, but chiefly in that of Lower Kilmacanagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Clanwilliam section lies detached from the Lower Kilmacanagh section half-a-mile to the east. Length of the Clanwilliam section, southward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 735 acres, 1 rood, 39 perches. Length of the Lower Kilmacanagh section, south by eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,881 acres, 1 rood, 22 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 975; in 1841, 1,100. Houses 164. Pop. of the Lower Kilmacanagh section, in 1841, 677. Houses 97. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and that of the Lower Kilmacanagh section is largely adorned by the woods and the demesne of Kilmacastle. The other seats are Knockaville-house, Ballyalter-house, and Grovestown-house. The Mutton rivulet describes a large extent of the boundary of the Lower Kilmacanagh section.—The parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINTEMPLER [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Title composition, £242. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 970; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballintemple. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 43, and the Roman Catholics to 964; and 2 day daily schools had on their books 135 boys and 51 girls.

OGHTMANA, a parish in the extreme north of the barony of Burren, and the county of Clare, Munster. It contains the villages of AUGHINISH and FINAVARRA; see these articles. It consists of 4 general portions, two of which are insulated, and two a little detached. Length, west by northward over the intersecting belts of land and water, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 9,843 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches.—of which 34 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are in Lough Murree. Pop., in 1841, 2,075. Houses 325. Both the Census and the Ecclesiastical Authorities state the pop. in 1831 at 703; and they appear to have omitted certain townlands noticed in the article AUSER: which see. The surface considerably projects into Galway bay, contains the two headlands of Aughinish Point and Finavarra Point; and consists, for the most part, of tolerably good and rather low land. Abbey-hill, on the eastern boundary of the most easterly district, has an altitude above sea-level of 795 feet. Two batteries are on the coast. The seats are Scaveen-lodge, Marine-lodge, Mount-Vernon-lodge, and Finavarra-house; and the hamlets are Carrowntobber, Behagh, Carrowanabarra, and Carrowdrumbragh.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCOBANANE [which see], in the dio. of Kilkenn. Title composition, £120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilkenny. In 1834, the inhabitants of the townlands included in the parish, as exhibited in the Census of 1831, were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 80 boys and 20 girls.

OUIL. See OWHEL.

OULART, a post village in the parish of Milenagh, barony of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the east road from Wexford to Gorey, 9 miles north-north-east of Wexford, 11½ south-south-west of Gorey, and 35 south by west of Dublin. Fairs are held on Jan. 6, Feb. 28, April 17, May 25, and Sept. 29. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Tuesday of every month. The town has a Roman Catholic chapel, a constabulary barrack, and a fever hospital and dispensary. The chapel gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ferns; and is parochially united to a chapel at Ballaghkeen. The fever hospital is situated a little north of the village, is within the Poor-law union of Ennisecorney, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 12,161; and, in 1839-40, they received £175 10s., and expended £206 18s. 8d., and the hospital admitted 60 patients. Oulart made some figure in the appalling scenes of the rebellion of 1798. See WEXFORD (COUNTY OF). Area of the village, 5 acres. Pop., in 1831, 161; in 1841, 289. Houses 51.

OULER (LOUGH), a small lake in the parish of Derrylossery, 2½ miles north of Glendalough, barony of North Ballinacorr, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It lies at an elevation of 1,829 feet above sea-level; and its superfluous waters form part of the cascade at the head of Glenmacnass.

OURRID (LOUGH), a lake on the mutual border of the baronies of Moyculen and Ballinshinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It measures 1½ mile in length; lies immediately west of Halfway-house, and closely adjacent to the road from Galway to Clifden; and has a surface-elevation of 156 feet above sea-level. Ourrid-hill is situated in the parish of Kilmaccon, 2½ miles south of the lake, and has an altitude of 757 feet above sea-level; but a mountain which overhangs the north side of the lake has an altitude of 2,128 feet.

OUTRAGH, or OUGHTERAGH, a parish in the barony of Carrigallen, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It contains the town of BALLINAMORE; which see. Length, south-eastward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 21,689 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches.—of which 485 acres, 30 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,449; in 1841, 9,255. Houses 1,557. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 8,137; in 1841, 8,309.

Houses 1,411. The surface is very diversified in contour and character, and consists, in a general view, of middle-rate land. Bencroy, the highest ground, is situated on the northern boundary, and has an altitude of 1,707 feet above sea-level. Lough St. John's, the largest lakes, lies on the south-west boundary, and has a surface-elevation of 205 feet above sea-level. The other lakes are George's, Cammagh, Callow-hill, Dromore, Bolganard, Corgar, Ardmeanan, and Drumlonan. The principal seats are Willowfield, Cloverhill, and Riverdale; and the chief hamlets are Edertinny, Lahard, Castleroy, Greaghglass, Drumkeen, Greaghrevaghmore, Stulongford, and Potteroe. The road from Carrick-on-Shannon to Belturbet passes through the interior. This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £65; glebe, £240 5s. 11d. Gross income, £488 5s. 11d.; nett, £407 16s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £183; and are appropriate to the diocesan, but are received by the vicar for a payment to the diocesan of £9 13s. 10½d. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is situated at Ballinamore, and was built in 1787 by means of parochial assessment, and very recently enlarged by means of a contribution of £43 12s. 4d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Sittings previous to the enlargement, 240; attendance 200. The Roman Catholic chapel is also situated at Ballinamore; and has an attendance of 1,400. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 1,117, and the Roman Catholics to 7,332; and 19 daily schools—one of which at Willbrook was salaried with £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 589 boys and 283 girls.

OUTRAGH, or OUTERAGH, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 3 miles north-north-east of Cahir, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, west by southward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,547 acres, 2 roads, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,02; in 1841, 554. Houses 90. A considerable portion of the surface is excellent meadow and grazing land; and the remainder is good tillage ground. The only seat is Outragh-house; and the antiquities are ruins of a church and a castle. The road from Cahir to Cashel passes through the interior. This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £92 3s. 8d.; glebe, £30. The rectories of Outragh and Montlestown [see that article], constitute the benefice of Outragh. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 1,176. Gross income, £272 3s. 8d.; nett, £234 10s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The Protestants attend the church of New-Inn, distant 2 miles. In 1834, the Protestants of Outragh parish amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 630; the Protestants of the union to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 1,224; and a daily school in the parish and the union was salaried with £5 a-year from Col. Palliser, £2 from the curate, and £5 from Dr. Bell, and had on its books 48 boys and 22 girls.

OUTRATH, a parish in the barony of Shillelogher, 2½ miles south by east of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,050 acres, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 937, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,529; * in 1841, 599. Houses 88. The surface consists of tolerably good land; and is traversed by the road from Kilkenny to Knocktopher. The only seat is Prospect-house; the chief hamlets are Upper Badalmore and Lower Badalmore; and the principal antiquity is the ruin of a church. This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of INCORRIGLOMAN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £200. The Roman Catholic chapel of Grange has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Dancesfort, Kells, Lady's-well, and Bennet's-Briggs. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 1,545; and a pay daily school was usually attended by about 49 children.

OUVANE (THE), a mountain rivulet of the barony of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster. It rises among the Shehy mountains, at the north-east extremity of the barony, and runs 7½ miles south-westward to the head of Bantry bay, at a point 2½ miles north by east of the town of Bantry.

OVENS, a hamlet in the parish of Athdown, barony of East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. It stands 6 miles west by south of Cork, on the road thence to Bantry, on the river Bride, and on the route of the proposed railway from the Dublin and Cork line to Berehaven. It is the site of a church and a Roman Catholic chapel; and in its vicinity is a limestone cavern of some interest.

OVOCA, or AVOCA, a superbly scenic river, in the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It is formed by the confluence of the Avonbeg and the Avonmore at the junction-point of the three baronies of Arklow, South Ballinacor, and North Ballinacor; and it thence flows 3½ miles southward to the confluence with it of the Aughrim river, and 4 miles south-eastward thence to the sea immediately below Arklow. See AVONBEG, AVONMORE, and AUGHRIM. The Ovoc's place of formation by the confluence of the Avonbeg and the Avonmore is now topographically as well as poetically known under the designation of The Meeting of the Waters; and its place of confluence with the Aughrim river is known as The Second Meeting of the Waters. The principal places of interest on the banks or overhanging the course of the river from the Meeting of the Waters down to the sea are Ovoc's-cottage, Castle-Howard, Ballymurtagh mines, Cronbane mines, Ballygahan-house, Cherrymount-house, Timelick-house, Millmount-house, Belleave-house, Newbridge-village, Ovoc's-lodge, Knocknahanohill-house, Ballinapark-house, Woodvale, Parknashaw-house, Ballyarthur-house, Portland-arms-hotel, Glenart-castle, Sheepwalk-house, Shelton-abbey, Ballyraine-house, Woodmount-house, Lambertin-house, Kilbride-house, Crogham-Kinsella, and the town of Arklow; and our articles on the more important of these localities contain notices of whatever is most interesting in either the scenery, the associations, or the mineral treasures of the vale. "The banks of the river, in this celebrated vale," says the author of the Guide to Wicklow, "are about ½ of a mile in breadth, and their inclinations nearly equal, and for a distance of almost 4 miles so closely wooded that there is only seen one continued uninterrupted surface of foliage, over which it would appear almost practicable to walk; and through which the sun can hardly be supposed capable of penetrating, while in the interval between the opposing forests, the Ovoc rolls its dark and murmuring tide." "We now enter the Vale of Ovoc," says Brewer; "and here the attention of the lover of the picturesque, and we may add, the respectful pause of every man, duly conscious of the benignity with which the great Author of nature has adorned the painful human travel with beauties which soothe the cares of life, and elevate the imagination, are first demanded by the point at which takes place the junction of the

* The reason of the difference between the two authorities seems to be that the district of Grange is treated politically as a separate parish, and ecclesiastically as part of Outragh.

Two streams denominated the Avonmore and Avonbeg. This spot, generally termed The Meeting of the Waters, transcends, in an enchanting combination of delightful objects, all powers of prosaic description, and we gladly refer the expression of our feelings to the warm and brilliant pen of a native poet.

"There is not in the wide world a valley so sweet
As that vale in whose bosom the bright waters meet;
O'er the last rays of fading life must depart
Ere the Moon of that valley shall fade from my heart!"

Sweet vale of Oveca! how calm could I rest
In thy bosom of shade, with the friends I love best;
Where the storms which we feel in this cold world shall cease,
And our hearts like thy waters be nighed in peace."

After leaving the base of the mountain whose summit is adorned with the towers of Castle Howard, the Oweas flows between the mountains of Croncane and Ballymorthagh, both of which contain mines of copper. Pursuing the banks of the river, the Owea gradually expands into fertile districts, dotted here and there with white cottages, and smiling in verdure and tranquillity. Mountains of vast altitude arise on both sides, thrown into an endless variety of lovely pictures by the irregularity of their positions. In general these mountains are covered with wood, or are richly pictorial in heaths and other stupendous vegetation; but nature knows no oppressive closeness in this region; bold jutting rocks start forth; where the traveller anticipates a continuance of enchanting softness, and cast the landscape into shade and contrast. Small and sweet glens retire from the eye in various directions, and speak of repose beyond earthly hope." About 50 years ago, the Oveca was remarkable for the great quantity of salmon which it produced; but it became, in a great measure, cleared of its fish by the pouring into it of the drainage of the Ballymorthagh and Croncane copper mines.

OWENASS (THE), a rivulet of Queen's co., Leinster. It rises on the north-east corner of the barony of Upperwoods, on the mountain of Bauncrone, whose summit soars to an altitude of 1,676 feet above sea-level; and runs 9 miles east-northeastward, and north-eastward, on the boundary between the barony of Timinehinch on the left, and the baronies of West Maryborough and Portneehinch on the right, and past the town of Mountmellick to the river Barrow at a point $\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Mount-

OWENAVARRAGH. See AWINDANNA.

OWENBEG (THE), a rivulet in the barony of Troughadeny, co. Kerry, Munster. It rises near the south-east extremity of the Clarinuddery mountains, and runs 6 miles north-north-eastward, through the mountainous region to the Feale, on the boundary with co. Limerick, about $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile below Welles-bridge.

OWENBEG (THE), a rivulet of the county of Sligo, Co. Donegal. It rises on the northern border of the parish of Achnor, among the Ox mountains, at an elevation of upwards of 1,500 feet above the level of the sea; and flows 12 miles eastward through the parishes of Killoran and Ballysadare, and past the village of Coolaney to the Lincin, Arrow, or Ballyadare river at the village of Collooney.

OWENCARROW (THE), a rivulet in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It issues from Lough Vagh, at the elevation of 149 feet above sea-level; and runs 4 miles north-north-eastward, through the lower part of the parish of Garttan, and between the parishes of Kilmacrenan and Clondeborky, to Lough Glen, at an elevation of 84 feet above sea-level. The superfluence of Lough Glen to the sea takes the name of Glen river.

OWENCOCKER (THE), a rivulet of the south-western district of the co. of Donegal, Ulster. It rises among the mountain heights of Benbane, and runs 8 miles north-westward and westward, through the parishes of Inver and Lower Killybegs, to the head of Loughbrusbeg estuary, a little below the village of Ardara. The right of fishing in both the rivulet and the estuary is private property.

OWENDUFF (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It rises among the mountains on the south margin of the barony, at an elevation of upwards of 1,500 feet above sea-level, and at a place only 3 miles north of Clew bay; and it runs 7 miles northward, and 3 westward, to the west side of Tulloghan bay. Its chief tributary is the Tarsaghamore.

OWENDUFF (THE), a rivulet in the south-west district of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It rises about $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of New Ross, and flows about 8 miles, partly in the baronies of Bantry and Shelburne, but chiefly on the boundary between the barony of Shelburne and that of West Shelmalier, to the head of Bannow bay.

OWENDUFF, a parish in the north-east of the barony of Shelburne, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by south of New Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 7,980 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,349; in 1841, 2,623. Houses 407. The surface consists, in a general view, of light, dry arable land, with considerable interspersions of bog. The highest ground is in the north-east, and has an altitude of 400 feet above sea-level. The Owenduff rivulet enters the parish at an elevation of 112 feet above sea-level, runs across the north-east wing of the parish, and traces most of the eastern boundary. The principal hamlets are Ballinvaunen, Bridge-Quarter, Carricksbodge, Cassagh, Thistlestown, and Rookery. The road from Ballyhack to Enniscomphy passes through the interior. This parish is an inappropriate curacy, in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes are compounded for £340, and belong to Caesar Colclough, Esq. The inappropriate curacies of Owenduff, Tintern, and Clonmines (see these articles), constitute the perpetual curacy and the benefice of Owenduff. Length, 12 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$. Pop., in 1831, 5,310. Gross income, £92 6s. 2d.; nett, £76 6s. 2d. Patron, Caesar Colclough, Esq. The incumbent also performs the occasional duties of the inappropriate parishes of Clongeen and Kilrowmore.

The church is situated in the parish of Tintern, and has an attendance of 180. The Owenduff Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and there are two Roman Catholic chapels in Tintern. In 1834, the Protestants of Owenduff parish amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 2,305; the Protestants of the union to 247, and the Roman Catholics to 5,158; 3 hedge-schools in the parish were usually attended by about 117 children; and there were in the other members of the union 1 Sabbath school and 8 daily schools.

OWENEA (THE), a rivulet in the south-west district of the county of Donegal, Ulster. It issues from the small lake Ea, in the west of the parish of Inniskeel, and flows 10 miles westward, through that parish, and on the boundary between it and Lower Killybegs, to the head of Loughrasmore estuary, at a point $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile north of the village of Ardarra. The right of fishing in the stream is private property.

OWENRIVE (THE), a rivulet of co. Mayo, Connacht. See ERRIVE.

OWENGARNEY. See OUGARNEY.

OWENMORE (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connacht. It issues from the small lake Lugacollivoe, at an elevation of 791 feet above sea-level; and runs 2 miles north-westward, $\frac{1}{2}$ north-eastward, $\frac{1}{2}$ east-south-eastward, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-westward, to the formation of the Errive, at the confluence of the Owenduff. Its whole course is within the parishes of Aughaval and Aghagower.

OWENMORE (THE), a river of the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connacht. It is formed on the east verge of the barony, by the confluence of a stream of $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles of length from the south, with a voluminous and ramified stream which brings down from the barony of Tyrrawley the rivulets of Alderg, Inagh, Fiddaunmungeery, and Oweniny; and it runs $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles westward to the head of Tullogh-an-ah, receiving in its progress the tribute of the Munhin, coming southward from the great lake of Carrowmore. "The river Owenmore," says Mr. Griffith, "is by much the largest and most important in the north-west of Mayo; its principal supply of water is derived from the northern sides of the Corlieve and Nephinbeg mountains; the course of the river is short, the distance between Tavnaghmore (where it may be first said to assume the character of a river), to the meeting of the tide in the Gullamore river, is but ten miles, yet the quantity of water that sometimes runs in it is prodigious; its waters also rise and fall with unexampled rapidity. At the base of the mountain Knockletteruss, I have known the water to rise ten feet in the course of two hours, and fall again nearly in the same time. The valley of the river from Tavnaghmore to Knockletteruss is extremely narrow and deep; and the mountains rise from the surface of the water very abruptly on both sides. There is an excellent salmon fishery at the mouth of this river, which is at present very much neglected; this is of great disadvantage to the country; if it were attended to as it deserves, there would be employment for many persons in the fishing season, which would increase the population, and consequently cause the improvement of a proportionate quantity of the present neglected land; for when the fishing season was over the people would find it necessary to cultivate the ground for subsistence."

OWENREAGH, cos. Tipperary and Kilkenny. See KING'S RIVER.

OWENREAGH (THE), a small and early tributary of the river Roe, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It rises among the Sperin mountains, on the southern margin of the county; and runs about 4 miles northward to the Roe, at a point a mile or two above Dungiven.

OWENREAGH, or ONREAGH (THE), a rivulet of the baronies of Clogher and Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It rises among the mountains, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Fintona; and runs $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ northward, and 3 east-north-eastward, to the Drumnagh, at a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles above Omagh.

OWENROE. See MOYNALT.

OWEY, an inhabited island in the parish of Templecran, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies half-a-mile west-north-west of the nearest part of the mainland, 2 miles north-west by west of Mullaghderg, 3 north-north-east of Arran, and 3 south-west of Gola Island. It has a low surface, and measures about 3 miles in circumference.

OWHEL, or OUEL (LOUGH), a lake partly in the barony of Moyashel and Magheradernon, but chiefly in that of Corkaree, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It extends south-eastward, from within $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile of Bunbrosna, to a point 2 miles from Mullingar; and it is politically distributed among the parishes of Leny, Portnashangan, Portloman, and Mullingar. It sends from the south-east end the new-born Brosna, and from the north-west end a stream to Lough Iron, and thence to the river Inny; and it serves also, in the direction of the Brosna, as the grand reservoir for the summit-level of the Royal Canal. Its length is $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its extreme breadth is $1\frac{1}{2}$; and its area comprises 175 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches within the parish of Leny, 904 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches within the parish of Portnashangan, 707 acres, 2 roods within the parish of Portloman, and 739 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches within the parish of Mullingar. Its surface-elevation above sea-level is 326 feet in summer, and 329 in winter. The highest grounds on its shores are Cullen in the south-east, 444 feet of altitude above sea-level, and Frewin in the west, 568 feet of altitude. The islets in the lake are very small, and bear the names of Church, Sindarra, Lackhouse, and Brown's Islands. The seats upon its shores are Portloman-house, Levington-park, Tullaghan, Ballingall, Woodland, Chanhugh-lodge, and Lakeview. "Lough Ouel," says the Rev. Caesar Otway, "is, in my opinion, one of the prettiest of Ireland's lakes. It is of a lowland character, and partakes of the soft payage style of picturesque beauty; no one would presume to compare the gentle naiaid of Ouel with the magnificent deities that preside over Killarney, or Ulswater, or Kathrine; but, after all, it is a precious bijou of a lake; and though there are no sublime peaks from whence tumble the thunder-riven rock and the avalanche—though no clouds rolling in awful masses break on the mountain side, and send down the tumbling cataract,—yet here are the smooth, verdant lawns—the softly swelling sheep depastured hills—the wooded banks—the island, timbered and consecrated by all the mournful associations connected with ruined churches. * * * Playful and fantastic was the being who once dwelt and had power over the sweet valley through which the waters of Lough Ouel now flow. The times alluded to were those when the Tuatha-Danans possessed Ireland—when magical power was then prevalent—and a fine town, older still than Kilmallock, and worthy of its ancient dwellers, covered the bottom of the valley. The fisherman, as he in modern days pushes his boat from the shore, and is disappointed in his venture—by the heavens becoming sunlit, the wind still, and the calm mirror of the lake assuring him he will cast his line in vain—it is then when he looks down, for want of something else to do, into the translucent deep, that he sees stacks of chimneys, ridge poles, and gables of houses, and even a round tower—Ireland's most ancient edifice—and he calls to mind the ditty that his nurse has sung about the drowning of Old Mullingar."

OWNEY AND ARRA, a barony in the west of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Galway; on the north-east, by Lower Ormond; on the east, by Upper Ormond; on the south-east, by Upper Kilmennagh; on the south, by co. Limerick; and on the west, by co. Clare. Its length, southward, is 13 miles; its extreme breadth is $10\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 89,671 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches,—of which 4,176 acres, 3 roods, 33 perches are in Lough Derg and the river Shannon. Lough Derg lies on the northern and western boundaries; the Shannon continues the western boundary downward from Lough Derg; and the Newtown, the Kilmastulla, and the Mulkern rivulets are the principal streams of the interior. The north-western district, or that which constitutes the shores and the near screens of the lower part of Lough Derg, is mountainous, and sends up summits to the altitudes of 1,206, 1,317, 1,127, and 1,083, feet above sea-level; and the south-east district contains the alpine nucleus of the Keuper group of mountains, with an altitude of 2,278 feet above sea-level; and has, on the eastern boundary and in the interior, summits of 1,007, 1,204, and 1,783, feet of altitude. The north-west district produces the celebrated Killaloe slate; and both it and the south-east district are, in a general view, good mineral fields. The other districts are fertile, diversified, and beautiful.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Abington and Monaca, and the whole of the parishes of Burgessbeg, Castleownarra, Kilconnerty, Killoscully, Kilmastulla, Kilharra, Killovalne, Yougharra, and Templechally. The chief villages are Newport, Ballina, and Portree. Pop., in 1831, 32,454; in 1841, 31,202. Houses 4,941. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,404; in manufactures and trade, 655; in other pursuits, 289. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 77; on the directing of labour, 1,440; on their own manual labour, 9,070; on means not specified, 111. Males at and above 3 years of age who could read and write, 5,384; who could read but not write, 2,580; who could neither read nor write, 5,728. Females at and above 3 years of age who could read and write, 2,091; who could read but not write, 3,681; who could neither read nor write, 7,517.—Owney and Atra barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Nenagh. The total number of tenements valued is 3,448; and of these, 1,824 were valued under £5,—772, under £10,—325, under £15,—177, under £20,—94, under £25,—66, under £30,—75, under £40,—39, under £50,—and 112, at and above £5.

OWNEYBEG, a barony in the north of the county of Limerick, Munster. It is bounded, on the north and east, by co. Tipperary; on the south, by Coonagh; and on the north-east and east, by Clonwilliam. Length, westward, 104 miles; extreme breadth, 64; area, 27,211 acres. The greater part of the surface is occupied by the heights, the fens, and the declivities of the Slieve Phelim mountains.—This barony contains the whole of the parish of Trough, and part of the parishes of Abington and Doon. The chief villages are Cuppingmore, Maroe, and Abington. Pop., in 1831, 10,082; in 1841, 10,732. Houses 1,640. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,403; in manufactures and trade, 257; in other pursuits, 76. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 614; on their own manual labour, 1,192; on means not specified, 37. Males at and above 3 years of age who could read and write, 1,808; who could read but not write, 723; who could neither read nor write, 2,094. Females at and above 3 years of age who could read and write, 850; who could read but not write, 835; who could neither read nor write, 2,777.—Owneybeg lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Limerick. The total number of tenements valued is 792; and of these, 256 were valued under £5,—190, under £10,—116, under £15,—54, under £20,—53, under £25,—21, under £30,—42, under £40,—27, under £50,—and 74, at and above £50.

OWNING, OOSING, BEAUTIER, or BEWLER, a parish in the barony of Iverk, 25 miles north by west of Clontarf, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, 44 miles; extreme breadth, 24; area, 40,330 acres, 2 roads, 13 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,261, in 1841, 1,352. Houses 191. The northern district, and a small part of the north-west border, are mountainous; but the other districts consist of tolerably good arable land. A summit in the north has an altitude above sea-level of 1,006 feet; and one on the north-west boundary has an altitude of 788 feet. The seats are Lamingtown-house, Ballyhenabery-house, Garrynare-house, and Anfield-house; and the hamlets are Garrycuff, Knockroe, and Owning.—The last with a pop., in 1831, of 50. The church of Owning still survives in ruin; and is traditionally alleged to have been built by Uiní Walsh, and to have taken from her its name of Uiní or Owning. In the south corner of the churchyard stood recently a very old yew tree, 19 feet in girth, and so hollowed in the centre that 3 or 4 persons could stand upright in it; and about 200 paces to the north is a prostrated cross-stub, whose covering-stone measures 93 feet in length, 7 in breadth, and 2 in thickness.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Fiddown [which see], in the dioc. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £180; glebe, £45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Templeoran and Piltown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 1,272; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 120 children; and 2 daily schools were aided from the funds of the National Board and from subscription, and had on their books 83 boys and 60 girls.

OWREGARE, or OUREGARE, a parish, 2 miles south-east of Bruff, and partly in the barony of Small County, but chiefly in that of Coshin, co. Limerick, Munster. Area of the Small Comfy section, 1,840 acres; of the Coshin section, 3,004 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,872; in 1841, 1,863. Houses 254. Pop. of the Coshin section, in 1831, 1,192; in 1841, 1,103. Houses 166. The surface consists of very good land, and is watered by the Morning-Star river. Among the seats is Greenpark.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dioc. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £128 8s. 1d.; nett, £116 8s. 1d. Patrons, the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Rinfurly, and the archbishop of Limerick. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of Kilmallock, and resides within 1 mile of Owregare. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £258 10s. 2d.; and are inappropriate in Mrs. Grady of Elton. There is no church; and the occasional duties are discharged by a curate for a salary of £10. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 45, and the Roman Catholics to 1,907; and there was no school.

OX MOUNTAINS, a range of mountains in the county of Sligo, Connaught. It commences at the south-western vicinity of the village of Ballyadere; extends west-south-westward, along the natural border of the baronies of Tyrconnell and Lencry, to the extremity of the county; and converges with the Lurgan hills, in the county of Mayo. See Lurgan. The principal summits raised in an order from east-north-east to west-south-west, have altitudes above sea-level of 602, 1,238, 1,778, 1,783, 1,392, 1,448, 1,208, 1,047, and 1,903 feet. The declivities are prevalently broken, rugged, and mountainous; and they are greatly diversified by numerous patches of tillage land; Lough Eskey lies among the mountains, at an altitude of 697 feet; and various small lakes also lie high upon their declivities and table-lands.

OYLOATE. See OYLOATE.

OYNA. See ENISTOWN.

OYSTER-HAVEN, a large bay, or long and narrow creek, in the baronies of Kinsale and Kinnalea, co. Cork, Munster. It opens at a mile east of the entrance of Kinsale harbour, and penetrates the land

2½ miles northward; but a ramification of it deflects at a point 1½ mile inward from the entrance, and penetrates the land 2½ miles north-westward. High rocks, called the Sovereign's Rocks, lie off the entrance; but they are never covered, and, in consequence, are not dangerous. Good anchoring ground occurs 1½ mile above the entrance; but the bay is so near the excellent harbour of Kinsale, as to be little frequented by vessels. The Oyster-Haven dispensary is within the Kinsale Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 15,502; and, in 1839-40, it expended £122 Gs. 7d., and administered to 2,547 patients. In 1836, there were employed in the fisheries, within the district of the coast-guard station of Oyster-Haven, 16 open sail-boats with 162 men, and 8 row-boats with 96 men.

OYSTER-ISLAND, an island in the parish of Killaspicbrowne, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It lies in the bay of Sligo, 1½ furlong from the nearest part of the mainland, and 3¼ miles west-north-west of Sligo; and it is the site of a beacon, and of two of the three lighthouses of Sligo.

PAINSTOWN, a parish, 2½ miles north of the town of Carlow, and partly in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, co. Kildare, but chiefly in the barony and county of Carlow, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the Kildare section, 288 acres, 1 rood, 15 perches,—of which 8 acres are in the river Barrow. Area of the Carlow section, 1,855 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches,—of which 15 acres, 30 perches are in the Barrow, and 20 acres are in New Lake. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 177; in 1841, 202. Houses 31. Pop. of the Carlow section, in 1841, 185. Houses 29. The surface lies along the left bank of the Barrow, and is partially watered thither by the Griese; and though the land is naturally of an indifferent quality, yet, in consequence of its vicinity to the town of Carlow, and especially of its high state of cultivation, it produces excellent crops, and brings a high rent. The large and well-wooded demesne of Oakpark, the seat of Col. Bruen, occupies a great portion of the area; and has, in the east, an extensive and beautiful deer-park, and a race-course. The other principal residences are New-Garden-house and Evington-lodge. The roads from Carlow to Athy and Castle-Dermot pass through the interior.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition belonging to the curacy, and gross income, £29 13s. 4½d.; nett, £28 3s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of the adjoining benefice of Urgan. The tithes of two-thirds of Painstown are compounded for £59 6s. 8d.; and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Leighlin cathedral. The church was built in 1834; and a private house, previous to that time, was used as the parochial place of worship, and had an attendance of 55. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 50, and the Roman Catholics to 135.

PAINSTOWN, a parish on the north border of the barony of Lower Duleek, 2½ miles south-west by south of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the village of YELLOWFERRIS; which see. Length, south by eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 3,511 acres, 30 perches,—of which 17 acres, 3 roods, 13 perches are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census 1,184, but according to the Ecclesiastical authorities 1,154; in 1841, 1,127. Houses 207. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,038; in 1841, 1,000. Houses 184. The surface lies on the right bank of the Boyne, consists of good land, and is traversed by the road from Navan to Drogheda. Beaupark, the charmingly situated residence of Gustavus Lambart, Esq., is a plain square mansion, crowning the summit of a high bank which rises boldly from the river, and commanding a fine view of the majestic current of the stream, its richly wooded banks, and nearly all the plantations of Slane-Castle demesne. The other seats are Thurstainstown-house, Dollardstown-house, Seneschaltown house, Greenhills-house, and St. Clond-house.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £276 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £27 13s. 10½d. The rectories of Painstown and ARDMULCHAN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Painstown. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3¼. Pop., in 1831, 2,206. Gross income, £563 9s. 2½d.; nett, £466 11s. 10½d. Patron, the Crown one turn, and the diocesan two turns. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Innismot, in the dio. of Meath; but is resident in Painstown. The church is a very old building; and, in 1823, it received the addition of a gallery, and its steeple was repaired and roofed by means of a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Black-Lion, in the parish of Ballymagarvey. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 88, and the Roman Catholics to 1,080; the Protestants of the union to 207, and the Roman Catholics to 2,026; a daily school in the parish was aided with £2 a-year from the Roman Catholic clergyman, and had on its books 34 boys and 12 girls; and there was also a daily school in Ardmulchan.

PAKENHAM-HALL, the demesne of the Earl of Longford, in the parishes of Maine and Rathgarve, barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The mansion is situated in the former of these parishes, 1½ mile west by north of Castle-Pollard; it was, not many years ago, enlarged and improved, under the direction of the architect, Mr. Francis Johnstone; and it has been pronounced "the only mansion in the country which contains anything like The Hall in its internal arrangements." The demesne is of great extent, richly wooded, and well kept; it stretches down to the vicinity of Lough Derravaragh, and there connects with Col. Conolly's fine demesne of Coolure, which sheets a large portion of the lake's shores with wood; and it has, along its skirts and upon its circumjacent estate, such comfortable cottages for the peasantry, and farm-houses for the agriculturists, as proclaim to travellers upon the public roads the presiding care of a spirit of liberality and kindness. The Pakenham estate, together with other lands in Westmeath, was granted to the Pakenham family soon after the rebellion of 1641. The well-known Mr. Edgeworth is stated, by his talented daughter in her Memoirs of him, to have spent at Pakenham-Hall much of his time, both in his early years and in his more advanced life.

PALATINE, a hamlet in the parish of Urglin, barony and county of Carlow, Leinster. It stands 3 miles north-east of the town of Carlow, on the road thence to Grane. It is a constabulary station, and has a fair on March 26. In its vicinity are the demesne of Burton and the seats of Burton-hall, Russelstown-park, Rutland-lodge, Rutland-house, Oakpark-house, Knockardy-house, and Thornville-house. Pop. not specially returned.

PALE (THE ENGLISH). See LEINSTER.

PALLAS, a hamlet in the parish of Killosolan, barony of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands in the vicinity of CULTRA [which see], and was the site of a friary of Carmelites, founded in the 14th century, by the family of Bermingham, Barons of Athenry.

PALLAS, a demesne and a lake in the parish of Killoghy, barony of Ballyboy, 4 miles south-west by west of Tullamore, King's co., Leinster. The demesne is well-wooded and handsome, and is the residence of Mr. Malone; and the lake covers an area of 82 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches, and has a surface-elevation of 248 feet above the level of the sea. On the north shore of the lake stand the ruins of Pallas-castle.

PALLAS, co. Longford. See PALLICE.

PALLASGREEN, a post village in the parish of Greane, barony of Coonagh, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands on the road from Cappaghmore to Bruff, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of the road from Limerick to Tipperary, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of the route of the projected railways from Limerick to Dublin and Waterford, 2 north-north-east of Kiltely, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south by west of Cappaghmore, 8 north-east of Bruff, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west by west of Tipperary, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of Limerick, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west by west of Dublin. It is pleasantly situated among beautifully wooded hills, and the best grazing grounds in the county. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, March 10, May 10, and Nov. 24. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. A dispensary here is within the Poor-law union of Tipperary, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 21,992; and, in 1839-40, it expended £198 13s. 1d., and made 5,947 dispensations of medicine. A small but neat church, containing accommodation for 80 persons, was recently built at the village by means of a contribution of £470 18s. 5d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cashel and Emly takes name from Pallasgreen, and has chapels at Nikker and Templebeaden. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 379; in 1841, 201. Houses 34.

PALLAS-KERRY, a small market and post town in the parish of Chapel-Russel, barony of Keery, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands $\frac{1}{2}$ furlongs north of the route of the projected railway from Limerick to Tarbert, 1 mile south of the Shannon, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of the road from Limerick to Askeaton, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-north-east of Askeaton, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Adare, 10 west by south of Limerick, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west by west of Dublin. Its vicinity is adorned with the demesne of Castletown, the handsome residence of Mr. Waller, and commands brilliant views of the estuary of the Shannon, and the southern sea-board of Clare. A fair is held on Aug.

15; and a court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. A dispensary in the town is within the Rathkeale Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £169 18s., and administered to 3,796 patients. Area of the town, 32 acres. Pop., in 1831, 630; in 1841, 783. Houses 132. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 63; in manufactures and trade, 63; in other pursuits, 24. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 71; on their own manual labour, 70; on means not specified, 6.

PALLICE, or PALLAS, a hamlet in the parish of Forghney, about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east by south of Ballymahon, barony of Abbeyshrule, co. Longford, Leinster. It possesses celebrity as the birth-place of Oliver Goldsmith; but is now a collection of mere cabins, and retains not a vestige of the house in which the poet was ushered into life. The honour of being Goldsmith's native spot "has been disputed," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "by no fewer than four places in as many counties; Drumsna in Leitrim, Lissoy in Westmeath, Ardnagan in Roscommon, and Pallas in Longford. The question, however, may be considered as settled by Mr. Prior (Life of Goldsmith), who examined the family bible now in the possession of one of the descendants, in which was the following entry of the birth of Oliver, the third son and sixth child of the Rev. Charles and Ann Goldsmith.

'Oliver Goldsmith was born at Pallas, Nov. ye 10th, 17—.' The marginal portion of the leaf having been unluckily torn away, the two last figures of the century are lost; the age of the poet is, however, sufficiently ascertained by the recollection of his sister, and by his calling himself, when writing from London in 1759, thirty-one. In the epitaph, written by Dr. Johnson, and placed on Goldsmith's monument in Westminster Abbey, are these words:—

'Natus in Hibernia, Fornice, Londondienis, in loco cui nomen Pallas.'

Here, however, the day and year of his birth are recorded as Nov. 29, 1731; and in the statement given by Mrs. Hodson, elder sister of the poet, to Bishop Percy, the day named is Nov. 29. * * * The Rev. Charles Goldsmith, the father of the poet, married Ann, daughter of the Rev. Oliver Jones, master of the Diocesan school at Elphin. Both were poor when they began the world; and the Rev. Mr. Green, uncle of Mrs. Goldsmith, provided them with a house at Pallas, where they lived for a period of twelve years, and where six of their children were born—the remaining three having been born at Lissoy. The list of their children as copied by Mr. Prior, from the family bible referred to, cannot fail to interest the reader. The entry stands thus:—'Charles Goldsmith of Ballyoughter, was married to Mrs. Ann Jones ye 4th of May, 1718. Margaret Goldsmith was born at Pallasmore, in the county of Longford, ye 22d August, 1719. Catherine Goldsmith, born at Pallas ye 13th January, 1721. Henry Goldsmith was born at Pallas, February 9, 17—. Jane Goldsmith was born at Pallas, February 9, 17—. Oliver Goldsmith was born at Pallas, Nov. ye 10, 17—. Maurice Goldsmith was born at Lissoy, in ye county of Westmeath, ye 7th of July, 1736. Charles Goldsmith, Junior, born at Lissoy, August 16, 1737. John Goldsmith, born at Lissoy, ye 23d of —, (month obliterated,) 1740.'

PALMERSTOWN, a parish in the barony of West Ballowry, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-south-east of Garristown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, south by westward, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 1; area, 1,580 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 321; in 1841, 285. Houses 47. The surface consists wholly of profitable land, and is traversed by the road from Garristown to Dublin. The only seat is Jordans-town-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CLONMETHAN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £45, and the rectorial for £90; and the latter are inappropriate in the vicars choral of St. Patrick's cathedral. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

PALMERSTOWN, a parish, formerly in the barony of Newcastle, but now in that of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It contains the village of Palmerstown, and part of the town of Chapel-Izod: see CHAPEL-IZOD. Length, east by southward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1; area, 1,517 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches,—of which 22 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are in the river Liffey. Pop., in 1831, 1,533; in 1841, 1,411. Houses 200. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 737. Houses 140. The surface is a luxuriant, ornate, and beautiful portion of the south side of the valley of the Liffey, and is traversed lengthwise by the great road from Dublin to Connaught. Palmerstown demesne, the property and residence of the Earl of Donoughmore, occupies the eastern district of the parish; and blends its woods with those of the Phoenix Park, in the vicinity of Chapel-Izod. The mansion of this demesne was erected by the Right Hon. John Hely-Hutchinson, ancestor of the Earl of Donoughmore, and secretary-of-state for Ireland, and provost of Trinity College, Dublin; and it is a spacious pile, situated on elevated ground, and commanding extensive views over a most luxuriant expanse of country. Attached to the demesne are a farm-yard and very good gardens. The other seats are Newtown-Clarke-house, Mount-Sackville, Bellevue, Glenmacroom, Harc-lawn, and Brook-lawn. The hamlets are Newtown-Clarke and Quarryville. The village of Palmerstown stands on the road from Dublin to Lucan, 1¼ mile west-north-west of Chapel-Izod, and 4 west by north of Dublin-castle. A fair is held on Aug. 21. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 201. Houses 40. This village gives the title of Viscount, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Temple, who claim descent from Algar, Earl of Mercia, previous to the Norman conquest. In 1722, Henry Temple, Esq., was created Baron Temple and Viscount Palmerstown; and, in 1802, Henry-John, the third Viscount, since then so well known as a statesman and a minister of state, succeeded to the title.—Palmerstown parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Chapel-Izod, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £170; compensation for glebe-land, payable by Lord Palmerstown, £27 13s. 10½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 350 to 400; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in the benefices of Lucan and Clondalkin. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 90 Churchmen, 3 Protestant dissenters, and 1,440 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools—two of which were in connection with the National Board, and all were aided by private donation—were usually attended by about 110 children.

PALMERSTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Templemurray, barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands 2 miles west-north-west of Killalla, on the pretty rivulet which flows into the creek or little estuary called Rathfran bay, and is separated by that rivulet from the parish of Killalla. It is a miserable place, and has its name from the principal proprietor of the circumjacent district, Sir W. H. Palmer, Bart. of Kenmare-park, near Rush. Adjacent to the hamlet, but in the parish of Killalla, are the seats of Castlereagh and Palmerstown; and adjacent to it in Templemurray, are the ruins of Sir W. H. Palmer's family mansion of Palmerstown-house, which was destroyed in 1798. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

PALMERSTOWN, the demesne of the Earl of Mayo, in the parish of Johnstown, 2½ miles north-east of Naas, barony of North Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands in the vicinity of the Grand Canal, and of the villages of Johnstown and Kill; and has been greatly improved by modern plantations. The Earl of Mayo's ancestor, who settled at Palmerstown about the year 1680, was a descendant of Bourke or De Burgh of Monycrower, a member of the powerful ancient family of Mac-William Oughter, Lords of Mayo.

PAPS (THE), a cluster of mountain-summits, in the barony of Magonihy, co. Kerry, Munster. They are situated on the eastern border of the county, and on the north side of the glen of the Fleek, 9 miles east-south-east of Killarney; and they form grand features of the scenery on the road from Killarney to Macroom.

PARBLES, a quondam parish in the barony of Costlea, near Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster.

PARK, a hamlet in the parish of Tullylish, 1½ mile east-north-east of Guilford, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Pop. not specially returned.

PARK, a village in the parish of Upper Cumber, barony of Tyrkeeran, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 132. Houses 21.

PARKGATE, a village in the parish of Donegore, barony of Upper Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the road from Antrim to Ballyclare, 2½ miles west-south-west of Donagh, and 4½ east of Antrim. Fairs are held on Feb. 7, and June 12. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. Pop., in 1831, 162. Houses 31.

PARLOUR (THE), a magnificent cavern in the vicinity of Benwee Head, on the north coast of the parish of Kilcommon, and barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is situated a little west of the pretty little harbour of Portacloy, and near the extremity of the lofty and almost insulated promontory of Doonvalla. Its entrance is overhung by a cliff of about 600 feet in height, and is wide enough to admit a row-boat, and about 30 feet high; and its interior expands into a spacious circular apartment, with a lofty dome-shaped roof. In the vicinity are the kindred objects called the ARCH and MOISTA-SOUND: see these articles.

PARSONSTOWN, King's co. See BIRN.

PARSONSTOWN, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ferrard, 4 miles east-south-east of Dunleer, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, ¾; area, 524 acres, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 257; in 1841, 237. Houses 38. Some of the land is very good; and some is cold and clayey. The hamlet of Parsonstown contained, in 1831, a pop. of 158.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNANY [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £19 5s., and the rectorial for £29 7s.; and the latter are inappropriate in Mr. Hall of county Tipperary. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

PARTEEN, a village in the parish of St. Patrick's, barony of Lower Bunnraty, co. Clare, Munster. It stands 2½ miles north by east of Limerick, on the road thence to Broadford, and on the right bank of the river Shannon. It contains a church and a Roman Catholic chapel; and its vicinity is adorned with the seats of Parteen-house, Maryview, Fairy-hall, Ballyglass-house, Springhill-house, Castlebank, Stream-mount, Ballycamon, Quinville-house, Quinsborough-house, and Whitehall. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Limerick takes name from Parteen, and has chapels here and at Ardacrusha. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

PARTICLES, a parish adjoining the parish of Kildryn, barony of Coshlea, co. Limerick, Munster. It contains the village of GLENOSHEEN: which see. Area 8,497 acres. Pop., in 1841, 2,431. Houses 361. It is a rectory in the dio. of Limerick, wholly appropriate to the dean and chapter of Limerick cathedral; and its occasional duties are performed by the incumbent of Kildryn for a salary of £20. No other statistics of the parish are separately returned.

PARTREE, or PARTRY, a village in the parish of Ballyovey, barony of Carra, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Ballinrobe to Castlebar, and on the peninsula between Lough Carra and Lough Mask, 5 miles north-west of Ballinrobe. A dispensary here is within the Ballinrobe Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 27,622 acres, with a pop. of 14,025; and, in 1840-41, it received £96 0s. 7d., expended £40 14s. 11½d., and made 4,933 dispensations of medicine. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Tuam takes name from Partree, and has chapels here and at Ballybannin. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

PASSAGE, a small post and seaport town in the parish of Kill-St.-Nichols, barony of Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the eastern verge of the province, and on the west shore of the estuary of the Suir, or upper part of Waterford Harbour, almost directly opposite Ballyhack, 5½ miles east by south of Waterford, and 8½ south by west of Dublin. The tideway in front of the town is about half-a-mile broad; any number of vessels may here ride in safety during storms, and a regular ferry has long been established to Ballyhack. The site of Passage is the nearest spot below the city of Waterford, on the Waterford bank of the Suir, on which a town could be built; the whole sweep of shore being a chain of rocky hills, dropping almost sheer down to the water's edge; and even this spot is so narrow as to occasion Passage to be inconveniently packed between an overhanging hill and the tide. "The town," says Dr. Smith, "is situated under a hill so steep, that few care to ride it up or down; however, the inhabitants make nothing of it. Yet their situation seems to be none of the most comfortable, as this rocky hill, which is six times as high as the highest house in the place, hangs over their heads. On the top the church is erected, to which the inhabitants have no very easy walk; and as the hills lie north and south, they have but little of the sun after mid-day, especially in winter; which, with an easterly wind, must make the place very bleak and unpleasant." The streets are confined; and the houses are poor and neglected, and exhibit evident marks that the town has ceased to prosper. A pier at the town is sufficiently commodious, and projects into a sufficient depth of water, to afford large vessels convenience for loading and discharging. A blockhouse mounted with several guns, formerly stood on the site of the pier, and was under the command of the governor of Duncannon fort. In 1649, during Cromwell's siege of Waterford, a parliamentary force, consisting of 6 troops of dragoons and 4 of horse marched against Passage, and took it with some difficulty; and afterwards a royalist force marched to retake it, but were turned from their purpose. See WATERFORD (CITY). In 1663, the Duke of Ormond was made governor of Passage for life. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Waterford and Lismore takes name from Passage, and has chapels here and at Kilkea and Faithleg. Area of the town, 37 acres. Pop., in 1831, 636; in 1841, 624. Houses 108. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 12; in manufactures and trade, 44; in other pursuits, 107. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 48; on their own manual labour, 37; on means not specified, 72. A portion of the town which, in 1831, contained 352 inhabitants, formerly belonged to the quondam county of the city of Waterford, but was transferred to the barony of Gualtier by the act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 106 and 109.

PASSAGE, a village on the east shore of Kinsale Harbour, adjacent to the town of Kinsale, and within the barony of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. Pop. not specially returned.

PASSAGE (EAST), a hamlet on the east shore of the east channel of Cork Harbour, 3½ miles east by north of Cove, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. A ferry here connects Great Island with the mainland of Barrymore and with Imokilly. Pop. not specially returned.

PASSAGE (WEST), a post, market, and seaport town, in the parishes of Marmullane and Monkstown barony, of Kerriecurrihy, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the west shore of the estuary of the Lee, opposite Great Island, 1½ mile north of Monkstown, 3 north-west of Cove, 5½ east-south-east of Cork, and 13½ south-west of Dublin. The environs are both romantic and beautiful; and they present many interesting features, both natural and artificial. The southern vicinity leads out the new and elaborately cut road, past the face of the Giant's Stairs to Monkstown; and the northern vicinity is sprinkled with villas, bathing-lodges, and other pleasant residences. The town itself consists chiefly of two central, irregularly built streets, about a mile in length; and possesses a parish-church, a Methodist meeting-house, and a new Roman Catholic chapel. The quay was built in 1836, is a substantial structure, and affords accommodation to the steam-vessels which ply on the river and down the estuary. Near the quay is a dock-yard; and at the south end of the town are large and convenient baths. Passage is the port of Cork for all very large vessels; it is, as its name imports, the grand thoroughfare or ferry-station between Cork and Cove; it is also an increasingly frequented place of at once commerce, ship-building, sea-bathing, and landscape-viewing; and, in all these capacities, it is the scene of much resort and of considerable bustle. "The disadvantages and difficulties of the navigation of the river between Passage and Cork," says Mr. Windele, "are much in favour of the former. In the channel the greatest depth is 16 feet, but at the neap tides it falls 13 and sometimes 11½ feet. It cannot be generally used with a north-east wind, and very frequently sailing vessels are detained at Passage by the tides. To reach Cork from Passage after the first hour of ebb would require a fast vessel; and after the tide has retired for a couple of hours, the transit becomes very doubtful. The upper part of the river is not, therefore, practicable at all for large vessels exceeding 150 tons burthen; while, on the contrary, at Passage there is a great depth of water in front of the town, with a safe channel, which, added to the necessity of large vessels unloading there, are facilities from which Passage derives considerable advantage." A proposal was made a number of years ago, to construct a railway from Cork to Passage: see CORK. The Passage and Monkstown dispensary is within the Cork Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 39,006; and, in 1839-40, it expended £119, and administered to 2,156 patients. A court of petty-sessions is held at Passage on every Friday. Area of the Monkstown section of the town, 16 acres; of the Marmullane section, 42 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,141; in 1841, 1,721. Houses 247. Pop. of the Monkstown section, in 1831, 1,153; * in 1841, 372. Houses 52. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3; in manufactures and trade, 45; in other pursuits, 27. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 44; on their own manual labour, 19; on means not specified, 11. Pop. of the Marmullane section, in 1831, 988; in 1841, 1,349. Houses 195. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 45; in manufactures and trade, 104; in other pursuits, 136. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 101; on their own manual labour, 107; on means not specified, 61. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cork takes name from Passage, and has chapels here and at Shanbally.

PASS-IF-YOU-CAN, a hamlet in the parish of Rathcomel, barony of Moyashele and Magheradernon, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands 3 miles north-east of Mullingar, on the road thence to Collinstown and Old-castle. Pop. not specially returned.

PATRICK'S-WELL (ST.), a village in the parishes of Kilkeedy, Killohanahan, and Mungrett, barony of Pobblebrien, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands on the mail-road from Limerick to Tralee, 3 miles north-east of Adare, 4½ north of Croom, 5 south-west of Limerick, and 99 south-west by west of Dublin. In its vicinity are the seats of Attyflin, Mount-Earl, Elm-park, Greenmount, Fort-Etna, Richmond, and Jockey-Hall, and the ruins of Mungrett-abbey. A court of petty-sessions is held in the village on the second Friday of every month. The St. Patrick's-Well dispensary is within the Poor-law union of Limerick; and, in 1839-40, it received £84 15s., and expended £84 15s. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Limerick takes name from St. Patrick's-Well; and has chapels at Ballybrown and Lurrage. The village straggles at comparatively great length along the public road. Area of the Kilkeedy section, 13 acres; of the Killohanahan section, 12 acres; of the Mungrett section, 14 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 512; in 1841, 541. Houses 83. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 57; in manufactures and trade, 40; in other pursuits, 18. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 29; on their own manual labour, 51; on means not specified, 9. Pop. of the Kilkeedy section, in 1831, 306; in 1841, 239. Houses 45. Pop. of the Killohanahan section, in 1831, 93; in 1841, 144. Houses 24. Pop. of the Mungrett section, in 1831, 113; in 1841, 158. Houses 24.

PAUL'S (ST.). See DUBLIN and CORK.

PAULSTOWN, a village in the parishes of Shankill and Kilmacahill, barony of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the road from Kilkenny to Carlow, 3½ miles north-north-west of Goresbridge, 3½ north-north-east of Gowran, and 8½ east by north of Kilkenny. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel, a constabulary barrack, and a graveyard; and in its vicinity are the Shankill church, Kilmacahill church, Shankill-castle, Mountath-house, Monelfellin-house, Paidstown-castle, Viewmount, Duninga, and the ruins of a castle, a church, and an abbey. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin takes name from Paulstown, and has chapels here and at Goresbridge. Area of the Shankill section of the village, 4 acres; of the Kilmacahill section, 2 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the whole, 265; of the Kilmacahill section, 179. Houses in the whole, 52; in the Kilmacahill section, 39.

PEMBROKESTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Lisnakill, barony of Middlethird, 4½ miles south-west of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. In its vicinity are Pembrokestown-house, a cromlech, and the ruins of Loughdeeben castle. "There is," says the Rev. R. H. Ryland, "a romantic wildness in the country about Pembrokestown which is totally unlike any thing to be seen in this barony. The hills, which rise precipitously, are covered with singularly bold and rugged rocks; and immediately adjoining and between these irregular elevations, small patches of the finest land, watered by a clear stream and sheltered from every wind, present a retired and quiet landscape, which even from contrast must be considered interesting. A slight improvement in the farmers' dwellings, and some judicious planting, would supply all that is wanting to render the scenery perfect."

PENKÖYLE. See KILCULLEN (OLD).

PENNYCOMEQUICK, a hamlet in the parish of Ennereilly, barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the coast, 3½ miles north-north-east of Arklow; and adjoining it are a burying-ground, and the ruins of Ennereilly church.

PEPPERSTOWN, or PEPPARDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 1 mile north-east of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,779 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,156; in 1841, 1,215. Houses 172. The surface consists of arable and pasture land, worth, on the average, about 30s. per plantation acre per annum. The highest ground is in the centre, and has an altitude of 361 feet above sea-level. The seats are Knockelly-house and Brookhill; and the antiquities are the ruins of two churches, Knockelly-castle, Crump's-castle, and Slanestown-castle. The road from Fethard to Drangan passes through the interior. —This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of FETHARD [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 11 Churchmen, 10 Presbyterians, and 1,194 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

PETER'S (ST.), a parish on the north border of the barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. Its east end contains a small part of the town of WEXFORD: which see. Length, west-south-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,405 acres, 11 perches,—of which 23 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches lie detached. Pop., in 1831, 1,445; in 1841, 1,690. Houses 304. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 748; in 1841, 1,177. Houses 200. The surface consists, in a general view, of good land. The chief rural residences are Lornhill-house, Great-Clonard, Little-Clonard, Roseville, and Newhill-house. The road from Wexford to Fethard and Duncannon passes through the interior.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Wexford, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £85. The Roman Catholic parochial chapel is the principal Roman Catholic place of worship for the town of Wexford; it stands on the high north-western outskirts of the town, closely adjoining the Roman Catholic college of Wexford; and it has 4 officiates, and an attendance of 8,000. The Convent chapel is under the care of the same officiates as the parochial chapel, and is attended only by its own inmates and a few casual visitors. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 110, and the Roman Catholics to 1,338; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £18 from the National Board, one with an unreported sum from subscriptions and public collection, and one with £64 from the clergy of the diocese—had on their books 430 boys and 339 girls.

PETTIGOE, a village, partly in the parish of Drumkeeran, barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, but chiefly in the parish of Templecarne, barony of Tyrnagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the rivulet Termon, on the road from Belleek to Castle-Derg, and on the east road from Enniskillen to Donegal, 1 mile north of the nearest part of Lower Lough Erne, 3½ south by east of Lough Derg, 4½ west-north-west of Kesh, 14 south-east by east of Donegal, 16 north-north-west of Enniskillen, and 96 north-north-west of Dublin. It stands amidst pretty green and wooded hills; and its vicinity offers various fine vantage-grounds for obtaining a panoramic view of the basin of Lower Lough Erne. The village contains a church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, and a Roman Catholic chapel; it is a prosperous and improving place; and, unhappily, it possesses not a little notoriety as the great thoroughfare of the crowds of pilgrims who frequent Lough Derg. See DERG (LOUGH). A dispensary here is within the Donegal Poor-law union. A court of petty-sessions is held on the last Friday of every month; and a fair is held on the 20th day of every month. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Clogher takes name from Pettigoe, and has chapels at Templecarne, Castle-Caldwell, and Mountain. Area of the Fermanagh section of the village, 10 acres; of the Donegal section, 15 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1841, 616. Houses 90. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 30; in manufactures and trade, 65; in other pursuits, 19. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 63; on their own manual labour, 37; on means not specified, 4. Pop. of the Donegal section, in 1841, 490. Houses 71.

PHIBSBOROUGH, a handsome suburban village, on the north side of Dublin, and on the Royal Canal, 1½ mile from Dublin castle, co. Dublin, Leinster. Pop. not specially returned.

PHILIPSTOWN (THE), a rivulet of King's county, Leinster. It rises in four sources about 2 miles south and south-west of the town of Philipstown, and pursues a lazy and very sinuous course of about 7 miles prevalently eastward and through a region of bogs, to the formation of the western head-stream of the Feagh river on the eastern boundary of the parish of Ballinakill. It possesses considerable economical value as a natural drain for a great expanse of bog; and is circumstantially reported on in the second volume of the Reports of the Commissioners on the bogs of Ireland.

PHILIPSTOWN (LOWER), a barony of King's county, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Westmeath; on the east, by the baronies of Warrenstown and Coolstown; on the south by the barony of Upper Philipstown; and on the west, by the baronies of Geashill and Ballycowan. Length, southward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 31,691 acres, 3 roads, 2 perches,—of which 5 acres, 20 perches are in Lough-Na-Shade. Two heights in the interior have altitudes of respectively 301 and 376 feet above sea-level; one on the north border has an altitude of 457 feet; and Croghan Hill, one of most conspicuous and beautiful natural features within a vast expanse of circumjacent country, has an altitude of 769 feet. The surface of the barony, with the exception of these heights, is flat, tame, and comparatively low; and, in common with the surface of the barony of Upper Philipstown, it comprises an enormous proportion of bog. Some remarks on the prevalently miserable condition of these two baronies will be found in our article on KING'S COUNTY; and the following additional remarks, in an official report made in 1836, are too important to bear being omitted: "From the evidence received, as well as from observation, it is evident that the labourers, instead of being naturally idle, as many insinuate, are most anxious to obtain work, and travel many miles for it, though their hopes are so often disappointed, and exert themselves for that purpose, beyond what the English labourer would do, when there is any probability of trifling remuneration; but there is generally so little stimulus to exertion, and their being able to get nothing to do, but the liberty of 'walking about and dragging sorrow after their heels,' it would be extraordinary if habitual idleness and inactivity did not fix upon them in spite of their national quickness and activity. Admitting the scarcity of food and labour, it must appear an extraordinary anomaly that so many thousand acres of bog, inviting cultivation, and well adapted for it, should remain within view of Philipstown untouched, or, more correctly, not permitted to be touched,—for many would gladly cultivate it if they were allowed to do so. The proprietors of the bog in the neighbourhood of Philipstown are the Earl of Charleville, Lord and Lady Belvidere, Lord Digby, and Lord Ponsonby, to whom, in my opinion, it would have been by this time a source of great profit, if they had permitted and encouraged its cultivation in a proper manner. The Ballycommon and Mount Lucas bogs, part of the immense bog of Allen, contain nearly 10,000 English acres, no part of which exceeds four miles from Philipstown; they consist of a fine black peat, dry in places, and admitting of complete drainage, being at an elevation of from 200 to 300 feet above the level of the sea, with abundance of clay and limestone gravel at a convenient depth, and an even surface, the Grand Canal also passing through the bog, and communicating with the metropolis and other parts of Ireland. The cultivation of these bogs would give employment to all who wanted, and would produce food and distribute comfort and happiness to thousands who are on the verge of starvation. If a company were to embark in these improvements, I have no doubt of the profit answering their expectation, and remunerating them for judicious outlay under a long lease." Mr George Rait, an enlightened and enterprising farmer within five miles of Philipstown, has introduced and prosecuted so great improvements to the district, and began several years ago to command so great attention from some of his farming neighbours, that a brief notice of his agricultural economy and practices has become essential to a fair topographical view of the baronies. "He occupies," says the reports already quoted, "a farm of 700 Irish, or upwards of 1,100 English acres. He allows his labourers a certain weight or measure of meal and milk per day, a room to eat their victuals in, and a fire to cook them by; the cost of the food allowed, at present prices, amounts to £10 per head per annum, and he pays them £7 each in money, which amounts in all to £17 per man per annum; the cost of an English labourer is about £30 per annum. Mr. George Rait and his brother are Scotchmen, and came to the farms they severally hold, near Philipstown, twenty years ago. They both have a number of agricultural pupils at handsome premiums. Mr. George Rait's rent is £2 2s. per Irish acre. The soil is a good firm dry loam, which he cultivates in the well-known alternate Scotch method, but does not stall-feed his cattle in summer. He sows Pacey's perennial rye-grass, which is allowed to go to seed, and he finds the seed more valuable than the hay; the latter is useful for the horses, and feeding bullocks, along with turnips. The hay is thrashed before stacking, and the seed enclosed in a covering of straw, and thatched like a corn stack for the winter; in spring it is winnowed and prepared for the English market. The clover and grass seeds are sown by a machine instead of the hand,—the only one I have observed in Ireland. This manner of sowing cannot be too much recommended; the most careless observer would at once recognise the effect of the machine on a field of clover, from its remarkable regularity in the distribution of the plants; it also possesses the advantage of enabling the farmer to sow his clover and other light seeds in windy weather."—The barony of Lower Philipstown contains part of the parish of Ballyburly, and the whole of the parishes of Ballycommon, Croghan, Killeconfert, and Killaderry. The only town is Philipstown. Pop., in 1831, 7,447; in 1841, 7,223. Houses 1,190. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 799; in manufactures and trade, 245; in other pursuits, 217. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 38; on the directing of labour, 355; on their own manual labour, 792; on means not specified, 36. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,314; who could read but not write, 529; who could neither read nor write, 1,409. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 632; who could read but not write, 793; who could neither read nor write, 1,769.—This barony lies partly within the Poor-law union of Edenderry, and partly within that of Tullamore. The total number of tenements valued is 1,341; and of these, 850 were valued under £5,—179, under £10,—94, under £15,—76, under £20,—35, under £25,—21, under £30,—20, under £40,—15, under £50,—and 51, at and above £50.

PHILIPSTOWN (UPPER), a barony in King's county, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by Lower Philipstown and by Coolestown; on the east, by Coolestown; on the south and south-west, by Queen's county; and on the west, by Geashil. Length, south-south-westward, 9 miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 37,996 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches. The streams flow upon a medium elevation of at least 200 feet above sea-level; and so very flat is the territorial surface, that the highest ground has an altitude of only 278 feet above sea-level. An enormous proportion of the surface, especially in the north, the east, and the south-west, is bog. The condition of the barony has been fully noticed in the preceding article: which see. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred 2 townlands of the parish of Ballykean from Upper Philipstown to Geashil,—pop., in 1841, 147; one townland of the parish of Dunany, 13 townlands of the parish of Ballybracken, the whole of the parish of Harristown, and 9 townlands of the parish of Fontstown, from Upper Philipstown, King's co., to West Ophaly, co. Kildare,—pop. 2,661; and one townland of the parish of Moore, from Upper Philipstown, King's co., to East Ophaly, co. Kildare,—pop. 97. The parish and townlands transferred to co. Kildare constituted a district of 5 miles by 2½; situated on the east bank of the Barrow, and detached 2½ miles from the nearest part of the main body of King's county.—The barony of Upper Philipstown, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Ballykean and Geashil, and the whole of Clonyhark. The only town is part of Portarlinoton; and the only considerable village is Clonygowan. Pop., in 1831, 9,864; in 1841, 7,452. Houses 1,268. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 921; in manufactures and trade, 153; in other pursuits, 258. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 57; on the directing of labour, 359; on their own manual labour, 886; on means not specified, 30. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,203; who could read but not write, 715; who could neither read nor write, 1,336. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 763; who could read but not write, 1,145; who could neither read nor write, 1,497.—This barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Athy, Mountmellick, and Tullamore. The total number of tenements valued is 1,721; and of these, 1,014 were valued under £5,—288, under £10,—141, under £15,—73, under £20,—48, under £25,—26, under £30,—42, under £40,—25, under £50,—and 64, at and above £50.

PHILIPSTOWN, a post and market town, and formerly a parliamentary borough and the assize town of King's county, in the parish of Killaderry, barony of Lower Philipstown, King's county, Leinster. It stands on the Grand Canal, on the road from Portarlino to Tyrrel's Pass, and on the road from Dublin to Tullamore and Birr, 4 miles north by east of Geashil, 6½ south-south-east of Tyrrel's Pass, 7½ east by north of Tullamore, 7½ south-east by east of Kilbeggan, 9½ west-south-west of Edenderry, 10½ north-north-west of Portarlino, 1½ north by east of Mountmellick, and 39 west of Dublin. The town obtained its name in honour of Philip II. of Spain, consort of Queen Mary; and was designed to be for King's county the parallel of Maryborough for Queen's county. It consists principally of one street; but, as to both environs and interior character, it is one of the ugliest and most rueful little towns in Europe. An old doggerel couplet does it no injustice in designating it "an odious heap:"—

"Great Bog of Allen, swallow down That odious heap called Philipstown."

Even the impingement of the Grand Canal, which might have both enlivened and enriched it, serves just as a sufficient foil to elicit the town's unutterable dreariness. The assizes continued, till a few years ago, to be held among this bog-environed congeries of cabins; but, in consequence of sheer want of accommodation for the strangers necessarily attending them, they were obliged to be removed to Tullamore. The public buildings are a sessions-house, a gaol, a barrack, an old but renovated castle, two schools, a Roman Catholic chapel, and the parish church of Killaderry. The castle bears the name of Fort or Forth Castle; it was the residence of King Philip, while on a visit to the town to which he gave his name; and it was recently repaired, and is now inhabited. A dispensary in the town is within the Poor-law union of Tullamore; and, in 1839-40, it expended £129 16s. 9d., and administered to 1,092 patients. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin takes name from Philipstown, and has chapels here and at Kill. A large and improving weekly market is held on Thursday, and fairs are held in the town on Jan. 3, March 28, May 15, June 24, Aug. 17, Oct. 18, and Dec. 3. Courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions are held in the town,—the latter on the second Thursday of every month. Philipstown was incorporated by charter of 12 Elizabeth; but since 1800, it has not had any corporation. The borough limits extended, on the north, to the river Ashmore; on the east, to Mount Lucas; on the south, to Hallingar; and on the west, to the boundary of the parish of Kill. The corporation consisted of 1 burgomaster, 2 bailiffs, 12 burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen; but it seems to have been kept up solely for the purpose of sending two members to the Irish parliament; and, at the Legislative Union, the compensation-money for disfranchisement was paid to George, Earl of Belvidere, Robert, Earl of Lanesborough, John King, Esq., and Lady Lanesborough, his wife, upon the trusts of the will of Robert, then late Earl of Belvidere. Area of the town, 82 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,454; in 1841, 1,489. Houses 234. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 16; in manufactures and trade, 103; in other pursuits, 149. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 27; on the directing of labour, 118; on their own manual labour, 113; on means not specified, 10.

PHILIPSTOWN, a parish on the north border of the barony of Ardee, 4 miles north-west of the town of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, north-eastward, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 3,659 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,659; in 1841, 1,669. Houses 291. The surface consists of good arable and pasture land; and is watered along the north-western and northern boundaries by the river Lagan or Glyde. The seats are Rathneeston-house, Wildgoose-lodge, and Thomastown-castle,—the last the seat of M. O'Reilly, Esq. The chief hamlet is Reaghtstown.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CHARLESTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £318 9s. 3d. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Reaghtstown, and has an attendance of 1,033; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tallanstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 90, and the Roman Catholics to 1,597; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 from the incumbent, and £5 from Mr. MacCartney, and one with £20 from the incumbent, Col. Filgate, and the Association for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 144 boys and 28 girls.

PHILIPSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Ferrard, 2 miles north of Drogheda, co. Louth, Leinster. Length and breadth, each $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile; area, 263 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 70; in 1841, 64. Houses 10.—This parish lies within the dio. of Armagh, but is not recognised in the ecclesiastical divisions. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Roman Catholics.

PHILIPSTOWN, co. DOWN. See PORTAFERRY.

PHILIPSTOWN, or PHILIPSTOWN-NUGENT, a parish in the barony of Upper Dundalk, $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles west-north-west of the town of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, east-south-eastward, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, 1; area, 1,035 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 459; in 1841, 401. Houses 75. The surface consists of good arable land; and is traversed by the road from Dundalk to Crossmaglen. The Castletown river traces the northern boundary. The seats are Philipstown-house and Woodbine-cottage. Within the parish are extensive flour and corn mills.—This parish is nominally a curacy, but practically a rectory, and part of the benefice of BARONSTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £107 13s. 5d.; glebe, £34 10s. The church was built in 1798 by means of donations from the incumbent, from Primate Rokeby, and from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 90; attendance 50. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 29 Churchmen, 21 Presbyterians, and 344 Roman Catholics.

PHINAGH. See FINOCH.

PHENIX-PARK, a public demesne, immediately adjacent to the west side of Dublin, and in the parishes of St. James, Chapel-Isod, and Castleknock, barony of Castleknock, co. Dublin, Leinster.

It extends along the north bank of the Liffey, from a point 5 furlongs above the village of Chapel-Isod, to a point 240 yards above George IV.'s Bridge; and it measures about $5\frac{1}{2}$ Irish miles in circumference, and 1,700 statute acres in area. It serves as an appendage to the dignity of the vice-regal establishment, and as a place of public resort for recreation and exercise; and it contains the summer residence of the Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, houses for the secretaries of state, and other officers of government, the Hibernian Society's school for the children of soldiers, the Phoenix-Pillar, the Wellington Testimonial, the Royal Military Infirmary, and the Zoological Gardens.

"We are informed in the history of Dublin by Dr. Walsh," says Mr. Brewer, "that the park derives its name from a corruption of the Irish term Fionn-uisge (clear, or fair, water), pronounced finiské, 'which articulated in the brief English manner, exactly resembles the word Phoenix.' The manor of Phenix, made part of the lands of Kilmainham, and was surrendered to the Crown by Sir John Rawson, prior of that hospital, in the reign of Henry VIII. An intention of forming the demesne into a deer-park was entertained in the time of Queen Elizabeth, but this design was not carried into effect till the vice-royalty of the Duke of Ormonde, in the reign of Charles II., since which date large additions have been made from lands purchased under the sanction of the Crown. The completion of the demesne, as regards ornamental disposal, was, however, reserved for the accomplished Earl of Chesterfield, who, whilst residing in Ireland as lord-lieutenant, embellished the park with many walks and plantations.

"Notwithstanding the efforts of Lord Chesterfield, this extensive park is more conspicuous for natural than artificial beauties; and is, perhaps, in every point of view, except as regards dimensions, excelled by many demesnes in the possession of ennobled or private individuals. Its attractions are, however, considerable. Two 'lakes,' of moderate extent, are well situated to adorn the principal ride; and their pensive waters intermingle with the scenery at several points of observation. The great extent of the grounds, and the prevailing undulation of surface, produce an abundant variety of landscape; and many noble views are obtained of contiguous tracts, in which the city of Dublin stands displayed with peculiar advantage. The endeavours of Lord Chesterfield were chiefly directed to the disposal of the grounds; but, in one instance, he called to his aid the decorative hands of architecture and sculpture. In the centre of an area, approached by four avenues, his lordship erected a stone column, of the Corinthian order, on the top of which is sculptured the emblem of the Phoenix, reproductive from its own ashes. There appears to be little propriety in the adoption of a figure, which is connected with the demesne in no other way than by the operation of an Anglicism calculated to create national risibility; and the pillar (no more than thirty feet in height), sinks into insignificance, when viewed as the central ornament of so extensive a district."

The Viceroyal Lodge is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of the city-entrance to the park; and, as to both position and architectural character, must be considered rather as a place of temporary retirement, than as a state building in use for the performance of official duty. The original structure was a small, plain, brick mansion, erected by a private individual, and purchased by government; wings were added, in 1802, by Lord Hardwicke; and the north front, the only ornamental facade,—of a respectable and pleasing character, decorated with four Ionic pillars sustaining a pediment—was erected chiefly by Lord Whitworth, after a design by Francis Johnstone, Esq. The lodge, in spite of its plainness and comparative incommensurateness, was the principal residence of George IV. during his visit to Ireland. The chief secretary's house is situated 4½ furlongs west-south-west, and the under secretary's house 4½ furlongs west-north-west, of the Viceregal Lodge; but they are too plain structures to challenge any remark. The other buildings within the park were noticed in the article on the city of DUBLIN: which see. The beautiful garden of the Zoological Society is situated on the east verge of the park, 3½ furlongs from the city-entrance; it is very spacious and judiciously disposed, and tolerably well furnished; it is daily open to visitors for an admission-fee of sixpence from each; and it forms one of the most interesting as well as rational places for the recreation of the citizens.

PHOUL-A-PHOUCA, or POL-A-PHUCA, a celebrated waterfall on the boundary between the parish of Ballymore-Eustace, barony of South Nias, co. Kildare, and the parish of Hollywood, barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It occurs on the river Liffey, 1½ mile east-south-east of the town of Ballymore-Eustace, and 3½ south-south-west of Blessington. The fall consists of three leaps or stages, amounting, in a time of flood, to 150 feet in descent; and it occurs in a chasm of only 40 feet in width, between sheer cliffs of greywacke rock. "The centre fall," says the author of the Guide to Wicklow, "is an extraordinary and terrific object. Here the whole body of water composing the stream of the Liffey rushes down with the utmost impetuosity into a circular basin of stone, worn perfectly smooth, the form of which imparts to the water a rotatory motion, which Seward compares to the eddy on the coast of Norway, called the Navel of the Sea, a vortex whose power of engulfing is so great, that no vessel dares approach it. Across this chasm a bridge has been thrown, to continue the new line of road to New-Ross; the span of the arch is sixty-five feet, the altitude of the chord above the upper fall is forty-seven feet, and the height of the keystone of the arch above the river's bed one hundred and fifty feet; from the battlements there is a direct perpendicular view into the whirlpool just now described, and which gives name to the waterfall. This beautiful object and bold conception, the bridge of Pol-a-Phuca, is built from the design of Alexander Nimmo, Esq. Mr. Duncan's design was a little further up the river, from an idea of instability or want of room, so near the fall. The arch is of the second order of pointed architecture, and is thrown from rock to rock precisely over the principal fall. On the west side of the bridge the bed of the river alone appears to the spectator, but on crossing quickly to the other side and looking down, he is astonished at perceiving here an additional depth of near one hundred feet, from the same level to the lowest bed of the river; the effect will be found very extraordinary, and is occasioned by the water falling a perpendicular height of more than fifty feet immediately under the causeway. * * The scenery on each side of the fall might be made very interesting and beautiful by a trifling expense in planting. One side was planted, some years since, by the late Earl of Miltown, whose property it is; but the other side of the glen belongs to the see of Dublin, and is held, under lease of the archbishop, by the Rev. Richard Wolfe of Forenaughts, in the county of Kildare. It is quite naked and barren, unproductive to the proprietors, and ungrateful to the eye of the picturesque tourist. Upon Lord Miltown's side of the glen, there is a caretaker who receives visitors, and points out the beauties of the place, with great civility and attention; and pretty cottages, summer-houses, grottos, banquetting-rooms, &c., are scattered through the hanging wood; seats, too, are placed in the most advantageous places for viewing each particular inclination in the waterfall, and many circumstances conspire to render the grounds at Pol-a-Phuca a very pleasing retreat in which to while away a mid-summer's day."

PHOUL-A-PHOUCA, co. Fermanagh. See INNIRMACSAINT.

PIERCETOWN, a parish in the barony of Rathconrath, 4½ miles north-north-east of Ballymore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,230 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch,—of which 6 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are in the river Lny. Pop., in 1831, 1,089; in 1841, 1,080. Houses 179. The west and south-west districts are bog; and the other districts consist of land worth about 30s. per plantation acre per annum. The river Lny traces the short northern boundary, and the rivulet Blackwater traces thither a large stretch of the north-eastern boundary. The seats are Ballinacarra-house and Williamstown-lodge. The road from Ballymore to Rathowen passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ALMOHITA [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £95; glebe, £24. The church is in ruins. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Ballinacarra, and has an attendance of about 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Forney. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 48 Churchmen, 7 Presbyterians, and 1,053 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools—one of which at Ballinacarra was supported with £30 a-year from Mr. Digby—had on their books 38 boys and 37 girls.

PIERCETOWN, PIERCETOWNLANDY, or LECKNOW, a parish in the baronies of Lower and Upper Duleek, 4½ miles south by west of the town of Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. Length of the Lower Duleek section, southward, 1½ mile; breadth, 1. Length of the Upper Duleek section, south-south-eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the Lower Duleek section, 635 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches; of the Upper Duleek section, 1,895 acres, 3 roods, 28 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 720, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 518; in 1841, 590. Houses 105. Pop., in 1841, of the Lower Duleek section, 167; of the Upper Duleek section, 423. Houses in the two sections, 26 and 79. The Lower Duleek section consists of the townland of Balrath, lies 1½ mile north-west of the nearest part of the Upper Duleek section; and was transferred from Upper Duleek to Lower Duleek by the Act 6 and 7 William IV. The land of both sections is good. The seats in the Lower Duleek section are Balrath-house, Snugborough-house, the Grove, and Mullaghfin-house. The road from Duleek to Ratoath passes across the north-west wing of the Upper Duleek section.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMOON [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £169 8s.; glebe, £14. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 522; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

PILL (THE), a rivulet of the south-west of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It rises in the vicinity of the hamlet of Tullabought, and flows 6½ miles southward, past the village of Pilltown, to the Snir, at a point 6 or 7 furlongs above the hamlet of Fiddown. The name Pill, however, is rather generic than specific, and designates a considerable number of slow-running tide-stemmed rivulets of the south-east of Ireland.

PILL, or CORUG (THE), a rivulet of the south of co. Wexford, Leinster. It rises between the hills of Ballagh and Camorous, 7 miles east of New-Rose, and flows 10 miles southward to the head of Bannow Harbour. "This river," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "is famed in the county history as the barrier of the English, and was called, par excellence, The Pill,—a name applied generally to tide-inlets. Sir George Carew, writing in Elizabeth's time, observes, that the south part of the shire, as the most civil part, is contained within a river called Pill; where the aucyentest gentilmien, descended of the first conquerors, do inhabit; the other, also, without the river, is inhabited by the original Irish, the Kavanagh, Morogh, and Kinselagh, who possess the woody part of the country, and yet are daylie more and more scattered by our Englishe gentilmien, who ineroche upon them, and plant castles and piles within them." Hollinshead alludes to the exclusive effects of this natural circumvallation; "but of all places," he tells us, "Weisford, with the territorie baid and perlosed within the river called the Pill, was so quite estranged from Irishrie, as if a traveller of the Irish had pitcht his foot within the Pill, and spoken Irish, the Weisfordians would command him forthwith to turne the other end of his toong, and speak English, or els bring his trouchman with him. The guarding of this river was deemed of such importance, that an act of parliament was passed by Henry VI. for building towers upon its banks, and "that none shal breake the fortifications or strengthe of the water of Baunow, nor shal made noe waise on the same water from the woode of Baunow to the Pill adjoyninge to the river of Slane; saviage soe much waise as shal be made by the commandment and viewe of the bishop and deane of Fernes, the seneschall of the libertie, and sherriffe of the crosse." By patent, Henry IV. appointed John Neville, Baron of Rosgarlaud, keeper of this water; and the ancient feudal tenure by which the Hore family held the manor of Pole, was 'the service of keeping a passage over the Pill water as often as the sessions should be held at Wexford.'"

PILLTOWN, a small market, post, and seaport town, in the parish of Fiddown, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the rivulet Pill, and on the mail-road from Waterford to Clonmel, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south of the route of the proposed railway from Waterford to Limerick, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of the river Suir, $3\frac{1}{2}$ east of Carrick-on-Suir, $10\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by west of Waterford, $15\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Thomastown, and $75\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Dublin. The immediate circumjacent country excels most districts of Ireland in the richness and variety of the natural scenery, and the artificial embellishments which it presents in small space; and boasts, in particular, the tasteful, well-kept, and magnificent demesne of Besborough, the residence of the Ponsonby family, Earls of Besborough. Both the town and its environs are the property of that family; and they afford a distinguished instance of the benefits which may be conferred, the beauties which may be created, and the taste and skill which may be diffused, by the judicious care and the wise encouragements of a resident landlord. "The gentleman who filled the responsible office of agent to the Besborough estate, about 20 years ago, was a man of considerable taste, in the extended signification of the word. He was a lover of pictures, and an encourager of the fine arts, generally speaking, and was extremely anxious to improve and beautify the spot over which he had, at the time, an almost absolute control. He was particularly remarkable for cherishing native talent, and during his reign (for reign it might almost be called), Pilltown and its immediate neighbourhood produced several young artists of no inconsiderable merit in their respective branches of the fine arts. Some, indeed, with the fatality attendant on Irish genius, have, since then, verified the description of the poet,— while others, and some of them are still living, have acquired a fair share of local celebrity for their cleverness and talent. Under the dynasty of the person we allude to, a spirit for outward improvement at least was diffused throughout the bosoms of most of the tenantry, which the fostering care and encouraging eye of the proprietor himself have since matured and preserved, practice and theory having gone on hand in hand under his prudent direction. About eight years ago, Lord Duncannon, eldest son to the Earl of Besborough, visited, for the first time, this portion of the possessions of his ancestors, bringing his family with him. The change which immediately took place for the better in the entire appearance of the place, and in the condition of the inhabitants, was strikingly great. There were rack-rents and middlemen before, which not all the external beauty of the place could atone for. These were both at once, and without delay, abolished. There were occasionally village tyrannies: these were put a stop to. The poorest labourer was taught to feel, that though he was subject himself to the control of the laws, he had also a protection in them from oppression. In his arrival also, an incentive was given to industry, to improvement an example, to morality a reward, and to vice a powerful and stern check."

The principal street of the town is about half-a-mile in length. The cottages are mostly of modern construction; they have in front, and enclosed from the pathway, small gardens of flowers and evergreens; and they are distinguished for both an external neatness and an internal cleanliness which are not common in the small towns of Ireland. Both the market-house and the hotel are pleasing buildings of two stories, but in different styles; and the former contains, in the upper part of a large turret, such an interesting collection of paintings, minerals, fossils, gems, statuary, medals, armour, and antiquities of every description and from every country, as may fairly challenge comparison with many museums of greater extent and pretension. A Protestant schoolhouse midway up the town is a pretty building. An unfinished tower, which stands at one end of the town, was erected to perpetuate the memory of one of the Ponsonby family who fell in the last war. A commodious quay is situated immediately behind the market-house, at the termination of the tideway and the navigation of the Pill river; and receives vessels of 70 tons or even greater burden. A dockyard is connected with the quay. A bridge or viaduct spans an affluent of the Pill, and takes along a new road for cutting off a short rocky bill on the Waterford road. A new road to Dublin, shorter than any previous line, proceeds by the demesne of Castlemorris, and joins the Carrick-on-Suir and Dublin road at the ruins of Aghavillar. The Pilltown and Whitechurch dispensary is within the Carrick-on-Suir Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 7,648; and, in 1839, it expended £147 11s., and administered to 2,500 patients. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Thursday of every month. Area of the town, 55 acres. Pop., in 1831, 634; in 1841, 701. Houses 130. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 49; in manufactures and trade, 71; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 73; on their own manual labour, 63; on means not specified, 7.

PILLTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Clashmore, barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the east shore of the estuary of the Blackwater, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Youghal. This place was the residence of Judge Walsh, the infamous concocter of the forged commission in favour of the rebels in the reign of Charles I. Pop. not specially returned.

PLAISKINS. See PLEASKIN.

PLANTATION, a small seat of manufacture in the parish of Lisburn, barony of Upper Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated 1 mile south-east by east of the town of Lisburn, on the road thence to Ballinahinch. A thread manufactory was established here by a Mr. Barber, from Scotland; and, about 20 years ago, it employed upwards of 120 persons, and annually spun about 200,000 hanks of native yarn into threads of all classes.

PLASSEY, a locality in the parish of Kilton-ane, barony of Lower Tulla, co. Clare, 2 miles north-east of Limerick, Munster. Here the rivulet Blackwater falls into the Shannon, the long stretch of the Limerick navigation within Clare commences, and a foot bridge across the Shannon was proposed to be constructed by the Commissioners for improving the Shannon Navigation. The horses employed in tracking boats up the Limerick navigation pass at Plassey from the left to the right bank of the Shannon, and used formerly to be conveyed across in boats, a method occasioning both inconvenience and delay; and the chief design of the foot bridge is to afford for the horses facility of passage. Estimated cost, £3,000.

PLATTEN, a demesne in the parish of Duleek, barony of Lower Duleek, 2 miles south-west of Drogheda, co. Meath, Leinster. The mansion belongs to Mr. Reeves, is a baronial-looking pile, and occupies the site of a large and fine castle, erected and inhabited by the family of D'Arcy. This family were descendants of Sir John D'Arcy, who was several times chief governor of Ireland, in the reigns of Edward II. and his successor; and one of them was Sir William D'Arcy, Vice-treasurer of Ireland in 1523, and author of a work entitled, "The Decay of Ireland and the Causes of it."

PLEASKIN, a grand and singularly beautiful cliff, a little west of Bengore, parish of Billy, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is the loftiest and most romantic of the intricate and magnificent series of cliffs eastward from the Giant's Causeway; and, in order to be fully appreciated, requires to be seen both from a vantage-ground on its summit, and from a boat near its base. "At Pleaskin," says the author of the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "the natural basaltic rock lies immediately under the surface; about twelve feet from the summit, the rock begins to assume a columnar tendency, and is formed into ranges of rudely columnar basalt, in a vertical position, and exhibiting the appearance of a grand gallery, whose columns measure sixty feet in height. This basaltic colonnade rests upon a bed of coarse, black, irregular rock, sixty feet thick, abounding in blobs and air-holes; below this coarse stratum is a second range of pillars, forty-five feet high, more accurately columnar, nearly as accurately formed as those of the Causeway itself; and, in general, it may be observed, that the lower the range the more accurate the columnarization will be found to be. This latter range is supported by a bed of red ochrous stone. These natural facades with the intervening strata, form a perpendicular height of about 154 feet; and from the base of this precipice, a sloping bank is continued to the sea, strewn with debris and clothed with verdure, whose altitude is about 200 feet, making altogether a height of 354 feet above the sea." "See the Pleaskin from the water if you can," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "but do not fail to see it by land. Seat yourself in 'Hamilton's Seat,' and look down upon the galleries, the colonnades, the black irregular rocks, the stratus of many colours, and the debris of a sloping bank that meets the waves, and is clothed, here and there, with verdures of all hues and qualities. May you see it, as we did, when cloud and sunshine were chasing each other; when the gulls and sea-birds looked like motes floating from the ocean to their haunts in the wild cliffs; when we saw the motion of the waves, yet, though we were hushed and listening, could hardly hear them murmur; when we looked down an abyss of most varied and surprising beauty, not at the time remembering that from where we sat to where the ripple kissed the strand was a depth of 354 feet."

PLEBERSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 2 miles south by east of Thomastown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south by westward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 898 acres, 14 perches,—of which 9 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches are in the river Nore. Pop., in 1831, 237; in 1841, 262. Houses 40. The Fourth Report of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenues and Patronage, asserts it to be only a townland; and yet returns it as a parish containing a pop. of 1,851, and nearly identical with the parish of ANNEY-JEAPPOINT: which see. The surface of Pleberstown lies on the right bank of the Nore, and consists of good land. The seats are Coolmore-house, and Bonnybrook-house; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of a friary chapel, and Dysert-castle.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of BURNCHURCH [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The tithes are mixed up with those of some other parish or parishes of the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 234.

PLUCK, a hamlet in the parish of Leck, barony of Raphoe, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Letterkenny, co. Donegal, Ulster. Pop. not specially returned.

POBBLEBRIEN, a barony of the county of Limerick, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the Shannon, which divides it from co. Clare; on the east, by the city of Limerick and the barony of Clanwilliam; on the south, by the baronies of Small County and Coshma; and on the west, by the baronies of Upper Connello, Lower Connello, and Kenry. Length, south-south-eastward, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 5; area, 34,312 acres,—of which 1,223 acres are tideway. The surface is one of the most rich and beautiful portions of the county, tame in natural feature, but fertile in soil, and very profuse in artificial decoration; and, in a general view, it extends from the Comogue to the Shannon, partly on both sides of the Maigue, but chiefly on the right bank of that stream. The Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 108 and 109, transferred parts of the parishes of Crecora, Kilkeedy, Killeely, Knocknagaul, Mungrett, St. Michael, St. Munchin, and St. Nicholas, from the quondam county of the city of Limerick to the barony of Pobblebrien,—pop., in 1841, 5,997. This barony, as now constituted, contains the whole of the parishes of Crecora, Kilkeedy, Knocknagaul, and Mungrett, and part of the parishes of Ballycathane, Croom, Killeely, Killeenaghty, Kiltonahan, Kilpeacon, Monasternagh, St. Michael, St. Munchin, and St. Nicholas. The only considerable village is St. Patrick's-Well. Pop., in 1831, 10,667; in 1841, 16,616. Houses 2,549. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,180; in manufactures and trade, 305; in other pursuits, 234. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 56; on the directing of labour, 733; on their own manual labour, 1,844; on means not specified, 86. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,816; who could read but not write, 907; who could neither read nor write, 3,497. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,326; who could read but not write, 1,149; who could neither read nor write, 4,812.—Pobblebrien lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Limerick. The total number of tenements valued is 934; and of these, 362 were valued under £3.—154, under £10.—81, under £15.—70, under £20.—45, under £25.—40, under £30.—40, under £40.—29, under £50.—and 113, at and above £50.

POBBLE-O'KEEFE, a government estate, or territory of Crown-lands, on the western border of the barony of Dubhallow, and of the county of Cork, Munster. It contains the new and thriving little town of King-William's-Town, and has already been partially noticed in our article on that place. See KING-WILLIAM'S-TOWN. The name means the Land of O'Keefe's people. The tract measures about 7 miles in length from north to south, about 2½ in breadth, and about 9,000 acres in area; and it is bounded chiefly on the west by the incipient Blackwater, here the division-line between Cork and Kerry, and on the east by the mountain-rivulet Owensaglyn or Auntharaglyn. Its surface is billy and undulated, possesses an average altitude of about 500 feet above the level of the sea; forms a central portion of a vast mountain district of about 900 square miles, and, though exhibiting some peat-bog in the bottom of valleys and depressions, prevailing shows a good strong soil varying from alluvium and loamy gravel to a powerful clay. The great mountain region around was the theatre of a desolating warfare in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., the refuge of outlaws in the reigns of William III. and Anne, and the very focus of insurrectionary movements in the south-west of Munster since the commencement of the present century; but, during the last twenty-two years, it has been the scene of such wise and benevolent engineering measures and georgic operations on the part of government as afford topics to any politic economist, for a powerful chapter on the benign effects of largely infusing into political administration a spirit of paternal care over unemployed masses of the people. "This extensive tract of country," says a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, "was distinguished by a more than ordinary degree of indolence, discontentedness, and turbulence, in its inhabitants and their abodes; being almost inaccessible for want of roads, crime frequently escaped unpunished. During the disturbances of the winter of 1821, and the spring of 1822, this district was the asylum for White Boys, smugglers, and midnight marauders. Stolen cattle were constantly driven into it, from the surrounding flat and fertile country, as to a safe and impenetrable retreat. The only passes ever made through this part of the country previous to 1822, were effected at the instance and expense of the English government immediately subsequent to the rebellion of the Earl of Desmond, of whose extensive territory the district of which we have been speaking formed a part. These passes or roads were laid out in straight lines without any reference to the nature of the country, and ran directly over hill and valley from one military point to another. A vast change has been effected in the state of the district and its inhabitants, since the month of September, 1822, when new lines of road were laid down, under the direction of a man of distinguished talent and information. Mr. Griffith, the civil engineer, sent down for that purpose, and for the direction of other public works, undertaken for the employment of the poor, in consequence of the scarcity which prevailed in the summer of that year. The progress of this important change he has thus described:—'At the commencement of the works the people flocked to them from all quarters, seeking employment at any rate which might be offered. Their general appearance bespoke extreme poverty; their looks were haggard, and their clothing wretched; they rarely possessed any instruments of husbandry beyond a very small ill-made spade, and as a consequence it followed that nearly the whole face of the country was unimproved and in a state of nature. But since the completion of the roads in 1829, rapid strides have been made towards cultivation and improvement; upwards of sixty new lime-kilns were built for the purpose of burning lime for agriculture within the two preceding years; carts, ploughs, and harrows, of superior construction, became common; new houses of a better class were built in great numbers in the vicinity of the new roads, and also in the adjacent villages of Newmarket, Castle-Island, and Abbeyfeale; new enclosures of mountain farms have been made in every direction; and this country, which at no distant period was the scene of lawless outrage, and one of the strongholds of what might be termed the rebel army, quickly became perfectly tranquil, and exhibited a scene of industry and exertion at once pleasing and remarkable. To the credit of the people be it told, that a large portion of the money received by them for labour on the roads was husbanded with care, and subsequently laid out in building substantial houses, and in the purchase of cattle, and implements of husbandry, and numerous examples might be adduced of poor labourers possessing neither money, houses, nor lands, when first employed on the public roads, who within a short period were able to take farms, build houses, and stock their lands with cows and young cattle.'

POE (THE), a rivulet of the county of Tyrone, Ulster. It rises on the south side of Ardbarren, at a point 3½ miles south by west of Castle-Derg, and at an elevation of about 400 feet above the level of the sea; and it flows 10½ miles eastward, chiefly along the boundary between the baronies of Omagh and Strabane, to the river Strule, at a point 1½ mile below the town of Omagh. The stream is also called Faery Water.

POINTZ-PASS. See POYNTZ-PASS.

POI-A-PHUCA. See PHOUL-A-PHOUCA.

POLBOY, or POLBUIE, a hamlet in the parish of Killeconomy, barony of Clonmacnoon, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the Grand Canal, and in the vicinity of the Suck, 1½ mile south-south-east of Ballinasloe. Here are a bridge, an aqueduct, and the ruins of a monastery. Pop. not specially returned.

POLBOY, or POLBUIE, a bog in the parishes of Killeconomy and Clontuskert, barony of Clonmacnoon, co. Galway, Connaught. It commences ½ of a mile south of Ballinasloe, and extends 2½ miles along the right bank of the Suck, and past the hamlet of Polboy. It is bounded on the north-west and the south by steep ridges of limestone gravel; and is interiorly divided by three small streams which run nearly from west to east; and, though for the most part very wet, it might be drained and reclaimed at less expense than most other bogs, the fall being quite sufficient, and the limestone gravel in no part very distant. Area, 1,950 acres; estimated cost of reclamation, £2,645 4s. 7d.

POLBWEE. See NAVAN (TOWN OF).

POLEROAN, POLLRONE, or POLROWAN, a parish in the barony of Iverk, 4½ miles south-south-east of Piltown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the villages of Poleroan, DOORNANE, GRANGE, and MOONCOIN: see these articles. Length, southward, 5½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 3,596 acres, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,246; in 1841, 1,894. Houses 298. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 637. Houses 91. The surface consists, in a general view, of very good land. The river Suir traces the southern boundary. The chief seat is Poleroan-house; and the principal hamlets are Ballybrazil, Nicholastown, and Clogga. The road from Clonmel to Waterford passes through the interior; and the village of Poleroan stands 5 furlongs south of that road, and in the near vicinity of the Suir. Area of the village, 18 acres. Pop., in 1831, 315; in 1841, 145. Houses 21.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £150; glebe, £1 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £150, and are inappropriate in the corporation of the city of Waterford. The vicarages of Poleroan, PORTNESULLY, and ILLUD [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Poleroan. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 2,995. Gross income, £284 2s.; nett, £268 10s. 2d. Patron, the corporation of Waterford. The incumbent holds also the united benefices of Whitechurch, Loscoran, and Colligan, in the dio. of Lismore. The church is in ruins; and there is a Roman Catholic chapel in Portnesully. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and union amounted to 4, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 1,149, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 2,909; a daily school in the parish had on its books 60 boys; and there were two daily schools and a Sunday school in Portnesully.

POLES, a hamlet, 3¼ miles north-north-west of Nobber, and in the barony of Lower Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop. not specially returned.

POLIPILCKE. See BALLYFOILE.

POLLARDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of East Ophaly, 3 miles east-north-east of Kildare, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,249 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 278; in 1841, 313. Houses 46. The surface consists of tolerably good land. The highest ground is near the centre, and has an altitude of 400 feet above sea-level. The south end touches the Curragh of Kildare, and contains the hotel in the vicinity of the Staud-house.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of THOMASTOWN [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £75; glebe, £1 15s. 7d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 280; and a pay daily school had on its books 20 boys and 16 girls.

POLLRONE. See POLLRONE.

POLSHILLAGH, a village in the parish of Kilmoylan, barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands in the midst of a boggy district of country, ½ of a mile east of the road from Athenry to Tuam, 3½ miles west-north-west of Monivea, and 6 north of Athenry; and it is so near the eastern boundary of its parish and barony that the map of the Ordnance Survey places it within the adjoining parish of Abbeyknockmoy, and barony of Tyaquin. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 150. Houses 32.

POMEROY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the west border of the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, west by northward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 15,950 acres, 3 roods, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 7,183, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 7,695; in 1841, 8,527.

Houses 1,562. About 800 acres of the surface are unprofitable; about two-fifths of the whole area consist of a good description of light land, annually worth about 25s. per statute acre; and the remainder consists of land worth from 10s. 6d. to 15s. per acre. The road from Dungannon to Omagh and Newtown-Stewart passes through the interior. Pomeroy demesne, the residence of R. W. Lowry, Esq., though adjoining the village of Pomeroy, is within the parish of Desertcreeight. The principal seats within Pomeroy parish, are Mulnagore-lodge and Almore-lodge. Pomeroy village stands on the northern verge of the parish, and on the road from Dungannon to Newtown-Stewart, 6½ miles east-north-east of Six-mile-Cross, 7 north-west of Dungannon, and 7 west-south-west of Cookstown. Its site is on the outskirts of the vast tract of moor, bog, and mountain which constitutes the central regions of the county; and its environs, especially on two sides, are wild and repulsive. Fairs are held on the second Tuesday of every month. A court of petty-sessions is held monthly. A dispensary is within the Cookstown Poor-law union, and serves for an area of 15,950 acres, with a pop. of 7,183; and, in 1839–40, it expended £71, and administered to 1,067 patients. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, 491. Houses 91. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36; in manufactures and trade, 50; in other pursuits, 13. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 41; on their own manual labour, 46; on means not specified, 3.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £389; glebe, £197 17s. 1½d. Gross income, £586 17s. 1½d.; nett, £527 7s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built about the year 1775. Sittings 300; attendance, from 180 to 260. A school-house is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 100. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 90 to 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 900 to 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Donaghmore. A Roman Catholic out-of-door place of meeting has an attendance of about 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tullyallen. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 995 Churchmen, 1,372 Presbyterians, 15 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,157 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 110 children; and 6 daily schools—two of which were connected with the National Board, and one with the Kildare Place Society—had on their books 389 boys and 166 girls.

PONDS, a village in the parish of Rathfarnham, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands 3 furlongs south-east of the village of Rathfarnham, and is the site of a convent. Area, 36 acres. Pop., in 1841, 223. Houses 43.

PONTOON, a neck of land between Loughs Conn and Cullen, and in the parish of Turlough and barony of Curra, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is situated 6 miles south by west of Ballina, and is traversed by the mail-road thence to Castlebar. A bridge which gives name to the locality, spans the brief strait between the lakes, and takes across the public road. A small but comfortable inn on the little peninsula, was built by the Earl of Lucan, one of the principal proprietors of the surrounding country, for the accommodation of tourists. A wild rocky hill which overhangs the bridge, commands a noble view of the greater part of Lough Conn, and of its islands and bold shores.

POOLANASS, the lower lake of the vale of Glendalough, parish of Derryloosory, barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It has a surface-elevation of 435 feet above sea-level, while the upper lake has an elevation of 441 feet; and it is overlooked by the ruins called Our Lady's Church, the Cathedral, St. Kevin's Kitchen, and the Round Tower. See GLENDALOUGH. A streamlet which flows into its south side, and is called the Poolanass brook, descends a deep wooded ravine between the mountains of Derrybawn and Lugduff, and forms a beautiful small cascade as it forces its way through the chasms of the rocks.

POOLBOY. See POLBOY.

POOLDOODY, a lagoon in the parishes of Abbey and Drumcreehy, barony of Burren, co. Clare, Munster. It is connected by a narrow channel with the east side of Ballyvaughan bay; it extends eastward and south-south-eastward 3 miles, with an extreme breadth of 5 furlongs; and it contains an extensive and celebrated oyster-bed, and forms a completely landlocked retreat for fishing-boats.

POOLNASHERRY, a shallow and ramified bay or lagoon, in the barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It opens from the estuary of the Shannon, at a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of the town of Kilrush; it is only $2\frac{1}{2}$ furlongs wide at the entrance; it penetrates the land 2 miles northward, and 3 north-eastward; and it has, on respectively its west, its north, and its east sides, the parishes of Moyarta, Kilfearagh, and Kilrush. It is very shallow at high water; and by far the greater part of it is dry at low water. It contains several islets, the chief of which are called Black Island, Illanmore, and Illanbeg. It is crowded frequented by boats employed in the turf trade from Kilrush to Limerick. See KILRUSH. A ferry across its entrance takes over the thoroughfare from Kilrush to Carrigabolt.

POOB-HEAD, a promontory, 3 miles east of the lighthouse at the entrance of Cork Harbour, and forming the most southerly ground in the barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It is bold and lofty, and commands a view of Kinsale Head to the west, and of a considerable tract of sea-coast to the east. A rock lies a brief distance seaward from the promontory, and bears the name of Hawk Rock.

PORT, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the coast of the barony of Ferrard, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by north of Dunleer, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,803 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 809; in 1841, 868. Houses 165. The surface is wholly profitable, and consists of tolerably good tillage land. The coast is $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in extent, and consists wholly of sandy beach. The road from Dunany to Drogheda passes through the interior. The hamlets are Ferrard-Cross and Duddestown; and the chief rural residences are Seafield and Sally-cottage. The village of Port stands $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Dunany, on the road thence to Drogheda. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 193; in 1841, 138. Houses 29.—This parish is nominally a vicarage, but practically a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHDRUMMIN [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. Tithes composition, £145 1s. 4d.; glebe, £5. A Roman Catholic chapel at Welshestown has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Hackett's-Cross in the benefice of Termonfeckan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 800; and a daily school was connected with the National Board, and had on its books 159 boys and 129 girls.

PORT, a village in the parish of Inver, barony of Banmagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the west shore of Inver bay, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of the hamlet of Inver, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Donegal. Fairs are held on March 14, May 12, June 26, Aug. 26, Nov. 5, and Dec. 15. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 198. Houses 36.

PORTACHULLA, or PORTACOLLA, a small fishing village and harbour in the middle of the south coast of Clare Island, co. Mayo, Connaught. The hamlet is the site of a Roman Catholic chapel and the ruins of a monastery; and, previous to 1824, when the Fishery Board granted £92 6s. 2d. toward the effecting of some clearances, the harbour consisted only of some winding channels among one mass of wild rock, and was frequented only by a few adventurous fishermen.

PORTACLOY, a harbour on the north coast of the parish of Kilcommon, and barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It consists of a rocky southward creek or narrow bay, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile in length, and situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Benwee-Head, and $\frac{9}{10}$ miles in a straight line north-west by north of Belmullet. It is in itself a pretty recess; and it lies in the immediate vicinity of the most magnificent coast-scenery in Connaught, and of the three romantic objects called the ARCH, the PARLOUR, and MOISTA-SOUND: which see. At Portacloy is a coast-guard station.

PORTADOWN, a quoad sacra parish in the barony of West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. It consists of the southern portion of the quoad civilia parish of DRUMCREEK, and contains the greater part of the post and market town of PORTADOWN: see these articles. Length, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,888 acres, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,906. The surface consists of good land, and is a beautiful portion of the rich and pleasant central district of the county. The Bann navigation traces the eastern boundary; and the Ulster railway and the road from Armagh to Belfast pass through the interior. The principal seats are Woodside-house, Woodside-cottage, Mount-Prospect, Woburn-villa, Clownagh-house, Clownagh-cottage, Ballyworkan-house, and Ballyworkan-cottage.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Gross income, £150; nett, £110. Patron, the incumbent of Drumcree. The church was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4d., and a loan of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance 400. The Methodist meeting-houses in Portadown and Drumakilly have an attendance of respectively 350 and 50. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,398 Churchmen, 506 Presbyterians, 19 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,167 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, held in one of the Methodist meeting-houses, had on its books 350 children; a Sunday school at Mullintine made no return of its attendance; and 13 daily schools had on their books 276 boys and 115 girls. The daily school at Ballyworkan was salaried with £2 a-year from the incumbent; the daily school at Artabracon, with £2 and other advantages from the incumbent; one of the daily schools at Mullintine, with £1 10s. from Mrs. Henry; another of the daily schools at Mullintine, with £10 from Lord Mandeville; and three of the daily schools at Portadown, with sums not reported from Lord Mandeville.

PORTADOWN, a post and market town, partly in the parish of Segoe, barony of East O'Neilland, but chiefly in the parish of Drumcree, barony of West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands on the river Bann, on the road from Armagh to Belfast, on the Ulster railway, and at the point of proposed junction with that railway of a line southward to the northern terminus of the Dublin and Drogheda railway, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west by north of Guilford, $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Tanderagee, $4\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Lurgan, $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-east of Richhill, $5\frac{1}{2}$ east by north of Loughgall, 8 east by south of Charlemont, 8 north-east by east of Armagh, 15 south-west of Lisburn, 21 south-west by west of Belfast, and 65½ north of Dublin. The surrounding country is generally flat; and that on the north side toward Lough Neagh, is low, marshy, and bleak. The immediate environs are well cultivated, thickly peopled, profusely sprinkled with villas and small farm-houses, and indicative of much comparative comfort and prosperity. The Bann is here navigable for vessels of 60 tons burden; and it is joined about a mile above the town by the Newry Canal; so that it navigably connects the town with both Lough Neagh on the north and the bay of Carlingford on the south. Barges upon the river and the canal convey from Portadown to Newry large quantities of corn and other farm produce, and return with coals, slates, timber, iron, and other goods for inland consumption. The opening of the Ulster railway has occasioned a great increase of traffic to Belfast; the thoroughfare north-eastward from Armagh and the county of Monaghan has long sustained a considerable trade; and the formation of the proposed railway from Drogheda to the north will render Portadown one of the most stirring and important key-towns of communication in Ulster. A large proportion of the population both in and around the town are employed in the linen and cotton manufactures. A large distillery was, not many years ago, commenced. Large sales of country produce are made at the weekly markets. Fairs are held on the third Saturday of every month, and on Easter-Monday, Whit-Monday, and Nov. 13. The town has branch-offices of the Belfast Bank and the Ulster Bank. In 1841, the Portadown Loan Fund had a capital of £4,738, circulated £18,240 in 4,726 loans, realized a net profit of £282 11s. 4d., and expended for charitable purposes £105, and from the date of its foundation till the close of 1841, it circulated £52,091 in 13,096 loans, realized a net profit of £768 13s. 2d., and expended for charitable purposes £356 5s. A court of petty-sessions is held on the first and the fourth Saturdays of every month. A dispensary at Portadown is within the Lurgan Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 16,000 acres, with a pop. of 13,385; and, in 1839, it expended £174 16s., and administered to 4,540 patients. The town, in common with Tanderagee, belongs to Lord Mandeville; it is airy, clean, and pleasant; and it has of late years been much improved. A new bridge was recently erected across the Bann. Area of the Segoe section of the town, 17 acres; of the Drumceee section, 37 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,591; in 1841, 2,505. Houses 429. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 86; in manufactures and trade, 334; in other pursuits, 67. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 22; on the directing of labour, 320; on their own manual labour, 126; on means not specified, 19. Pop. of the Drumceee section, in 1841, 2,322. Houses 401. The whole population of 1831 is returned by the Census as in Drumceee.

PORTAFERRY, a post, market, and sea-port town, in the parish of Ballyphilip, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the east shore of the strait or entrance-channel of Lough Strangford, ¼ a mile by water north-north-east of the village of Strangford, 3¼ miles by water east-south-east of Killyleagh, 3¼ north by west of the commencement of the entrance to Lough Strangford, 6¼ south of Kirkcubbin, 6¼ north-east of Downpatrick, 7¼ south-west of Ballyhalbert, 15 south by east of Newtown-Ardes, 23 south-east by south of Belfast, and 80 north-north-east of Dublin. The landscape within view of the town and of vantage-grounds in its vicinity, includes a large sweep of Lough Strangford, and a very variegated portion of the shores, and is both beautiful and strongly picturesque. The road hence to Newtown-Ardes commands a series of most interesting views of the lough, and leads to several remarkable places upon its shores; and that to Donaghadee by way of Ballyhalbert commands a full view of the southern half of the North Channel, the various outlines of the Galloway coast of Scotland, and the numerous creeks, bays, headlands, and tiny peninsulæ of the broken and rocky eastern coast of Ardes. Blackbank hill, 1¼ mile north-north-west of Portaferry, overhangs the margin of the first great expansion of Lough Strangford, has an altitude of 339 feet above sea-level, and carries the eye of a spectator round a whole panorama of interesting scenery. The demesne of Portaferry-house, the seat of A. Nugent, Esq., the proprietor of the town and of an adjacent estate of upwards of 5,000 Conyngham acres, occupies comparatively elevated ground on the immediate shores of the Channel, and in the immediate northern vicinity of the town, but within the parish of Ardguin; it includes 300 acres of woodland, and comprises a series of charming close views; and it commands, on one side, an animated home prospect, southward to the town of Portaferry, and over the lough to the village of Strangford,—and a brilliant far-away prospect over the North Channel and the sea-board of Down, to Scotland, the Isle of Man, and the mountains of Mourne.—The town consists of a small square, three streets, and a range of houses along the quay; and it contains a parish-church and other places of worship. The site of the former parish-church was Ballyphilip; and “near this,” says the old chorographist of Down, “stands the old church, which is a coarse building of an old contrivance, being a room of 37 feet in length, 16 feet broad, and 20 feet high, covered with a coved arch of stone, so close and firmly cemented, that it does not appear to admit any water,—to which cause it probably owes its security hitherto from ruin. On the south side of the wall are 3 niches, covered like the heads of so many stalls in some ancient choirs. Close adjoining to it is another building, likewise covered with a coved arch of stone, and consisting of two apartments, appearing to have been lofted, and from whence is a passage by a door into the church. This latter place seems to have been the house where the incumbent had his residence before the translation of the parish-church to Portaferry.” A picturesque old castle within Portaferry demesne was originally built by De Courcsey, and seems to have occasioned the building of the town; it afterwards became the residence of the Savage family, the ancestors of the present proprietor; and, as appears from an inscription on the arms of the Savages over the door, it was enlarged and completed in the year 1636. At one time, the port carried on a very extensive trade; previous to about a century ago, it was almost swamped by Newry and Belfast, and reduced from having 30 or 40 ships to having only one or two; and of late years it conducts a considerable trade in the exportation of agricultural produce to Liverpool and Glasgow, and the importation thither of coals, slates, timber, iron, and various other articles suited to the wants of the surrounding country. The town has a distillery; and possesses a considerable handicraft and retail trade. Fairs are held on the second Tuesday of every month, and on Jan. 1, and July 31. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. The public conveyances in 1838 were a coach and a mail-car to Belfast. Area of the town, 62 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,203; in 1841, 2,107. Houses 411. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 63; in manufactures and trade, 248; in other pursuits, 140. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 12; on the directing of labour, 161; on their own manual labour, 213; on means not specified, 65.

PORTAFRANKA, a marine inlet in the parish of Kilmore-Erriis, barony of Erriis, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is situated on the west coast of the Mullet peninsula, 4½ miles south-south-west of Erriis Head; it has a narrow and rocky entrance, with generally a heavy breaker; it is accessible by sail-boats in only southerly and easterly winds; it affords good shelter to any vessel which can effect an entrance; and it penetrates the land, first 1½ mile east-south-eastward, and next 1 mile north-eastward, but is mostly dry at low water. Its chief capacity as a harbour exists on the south side, and is noticed under the word ANNAUGH: which see.

PORTAHACK. See AHACK.

PORTARLINGTON, a bog, partly in the barony of West Ophaly, co. Kildare, and partly in the barony of Portneehinch, Queen's co., but chiefly in the barony of Upper Philipstown, King's co., Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, partly by the river Cushina, and partly by gravel hills; on the east, partly by the Little Barrow river, and partly by the hill of Derrylea; on the south, by irregular ridges of limestone gravel, which separate it from the river Barrow, and prevent the immediate discharge of its water into that river; and, on the west, by the gravel ridge which extends between Clonequin, Shandra, and Killymalogue. It approaches within 3 furlongs of the town of Portarlinton, extends 4½ miles from west to east, and comprehends an area of 4,916 acres. It is not divided by any vale or stream; it contains only one derry or island; and it is traversed nearly from end to end by one line of summit-ground. It has a mean depth of 19 feet; and it may, in comparison with other bogs, be considered as firm. A large quagmire, however, commences a mile west of the island of Derrycastle, extends in a straight line to a small lake on the northern edge of the bog, and has an average breadth of about two furlongs. The official report upon the bog in 1812, estimates the cost of reclamation at £8,114 19s. 2d., and says, "Sir John Macartney, during his residence at Derrylea, reclaimed a very considerable part of the neighbouring fibrous or red bog, which now annually yields excellent crops of rape, oats, and potatoes, &c., and some improvements have also been made near Cushina. An extensive tract south of Derravilla-hill has been reclaimed; those parts of the bog which at one period extended to the west of the road from Portarlinton to Clongowan, have also been brought into cultivation, and have now become very fruitful."

PORTARLINGTON,

A market and post town, and a parliamentary borough, partly in the parish of Cloneyburk, barony of Upper Philipstown, King's co., and partly in the parish of Lea, barony of Portneehinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the river Barrow, on the Mountmellick branch of the Grand Canal, and on the road from Dublin to Birr, 14 mile north-west of the route of the proposed Main-Trunk railway, 3¼ north of Emo, 5 west by north of Monastereven, 6½ north-east by east of Mountmellick, 7¼ south-west of Rathangan, 8¼ north-north-east of Maryborough, 27¼ east by north of Birr, and 35¼ west-south-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The environs, though prevailing flat, naturally featureless, and extensively embrowned and encumbered with bog, have been worked into comparative beauty by cultivation, and boast not only a fair proportion of pleasant villas, but the large parks and the finely wooded grounds of the Earl of Portarlinton's demesne of Emo; which see. The town itself, in at once the regularity and cleanliness of its streets, the pleasant and urban character of a large proportion of its houses, and the comfort and respectability of its inhabitants, ranks far above the majority of the inland towns of the kingdom. The principal street of the Queen's county section commences in the immediate vicinity of the bridge over the canal on the road to Dublin, and extends 1,000 yards north-westward, 520 north-north-westward, and 120 northward; but over the first of these stretches, it is but partially or stragglingly edified, and over the last, it contracts, and is comparatively narrow in width. A street of 180 yards in length goes off westward from the point where the main street makes its second deflexion: a square of about 70 or 80 yards each side, with a church in its centre, terminates the main street; a street of 120 yards in length goes off eastward from the middle of the east side of the square; a very brief street goes off northward from the middle of the north side of the square, toward a bridge over the Barrow on the road to Rathangan; and a street of 160 yards in length goes off westward from the middle of the west side of the square, to a bridge over the Barrow on the road to Mountmellick. These portions of the town, all on the right bank of the Barrow, are what constitute the Queen's county section; and one street, 920 yards in length, and extending west by southward from the bridge over the Barrow along the road to Mountmellick, constitutes very nearly the whole of the King's county section. Some of the houses are ornamental and very spacious; and a great proportion are neat, respectable, and large. The public buildings are not numerous, but are of an eligible description. The market-house is a commodious structure; and contains, in its upper story, several large rooms, which are used for assemblies, for the seneschal's court, and for courts of quarter-sessions. The church, in the centre of the square, in the Queen's county section of the town, serves as a chapel-of-ease to the parish-church; it bears the name of the English church; it was completed in the year 1810; and it is a handsome structure, with a very elegant spire. Another church serves also as a chapel-of-ease, and bears the name of the French church; it was built for the use of a colony of French refugees, who sought an asylum at Portarlinton from persecution in their native country; and, till very recently, the services in it were conducted in the French language. The Roman Catholic chapel is a capacious building, and is adorned with a spire 140 feet in height. The schools of the town have long been distinguished for their comparative numerousness and their aggregate excellence; and they boast, among other pupils who have risen to great eminence, Marquis Wellesley and the Duke of Wellington. In 1834, the parishes in which the town is situated had five schools in connection with the National Board, four in connection with the London Hibernian Society, six partially supported by subscription, three pay classical schools for boys, two pay superior schools for girls, a school for adults, and 14 other pay daily schools.

Origin and Trade.—Lord Arlington received from Charles II. a grant of the estate on which the town is built; and his title, together with the prefix Port, which was suggested by the circumstance of the locality having a small quay or landing-place on the Barrow, gave to the town its name of Portarlinton. His lordship founded the town after the Restoration, and brought to it a body of French and German immigrants; William III. also brought to it a colony of Frenchmen from Holland; and Rouvigny, Earl of Galway, to whom the estate of Lord Arlington reverted, greatly improved the town, endowed two schools for its use; and erected the French and the English chapels of ease, or, as they have been called, the churches of St. Paul and St. Michael. The town, in spite of its advantageous position on the Grand Canal, and in the midst of a considerable extent of populous, agricultural country, possesses exceedingly little trade and commerce; and it both acquires and maintains by far the greater portion of its prosperity, by means of the simple circumstance of having a larger number of resident gentry than almost any other town of its size in Ireland. The principal of the few appliances of manufacture are a tannery; and tobacco, soap, and candle works. The corn and general market is held on Wednesday; the meat market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on Jan. 6, March 2, Easter Monday, May 22, July 4, Sept. 1, Oct. 12, and Nov. 23. The public conveyances in 1838 were the passage-boats on the canal, a coach in transit between Dublin and Birr, and a caravan in transit between Dublin and Mountmellick. The town has a loan fund, a savings bank, and a dispensary; and, previous to the operation of the Poor-law Act, it had a mendicancy society. In 1841, the loan fund had a capital of £1,200, circulated £6,470 in 1,716 loans; realized a nett profit of £77 12s. 3d., and expended for charitable purposes £60; and, from the date of its institution till the close of 1841, it circulated £36,212 in 8,846 loans, realized a nett profit of £431 18s., and expended for charitable purposes £204. The dispensary is within the Mountmellick Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 15,004; and, in 1839, it expended £113 8s. 3d., and administered to 1,496 patients.

Municipal Affairs.—“The ancient name of the land on which the Queen’s county portion of the town is built,” say the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations, “is Coolteodora, or Cooletoderry. Early in the seventeenth century, Terence O’Dempsey was seized of Coolteodora, in the Queen’s county, and of Kilmalogue in the King’s county, by virtue of letters-patent of King James I., bearing date the 15th of June, in the sixteenth year of his reign (1618). Terence O’Dempsey was subsequently created Viscount Clannalra, and hence the lands comprised in the patent of James have been frequently described as the territory of Clannalra. This territory, including Cooletoderry and Kilmalogue, descended to Lewis Lord Clannalra, as tenant entail, and becoming forfeited by his being attainted of treason in the year 1641, was granted by letters-patent, bearing date the 5th of November, 14 Charles II., to Sir Henry Bennett, afterwards Lord Arlington; and it was subsequently awarded to Lord Arlington by the trustees of forfeited estates. The 78th section of the Act of Explanation (1718, Car. II., c. 2), relates to these lands. After stating that Lewis Viscount Clannalra had been but tenant entail, and had exhibited his claim as such to the trustees of forfeited estates, and that Lord Arlington claimed the reversion in fee, by virtue of the patent of 5th November, 14 Charles II., and stating that it was doubtful whether the estate tail was not extinct, Lord Clannalra’s claim of innocence not being allowed, to obviate the doubt, the section enabled Lord Arlington immediately to enter upon and possess the lands whereof Lewis Lord Clannalra was seized on the 22d of October, 1641, as fully as if the estate tail had been spent or expired, and provided for the remuneration of the adventurers and soldiers who should be removed off the lands for the purpose of giving complete possession to Lord Arlington; and Lord A. also obtained a second patent of these lands bearing date the 27th of July, in the eighteenth year of Charles II. By the last section of the Act of Explanation, in power was given to the Lord-lieutenant and Council of Ireland to direct, in the passing of all letters-patent, how new and proper names, more suitable to the English tongue, might be inserted; with an alias for all towns, lands, and places; and that such new names should thereafter be the only names to be used. Under the provision of this clause, Coolteodora received from the Lord-lieutenant and Council the alias of Portarlinton; but Sir Henry Petty’s survey having been made before this name was bestowed, the lands are still called by their ancient name in the quit rent and county books. This borough was incorporated in the year 1607, by King Charles II., by a charter which bears date the 3d day of August, in the nineteenth year of his reign, enrolled in chancery (Rot. Pat. 19 Car. II., p. 5, m. 51d.). This charter, the only one relating to Portarlinton, after stating the adjudication of the lands forfeited by Lewis Lord Viscount Clannalra, to Henry Lord Arlington and his heirs for ever, recites the patent of the 27th day of July, in the 18th year of the king, (Charles II.,) to Lord Arlington, and stating that he had expressed a desire that the lands should be planted with English, proceeded to erect certain of these lands, which lay in the King’s county, into a manor to be called ‘the Manor of Charlestown;’ and further ordained that the lands of Coolteodora, alias Portarlinton, and other lands therein named, all in the barony of Portnashinch and Queen’s county, and the Clonroche alias Portarlinton woods and other lands in the barony of Philipstown, in the King’s county, should be one entire manor, to be called and known by the name of the Manor of Portarlinton. The limits of the borough, according to the charter, “extend into the King’s and Queen’s counties in every direction, from the Pass over the river Barrow, commonly called Bellatride, near Cooletoderry, alias Portarlinton, 100 acres of Irish plantation measure in the whole;” but they actually reached, on the north, to the commons’ drain near Derravilla, on the east, to Old Brackland Bridge, on the south, to the meadow of Drughill on the Barrow, and on the west, to Butlersford. The upper bridge over the Barrow, or that which directly connects the two sections of the town, now occupies the locality of the quondam Pass of Bellatride. The new limits of the parliamentary borough extend, in some points, beyond the old; but, upon the whole, they are more circumscribed; yet they include the entire town as built upon, and a small surrounding district. The corporation, according to charter, consists of a sovereign, two portreeves or bailiffs, twelve burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen; and was entitled, “The Sovereign, Bailiffs, and Burgesses of the Borough and Town of Portarlinton.” The courts held in the town are manorial courts leet and baron, courts of quarter-sessions for Queen’s co., and courts of petty-sessions for both Queen’s co. and King’s co. The public peace is preserved by a party of the constabulary force of the Mountmellick district.

Statistics.—[See]. The borough sends one member to the imperial parliament. Constituency, in 1842, 200; of whom 1 was the portreeve; 9 were freemen, and 190 were £10 householders. The total number of tenements rated under the Poor Act is 884; and of these, 417 were valued under £5,—70, under £10,—31, under £15,—21, under £20,—13, under £25,—8, under £30,—7, under £40,—4, under £50;—and 9, at and above £50.—Area of the King’s co. section of the town, 167 acres; of the Queen’s co. section, 298 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,091; in 1841, 3,106. Houses 516. Pop. of the King's co. section, in 1831, 1,094; in 1841, 1,112. Houses 195. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 15; in manufactures and trade, 52; in other pursuits, 154. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 33; on the directing of labour, 74; on their own manual labour, 104; on means not specified, 10. Pop. of the Queen's co. section, in 1831, 1,997; in 1841, 1,994. Houses 321. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 102; in manufactures and trade, 163; in other pursuits, 92. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 44; on the directing of labour, 186; on their own manual labour, 113; on means not specified, 18.—Portarlington gives the title of Earl, in the peerage of Ireland, to the noble family of Dawson. In 1770, Henry Dawson, Esq., member of parliament for the borough of Portarlington, and the lineal descendant of Marmaduke D'Ossone, a Norman nobleman who came to Britain in the train of William the Conqueror, was created Baron Dawson, of Dawson's Court in Queen's co.; in 1776, he was advanced to the dignity of Viscount Carlow; and in 1785, John, his eldest son, and the second Viscount, was made Earl of Portarlington.

PORTCOON, a magnificent cave, and a tiny but very curious inlet of the sea, on the coast of the parish of Billy, and in the immediate vicinity of the Giant's Causeway, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. The cave is usually the first of the series of interesting objects shown to visitors to the Giant's Causeway by the local guides; it is accessible both by the land and by the water; and it possesses so great capacity upon an aqueous platform, that row-boats may penetrate it to the extent of at least an hundred yards. The interior is of very extraordinary formation, and replete with mineralogical interest. The roof and sides are composed of a sort of trap conglomerate, consisting of rounded stones, in an extremely hard basaltic cement; and the roof, as seen from the innermost recess, seems somewhat like a series of pointed arches, and occasions the whole cave to resemble the side-aisle of the nave of a Gothic cathedral. The cave is celebrated also for a repeating or reverberating echo, similar to that of Fingal's Cave in the celebrated Hebridean island of Staffa.—The marine inlet or little bay of Portcoon adjoins the cave, and is formed by a very remarkable whin-dyke. "It seems," says the author of the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "to have been composed of seven walls, and to have been separated from the dyke in front of the precipice by some great convulsion. In this shock a small pyramidal basaltic rock was detached from the great mass, and stands now insulated in the centre of the small bay. The ruins of the whin-dyke are attached to its eastern side, separated into a number of distinct walls, exhibiting their construction by horizontal prisms, and forming, altogether, a very instructive object. Beyond the projecting excavated rock, of which Portcoon cave is composed, is a second of these whin-dykes, being one side of the little estuary of Port Nabau."

PORTAVOE, a small creek, and a demesne, in the north-east corner of the parish of Bangor, opposite the Copeland Islands, and 2 miles north-west by north of Donaghadee, barony of Ards, co. Down, Ulster. The demesne is the seat of D. Kerr, Esq. Adjacent to it is a curious object called the Sounding-Stone. The creek is a little sandy bay of 5 acres, between the projecting points of land, and might be converted into a harbour by the erection of a pier from the north point. "This place," says Mr. Nimmo, "would have deep water; but the pier necessary to protect it from the swell setting from the north would, for that reason, be expensive. The fishing-boats used to shelter on the south side of the south point, where there are still some cabins, but the proprietor, Mr. Kerr of Portavoe, is unwilling to encourage the residence of fishermen here."

PORT-DIANA, a village in the parish of Agherton, Liberties of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 427. Houses 37. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 8; in manufactures and trade, 14; in other pursuits, 15.

PORTERIN, or PORTRAN, a parish in the barony of Athlone, 5 miles east-south-east of Roscommon, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,133 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches. Pop. not specially returned. This parish lies upon the west shore of Lough Ree; but is not recognised in the civil territorial divisions. It is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLENVOY [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £18; glebe, £2 5s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £18, and are inappropriate in Viscount Kingsland.

PORTEVAD, a small fishing harbour in the parish of Dromard, barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is situated on the west side of Ardnamaglass or Ballysadere bay, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of the town of Ballysadere. It is a fine natural creek, and forms the principal retreat of the yawls and sailing-boats belonging to the bay, and amounting to about fifty. A coast-guard station adjoins it, but is situated within the parish of Skreen.

PORTGLENONE, a quoad sacra parish, containing the greater part of a town of the same name, in the quoad civilia parish of Ahoghill, and barony of Lower Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,240 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,800. The surface lies along the right bank of the Lower Bann, and consists, in general, of very good land.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Gross income, £92 6s. 7d.; nett, £81 6s. 7d. Patron, the incumbent of Ahoghill. The church is an old building; and was erected chiefly at the expense of Bishop Hutchinson; and contains a monument to that bishop's memory. Sittings 250; attendance, 150. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively from 250 to 350, and from 500 to 800. The Kilbanite Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of about 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ahoghill. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 531 Churchmen, 3,808 Presbyterians, 12 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,854 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools—6 of which were at respectively Mounthorn, Killynann, Tullinahin, Lisroddon, Kylestown, and Gurgavry—were attended on the average by about 489 children; and 13 daily schools—six of which were aided variously by the London Hibernian Society, one with £2 a-year from that Society and £3 from the Bishop of Meath, two with £8 each from the National Board, and one with £32 from the Board of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 418 boys and 257 girls. In 1834, the National Board had schools at Connaughtleggan, Moybogue, and Aughnaclesh.

PORTGLENONE, a small market and post town, partly in the parish of Tamlaghtocreeilly, barony of Loughisholin, co. Londonderry, but chiefly in the quoad sacra parish of Portglenone, and quoad civilia parish of Ahoghill, barony of Lower Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the river Bann, on the road from Randalstown to Kilrea, and on one of the great general thoroughfares between the cou-ties of Antrim and Londonderry, 4 miles west-north-west of Ahoghill, 4 north by east of Bellaghy, 5 south-south-east of Kilrea, 6½ west by north of Ballymena, 9½ north-west by west of Randalstown, 33 north-west of Belfast, and 96 north of Dublin. An elegant and recently built bridge spans the Bann at the town, and both facilitates intercourse, and stimulates trade. The chief portion of the town is a street leading down to this bridge, and containing several well-built houses. Portlengone conducts a little trade, in conveying grain, slates, timber, and other articles by lighters on the Bann; and, in common with all the surrounding country, it would experience a considerable increase of prosperity were the impediments to the full navigation of the river removed. Some linen-weaving is carried on in the town and neighbourhood. Fairs are held on the first Tuesday of every month, and on May 25. A court of petty-sessions for the county of Antrim is held on the third Thursday of every month. In 1841, the Portlengone Loan Fund had a capital of £1,945, circulated £7,507 in 2,200 loans, and realized a nett profit of £74 6s. 6d. In the vicinity of the town is Portlengone-house, a splendid edifice, built by Dr. Alexander, bishop of Meath, cousin of the second Earl of Caledon, and inhabited by his son, Nathaniel Alexander, Esq., in 1843 one of the members of parliament for the county of Antrim. Area of the Londonderry section of the town, 6 acres; of the Antrim section, 19 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 773; in 1841, 990. Houses 175. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 33; in manufactures and trade, 133; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 130; on their own manual labour, 46; on means not specified, 4.

PORT-KINNEGOE, a small bay, in the parish of Lower Moville, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated 3 miles west-north-west of Innishowen Head, and 4 north by east of the village of Moville. The removal of a rock at its entrance, and the erection of a pier in its interior, are requisite to convert it into even a fishing harbour.

PORTLAW, a small manufacturing and post town, in the parish of Clonegan, barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the rivulet Cloddagh, 1½ mile west of the river Suir, 3¼ north of the Waterford and Cork mail-road, 6¼ north-east of Kilmacthomas, 7 south-east of Carriek-on-Suir, 8 west by north of Waterford, and 83¼ south-south-west of Dublin. Immediately west of it is the Marquis of Waterford's extensive and splendid demesne of CURRACHMORE [which see]; and in the near vicinity are Springfield-house, Mayfield-cottage, Millford-house, Guillegagh-house, and Mayfield-house,—the last the seat of the Rev. John Medicott. Portlaw was not long ago a poor and insignificant village, but is now a clean, pleasant, and very prosperous town; and it owes its happy change of condition wholly to its having been made the scene of Messrs. Malcomson's great and noble experiment as to whether cotton-factories will flourish in Ireland. Messrs. Malcomson are members of the Society of Friends, and were resident in Clonmel; they commenced the erection of their cotton-factory at Portlaw, in 1818, by taking down a small flour-mill which then stood upon the Cloddagh, and building upon its site the first portion of their present extensive pile of edifices; and they have already, during a number of years, had the luxury of knowing their works to be the largest and the best regulated of their class in either Munster, Connaught, or Leinster. "The experiment," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "has been eminently successful; there is now no doubt, that energy and industry, applied to the natural resources of Ireland, may enable the Irish manufacturer to enter the market and compete with the manufacturer of England. The establishment gives employment, during the year, to about 1,200 men, women, and children; the proprietors are enabled to buy the raw material and to vend the wrought articles on terms as beneficial as those enjoyed by the manufacturer of Manchester; in all respects the spinners of both countries are on a par; while in Ireland the advantage of labour at a cheaper rate is to be taken into account. The difference of wages, however, although a serious item in the aggregate, is small; the Irishman who can do nothing but dig, is indeed miserably paid, but the moment he acquires a trade he demands and will receive very nearly as much as an Englishman of the same grade will be able to earn in England. The Messrs. Malcomson have made—deservedly and most honourably made—large fortunes by this concern; and they have set an example which we confidently expect to see very extensively followed—and that ere long. But the result, it should be remembered, is not the work of a day; for a considerable period Messrs. Malcomson had to contend against difficulties under which ordinary minds would have sunk; suspicion and prejudice were both eager to stay their progress; it was found almost impossible to convince the people that the looms were designed to render them comfortable and independent; and even when hostility had comparatively vanished, there was a general dislike to use the article they had manufactured—even the women employed upon the work obtaining their cloths from the English market rather than assisting to establish their own. But the obstacles against which these enterprising gentlemen had to contend, and which in the end they have completely overcome, do not now stand in the way of other capitalists; the greater number of them at least have disappeared; while the capabilities for producing wealth have in no degree diminished. The town and neighbourhood of Portlaw have, of course, shared the prosperity of the Malcomsons. The houses are cleanly and comfortable; the people are all decently dressed; and there is an air of improvement in everything that appertains to them. The good that may be done by the establishment of such manufactories in various parts of Ireland is incalculable; the benefits they would confer are sufficiently obvious; and if it can be shown, as it may be by reference to this at Portlaw, that the profit is certain if the factories be properly conducted, there will be no lack of enterprising individuals ready to embark capital in similar undertakings. It has, indeed, been for a long time obvious that Ireland, with its immense water-power, and its superabundant population living cheaply, and therefore able to work cheaply, was peculiarly calculated to manufacture articles in cotton; but, until within a comparatively brief period, there was so entire a want of confidence in the steadiness and sobriety of the people, that few were found willing to risk a property that might be destroyed by the evil passions or caprice of a single individual, influencing other individuals." A court of petty-sessions is held in the town on the second Wednesday of every month. Fairs are held on May 28, Aug. 26, and Easter Monday. A Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Waterford and Lismore, takes name from Portlaw, and has chapels here and at Ballydaff. Area of the town, 100 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,618; in 1841, 3,647. Houses 458. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 323; in manufactures and trade, 276; in other pursuits, 78. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 240; on their own manual labour, 388; on means not specified, 41.

Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 417; who could read but not write, 317; who could neither read nor write, 698. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 206; who could read but not write, 414; who could neither read nor write, 1,172.

PORTLOMAN, a parish in the barony of Cork-aree, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north-west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, north-westward, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,617 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches,—of which 707 acres, 2 roods are in Lough Owel. Pop., in 1831, 417; in 1841, 427. Houses 68. The surface lies on the west side of Lough Owel, and consists of prime land. The hill of Frewin on the western border has an altitude of 568 feet above sea-level. Brown's Island in Lough Owel belongs to Portloman. A monastery formerly stood on the shore of the lake. The only seat is Portloman-house.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £85. The rectories of Portloman and Portshangan [see that article], constitute the benefice of Portloman. Length, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$. Pop., in 1831, 880. Gross income, £193 1s. 14d.; nett, £150 3s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is in Portshangan. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 421; the Protestants of the union, including 9 Presbyterians, to 75, and the Roman Catholics to 833; a daily school in the parish was salaried with £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, £21 from Mr. Gibbons, £4 from Mrs. Gibbons, and £5 and other advantages from Lord Forbes, and had on its books 35 boys and 23 girls; and there was also a daily school in Portshangan.

PORTLICK, a demesne and a bay, on the east side of Lough Ree, parish of Bunown, barony of Kilkenny-West, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The demesne of Portlick-castle, and the district immediately around it, constitute one of the most beautiful pieces of landscape within the whole sweep of Lough Ree.

PORT-LORGAN, a small fishing-harbour in the parish of Cloncha, and vicinity of Malin-Head, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is a mere beach harbour, and not in a good condition.

PORTMAGEE, a fishing village and small harbour in the parish of Killemlagh, barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. The village stands on the south side of the south end of Valentia Harbour, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Bray Head, and $\frac{6}{8}$ south-west of Cahirciveen; and the harbour is a cove or creek of Valentia sound immediately adjacent to the village. Pop. not specially returned.

PORTMARNOCK, a parish on the coast of the barony of Coolock, 2 miles south-south-east of Malahide, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, south by eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,084 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches,—of which 16 acres, 1 rood, 13 perches lie detached. Pop., in 1831, 482; in 1841, 631. Houses 89. Excepting the townland called the Borough, which comprises about one-fourth of the whole area, and is of an inferior quality, the parochial surface consists of excellent land, worth from £4 to £6 per acre per annum. The Portmarnock estuary commences at the village of Baldoyle, in the adjoining parish of Baldoyle, and penetrates the land $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by westward, with a main breadth of less than half-a-mile; but it is nearly all dry at low-water. A low sandy peninsula extends southward between the estuary and the sea, and terminates in Portmarnock Point, 33 feet in altitude above sea-level, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile west by south of the island of Ireland's Eye. The seats within the parish are Portmarnock-house, Hazelbrook, Carrickhill, Beechwood-house, Briar-hall, Broomfield-house, Broomfield-cottage, and Seamount. The manor of Portmarnock belonged, at an early period, to the abbey of the Virgin Mary in Dublin; and it was formally confirmed to the superior of that establishment by Henry II. and King John. The small and gloomy castle of Rob's-Wall or Roebuck's-Wall, stands on a rock close to the shore, and was built toward the close of the 15th century, or early in the 16th century, by MacRoebuck, the head of a sept of De Birmingham, descended from a famous chieftain of the name of Roebuck De Birmingham. The interior of the parish is traversed by the Dublin and Drogheda railway.—Portmarnock is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £75; glebe, £27. Gross income, £122; nett, £100 5s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £23 1s. 7d.; and are impropriate in Mr. Robert Hudson. The church was built in 1788, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 60; attendance 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 83, and the Roman Catholics to 362; and a daily school was supported by subscriptions and public collections, and was usually attended by about 12 children.

PORTMORE, or BEO (LOVON), a lake in the parishes of Glenavoy and Ballinderry, barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. It lies half-a-mile south and east of the nearest parts of Lough Neagh, $\frac{1}{4}$ north-west of the village of Ballinderry, and $\frac{2}{4}$ south-west of the village of Glenavoy. It is nearly circular in outline; and covers an area of 283 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches within the parish of Ballinderry, and 342 acres, 2 roods, 6 perches within the parish of Glenavoy. It is stored with pike, bream, trout, perch, roach, and eels, and is frequented by a variety of wild fowl. About the year 1740, Arthur Dobbs, Esq., author of a pamphlet on the Trade of Ireland, then agent to Lord Conway, and afterwards Governor of North Carolina, drained or rather emptied the lake by means of a windmill and buckets; but the water returning either through springs or by a subterraneous communication with Lough Neagh, he was compelled to abandon his attempt to convert its bed into arable land. On the flat shores of the lake are the prostrate ruins of Portmore-castle, erected in 1664, by Lord Conway; and either within the walls of this castle, or on a sequestered spot in the lake called Sally Island, the learned and pious Jeremy Taylor, chaplain to Charles I., and bishop of Dromore, and of Down and Connor, found a retreat during the protectorate of Cromwell, and composed some of his celebrated and justly admired works. The preface of the 'Ductor Dubitantium,' in particular, is dated from his study in Portmore, in Killultagh, on the banks of Lough Beg.

PORTMORE, a small fishery harbour in the parish of Cloncha, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated near Malin Head, the northern extremity of Ireland; and was formed, a few years ago, by excavations among rocks, in a stretch of wild, bold, craggy shore. It gives a landing-place, and affords shelter to boats, in one of the most inhospitable districts of the whole periphery of the Irish coast,—a district in which, previous to the formation of Portmore Harbour, frequent accidents occurred, and many lives were lost in even moderate weather.

PORTMUCK, a small harbour in the parish of Island-Magee, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is situated under cover of the little island of Muck, $\frac{2}{4}$ miles east-south-east of the entrance to Lough Larne, $\frac{4}{8}$ north by west of Black-Head, and $\frac{5}{8}$ south of the Maidens. A pier was built here by means of a grant of £295 from government, and a donation of £136 from Mr. MacClelland; but it was badly constructed, and, a few years ago, it greatly needed repair. The pier is much used for the purposes of the adjacent fishery, as a place of shelter to small sailing-craft, and particularly as a rival shipment place to Lough Larne of great quantities of Antrim chalk, popularly misnamed limestone, for Scotland and various parts of the Irish coast. Official evidence given in 1835, says respecting this harbour, "It is dry when the tide ebbs, and of little use as a place of shelter, even for small craft, when the wind blows from north-west to north-north-east. During gales from the north-north-east, last winter, the sea washed away a great portion of this pier, about the centre, leaving a very considerable breach."

PORTNABLAS, a cove in the parish of Clonduborky, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated within a mile of Dunfanaghy harbour, possesses good natural shelter, and is the place in which the coast-guard of Dunfanaghy keep their boats, and to which the fishermen resort when they cannot pass Dunfanaghy bar. It might, at a small expense, be made entirely safe, and would be a protection to life and property.

PORTNACROSS, a small fishing-harbour, in the parish of Glencolumbkille, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated near Teilen Head, between the creek of West-Teilen and that of Trybane-Muckras. It contains a landing-place, and has a depth of 10 feet at high-water, but is dry at low-water.

PORTNAHALLA. See BALLYCASTLE, co. Mayo.

PORTNAHINCH. See PORTNEHINCH.

PORTNASCULLY. See PORTNECULLY.

PORTNASHANGAN. See PORTSHANGAN.

PORTNASON, a village in the parish of Innismacaint, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated between Ballyshannon and Bundoran, and is a poor and neglected place. At one end of it is a handsome house, which belonged to the late Mr. Allingham. Pop. not specially returned.

PORT-NA-SPAGNA, or PORT-NA-SPANIA, a small bay, a little east of the Giant's Causeway, parish of Billy, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. Its screes are part of the wondrous basaltic formation of the north coast of the county; and in one part they exhibit a whin-dyke, which emerges in the rubble at the foot of the facade. The bay derives its name from a traditionary story that some of the ships of the famous Spanish Armada, in the reign of Elizabeth, were cast upon the base of the cliff immediately to the west; and the story adds that the ships were brought into danger by mistaking a few shattered columns, called the Chimney-Tops, on the summit of the cliff, for the chimneys of an old castle, and approaching within cannon-range to fall upon the supposed fortalice.

PORT-NA-TRUIN, a small bay between Benbane and Bengore Heads, parish of Billy, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is one of the series of small marine indentations upon the most magnificent portion of the basaltic coast of the county; and its name—which, in Irish, means the bay of lamentation—seems to have been suggested by the circumstance that sounds resembling those of human lamentation, and caused by the action of the tidal current upon confined air, are sometimes heard to issue from the cavities among its rocks.

PORTNATU, a landing-place, in the parish of Ballywillin, barony of Lower Dunluce, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is situated on the east side of Ramore peninsula, in the vicinity of Portrush. During the season of lobster-fishing in summer, it is very convenient for the fishermen, and saves them the trouble of pulling round the dangerous point of Ramore to Portrush; and, were it excavated and put into a proper condition, it might be of great and permanent value to the general fisheries of the district.

PORTNEAN, a landing-place in the vicinity of Portnatu, parish of Ballywillin, barony of Lower Dunluce, co. Antrim, Ulster.

PORTNEHINCH, a barony in the north-east of Queen's county, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by King's co.; on the north-east and east, by co. Kildare; on the south, by the baronies of Stradbally and East Maryborough; and on the west, by the barony of Tinnehinch. Length, east by southward, 10 miles; extreme breadth, 6½; area, 35,835 acres, 1 rood, 17 perches,—of which 48 acres, 3 roods, 12 perches are in Lough Emo and the river Barrow. The surface is preëminently flat and naturally tame; but it possesses a large aggregate of wood, and has been worked by cultivation into a comparatively improved condition. The soil is generally light, and requires powerful stimulating in order to its being tolerably productive. Though a few resident proprietors and gentlemen-farmers practise an improved system of husbandry, and a wise rotation of crops; yet the great body of the farmers are profoundly ignorant of the most modern agricultural improvements, and usually grow oats after wheat or barley,—and even many who lay the land down to grass for two or three years do so with the oats crop after wheat, instead of making the grass intervene between the two corn crops. Turnips are grown only by a very few resident proprietors and gentlemen-farmers. A very large aggregate extent of surface, consisting not only of bog, but of moorish and spouty grounds, and of lands subject to inundations from rivers, brooks, and canals, as well as from temporary collections of surface rain-water, is of little or no value in consequence of the want of draining, and of clearing, deepening, and extending the ditches and other water-courses. "In no country," says an official report of the year 1836, "is the want of the knowledge and practice of cultivating root and green crops more striking than in this barony. Here the majority of labourers have from half an acre to two or three acres of land, and yet they and even also many occupiers of four or five acres of ground, put their cow or cows out to grass in summer with a neighbouring farmer, and frequently at straw-yard during the winter, instead of feeding them at home, on clover, vetches, lucern, cabbages, &c., during summer, and on turnips, mangel-wurzel, cabbages, and other winter food during that season; thus, not only incurring that unnecessary expense, but still more losing the manure, and thereby condemning their ground to its present state of comparative sterility, bearing only beggarly crops of potatoes and oats, that will hardly pay for seed and labour, instead of yielding the abundant produce which the industry of a man, his wife, and probably five or six children, would draw from it under a proper system. It is lamentable to see these poor people struggling on, as they aptly say of themselves, frequently without the necessities of life, while with their little land and the employment they get, they and their families might live in comfort and decency by the mere adoption of a better system, and with a very little assistance, in many cases amounting only to instruction and example from their landlords or employers."—This barony contains the parishes of Ardea, Coolhamgher, and Lea. The towns are part of Portarlington, and part of Mountmellick; and the chief villages are Irishtown and Ballybrittas. Pop., in 1831, 15,392; in 1841, 15,365. Houses 2,523. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,808; in manufactures and trade, 630; in other pursuits, 288. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 105; on the directing of labour, 1,031; on their own manual labour, 1,511; on means not specified, 79. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,067; who could read but not write, 1,363; who could neither read nor write, 2,233. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,211; who could read but not write, 2,213; who could neither read nor write, 2,546. Portneinch lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Mountmellick. The total number of tenements valued, exclusive of part of the borough of Portarlinton, was 1,842; and of these, 1,152 were valued under £5.—344, under £10.—132, under £15.—62, under £20.—39, under £25.—20, under £30.—19, under £40.—19, under £50.—and 55, at and above £50.

PORTNEINCH-BRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Ardes, barony of Portneinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the river Barrow, and takes its name from a bridge over that stream, 3 miles west-south-west of Portarlinton. Pop. not specially returned.

PORTNESCULLY, a parish in the barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It lies upon the river Suir, 5½ miles west by north of the city of Waterford. Length, south-eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,452 acres, 3 roods, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,084; in 1841, 1,121. Houses 164. It contains the villages of BALLYGOREY, and LICKETSTOWN [which see]; and the hamlets of Portnescully, Moonveen, Corluddy, and Luffany. Pop., in 1841, exclusive of Ballygorey, and Licketstown, 708. Houses 115. The surface is low and prevalently level; and consists of excellent land. The chief artificial objects of any interest are the ruins of Portnescully church and Corluddy-castle.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of POLKNOKE [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £75, and the rectorial for £125; and the latter are impropriate in the corporation of the city of Waterford. The Roman Catholic chapel at Carrigeen has an attendance of 1,456; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Moonhoin in Rathkieran, and Killinaspig in Tubrid. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 400 scholars; and two pay daily schools had on their books 300 boys but no girls.

PORTNESHANGAN. See PORTSHANAGAN.

PORT-NOFFER, a small bay overhung by grandly basaltic cliffs; between the Giant's Causeway and Port-na-Spugna, parish of Billy, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. Within the bay stands an insulated basaltic mass called the Lion Rock; and in the rocky cliffs which form its screens are three extraordinary wind-dykes; one of which is called the Revivally Dyke, and, as seen from the sea, appears like a wall running through the front of the cliff.

PORT-NOO, a small fishing harbour in the parish of Templecorone, between Imilised and the Goffara river, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. A pier was erected here by means of a grant of £530 from government, and a donation of £250 from F. Mansfield, Esq.; and an official report in 1836 says, "This pier has proved of much protection to the boats frequenting it, as, previous to its erection, none could approach the shore with safety. With strong gales however from the south-west, it is unsafe. Large quantities of sea-mauure are landed here, and it is likely to be soon used as a place of shipment for corn. At spring tides, vessels drawing 12 feet of water can lie alongside."

PORT-NORRIS. See MOUNT-NORRIS.

PORTOBELLO, a village in the parish of St. Peter, barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It is strictly suburban to Dublin, contains a barrack and the passenger basin of the Grand Canal, and stands 1 mile south by west of Dublin-castle. See DUBLIN. Area, 55 acres. Pop., in 1841, 287. Houses 34.

PORTRANE, or PORTRAHAN, a parish on the coast of the barony of Nethercross, 4½ miles north-east, by east of Swords, co. Dublin, Leinster. It includes the island of LAMBAY, and contains part of the village of DONABATE; see these articles. Length of the mainland district, eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the whole parish, 2,185 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches,—of which 395 acres, 3 roods are in Lambay island. Pop., in 1831, 731; in 1841, 780. Houses 127. Pop. exclusive of the portion of Donabate, in 1841, 739. Houses 121. The surface of the mainland district is low, and consists of naturally bad land, part of which, however, has been worked by art into a condition of great fertility. Portrane estuary separates it from the parish of Lusk on the north, and penetrates the land to the extent of 2½ miles, with an extreme breadth of 1½ mile; but it is nearly all dry at low water, and, in common with the parish itself, it is crossed by the Dublin and Drogheda railway. On the east coast are a martello-tower and two coast-guard stations. In the west is the hamlet of Balfak. In the south is part of the demesne of PORTRANE; see next article.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and part of the benefice of DONABATE [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The tithes belonging to the incumbent are compounded for £30, and the rectorial tithes for £107, 3s. 9d.; and the latter are impropriate in Miss Mary Misset. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 718; and 2 daily schools—one of which was supported chiefly by Mr. Evans of Portrane—had on their books 61 boys and 69 girls.

PORTRANE, the sumptuous demesne of George H. Evans, Esq., in the parishes of Portrane and Donabate, barony of Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. The mansion stands within the parish of Donabate, and 1½ mile east of Donabate village. It is a spacious building composed of brick, and is situated near the centre of a fine park, well stocked with deer, and occupies a bold position favourable to extensive views. The character of the surrounding scenery admits of an unusual extent of prospect, and presents a happy variety of objects. Nearly the whole of Fingall lies spread in one vast picture. The sea-vues are relieved and enlivened by the islands of Lambay and Inelund's Eye. The bold promontory of Howth mingles finely with the retirement of the foreground; and in the distance, the Wicklow mountains bound the powers of the vision with a romantic and enchanting outline. This attractive demesne comprises some of the best land in the county of Dublin, and the large plantations thrive with a degree of vigour; not usual to situations so much exposed to the keen winds which sweep over the sea. The manor of Portrane belonged, at an early period, to the religious institution of the Holy Trinity, Dublin. In the year 1204, Patrick, the sub-prior of that monastery, exchanged with Archbishop Comin all the rights possessed by the prior and canons of Christ-church in the town of Portrachern (Portrane), and in the island of Lambay, for certain other property; and, as it would appear, the manor was then obtained by the abbess of Gracedieu, a nunnery contiguous to Portrane, with whose successors it remained until the suppression of religious houses. In the year 1586, Sir John Barnewall, third baron of Trimlestown, was constituted seneschal, and receiver of a moiety of this among other manors; and a considerable property then acquired by him in this neighbourhood, is still in the possession of the Trimlestown family. Sir Patrick Barnewall, ancestor of Viscount Kingsland, likewise obtained a considerable grant of lands in Portrane, on the dissolution of monasteries. That branch of the family of Evans which at present possesses the mansion, derives from Eyre Evans, Esq., M.P. for the county of Limerick, who settled at Portrane in the early part of the eighteenth century. Portrane-castle consists of a square tower, of moderate dimensions, long since deserted by its proprietors, but not reduced to a state of utter ruin. At the date of the suppression of monasteries, the prioresse of Gracedieu was possessed of this castle, together with much contiguous property. The building, among other possessions of the same religious house, passed, in the year 1541, to Sir Patrick Barnewall; but the family of Cusack of Rathaldren, appears to have had some share in the grants then obtained by Sir Patrick, for, during the several ages in which the Barnewall family occasionally resided at Gracedieu, we find the Cusacks to occur as inhabitants of Portrane-castle, and have many notices of their intermarriages with the Plunkets, Luttrells, and other families of great local influence. In the first named of these families (the Plunkets), the estate at length became vested, but was forfeited by them, as we believe, in the civil war of 1641. The ruins of the convent of Gracedieu present an interesting feature in the scenery of Portrane. This convent was indebted for its foundation to Archbishop Comin, who removed hither from Lusk, in the year 1190, the nunnery of the order of Arrosia, established at a very early period in that town. The nunnery was dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and, at the time of the dissolution, the prioresse was seized of considerable property in the vicinity, including the manorial rights of Portrane. The buildings then passed into the possession of Sir Patrick Barnewall, of Fieldstown, ancestor of Viscount Kingsland, but have since progressively sunk into decay." [Brewer's Ireland.]

PORTROE, a village in the parish of Castle-townarra, barony of Owney and Arra, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the east road from Portumna to Killaloe, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south and east of the nearest parts of Lough Derg, $1\frac{1}{2}$ north of the celebrated slate-quarries, and 6 west by north of Nenagh. Within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of it are the seats of Shannonville, Youghal-house, Garrykenedy-house, Castle-Lough, Landstown-house, Cloneybrian-house, Kyleban-house, and Mouroe. Fairs are held on Feb. 26, March 22, May 14, June 19, July 4, Nov. 11, and Dec. 20. A dispensary in the village is within the Nenagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 17,377; and, in 1839-40, it expended £92 8s. and administered to 4,327 patients. The village has a Roman Catholic chapel. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 447. Houses 74. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 39; in manufactures and trade, 38; in other pursuits, 9; Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 47; on their own manual labour, 32; on means not specified, 5.

PORTRUSH, a small sea-port town in the parish of Ballywillin, barony of Lower Dunluce, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands at the north-western extremity of the county, 3 miles east-north-east of Port-Stewart, $4\frac{1}{2}$ north of Coleraine. 5 west by north of Bushmills, and $50\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by north of Belfast. Its site is the extremity of a narrow rocky peninsula, which projects $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile beyond the adjacent coastline to the vicinity of the rocky islets called the Skerries, and which was the well known subject of several interesting philosophical discussions, during the latter part of last century, upon basaltic formations. The headland which terminates the peninsula, and the delightful promenade on the rocks immediately adjacent to the town, command extensive and superb views of Magilligan-Point and Imishowen Head on the west, and of the headlands around the Giant's Causeway and the wondrous cliffs of the coast of the barony of Carey on the east. The situation of the town is singularly airy and romantic; and the small cove which constitutes the harbour is protected by a great natural mole of basaltic rock. The harbour has been provided with piers, and artificially enlarged; it affords accommodation to vessels of the largest class to load and discharge; it gives protection under cover of its piers in 20 feet of water at the lowest ebb of spring tides; it is the nearest Irish port to Glasgow and Greenock, and is regularly frequented by the steam-vessels which ply between the north coast of Ulster and the Clyde and the Mersey; and it belongs to a company of merchants in Coleraine, and may be considered as, in every practical sense, that town's outpost. The bay of Portrush affords good shelter from westerly gales; a safe anchorage is also found off the Skerries, about 3 miles distant, to which coasting-vessels and steamers often resort when overtaken by fog or contrary winds. The harbour is formed by two moles, projected from high water line, one 800, the other 650 feet in length, with an entrance between their extremities 200 feet in width. These piers enclose a sheet of water measuring nearly 8 imperial acres. The depth between the pier-heads varies from 13 feet at the southern to 20 feet at the northern pier at low water of spring-tides. [Report by Messrs. Stevenson and Sons, Dec. 1844.] The returns of exports and imports of Portrush are mixed up with those of the exports and imports of Coleraine. A line of railroad has been projected between this port and Armagh, passing through or near the towns of Blackwater, Charlemont, Coal Island, Dungannon, Stewartstown, Coagh, Cookstown, Monemore, Bellaghy, Desertmartin, Toome, Magherafelt, Portlengone, Maghera, Dungleven, Swateragh, Kilrea, Ballymoney, Coleraine, and Portstewart. This line, by means of the Ulster, will connect the several towns on the line with the important ones of Belfast, Lurgan, Lisburn, and Portadown, and, by a junction with the proposed Newry, Armagh, and Enniskillen line, with the north-east and north-west of Ireland; and, by means of the Belfast junction, will form a direct route to the Irish metropolis. The proposed terminus at Portrush is within 6 miles of the Giant's Causeway, and from Portrush to that place the scenery along the coast is of the most magnificent and interesting description. The town has a clean and inviting appearance, and is now favourably known as an agreeable summer resort for sea-bathers. A church was recently built here, by means of contributions of £166 6s. 7d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £1,733 13s. 5d. from private sources. Dr. Richardson, while Dr. Davy was on a visit to him, first observed, in the meadows of Portrush, the stolones of the agrostis stolonifera, or forin grass, which soon afterwards became an object of such engrossing agricultural attention. "Dr. R. has told me," says the Rev. Mr. Dubourdieu, "that he showed to Dr. Davy the young stolones rising without panicles such as the stalks of all other grasses have. To ascertain what this unusual appearance led to, it was agreed between the two gentlemen to leave parts of the meadows uncut, and watch the result, which was, that these headless stalks continued steadily increasing their length, and, of course, adding prodigiously to the crop." Area of the town, 44 acres. Pop., in 1831, 387; in 1841, 630. Houses 101. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 9; in manufactures and trade, 53; in other pursuits, 50. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 22; on the directing of labour, 40; on their own manual labour, 44; on means not specified, 12.

PORTSALLAGH, a small fishing harbour in the parish of Lower Moville, about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile south of Innishowen Head, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It might be made very useful as a safety port.

PORTSHANGAN, or PORTNESHANGAN, a parish in the barony of Corkaree, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, west-north-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,635 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches,—of which 904 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches are in Lough Owbel, 7 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches are in Lough Iron, and 29 acres, 16 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 463; in 1841, 546. Houses 92. The surface extends from the vicinity of Knockdrin-castle, across the northern part of Lough Owbel, to the head of Lough Iron; and consists, in a general view, of middle-rate land. The remains of the old demesne of Portshangan are upon the shores of Lough Owbel. Ballinagall, the beautiful and well-wooded demesne of James Gibbons, Esq., occupies a large portion of the south-eastern district, and is presided over by a handsome Grecian mansion. Mount-Murray, the seat of Mr. Murray, stands between Lough Owbel and Lough Iron. The only other noticeable seat is Woodland. An old abbey seems to have stood in the district east of Lough Owbel. The road from Mullingar to Multifarnham passes through the interior. In 1841, the Portshangan Loan Fund had a capital of £420, circulated £1,927 in 415 loans, realized a nett profit of £7 15s. 6d., and expended for charitable purposes £19 12s. 3d.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of PORTLOMAN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £92 6s. 12d.; glebe, £15 15s. The church was built in 1824, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, a donation of £276 18s. 3½d. from Sir Richard Levinge, and a donation of £1,892 6s. 2d. from James Gibbons, Esq. of Ballinagall. Sittings 150; attendance, from 80 to 90. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 54 Churchmen, 9 Presbyterians, and 412 Roman Catholics; and a hedge-school at Ballard had on its books 15 boys and 8 girls.

PORT-STEWART, a small town on the coast of the parish of Agherton, Liberties of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands 2 miles east-north-east of the mouth of the Bann, 3 west-south-west of Portrush, 4½ north-north-west of Coleraine, and 50½ north-west by north of Belfast. It is a cheerful little town, upon a very pleasant site; it commands good views of the coast from the mouth of the Bann to Innishowen Head; it contains a small inn and lodging-houses for the accommodation of visitors; and it has become a favourite, and certainly is a very eligible summer resort of sea-bathers. A church, to serve for the parish of Agherton, was recently built in Port-Stewart, at the cost of the Protestant parishioners. Handsome private houses have been erected in the town by John Cromie and Henry O'Hara, Esqrs., its principal proprietors; and Stramore, the demesne of Mr. Cromie, the chief proprietor of the parish, is situated about a mile to the south-east. The Agherton, Ballyaghan, or Port-Stewart dispensary, is within the Poor-law union of Coleraine, and serves for a district of 3,896 acres, with a pop. of 2,746; and, in 1839-40, it expended £78 14s. 4d., and administered to 233 patients. A fair is held on the first Monday of August. Dr. Adam Clarke, the commentator on the Scriptures, and well-known Methodist preacher, was born in the vicinity. Area of the town, 40 acres. Pop., in 1831, 475; in 1841, 603. Houses 100. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 8; in manufactures and trade, 48; in other pursuits, 57. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 24; on the directing of labour, 31; on their own manual labour, 49; on means not specified, 9.

PORT-ST.-MARNOCK. See PORTMARNOCK.

PORT-TERLIN, a small fishing harbour on the north coast of the parish of Kilcommon, between Balderig and Portacloy, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It has a few yawls; but it lies too open to be made a tolerable harbour, except by cutting a canal or passage through the beach.

PORTUMNA, a post and market town in the parish of Lickmolassy, barony of Longford, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the eastern verge of the province, and on the road from Birr to Galway, about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from the river Shannon, immediately above the head or commencement of Lough Derg, 7 miles south-south-west of Eyrecourt, 9 east-north-east of Woodford, 11 west of Birr, 14½ east-south-east of Loughrea, 21 north-east by north of Scariff, and 73½ west-south-west of Dublin. A wooden bridge, 820 feet long, including the causeway, brings the thoroughfare from Birr and Dublin across the Shannon. The town was not long ago a mere assemblage of long lines of cabins; but it has of late years been greatly improved, partly by the liberality of its noble proprietor, the Marquis of Clanricarde, and partly in consequence of the steam navigation from Athlone to Killaloe. The parish-church stands at the south end of the town, and is a beautiful structure, with stone-sashed windows in the perpendicular style, and a lofty spire. The Roman Catholic chapel is a modern, spacious, and well-built fabric. The Marquis of Clanricarde's demesne of Portumna-castle adorns all the southern environs of the town, and extends along the head of Lough Derg. The castle was burned by accident in 1826; it was very grand, and highly interesting; its staircase, its great hall, and its state drawing-room, were very handsome; its library-room was a long apartment in the highest story; several of its rooms acquired an impressive and a venerable air from the presence of old family portraits, and a large quantity of ancient furniture; and its leads commanded a brilliant and a very extensive prospect of Lough Derg, the Shannon, and the circumjacent country. In the vicinity of the castle and about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south of the town, stand extensive and beautiful ruins of a Dominican friary. "From being closely surrounded with fine full grown timber, no part of the ruins appear, till of a sudden the eastern window discloses itself to the view. The next object to draw the attention after entering the churchyard, is another beautiful window, which is more florid but less majestic in appearance than the one first seen. Its rich tracery being partly covered with ivy, renders the interior view far superior to the one taken from the outside. It is in the south transept. The friary, which is cruciform, and in the Gothic style, is still in pretty good repair, the walls being nearly all to their original height, except the tower or steeple, which was sprung on four elegant pointed arches, whereof three still remain. One of the two which connected the nave and chancel has been totally taken down, and the other, which is of elegant cut stone, is built up, so as that if a view of it was given, the beautiful window should be left out of the picture. The entrance is in the west end, and by a small doorway, over which is a pointed arched window, and from which to the farthest end, of the choir or chancel measures above 100 feet. The choir is 21 feet wide, and the side walls about 16 feet in height, and served for the parish-church, till a new one being erected, which does much credit to its architects, it was forsaken and unroofed. The baptistery is built against the north wall of the friary, and was entered by a small door from the choir, which is now built up." A ruin which adjoins the north transept is supposed by some antiquaries to be the church of a Cistercian abbey which stood on the spot before the erection of the Dominican friary. "Portumna," says an intelligent writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, "must have been a place of no small note from a very distant period of time, as being the principal pass whereby the people of North Munster and they of Connaught had communication with each other. Portumna, viewed either in a civil or ecclesiastical point of view, will be found to compete with most of our baronial towns, especially in the former; for the members of the illustrious house of Clanricarde took such an active part in the affairs of government, respecting this and the sister kingdom, that to give but a hasty sketch of those momentous transactions, would swell this notice far beyond its proper limits. Notwithstanding the silence of history as to Portumna's being an ecclesiastical station, previous to the arrival of the English, it is probable that some religious order had settled in a place where there was a town for many centuries before Ireland became subject to the control of the sister kingdom. Had it not been situated on a noted pass of the Shannon, I should not hesitate to say it was an ecclesiastical station long before the landing of the English; for most of our ancient towns sprung up around religious establishments. I made the above remark, because some writers seem as if the first religious house erected at Portumna was in the fifteenth century, for Dominican friars; whereas the Cistercian monks of Dunbrody (a monastery founded in 1182) had a chapel here dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, which depended on their monastery in the county of Wexford. At what time Portumna was forsaken by the Cistercians is unknown; but it is very probable that it was given up but a short time when the Dominican friars took possession of it, with the consent of the Cistercians of Dunbrody, and O'Madden the dynast of the place. After having their possessions confirmed by a bull of the Pope which bore date 8th of Oct., 1426, the Dominicans erected a friary and church, which they dedicated to the Virgin and the original patron saints. Pope Martin V., a short time after granting the above-mentioned bull, gave indulgences to all those who had contributed to its erection." Previous to the time of Elizabeth, the family of De Burgh, ancestors of the Marquis of Clanricarde, often derided the authority and defied the power of the Crown; but during Elizabeth's reign, as well as at all subsequent periods, they were distinguished for their steady and zealous loyalty; and Portumna, in connection with both their early rebelliousness and their later patriotism, was a busy scene of strife, and an important military post in civil war. Sir William De Burgh, in guerdon of repelling an invasion, which was led on by one of the house of Desmond, received a title and much approbation from Elizabeth; and the first Marquis of Clanricarde, though remaining firmly connected with the Roman Catholics, was distinguished for singular loyalty and other excellences during the trying and tempestuous vicissitudes of the Carolist and Cromwellian periods. "Lord Clanricarde," remarks Mr. Trotter, "made every effort a good subject could and ought, in the reign of Charles I., to assist the sovereign, and to restrain violence in Ireland; but the despotism of Charles was too inveterate to allow itself to be assisted; and the turbulent passions of the Irish, inflamed by the furious and bigoted Rinuccini, were too high to permit this excellent nobleman to have his just weight among them. The Marquis of Clanricarde, however, never swerved from the best-principled conduct; never submitted, as Ormonde did, to the parliament and fanatic leaders, and, untainted by the prejudice against Catholics, which narrowed Lord Ormonde's mind, he laboured strongly to save them from the effects of their own imprudence; and to secure to them, in good time, advantageous terms. Lord Clanricarde refused a high command from the confederate Catholics, when they first concentrated their power in Charles the First's reign, because he would not stoop to be the instrument of their passions. He was their friend, but disinclined to be the tool and foothold of their party. He finally accepted the office of Lord-deputy; and though disapproving of the monarch's conduct in many things, he endeavoured to the last to struggle for the English crown, and to hold Connaught in obedience to it. For these services, I believe, he never experienced any royal gratitude, or at least, was only suffered by Charles the Second, who received every service, and rewarded none, to live at Portumna-castle in dignified retirement." The first of the De Burghs who settled in Ireland, was Adelin, uncle of Hubert De Burgh, Earl of Kent, in the reigns of John and Henry III., and one of the greatest subjects in Europe. Richard De Burgh, the descendant of Adelin, was Lord of Connaught, and, dying in 1243, left two sons,—Walter, Earl of Ulster,—and William, ancestor of the Marquis of Clanricarde. In 1543, Ulick De Burgh was created Earl of Clanricarde; and in 1644, Ulick the fifth Earl, was advanced to the dignity of Marquis of Clanricarde. At the latter's death in 1697, the Marquisate became extinct, and the earldom was inherited by his cousin-german, Richard De Burgh. In 1785, the marquisate was restored in the person of Henry, the 14th Earl; but at his death in 1797, it again became extinct, and the earldom devolved upon the marquis's brother John. In 1825, Ulick, the 14th Earl, was created the third Marquis of Clanricarde, in the peerage of Ireland; and next year he was made Baron of Souerhill in the peerage of the United Kingdom. Portumna enjoys a good retail trade, and is a place of considerable export trade to Dublin. Fairs are held on Feb. 15, May 6, July 1, Aug. 15, Oct. 17, and Nov. 15. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Monday. A dispensary in the town is within the Loughrea Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 52,709 acres, with a pop. of 34,004; and, in 1840-41, it expended £111 10s. 6d., and administered to 1,252 patients. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Clonfert takes name from Portumna, and has chapels here and at Licmolash. Area of the town, 52 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,122; in 1841, 1,643. Houses 228. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 136; in manufactures and trade, 115; in other pursuits, 70. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 119; on their own manual labour, 164; on means not specified, 21.

POTTERCHA, a village, in the parish of Kilsyre, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 124. Houses 22.

POULACULLA, a romantic glen, 4 miles south-south-east of Innistigue, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. "It is approached," says Mr. Brewer, "by a narrow creek, proceeding from the Nora, at the extremity of which a cascade of great beauty rolls in mournful tones over the rugged fragments of rocks, and descends a craggy precipice above 50 feet in height. From the fissures of numberless cliffs which hang over the boatman's head, as he plies the oar below, shoot forth venerable trees, ameliorating and diversifying the character of this pensive glen."

POWER'S-COUNTRY. a quondam territorial division of the county of Waterford, Munster. It comprehended most of the barony of Upperthird, and part of the baronies of Middlethird and Decies-without-Drum; and it had its name from the family of Power or Le Poer, the ancestors of the Marquis of Waterford.

POWSCOURT, or STAGONIL, a parish in the barony of Rathdown, 3 miles west-south-west of Bray, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the village of ENNISKERRY: which see. Length, west-south-westward, 7½ miles; extreme breadth, 5½; area, 18,938 acres, 37 perches,—of which 64 acres, 3 roods are in Lower Lough Bray, and 28 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches are in Upper Lough Bray. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 4,538, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 4,368;* in 1841, 3,070. Houses 434. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,041; in 1841, 2,622. Houses 368. Four-fifths of the surface are lofty, and, for the most part, wildly mountainous; but the remaining fifth, which is identical chiefly with the low grounds of the demesne of Powerscourt, and with the immediate environs of the village of Enniskerry, is averagely low, greatly diversified, powerfully scenic, and most sumptuously ornate. The land varies in quality from poor pastoral moorland, to very fertile arable ground, and, in annual value, from 10s. to £6 per acre. Some of the most interesting localities and objects will be found noticed in the articles POWSCOURT (DEMENSE OF), DARGLE, BRAY, ENNISKERRY, GLENREE, CHARLEVILLE, TINNEHINCH, SCALP, DJOUCE, KIPPURE, and MILITARY-ROAD: which see. Prince William's-Seat mountain, on the northern boundary, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,825 feet; Kippure, on the western boundary, has an altitude of 2,473; War-hill and DjoUCE mountain, on the southern boundary, have altitudes of 2,250 and 2,344 feet; and the congeries of mountains in the western and central districts have such lofty average altitudes as to lift the two lakes of Bray to surface-elevations above sea-level of 1,225 and 1,453 feet, and to give origin to the rivers Annamoe and Liffey at elevations of respectively 1,770 and 1,256 feet. The principal draining streams of the interior are the three head-waters of the Bray,—the Cookstown rivulet in the north-east, the Glenree rivulet in the centre, and the Dargle rivulet in the south. The Military-Road traverses the western district southward; and the road from Dublin to Rathdrum comes in from Co. Dublin through the Scalp, and passes through the village of Enniskerry. The principal rural residences, additional to the noble one of Powerscourt, are Harmony-cottage, Dargle-cottage, Kileroney-cottage, Upper Cookstown, Lower Cookstown, Seaview, Grove-hill, Monastery-house, Killygar-house, Valclusa, Bahana, Lough Bray-cottage, and Tinneluch-house,—the last the seat of James Grattan, Esq. The principal hamlets are Ballybrew, Buryfield, Glenree, and Crone.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £309 4s. 7d.; glebe, £14 14s. Gross income, £387 18s. 7½d.; nett, £337 19s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the sinecure prebend of Christ-church in the cathedral of Cork. A curate receives a salary of £100. The church was enlarged in 1822, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 600; attendance, from 550 to 650. A school-house is also used as a parochial place of worship during winter. A Roman Catholic chapel, and a barn used as a Roman Catholic chapel, have an attendance of respectively from 300 to 400, and from 200 to 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapels of Bray and Delganv. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,656 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, 4 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,834 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools at Charlemont and Powerscourt-Gate were usually attended by about 185 children; and 8 daily schools—2 of which were supported chiefly by the rector, two chiefly by Lord Powerscourt, one almost entirely by Lady Powerscourt, one wholly by Lady Powerscourt, and one almost entirely by Lady Rathdown—had on their books 208 boys and 237 girls.

POWSCOURT, the beautiful, romantic, and gorgeous demesne of Viscount Powerscourt, in the eastern district of the parish of Powerscourt, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It comprises about 700 acres immediately around the mansion, about 500 in the glen of the Powerscourt waterfall, and about 200 on the north side of the Dargle; it contains a very large proportion of the most interesting scenes and objects within the vast and justly celebrated natural picture-gallery of the county of Wicklow; it forms the topic of about one-fifteenth of the entire letter-press of Curry and Company's ably, judiciously, and symmetrically written "Guide to the County of Wicklow;" and it has been summarily described as so wondrously combining hill and dale, wood and water, and so brilliantly exhibiting the most exquisite beauty in a frame-work of sublime and seemingly inaccessible mountains as to realize the picture of "the happy valley." We cannot, therefore, be expected to do it full justice within the necessarily small limits which we must allot to it; and will easily be excused for availing ourselves of the succinct yet accurate views of it given by Mr. Brewer:—"The mansion of Powerscourt is a spacious structure, composed of granite, and was erected late in the 18th century, after the designs of Mr. Cassels. The style of architecture is not conspicuous for purity or beauty, and it is much to be regretted that one of the finest situations in Europe should not have been occupied by a fabric evincing correspondent grandeur of conception. This building displays two fronts. One of these comprises a central body and two wings. The central compartment is ornamented with a pediment, having the family-arms on the tympanum. The wings are plain, and beyond each is a circular sweep, terminating in an obelisk which supports the crest. The second front has a circular tower at each extremity, crowned with an ogee-shaped cupola. The interior presents some fine rooms, and the richly decorated hall is deservedly admired by most visitors. This mansion is placed on an eminence sufficient for a display of the structure and for a command of extensive views, but not so lofty as to communicate the fears of chillness and exposure. In the background, but sufficiently distant to preserve the building from comparative diminution as a pictorial object, mountains rise in magnificent succession, their summits broken into an outline of beautiful irregularity.

"The home demesne is luxuriant in natural charms, cultivated with distinguished taste. The graceful inequalities of this elevated tract are rich in wood, finely disposed; and a winding river, partially enwrapped in foliage, flows through the vale to which the grounds descend. Nature is here gently assisted, and no encumbrances of modern temples, hermitages, or other toys of the landscape-gardener, call forth vulgar admiration, whilst they offend the eye of the judicious, and violate the dignity of Heaven's works. It would be vain to attempt the task of pointing out the numerous situations in this demesne, from which may be obtained prospects of peculiar beauty; and, perhaps, none are excelled by the view gained shortly after entering the grounds. Here, as we approach the house, the first break of scenery towards the south is inconceivably grand, soft, and various. Mountains, often cultivated high towards their summits, and sometimes rudely majestic in the unaided tints of nature, form the impressive background, at a happy distance. The undulating tracts which lie between that range of mountains, and the lofty ridge on which the spectator is placed, comprise the rich woods and plantations on the demesne of Charleville. Amidst the umbrageous screen of this cultivated scenery, the river pursues its devious course, lucid, rippling, and often half-hidden. It may be added, that a distant bridge over the winding stream stands well revealed, as an adjunct of the picturesque. This is in itself a pleasing object, evincing, without effort, the operations of art; and the occasional animation afforded by the transit of rural passengers, imparts a felicitous effect to the profound and silent expanse of scenery.

"The deer-park of Powerscourt abounds in natural beauties, but of a character partaking more of wildness and austerity than the attractive precincts of the mansion. This extensive enclosure is enriched with many oaks of a venerable growth, and is celebrated for a waterfall of great magnificence. The herds of deer are equally numerous and fine. The principal object which arrests the attention, on approaching the park, is Knockree-mountain, which rises to the right of the villages of Coolekeas and Ballynagea. This mountain represents the central part of a stupendous rath or ancient Irish fortress, wrought by the mighty hand of Nature; and it may be thought that the similitude is preserved by surrounding circumstances: the lofty mountains of Glencree, Cuttlestown, and Walker's Rock, or the Long-hill, partly forming a resemblance of the outward ramparts, and the valleys of Glencree, Ballynagea, and Charleville, the fosse or ditch. The entrance of the park is marked by much grandeur of effect. On each side is a chain of mountains, wooded to the summit, and a river hurries over a rocky chancel, through the valley at their base. The mountains close at the termination of this vale, and form one great amphitheatre of wood, the scene of the waterfall. The stream which supplies this celebrated fall rises at a place called Glensoulan, and is, in the more temperate parts of its course, an inconsiderable rivulet. After reaching the Jousm mountain, its waters sink down a precipice or stupendous wall of ferruginous basalt, upwards of 100 feet in height. When not augmented by heavy falls of rain, the volume of descending liquid is small, and the face of the rock is seen through the thin veil of its delicate transparency. But, after continued rains have surcharged the interstices of the mountains, the tumultuous fury with which this precipitated body of water bursts down the frightful depth of its descent, affords a rare spectacle of awful beauty. The profound seclusion of the glen favours the full poignancy of the effect, and the dark masses of contiguous wood, rising to the utmost height of the mountains, lend a delightful contrast of colouring to the foam and torrent of the cataract. This noble fall of water is distant about two miles and a-half from the mansion of Powerscourt.

"The estate derives its name from De la Poer, a former possessor, by whom it was obtained in marriage with one of the daughters of Milo De Cogan. A strong castle was constructed at this place by De la Poer, which was taken and destroyed by the septs of O'Toole and O'Byrne, in the year 1535, but was speedily rebuilt by government at the great expense, for those times, of 5,000 marks. In 1556, the sept of the O'Kavanaghs gained violent possession of Powerscourt, then the property of a branch of the Talbot family, by grant from Henry VIII. These invaders fortified the castle, and garrisoned it with 140 men; but when attacked by Sir George Stanley with a regular force, the Kavanaghs surrendered upon mercy. We regret to observe that the mercy shown by the conqueror consisted in putting to death 74 of their number; the remainder were suffered to depart. It is mentioned by Mr. Harris, in the second volume of Ware's Antiquities, that about the middle of the last century, six urns were discovered beneath an artificial mount near Powerscourt, one of which is represented in an engraving inserted in that work. The capacity of it, if entire, would not much exceed a quart; it is of a light brown colour, and composed of a crumbling soft clay, rudely enough wrought, but much ornamented on the exterior; and each urn was covered with a small flat stone, and filled with black dirt, which possibly might have been ashes reduced to that condition by time."

The family of Wingfield, now Viscounts Powerscourt, is very ancient; and they derive their name from the castle and manor of Wingfield, which are situated in Suffolk, and which belonged to them before the date of the Norman conquest. Sir Richard Wingfield, fourth in lineal descent from Sir John Wingfield, who is said to have served under the Black Prince, married the only daughter of Sir William Fitzwilliam of Milltown, and sister of the Lord-deputy of Ireland; and Sir Richard Wingfield, the eldest son of these parents, greatly distinguished himself in the suppression of Tyrone, displayed great valour in an attempt upon Calais, received an appointment from Queen Elizabeth and a reappointment from James I. to the marshalship of Ireland, overthrew and suppressed the rebellion of Sir Hugh O'Dogherty and Sir Neil O'Donnell in Ulster, and obtained, in guerdon of his services, the lands of Fereullen, comprising the whole of the parish of Powerscourt, with the exception of about 1,000 acres now belonging to the Earl of Rathdown. In 1618, Sir Richard was created Viscount Powerscourt; and, at his death in 1634, the peerage became extinct, and the estates were inherited by his cousin, Sir Richard Wingfield. In 1665, the grandson of this Sir Richard was made Viscount Powerscourt by a new patent; and, at his death in 1717, the peerage again became extinct, and the estates devolved to his cousin, Edward Wingfield, Esq., barrister-at-law. In 1743, Richard, the only son of this heir, obtained another and final revival of the peerage, and was created Baron Wingfield and Viscount Powerscourt. "In the unfortunate rebellion of 1798," says the writer of the Wicklow Guide, "the attachment of his tenantry to the then Viscount was very remarkable: When all the nobility and gentry fled to the capital for shelter and protection, Lord Powerscourt, with the true spirit of his great ancestor, continued to inhabit his mansion in Wicklow, and fortified it for defence. Upon the roof of the house, which is flat and sheeted with lead, his tena-antry, now converted into faithful yeomanry to whom he intrusted his life, kept constant guard; and with 100 of these trusty and attached adherents he persevered in preserving his family and property, while other parts of Ireland teemed with blood."

POWERTOWN, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 2½ miles south-east of the town of Gowran, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3; area, 5,432 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches,—of which 11½ acres, 2 roods, 37 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 1,718; in 1841, 1,730. Houses 273. The surface lies on the eastern border of the county, and upon the left bank of the Barrow; it is traversed by the road from Gowran to Graigue-managh; it possesses a considerable diversity of outline; and it consists of arable and pasture land, much of which is excellent, while all the remainder is good. Mount-Loftus, the seat of Sir F. W. Loftus, Bart., is a principal artificial feature, occupies an elevated site, and commands fine views of the river and banks of the Barrow. The village of Powerstown is situated in the north-western district, and is watered by a rivulet which falls into the Barrow a little below Gores-bridge. The principal antiquities are vestiges of two old churches, and the ruins of Drumroe-castle. —This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £450; glebe, £22 2s. 5d. Gross income, £472 2s. 3d.; nett, £379 19s. 11d. Patron, the Crown and the diocesan one of every three turns. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d., and the use of the glebe-house. The church is an old building. Sitings 120; attendance 10. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ullard. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 1,668; and a daily school was in connection with the National Board, and had on its books 116 boys and 55 girls.

POWERTOWN, co. Tipperary. See KILGRANT.

POYNTZ-PASS, or FENWICK'S-PASS, a village, partly in the parish of Aghaderg, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, but chiefly in the parish of Ballymore, barony of Lower Orier, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands on the Newry Canal, on the main-road from Tanderagee to Newry, and on the road from Banbridge to Newtown-Hamilton, 7 furlongs south of Aeton, 2½ miles south-west by west of Loughbrickland, ¾ south by east of Tanderagee, and 5 south-west of Banbridge. The circumjacent country, though now an open, fertile, and beautiful tract, was formerly a series of fastnesses of bog, morass, and forest; and the town has the latter part of its name from occupying the locality of an encumbered pass through these fastnesses between the counties of Down and Armagh. A castle stood at the pass to guard it; and the stump of the fortalice was not very long ago visible. The prefix Poyntz arose from the circumstance of Lieutenant Poyntz having here fought a desperate action at the head of a few loyal troops against a numerous body of the forces of Tyrone. The part of the village which stands in Armagh was built in 1790 by Mr. Stewart, who was then proprietor of its site, and who obtained for it the grant of a right to hold a market and fairs. The town consists of one principal street, and an intersecting subordinate street; and it contains a dispensary, a National school, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a parish-church. The dispensary is within the Newry Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 12,000 acres, with a pop. of 8,000; and, in 1830, it expended £78, and administered to 873 patients. Well attended fairs are held on the first Saturday of every month; and are the scene of extensive sales of sheep and cattle. At the village is the 12th lock of the Newry Canal; and within about a mile are Lough Shark, a Presbyterian meeting-house, and the seats of Lisraw-house, Passview, Acton-house, Drumargal-house, the Close, Bachelor's-Hill, Thornvale, Woodview, Macguinness-Farm, and Merryfield. Area of the Down section of the village, 8 acres; of the Armagh section, 23 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 660; in 1841, 643. Houses 114. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 29; in manufactures and trade, 73; in other pursuits, 24. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 67; on their own manual labour, 47; on means not specified, 3. Pop. of the Armagh section, in 1831, 572; in 1841, 553. Houses 96.

PREBAN, PAERBAWN, or BRABAN, a parish in the barony of South Ballinacor, 3½ miles north-east of Tinehelly, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,265 acres, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,095; in 1841, 1,176. Houses 172. A mountain on the northern boundary has an altitude of 1,279 feet above sea-level; a height in the interior of the western district has an altitude of 900 feet; the site of the church, in the centre of the parish, has an altitude of 567 feet; and a brook of the interior has, at Preban-bridge, a surface-elevation of 423 feet. The Derry rivulet flows along the southern border; and the road from Tinehelly to Rathdrum passes through the interior. The general quality of the land is light, and fit only for the production of oats and potatoes. The seats are Ballinacra-house and Tankersley-house; and the hamlets are Preban and Crossanavar. —This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. The vicarial tithes belong to the perpetual curacy, and are compounded for £72 12s. 11d. Gross income, £92 12s. 11d.; nett, £87 0s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £145 5s. 10d.; and are appropriated to the see of Ferns. The church was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 250; attendance 130. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of adjoining parishes. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 241, and the Roman Catholics to 851; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided with £5 a-year from the bishop of Ferns—had on their books 113 boys and 89 girls.

PRIMULT. See BALLYBURLY.

PRIEST'S-LEAP, a wild and alpine mountain-pass, on the mutual border of the barony of Bantry, co. Cork, and the barony of Glanerought, co. Kerry, and midway between the towns of Bantry and Kenmare, Munster. The alpine acclivities which lead to it are bold, romantic, and often frightfully naked and rugged; and both the pass itself and a track through these acclivities are traversed by one of the wildest roads in Europe,—the old road from the south-west of the county of Cork into the county of Kerry. "The Priest's Leap road," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "offers to every student of the ancient mystery of road-making the fairest subject for inquiry and contemplation; nothing can be more direct than its uphill fights, or more decided and unwavering than its downward progressions; no mountain-elevation, however bristling with crags or formidable the aspect of its precipitous sides, deterred the stern and uncompromising engineer who laid it down. He carried it over the loftiest summits, the wildest moors, at the bottoms of the most desolate glens, and along the most dizzy steeps overlooking the deepest glens. A savage-looking defile is sometimes made available as a conduit for every ferocious breeze that loves to howl and sweep along such localities,—and the loneliness of many of the scenes is emphatically marked by the significant 'leacht,' or stone heap, that points out the spot where, in other times, some solitary traveller met his fate from the wayside plunderer. * * To the lover of the wild, the picturesque, and the romantic, we recommend this road for his special enjoyment. Glorious is its scenery over mountain and through glen. The broad bay of Banntry is glistening far beneath, and the blue shores of Iveragh and Bere in the distance, are noble features in the majestic panorama. Nor has the voice of tradition failed, or become silent, among these hills; many a wild legend and whimsical fiction may be gathered, by a little kindness, from their shrewd, inquisitive, and really imaginative inhabitants. Nearly midway in the course of the mountain-road stand the ruins of one of those small ancient churches, whose era from their style—the Romanesque—must be placed between the 5th and the 11th centuries. A portion of the walls only remains. The stones are large and cyclopean, curiously jointed, and well-fashioned. We were told that it is 'one of the first churches called at Rome'—a traditional record of its high antiquity. Outside the burial-ground is a perfect curiosity;—a natural rock, of a tabular form, with five basin-like hollows on the surface, of four or five inches in depth, and about a foot in diameter. These are severally filled with water, and in each is a stone of a long oval form fitting the space fully. The whole forms a petrified dairy—the basins being the keelers, the ovals the rolls of butter."

PRIOR, a parish in the barony of Iveragh, 7½ miles south by west of Cahireiveen, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 11,798 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,176; in 1841, 3,323. Houses 576. The surface is partly washed on the east by Ballinakelligs bay; and is preëminently very wild and mountainous. A principal height is Knockagallisk, whose summit rises to the altitude of 1,351 feet above sea-level. The proportion of mountainous and boggy ground compared with the proportion of arable and meadow land is as 17 to 1.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DRUGOG [which see], in the dio. of Ardret and Aghadoc. Tithe composition, £120 3s. 1d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killenlagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 3,380; and 3 day daily schools were usually attended by about 61 children.

PROSPEROUS, a village in the parish of Killybegs, barony of Clane, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the road from Rathangan to Dublin, 2½ miles west of Clane, 2½ north-east of Robertstown, and 5½ north-west of Naas. It is a perfect burlesque upon its name; and may be pronounced one of the most unprosperous, decaying, and miserable villages in Ireland. A cotton-factory was established here in 1780, by Captain Brook, but was long ago abandoned. In the village are a police station, a school, and a Roman Catholic chapel; and within a mile of it are Killybegs-house, Woodville-house, and Downings-house. The circumjacent country is flat, dreary, and to a large extent sheer morass. Area of the village, 38 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,038; in 1841, 526. Houses 91. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 58; in manufactures, and trade, 45; in other pursuits, 9. Families dependent chiefly on the directing of labour, 54; on their own manual labour, 55; on means not specified, 3.

PUBBLEBRIEN. See POBBLEBRIEN.

PUBBLEDRUM, a quondam parish in the baronies of Forth and Rathvilly, co. Carlow, Leinster. It is not recognised in the Ecclesiastical divisions; and it has, even as to civil usage, ceased to be recognised as a parish. Pop., in 1831, of the Forth section, 1,182; of the Rathvilly section, 89. Houses in these, 178 and 12.

PUCKANE, or PUCKAUN, a village in the parish of Killodiernan, barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands 1½ mile east of the head of Dromineer bay in Lough Derg, and 4½ north by west of Nenagh. In the village are a police barrack and a Roman Catholic chapel; and within a mile of it are a parish-church, Loughs Claveen, Claree, Poulavee, and Black, and the seats of Johnstown, Urra-lodge, Lispera, Prior-park, Lodge-house, Rockville, Prospect-house, Castleview, Blackford-house, Riverview, Knight-cottage, Amagbegg-house, and Shannonville-house. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 173; in 1841, 155. Houses 33.

PUFFIN-ISLAND, an island in the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. It screens the north-west side of St. Finnan's bay, extends about 7 furlongs south-westward, and lies within ¼ of a mile of the nearest part of the mainland, and 2½ south by east of Bray Head, or the western extremity of Valentia Island. It is much frequented by the fowl called puffins, and is also well stocked with rabbits. Its surface is craggy, steep, and soaring; and terminates in a summit which is cloven with a remarkable gap. The surrounding sea is often tremendously lashed by winds and swells from the Atlantic.

PULCAHILL, one of four denominations of a bog, in the baronies of Clare and Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. The other denominations are Aughlingham, Menlough, and Clare-Galway. The bog extends from the east side of the foot of Lough Corrib to within ¾ of a mile of the village of Clare-Galway; and it approaches, on the south, to within 2½ miles of the town of Galway. It is bisected from end to end by the river Clare; the greater part of it is flooded in winter; and the highest point of it, near Moonleagh, has an elevation of 18½ feet above the level of Lough Corrib. "Its effectual drainage," says the official report upon it, "could not be accomplished without lowering the surface of Lough Corrib several feet, which would be attended with more expense than the fee-simple of it would be worth, were it land of the very best quality. It may, perhaps, be asserted that Lough Corrib being so extensive, the lowering of it might be a great object with the landowners on the verge, as a great quantity of land might by that means be gained; this would not be the case to any very great extent, as the shores of the lake are generally very bold, steep, and rocky. The bog is from 28 to 36 feet in depth, and the strata underneath generally is white marl and lime-tone gravel. The bog of Menlough is also a flat low bog; being an island where the lake narrows into the river of Galway; its greatest height is only about 10 feet over the surface of the lake, being from 29 to 34 feet in depth, and its greatest depth 45 feet." In 1765, an attempt to drain the flooded grounds east of Clare-Galway, and adjoining the Clare river, and to form a navigation between the towns of Tuam and Galway, was made by Mr. Bodkin, of Lucka; but in consequence of the rockiness of the ground, the undertaking proceeded no farther than the making of a shallow cut at Clare-Galway.

PULLAGHEENY, a fishing harbour in the parish of Kilglass, barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is situated on the east side of Killaffa bay, 1½ mile south by west of Lennadoon Point, and 3½ west-south-west of Eskay. A pier was constructed here, a number of years ago, chiefly by means of grants from the Fishery Board. The adjacent shore is rocky, inhospitable, and dangerous.

PULLAGHOPPLE. See BIRMINGHAM.

PULLANS. See PULLINS.

PULLEN, a small fishing-station, between Doonbeg and Kilkee, on the west coast of the barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It is a mere gorge between cliffs, about 500 feet long and 40 broad, and cannot accommodate or even admit any other craft than canoes.

PULLENDIVA, a coast-guard station, and a small fishing-harbour, between Aughris Head and the mouth of the river Eskay, barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is partially covered by the flat rock Lackbin, and affords a tolerably quiet landing-place for yawls in off-shore winds; but the completing of its shelter by the erection of suitable piers would be impracticable except at very great expense. In 1836, there were employed in the fisheries within its district 1 open sail-boat, 15 row-boats, and 92 men.

PULLINASHANTINA, a remarkable cavern on the coast of the Mullet, and in the vicinity of Binghamstown, parish of Kilmore, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. The tides run violently and roaringly into it, nearly a quarter of a mile; and a part of the singular rock which forms it has fallen in, leaving a wide and awfully impressive gap.

PULLINS, a singularly romantic district in the barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is sometimes understood in so large a sense as to include the greater part of the parish of Drumhome, and the south-western part of the parish of Templecarne; but it properly consists of only a glen in the former parish, about 2 miles in length, chiefly within the demesne of Brown-Hall, and extending westward to the village of Ballintra. "It is formed," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "by the course of a mountain-torrent, which runs for nearly a mile through a most singularly picturesque ravine, presenting to view in succession a series of cascades, caves, wild cliffs, huge shattered rocks, amidst a profusion of the richest and most varied ferns, and every description of mountain plants. The whole course of the river is shaded by a mass of deep wood, which greatly enhances the effect of the scenery. A solid bed of limestone seems to have been cleft from 30 to 40 feet in depth; and in this narrow fissure, turning often at a very acute angle, the river foams along, frequently entirely disappearing in caves where its course passes under and through the rocks for a considerable space. In some of these caves, the regularly formed arched roof, about 50 feet span, and above 100 yards long, presents one of the wildest representations imaginable of the lawless distiller's haunt, or the outlaw's refuge. A dropping well of the purest water is found in a basin of the rock within, and a succession of winding caves, forming numerous outlets, afford opportunities of escape or concealment on all sides." Often the course of the river is obliterated by masses of rock piled over each other in the most fantastic manner, and the existence of the stream is only known by a hoarse murmur deep below the place on which the spectator stands. After a course again of half-a-mile through a flat meadow, the river resumes its wild character, but with increased magnificence of scenery. The river suddenly descends about sixty feet in a deep and dark chasm, the rock actually meeting overhead, whilst a precipitous wall of rock bounds either side; it falls at once nearly twenty feet, in an unbroken stream, with a roar which makes the solid wall around absolutely quake. It emerges under a narrow natural bridge of rock of the most perfect Gothic mould, and turning suddenly, a vista of ¼ of a mile appears opening upon the sea in a distance, and on either side a perpendicular wall of rock, clothed with the richest ivy, extends in a perfectly straight line to the village of Ballintra, the river occupying the entire space between these curious walls. A description can but faintly convey the extraordinary character of these lovely scenes, nor can the artist represent their singular beauties."

PULLOCHENY, a small but comparatively important harbour, at the northern extremity of the parish of Kilglass, barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is situated on the east side of Killalla bay, 1½ mile south by west of the headland which screens the east side of the bay's entrance. "On rounding the headland, we find two coves backed by a high beach of limestone shingle, and separated from each other by a small islet of limestone rock, about 300 fathoms from the shore. This islet is bluff toward the sea, which end is rarely covered; and declining towards the land, is connected with the main at low water by a spit or beach, covered 5 or 6 feet at high water. The cove on the north side of this spit is exposed, shallow, and rocky; but on the south side there is deep water, making a kind of anchorage tolerably sheltered at high water, where vessels come in summer to load kelp. The entrance to this anchorage has 4 fathoms at low water, and within these are 2 fathoms, so that, if properly covered, this would be a deep harbour, fit for any craft, and being outside the bars of Killalla or the Moy, would form a place of shelter to the trade of these places in all weather. There is, however, a violent breaker in the entrance to Pullocheny in north-west winds. A great number of fishing yawls are kept in the place, but must all be hauled up on the beach. Within the beach is a marsh of several acres, over which spring tides frequently flow, and the stream passing through it has 5 or 6 feet water, but barred to high water by the beach at its mouth. The harbour itself is about 200 fathoms square, about half of it dry at low water, the south side a sherry of limestone flag." [Nimmo's Coast Survey.] A breakwater and a pier began to be constructed in 1823, but they never were completed, and, in a few years, they went to ruin. Official evidence published in 1836, says, "During summer, vessels from 200 tons downwards are loaded in the harbour with grain and potatoes. At low water there is a depth of 10 feet in the harbour, and 20 sail of vessels may lie in it besides the boats. It is tolerably secure, except in very heavy gales from the north-west at high water. After the first quarter ebb, the harbour is naturally protected." Pullocheny is a coast-guard station; and the number of fishermen within the district of this station is about 300.

PULLOUGH, one of several denominations of a bog, 4½ miles east of Ferbane, and within the baronies of Ballyerwan, Ballyboy, and Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. The other denominations are Ballinacor, Derrycooly, Derryloo, Killarany, and Rosmore. The bog is part of the vast region of morass which lies between Tullamore and Shannon Harbour; it is bounded, on the north, by the Grand Canal,—on the south, by the road from Tullamore to Cloghan,—and, on the west, by a rivulet called the Barony stream. It is naturally cut into seven parts by several streams which intersect it, and by the intervening profitable lands and deries of Ballinacor, Derrooly, and Derrycooly. Estimated cost of reclamation, £8,185 15s. 6d.

PULPIT (THE). See AGHADOK.

PULSHASY, a hamlet in the parish of Templetogether, barony of Ballymore, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop., in 1831, 35. Houses 6.

PURDY'S BURN, a village in the parish of Drumbo, barony of Upper Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Newtownbreda, on the road thence to Lisburn. Adjacent to it on the east, is Purdy's-Burn-house, the handsome seat of Narcissus Batt, Esq.; and within a mile of it are the Giant's Ring, Drumbo-church, and the seats of New-Grove, Edenderry-house, Belvoir-park, and Beech-hill. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 126. Houses 28.

PUREFOY'S PLACE. See CLONBULLUGE.

PURPLE-MOUNTAIN, a conspicuous, romantic, and beautiful mountain, on the mutual boundary of the baronies of Dunkerrin and Glanerought, co. Kerry, Munster. It rises suddenly up from the west side of the middle lake of Killarney, but is also a feature in the scenery of the lower lake, and one of the principal features of the scenery of the upper lake. As seen from almost any quarter, under almost any modification of light, and at any season whatever of the year, it possesses a purple hue, and therefore is literally the purple mountain. It owes a strong flush of its colouring, at one season of the year, to the flowers of the heath, which carpets a considerable extent of it; but it acquires its pervading and permanent tints solely from the colour of the rock of which it is principally composed.

PURRANES AND BALLYHANKEEN, a bog of two denominations, on the mutual border of the baronies of Kilmain and Clannorris, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Hollymount, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the river Robe; and is traversed by the road from Hollymount to Ballindangan. The section south of the road is a dry, firm, black bog, about 5 feet in mean depth; but the section north of the road, and adjoining the river, is low and swampy, rests on a substratum of soft, white marl, and has a depth of from 13 to 36 feet. Area of the bog, 2,332 acres; altitude above high-water level in Galway bay, 181 feet; estimated cost of reclamation, £3,240.

PURT, the suburb or southern section of the town of BALLYSHANNON; which see.

QUAKERS-ISLAND, or INCHCLARAUN, an island in the parish of Cashel, barony of Rathcline, co. Longford, Leinster. It measures $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile in length; and lies $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile from the nearest part of the mainland, and $\frac{5}{8}$ south of Lanesborough. It acquired its popular name of Quaker's-Island from the circumstance of having, for several years, been the farm and the residence of one of the society of Friends. It possesses a cluster of ecclesiastical ruins which, like those of Glendalough, Clonmacnoise, Inniscaltra, and some other places, claim to be seven churches. Some of the remaining windows in the ruins are in beautiful proportion; several arches and columns exhibit fine forms and remarkable symmetry; and one ruin presents, in tolerable preservation, the cloisters and the refectory of an abbey. Most of the ruins are clustered together toward the south end of the island; but one church, with a square tower, crowns an eminence considerably apart from the others, and near the centre of the island. "In my perambulations of a thousand miles and more, through this midland district," says Mr. Weld, "no place so forcibly riveted my fancy as this island; nor do I recollect ever having seen a spot where retirement, without being beyond the reach of the rational gratifications of civilized life, could be more effectually or perhaps more agreeably realized."

QUARRIES, a bog in the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies principally within the parish of Dromod, contains part of the summit-level of the barony, and possesses a surface-elevation of from 650 to 700 feet above the level of the sea. Its area is 3,407 acres. The waters of its eastern section pass the Blackwater to the Kenmare estuary; and those of its western section pass by the Owenegra and the Flesk to the lake of Killarney. The bog is for the most part pretty firm, and requires little more than surface drainage. The limestone quarries of Masurour are within it; they produce a very pure limestone, penetrated with veins of calc-spar, but free from the accompaniment of hornstone; and they are the central point, whence five roads radiate to different districts of the country. Estimated cost of reclaiming the bog, £1,325 12s. 9d.

QUEENSBOROUGH, a village in the parish of Beaulieu, barony of Ferrard, co. Louth, Leinster. It stands on the left bank of the river Boyne, and on the road from Baltray to Drogheda, 1 mile south-west of Baltray, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Drogheda. It is a neat and agreeable place. In its vicinity are Beaulieu-church and Beaulieu-house,—the latter the seat of the Rev. A. J. Montgomery. Pop. not specially returned.

QUEENSBOROUGH, a Roman Catholic parish in the barony of Longford, co. Galway, Connaught. It is in the dio. of Clonfert; and has chapels at Queensborough and Tahy. Its post-town is Eyrecourt.

QUEEN'S COUNTY,

An inland county of the province of Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by King's co.; on the east, by co. Kildare; on the south-east, by co. Carlow; on the south, by co. Kilkenny; and, on the west, by co. Tipperary and King's co. The watershed or summit-line of the Slievebloom mountains forms the boundary over 8 miles in the northern part of the west; the Silver river forms the boundary over 4 miles in the western part of the north; the river Barrow forms the boundary over about 20 miles of the north-east and the east; but the remainder of the boundary-line, though occasionally formed by streams and watersheds, is prevailing artificial; and even the boundary-line along the whole of the east, though very largely formed by the Barrow, makes two recessions from that river, and is, in consequence, considerably capricious. The outline of the county is much more regular than that of many Irish counties; and it renders the district compact and politically convenient, and may be summarily regarded as describing a four-sided figure,—the east, the south, and the west sides nearly equal to one another in extent, and the north side considerably smaller. The longest straight line that can be drawn within the limits, extends 36½ miles south-westward; the next longest extends 35½ north-eastward; the longest that can be drawn due westward extends 32 miles; and the longest that can be drawn due southward extends 26½ miles. The area of the county comprises 342,422 acres of arable land, 69,280 of uncultivated land, 11,630 of continuous plantations, 1,117 of towns, and 396 of water,—in all, 424,854 acres.

Surface.—The Slievebloom range of mountains extends partly in the interior of the north-west district, and partly along the boundary with King's county; it forms strictly one ridge, and is intersected by only one pass, lofty, steep, difficult, and so narrow as not to admit two horses abreast; and it exhibits along its summit a soaring appearance, and presents among its declivities and skirts a large amount and a pleasing variety of picturesque scenery. Its principal summits within the interior are Cappagh and the Cones, whose altitudes above sea-level are respectively 1,077 and 1,076 feet; and its principal summits on the boundary with King's county are Slievebloom and Arderin, whose altitudes are 1,691 and 1,733 feet. The Dysart or Slievelech hills contribute very conspicuous and highly interesting features to the south-eastern district, comprising upwards of one-fourth of the whole area; but they rather stand singly and dispersed, than fold into one another, or form a congeries, and they afford, from their eminences and through their vistas, many charming views of a fine and beautiful country, highly adorned with rich plantations and magnificent demesnes. Their three loftiest summits are Scotland-hill, 1,079 feet of altitude above sea-level,—Cullenagh-hill, 1,045 feet,—and a hill on the extreme edge of the southern border, 1,001 feet. The portion of the series situated in the extreme south-east is often called the Slievemargy-hills, and is intimately connected with the Castle-Corner-hills in the adjacent parts of the counties of Kilkenny and Carlow. The remaining districts of Queen's county are part of the great central plain of Ireland,—comparatively high in its mean basis or superficial elevation,—lying around or near the sources of some of the principal rivers of the kingdom,—and prevailing flat and of inexpressive contour. Several rather large tracts of bog, particularly on the northern border and in the vicinity of Naryborough, encumber the plain; but an extensive aggregate of bog has been reclaimed into the condition of fine meadow; and much is so happily dispersed in penicles throughout most districts of the county, excepting the Slievemargy coalfield, as to afford a cheap, convenient, and general supply of fuel.

Waters.—The Clodagh and the Silver rivulets drain, within the basin of the Shannon, the small district which lies north-west of the interior part of the Slievebloom range of mountains. The river Barrow rises on the northern part of the Slievebloom mountains; flows prevailing eastward to the north-eastern extremity of the county, and then flows prevailing southward to Waterford Harbour; drains most of the northern, and all the north-eastern, the eastern, and the south-eastern districts of the county; uniformly flows either on the county boundary, or at no great distance from it; receives from the interior numerous but generally very small affluents; is navigable for boats from Portlarrington; becomes aided, at the north-east corner of the county, with the Athy branch of the Grand Canal; and is navigable for barges thence to the sea, offering to all the eastern section of the county the advantages of cheap and facile conveyance of heavy goods northward to Dublin, and southward to Waterford and the ocean. The river Nore comes in as a mere brook from Ikerrin in co. Tipperary; flows north-eastward to the vicinity of Mountrath, and then flows south-eastward and southward; drains all the western and central, and most of the southern districts of the county; receives the Gully, the Erkin, and numerous smaller affluents; and, though not navigable within the county, is, over a considerable distance, a fine, deep, and spacious river.—The lakes within the county, together with their respective area, are Kellyville, 14 acres, 3 roads, 26 perches; Emo, 20 acres, 1 road, 5 perches; Grantstown, 27 acres, 1 road, 26 perches; Annagh, 96 acres, 3 roads, 1 perch; Duff, 11 acres, 3 roads, 19 perches; and Ballyfin, 26 acres. All the water-area returned by the Ordnance Survey as within the county, is included in these six lakes and in the river Barrow. The only canals are the Mountmellick branch of the Grand Canal along the northern border to Mountmellick, and the Athy branch of the Grand Canal along the eastern border, and parallel with the Barrow, to the vicinity of Athy.

Climate.—Queen's county being situated in the centre of the southern two-thirds of Ireland, and having quite or nearly the highest basis within the midland parts of the kingdom, is freer from fogs and damps than any of the western, most of the interior, and some of the eastern counties, and seems to be equal to the best in salubrity of air. Great forests formerly covered the county, impeded the free circulation of the air, and occasioned a general retentiveness of damp; but they are either so utterly extinct, or so reduced to mere clump and grove, as no longer to produce any deleterious effect, and as even to be too scanty for desirable warmth and shelter. The exhalations which arise from the numerous bogs are not of the putrid sort which belong to the fens and marshes of England; and hence the inhabitants of the districts around them, and even in the midst of them, are healthy and robust, and occasionally furnish instances of remarkable longevity.

Minerals.—Two tiny districts on the western boundary of the county, and on the summits and higher acclivities of the Slievebloom mountains, consist chiefly of mica slate. A district of about 100 square miles, in the north-west, and comprising the main body of the Slievebloom mountains, and some of the country along their base, consists of millstone grit, including white sandstones and shale, with thin beds of limestone and coal. A district in the extreme south-east, of nearly equal extent with the preceding, and somewhat identical with the region of the Dysart and Slievemargy hills, consists of rocks of the coal-formation, and constitutes part of the great coal-field of Leinster; and a tiny portion of this district on the very verge of the county, contains beds of workable coal, and is often loosely classed with the mining territory of Castle-Corner or Kilkenny. See LEINSTER and KILKENNY. All the remainder of the county consists of the carboniferous limestone of the vast central district limestone plain of Ireland. The useful minerals raised or found within the county are coal, iron, copper, manganese, mica, limestone, marble, sandstone, ochre, marl, fuller's-earth, and a great variety of clays, fit for all the coarse and the middle qualities of pottery.

Soils.—The soil of the east side of the Slievebloom mountains inclines to an alternately black and yellow stiff clay, of unequal depths; and lies, for the most part, upon a loose rotten rock, or upon a gritty gravel. The soil of the west side of the Slievebloom mountains generally inclines to a strong red clay, not unlike the soil of some of the northern counties, where only oats and potatoes are grown; but it is almost everywhere spongy, wet, and boggy, and often pierced and dissevered by naked protrusions of the underlying rock. The soil of the moors, in the various districts of the county, is bog, of from 3 or 4 to 20 or 24 inches in depth, upon a stratum of clay or gravel; and it is most easily reclaimed and improved, and becomes land of the best and surest description. The soil of a considerable portion of the champaign country is a strong gravel, very fertile in corn; and that of the remainder or great body of the champaign country, varies from a very stiff wheat-bearing clay, to a light and sandy yet fertile loam. Limestone of excellent quality may be quarried, and good manurial limestone gravel procured in almost every townland. "But," says Sir Charles Coote, in reference to this county, "the application of limestone, whether in gravel or when calcined, in its different states requires to be well understood, and cautiously applied, before the farmer can be certain to reap profit from its manure, as many people, conceiving lime of all-powerful virtue for land, without distinction, inconsiderately apply it, covering vast tracts before they have tried the experiment, in what stage or state or how far it may agree with their soils. I have seen large farms limed on the surface, which has proved of great detriment to the land, where limestone gravel would have been the proper manure, and in shallow soils, with limestone substrata, some farmers have injudiciously applied hot lime, which has produced the very contrary effect; when, if previously mixed and well incorporated with clay or bog stuff, it might have had the most desirable influence."

Agriculture.—Farms of less than 10 acres in extent are almost all in tillage; farms of from 10 to 50 acres are in about half tillage; and farms of upwards of 50 acres are from one-half to two-thirds in grass. Fallowing is not now usual. Wheat is very seldom weeded; but oats are generally weeded in the beginning of summer. The seed is usually steeped in salt and water, and limed; and too large a proportion of it to the extent of the land is generally sown,—the usual quantity being 16 stones per acre of dug land, and 20 stones per acre of ploughed land. The crops, after being laid down, are often rolled; and, excepting barley—which is generally too late in being cut—they are judiciously and carefully harvested. Clover, vetches, trefoil, rye-grass, and other artificial grasses, are not generally grown; and even turnips are raised to a comparatively small extent, and chiefly upon the largest class of tillage-farms. The smaller farmers grow only potatoes and wheat. The larger farmers usually take, in the first year, potatoes with manure; in the second year, wheat; in the third year, oats,—and lay some of the land down to grass with the wheat or the oats, to remain during from two to twenty years. The peasantry have little or no knowledge of the benefit of an alternation of crops. "The want of a proper rotation of crops," says an appendix to the first report of the Commissioners for inquiring into the condition of the poorer classes in Ireland,— "The want of a proper rotation of crops, and of the cultivation of clover, vetches, rape, turnips, mangel-wurzel, &c., is most disastrous in its effects on the cottier and other occupiers of from one to ten acres of land. These poor families are toiling on in hopeless misery themselves, their land and their live stock all exhibiting every symptom of wretched destitution, while the mere adoption of a proper system would enable them to live in comparative comfort and happiness. The English Assistant Commissioners found them everywhere buying hay, and putting out a single cow to grass with a neighbouring farmer, although, with good management, their land would have supported three or four." The dairies of the low countries are conducted in the same manner as those of the upland districts. The butter produced is of the first and the second qualities; it is generally packed after every churning; and it is sold at Carlow by large farmers, and at Mountmellick by small farmers. The increased intercourse with England has induced a better mode of saving butter; so that the article is now much better able than before to compete with Dutch butter in the English market. Cheese was formerly manufactured to a considerable amount, but has of late years almost ceased to be made. In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, 5,629 farms of from 1 to 5 acres, 4,825 of from 5 to 15 acres, 1,813 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 1,334 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the civic districts, 131 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 82 of from 5 to 15 acres, 18 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 13 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year there were, throughout the county, 8,663 farmers, 32,550 servants and labourers, 170 ploughmen, 144 gardeners, 1 grazier, 360 herds, 64 care-takers, 3 land-agents, 125 land-stewards, 13 gamekeepers, and 28 dairy-keepers.

Live Stock.—The prevailing breed of sheep is large; and is the old Irish breed crossed with the Leicester. The breeding stock are not so high in the legs as formerly, but are better shaped and heavier in carcase. As good sheep as any at present, indeed, were in the county 18 or 24 years ago; but they were then few in number, and possessed only by a few gentlemen; while now, and for a series of years past, they are possessed by almost all the large farmers. The Leicester breed has everywhere succeeded remarkably well, and is universally observed to have improved both the quantity and the quality of the fleece, the weight of meat as compared with the weight of bone, and the capacity of arriving speedily at maturity. The breed of cattle has been very much improved. The breeds most in request are the Durham and the Ayrshire. Oxen are used by some farmers for agricultural purposes, but not so generally as at a former period. The small farmers think the Irish breed the best, on account of its being thought more hardy and better suited to the food and the climate of the country; but the large farmers consider the Durham, or the cross between that and the Irish, the most profitable, on account of its arriving much earlier at maturity, its carrying more meat upon less bone, its laying on meat upon the parts most profitable to the butcher, and its having a much greater capacity or aptitude for fattening. The horses of the country are not kept in a proper condition for working; for they are turned out to grass from May to November, fed solely upon hay and straw in winter, and supported with at best potatoes and stale oats during their period of heavy work in spring. The breed of pigs is inferior to that which prevails in most of the other counties of Leinster, and has a considerable resemblance to the lank, ungainly, and unprofitable breed of Connaught. In 1841, there were, within the rural districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 710 horses and mules, 994 asses, 1,398 cattle, 338 sheep, 7,592 pigs, and 43,389 poultry.—on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,499 horses and mules, 1,214 asses, 2,949 cattle, 817 sheep, 5,751 pigs, and 39,942 poultry.—on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 3,868 horses and mules, 362 asses, 12,004 cattle, 3,092 sheep, 8,864 pigs, and 54,818 poultry.—on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 2,722 horses and mules, 161 asses, 6,581 cattle, 4,979 sheep, 5,680 pigs, and 31,637 poultry.—and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 4,096 horses and mules, 227 asses, 17,882 cattle, 38,283 sheep, 6,416 pigs, and 32,871 poultry; and within the civic districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 302 horses and mules, 78 asses, 424 cattle, 129 sheep, 1,229 pigs, and 1,758 poultry.—on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 88 horses and mules, 5 asses, 100 cattle, 19 sheep, 207 pigs, and 564 poultry.—on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 118 horses and mules, 129 cattle, 34 sheep, 92 pigs, and 336 poultry.—on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 60 horses and mules, 47 cattle, 70 sheep, 67 pigs, and 186 poultry.—and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 23 horses and mules, 16 cattle, 49 sheep, 17 pigs, and 15 poultry. The totals of the classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were, in the rural districts, 12,865 horses and mules, £102,920; 2,958 asses, £2,958; 41,714 cattle, £271,141; 47,509 sheep, £52,200; 34,273 pigs, £42,841; and 202,657 poultry, £5,060; and, in the civic districts, 586 horses and mules, £4,688; 83 asses, £83; 776 cattle, £5,044; 301 sheep, £331; 1,632 pigs, £2,040; and 2,877 poultry, £72. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts, £477,186; in the civic districts, £12,238.

Woods.—When natural forests sheeted nearly the whole country, the alder was the prevailing tree of the low countries, and oak the prevailing tree of the mountains; but during many years past, little more survives of either natural timber trees, or under-wood coppice, especially the alder, than little patches of brushwood, in such situations among bogs as are inaccessible to cattle. The quantity of grouped planted timber which existed in 1841, and was planted previous to 1791, comprised 1,335 acres of oak, 26 of ash, 5 of beech, 150 of fir, 1,933 of mixed trees, and 123 of orchards; and the total quantity of planted trees, of all ages, existing in 1841, consisted of 1,413 acres of continuous woods, and 11,488 detached trees of oak, 85 acres and 121,959 detached trees of ash, 2 acres and 21,323 detached trees of elm, 40 acres and 33,080 detached trees of beech, 1,586 acres and 46,600 detached trees of fir, 8,123 acres and 134,663 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 421 acres and 3,862 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 11,630 acres of continuous woods, and 373,015 detached trees, equivalent to 2,331 acres,—thus making a grand total of 13,961 acres of planted timber.

Manufactures and Trade.—The manufacture of serges and stuffs was formerly so considerable as to produce fabrics to the annual value of about £100,000; but previous to the close of last century it almost totally disappeared. The manufacture of woollen fabrics employs at present about 360 weavers; of linen fabrics, about 105 weavers; of cotton fabrics, about 400 weavers; and of silk fabrics, 2 or 3 weavers. By far the larger part of the trade of the county consists in the raising of agricultural and dairy produce, the rearing of store and fat cattle, and the exporting of these to the markets of Dublin and England. The statistics of personal occupations as furnished by the Census of 1841, afford an excellent close view of the classifications and comparative amount of personal industry; and these, exclusive of the classes engaged in agriculture and the professions, are as follow:—

fisherman, 1; millers, 100; maltsters, 3; brewers, 15; distiller, 1; bakers, 136; confectioners, 25; salters, 4; salt-manufacturer, 1; tobacco-twisters, 5; fishmongers, 2; egg-dealers, 22; fruiterers, 6; cattle dealers, 16; pig-jobbers, 13; corn-dealers, 10; seedsman, 1; flour-merchant, 1; butter-merchant, 1; huxters and provision-dealers, 105; butchers, 103; victuallers, 61; grocers, 16; tobacconists, 4; wine-merchants, 4; flax-dressers, 8; carders, 71; spinners of flax, 825; spinners of wool, 907; spinners of unspecified classes, 903; factory-workers, 136; winders and warpers, 118; wool-dressers, 279; weavers of cotton, 436; weavers of linen, 101; weavers of woollen, 359; weavers of silk, 3; weavers of lace, 22; weavers of unspecified classes, 736; manufacturers of woollen, 8; dyers, 12; clothier, 1; cloth-finishers, 2; skinner, 1; curriers, 6; tanners, 5; brogue-makers, 191; boot and shoe makers, 734; tailors, 676; sempstresses, 656; dress-makers, 616; milliners, 89; stay-makers, 12; comb-makers, 4; knitters, 743; hatters, 19; straw-hatters, 62; bonnet-makers, 155; straw-workers, 5; gloves, 5; hair-dresser and barber, 1; umbrella-maker, 1; leather-dealer, 1; hosier, 1; linen drapers, 5; silk-mercer, 1; venders of soft goods, 11; rag and bone dealers, 11; architects, 3; builders, 13; brick-makers, 5; potters, 16; stone-cutters, 103; lime-burners, 8; bricklayers, 2; stone-masons, 331; slaters, 72; thatchers, 7; plasterers, 16; pavier, 1; sawyers, 57; carpenters, 938; cart-maker, 1; cabinet-makers, 16; coopers, 181; turners, 9; millwrights, 83; wheelwrights, 6; pump-borers, 4; shuttle-maker, 1; brush-maker, 1; basket-makers, 10; broom-makers, 14; miners, 298; iron-founders, 23; blacksmiths, 561; whitesmiths, 59; nailers, 142; cutlers, 6; tool-maker, 1; sickle-makers, 2; gunsmiths, 2; braziers and copper-smiths, 20; wire-workers, 3; plumbers, 4; tin-plate workers, 19; tinkers, 7; machine-makers, 3; watch-makers, 10; goldsmith, silversmith, and jeweller, 1; coach and car makers, 8; saddlers, 30; harness-makers, 25; rope-makers, 5; letter-press printers, 17; paper-stainer, 1; mat-maker, 1; chandlers and soap-boilers, 14; starch-manufacturer, 1; painters and glaziers, 57; net-makers, 2; sieve-makers, 8; tobacco-pipe maker, 1; trunk-maker, 1; upholsterers, 2; stationer, 1; booksellers and stationers, 3; coal-merchants, 7; ironmongers, 2; merchants of unspecified classes, 34; dealers of unspecified classes, 196; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 285; shop-assistants, 208; tradesmen of unspecified classes, 10; and apprentices of unspecified classes, 23.

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county are the following, Abbeylisc, Jan. 26, March 17, May 5, July 20, Sept. 20, and Nov. 4; Aghaboe, Aug. 2, and Sept. 2; Ballycolla, Jan. 23, March 26, May 3, Oct. 1, and Dec. 12; Ballickmoyler, March 16, and Nov. 11; Ballinakill, the 16th of every month, March 22, and April 22; Ballylinan, Jan. 10, Feb. 10, May 10, Sept. 2, and Nov. 27; Borris-in-Ossory, Jan. 25, March 20, May 29, June 24, Aug. 15, Oct. 16, Nov. 21, and Dec. 20; Castlebrack, Aug. 12; Castletown, June 29; Clonslee, Feb. 28, May 16, Aug. 11, and Nov. 7; Cullahill, May 27, and Oct. 2; Donaghmore, March 28, June 12, Aug. 31, and Dec. 12; Dyert, June 5, and Nov. 13; Erril, June 12, March 9, and Dec. 25; Graigue, Jan. 6, Feb. 18, April 1, and Oct. 6; Maryborough, Jan. 1, Feb. 24, March 25, May 12, July 5, Sept. 4, Oct. 23, and Dec. 4; Mayo, June 29, Oct. 18, and Nov. 22; Mountmellick, Feb. 1, March 17, May 2, July 20, Aug. 26, Sept. 29, Nov. 1, and Dec. 11; Mountrath, Jan. 6, Feb. 17, April 4, May 5, Aug. 10, Sept. 29, and Nov. 10; Portarlington, Jan. 6, March 2, Easter-monday, May 22, July 4, Sept. 1, Oct. 12, and Nov. 23; Rathdowney, Jan. 27, April

1, May 6, July 10, Sept. 12, Nov. 1, and Dec. 15; Stradbally, May 6, July 10, Aug. 21, Sept. 14, and Nov. 21; and Timahoe, April 5, July 3, and Oct. 18.

Communications.—The Grand Canal and the Barrow navigations are of prime importance to the county, and have already been noticed in the section upon "Waters." The route of the main Trunk line of railway, as projected by the Public Commissioners, enters Queen's co. midway between Monastereven and Portllington, and proceeds south-westward to a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Maryborough; and there it forks into the lines toward Cork and Kilkenny—the former proceeding south-westward, and midway between Borris-in-Ossory and Aghaboe—and the latter proceeding southward, past Abbey-leix, and down the valley of the Nore. The three principal lines of road through the county are the post-road from Dublin to Birr, through Portllington and Mountmellick; the mail-road from Dublin to Limerick, through Ballybrittas, Eno, Maryborough, Mountrath, and Borris-in-Ossory; and the west mail-road from Dublin to Cork, through Stradbally, Abbeyleix, and Durrow. In 1842, the county surveyor had under his charge 689 miles of road.

Divisions and Towns.—Queen's county is divided into the baronies of Timnehinch, in the north-west; Portnehinch, in the north-east; Stradbally in the northern part of the east; Ballyadams, in the southern part of the east; Slievemargy, in the south-east; Cullinagh, in the eastern part of the south; Clarmallagh, in the western part of the south; Clandonagh, in the south-west; Upperwoods, in the west; West-Maryborough, in the western part of the interior; and East Maryborough, in the eastern part of the interior. The quondam barony of Upper Ossory was a few years ago practically abolished, by being divided into the three baronies or cantreds of Clarmallagh, Clandonagh, and Upperwoods; and 7 townlands of the parish of Durrow were transferred by the act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, from Galmoy in co. Kilkenny to Clarmallagh in Queen's county. The barony of Timnehinch contains 4 whole parishes; Portnehinch, 3 whole parishes; Stradbally, 5 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; Ballyadams, 2 whole parishes, and part of 6 other parishes; Slievemargy, 3 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; Cullinagh, 3 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; Clarmallagh, 2 whole parishes and part of 11 other parishes; Clandonagh, 4 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes; Upperwoods, 1 whole parish; West Maryborough, part of 2 parishes; and East Maryborough, 2 whole parishes, and part of 5 other parishes. The towns and chief villages are, in Timnehinch, Clonslee, Rosenallis, and part of Mountmellick; in Portnehinch, Irishtown, Ballybrittas, and part of Mountmellick and Portllington; in Stradbally, Stradbally; in Ballyadams, Ballylinny; in Slievemargy, Arles, Balliekmoyler, Graigue, and Sleaty-Graigue; in Cullinagh, Abbeyleix, Ballinakil, and Ballyroan; in Clarmallagh, Durrow and Ballycolla; in Clandonagh, Borris-in-Ossory, Donaghmore, and Rathdowney; in Upperwoods, Castletown and Coolrairie; in West Maryborough, Mountmellick; and in East Maryborough, Maryborough.—Dr. Beaufort, stating the number of parishes and of churches in Queen's county at respectively 50 and 26, assigns 27 parishes and 14 churches to the dio. of Leighlin, 14 parishes and 6 churches to the dio. of Ossory, 7 parishes and 6 churches to the dio. of Kildare, 1 parish to the dio. of Killaloe, and part of 1 parish to the dio. of Dublin.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in Queen's co. was 275, of scholars 11,763, of male scholars 6,624, of female scholars 4,908, of scholars whose sex was not specified 231, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,074, of scholars belonging to Presbyterian communities 10, of scholars belonging to other communities of Protestant dissenters 94, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic community 9,426, of scholars whose denominational religious connection was not ascertained 159; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 275, of scholars 11,914, of male scholars 6,734, of female scholars 5,701, of scholars whose sex was not specified 74, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,191, of scholars belonging to Presbyterian communities 0, of scholars belonging to other communities of Protestant dissenters 103, of scholars belonging to the Roman Catholic community 9,543, of scholars whose denominational religious connection was not ascertained 77. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834 are returned according to the diocesan divisions, and may be proximately estimated for Queen's co. by reference to the articles LEIGHLIN and OSSORY. At the close of 1842, the National Board had in operation within the county 61 schools, conducted by 46 male and 25 female teachers, attended by 3,623 male and 3,318 female scholars, and aided during the year with £787 13. 4d. in salaries, £65 10s. in free stock, and £76 4s. 6½d. in school requisites at half-price. In 1843, the number of persons committed on charges of felony was 625; the number of criminal cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 264; and the number of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 25. Of the 625 persons committed on charges of felony, 156 were charged with offences against the person, 51 with offences against property committed with violence, 183 with offences against property committed without violence, 6 with malicious offences against property, 3 with offences against the currency, and 226 with offences not included in the above categories; 14 were sentenced to transportation, 212 were sentenced to imprisonment, 51 were sentenced to pay fines, 150 were found not guilty on trial, 121 had no bill found against them, and 77 were not prosecuted. The constabulary force of the county on Jan. 1, 1844, consisted of 1 second-rate county inspector, 2 first-rate sub-inspectors, 4 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 9 second-rate head-constables, 49 constables, 195 first-rate sub-constables, 48 second-rate sub-constables, and 10 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1843 was £12,804 4s. 4½d. The head-quarters of the constabulary are at Maryborough; and the force is distributed among 41 stations, in the 7 districts of Maryborough, Balliekmoyler, Mountrath, Abbeyleix, Mountmellick, Stradbally, and Rathdowney. The staff of the county militia is stationed at Mountrath. A stipendiary magistrate resides at Maryborough. The county gaol, the county infirmary, and the district lunatic asylum for Queen's co., King's co., and the counties of Westmeath and Longford, are at Maryborough; and there are bridewells at Abbeyleix, Borris-in-Ossory, and Stradbally. The assizes are held at Maryborough; quarter-sessions, at Maryborough, Abbeyleix, Borris-in-Ossory, Graigue, and Stradbally; and petty-sessions at Abbeyleix, Ballycolla, Balliekmoyler, Ballybrittas, Ballylinan, Borris-in-Ossory, Castletown, Clonslee, Coolrain, Newchurch, Durrow, Maryborough, Mountrath, Mountmellick, Portllington, Rathdowney, and Stradbally. Savings banks are at Abbeyleix, Portllington, and Stradbally; and loan funds are at Abbeyleix, Aghaboe, Cretyard, Durrow, Mountrath, Portllington, and Timahoe; workhouses are at Abbeyleix and Mount-mellick; fever hospitals at Maryborough and Mount-rath; and dispensaries at Abbeyleix, Ballycolla, Ballickmoyler, Ballinakill, Ballybrittas, Borris-in-Ossory, Durrow, Clonsalee, Clandonagh, Mount-mellick, Mountrath, Newtown, Offerralee, Portarlinton, Raheen, Rathdowney, and Stradbally. The annual value of the property rated under the Poor-law is £168,750. The total number of tenements valued is 23,632; and of these, 14,206 were valued under £5,—3,905, under £10,—1,919, under £15,—989, under £20,—657, under £25,—393, under £30,—437, under £40,—256, under £50,—and 870, at and above £50. The amount of grand jury presentments in 1842 was £24,901. One member is sent to parliament for the borough of Portarlinton; and two members are sent for the county at large. County constituency, in 1842, 1,778; of whom 432 were £50 freeholders, 236 were £20 freeholders, 34 were £20 leaseholders, 877 were £10 freeholders, 83 were £10 leaseholders, and 116 were rent-chargers.

Pop. of the county, in 1792, upwards of 82,000; in 1831, 145,851; in 1841, 153,930. Houses, in 1792, 15,048; in 1831, 23,873; in 1841, 25,438. The following statistics are all of the year 1841. Males, 76,403; females, 77,527; families, 27,442. Inhabited houses, 25,438; uninhabited complete houses, 853; houses in the course of erection, 117. First-class inhabited houses, 682; second-class, 5,172; third-class, 12,812; fourth-class, 6,772. Families residing in first-class houses, 796; in second-class houses, 5,675; in third-class houses, 13,688; in fourth-class houses, 7,283. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 19,346; in manufactures and trade, 5,093; in other pursuits, 3,003. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 737; on the directing of labour, 8,936; on their own manual labour, 17,100; on means not specified, 669. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 33,768; to clothing, 3,182; to lodging, 3,228; to health, 50; to charity, 8; to justice, 417; to education, 210; to religion, 95; unclassified, 2,020; without any specified occupations, 4,030. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 6,535; to clothing, 5,227; to lodging, 21; to health, 61; to charity, 12; to justice, 3; to education, 144; to religion, 26; unclassified, 5,137; without any specified occupations, 32,709. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 27,350; who could read but not write, 14,066; who could neither read nor write, 25,702. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 17,041; who could read but not write, 20,799; who could neither read nor write, 30,770. Males at and above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 5,014; attending superior schools, 193. Females at and above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 4,309; attending superior schools, 143. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 52; married, 43; widowed, 5. Antiquities.—A perfect pillar-tower, with a conical cap, stands at Timahoe; and the foundations of two other pillar-towers occur at Rosenallis and Killesken. The principal ruins for extent, artistic interest, or historical association, are the Dominican abbey at Aghaboe, the priory at Aghmacart, the monastery at Rathaspeck, the churches of Ballyadams, Ballylinan, Coolbanagher, Killabin, Killechin, Slaty, and Straboe, the remains of military fortifications on the rock of Dunamase, and the castles of Ballyadams, Castlebrack, Castlecuffe, Clonsalee, Coolbanagher, Cullahill, Grange, Killynry, and Shean. Many other relics exist of both ecclesiastical and military architecture; and, in some instances, they are emphatic memorials of important passages in history. Among other castles than those already named as in ruin, are, the castles of Ballygeehan, Ballymanus, Castletown, Milltown, Cobbley, Coolkerry, Gortneclay, Grant's-Town, Kildreedy, Lea, Moret, Rushall, Stradbally, and Shrule. Several religious foundations formerly stood deep in the recesses of the quondam great forest around Mount-rath; and the chief of these was situated at Clonengh. A rude work of stone, an ancient judgment-seat of the Brehons, but popularly called the Fairy Chair, stands on Kyle hill, two miles from Borris-in-Ossory. Several barrows or tumuli, locally called mounds, and Danish forts, occur in various parts of the county, particularly in the baronies of Ballyadams and Timnehinch.

History.—Queen's county was constituted shire-ground in the reign of Queen Mary; and it received its appellation in honour of that sovereign, as King's county did in honour of her husband Philip of Spain. The ancient history of the district is strictly that of the ancient principalities of Ossory and Leix, and has already been glanced at under the word Ossory; which see. "Although this district was constituted a separate county in the reign of Mary," says Brewer, "it received no other additional English settlement than the fort of Maryborough, until the time of Queen Elizabeth, when the Fitzpatricks, instigated by rancorous hatred towards their rivals the O'Mores and O'Conors on one side, and the Butlers and family of Morres on the other, proved the most efficient allies of government in completing the subjugation of a tract of country, so truly formidable whilst its native possessors remained united. It was chiefly during the government of Sir Henry Sydney that the power of the O'Mores, who had formerly exercised almost unlimited sway in these parts, was finally broken. In obedience to the dreadful temper of the times, this object was achieved by the unsparing use of the sword. The followers of the O'Mores and their dependent sept, were banished into the southern counties of Cork and Kerry, then nearly depopulated. At this juncture, many respectable English families, to whom lands destitute of hereditary owners were granted by the Crown, fixed themselves permanently in the Queen's county, their descendants, in several instances, still holding a distinguished place among the old resident gentry. Seven of these families, whose founders bore a prominent share in subduing the natives, and in building forts and castellated houses for the defence of their estates, acquired the appellation of the Seven Tribes. The 'tribes' so called are the families of Cosby, Hartpole, Bowen, Barrington, Ruish, Hetherington, and Howdon or Ovington. In the reign of Charles I. very considerable grants of land in this county were made to Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, which now constitute the extensive manor of Villiers. This great lordship descended to the late Duke of Chandos; by means of whose only daughter, and sole heir, it is now the property of his Grace the Duke of Buckingham and Chandos. In the same reign also, and during the busy years of the Republic, the gentry of the county received additions in the families of Pygot, Cook, Prior, Parnell, Pole, &c. Soon after the accession of William III., the list of distinguished residents, or possessors of estates, was farther enriched by the noble families of Vesey, Viscount de Vesey, of Dawson, Earl of Portarlington; and also of Staples, Burrows, Johnson, and others of high respectability."

QUEENSTOWN, an incipient or proposed town, on the coast of the parish of Dalkey, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Its site is at the east side of Malpas hill, one of the group of the Killiney hills, 3 furlongs east of the village of Dalkey, and 2 miles east-south-east of Kingstown. The scenery is brilliant and grand, and the shore possesses peculiar facilities for sea-bathing. In Sept. 1841; a Joint-stock Building Company, which had been formed for the erection of the town, advertised that they had completed their surveys, and that their proposed capital for effecting their design was £150,000, in 15,000 shares of £10 each. But a Dublin periodical, now extinct, said three months previously, or in June of the same year, "Plans most satisfactory, and views prospective as well as perspective, of this as yet non-existent Brighton or Clifton, have been laid before the public, with a view to obtain the necessary ways and means to give it a more substantial reality; but, alas for the uncertainty of human wishes! Queenstown, despite the popularity of our Sovereign, is not likely for some time at least to present a rivalry in any thing but its romantic and commanding site to the busy, bustling, and not very symmetrically built town, erected in the honour of her august eldest uncle. The good people of Kingstown may therefore rejoice; their glory for some time will not at least be eclipsed. But however this may be, the first stone of the new town has been laid, nay, the first building—no less a building than Victoria-castle, has been actually erected. Like most modern would-be castles, it has towers and crenellated battlements, and large windows in abundance, and is upon the whole as unlike a real old castle as such structures usually are. It is, however, a picturesque and imposing structure of its kind, and what is of more consequence to its future occupants, a cheerful and commodious habitation, which is more than can be said of most genuine castles, and its situation on a terrace, on the south side of Killiney-hill, is one as commanding and as beautiful as could possibly be imagined."

QUERIN, a small harbour in the parish and barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated on the north side of the estuary of the Shannon, 4½ miles west by south of Kilrush, and 5 east-north-east of Carrigaholt. It has a narrow entrance, through which fishing vessels can run during westerly gales; and it is frequented by small boats, which convey to Limerick the agricultural produce of the neighbouring district. Two embankments for keeping out the sea, and a wharf for the better accommodation of boats and small vessels, were proposed to be built by the Commissioners for improving the Navigation of the Shannon,—the wharf to be constructed of rough ashlar in the front wall, and of rubble masonry in the wing walls,—and the whole work to cost £1,160. In the vicinity are Querin Point and Querin-house.

QUIN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Upper Bunnatt, co. Clare, Munster. Length, south-west by westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 9,584 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches,—of which, 232 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches are in Lough Cullaunbheeda, and 72 acres, 3 roods, 37 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 2,918; in 1841, 3,634. Houses 569. The surface descends to within 2½ miles of the head of the estuary of the Fergus, and is watered nearly through the centre by the river Rine. Lough Cullaunbheeda lies on the eastern boundary. The land comprises a large proportion of bog and natural pasture; yet consists, to a considerable extent, of good arable ground. In the southern district are several caves; and on the estate of Quinville in the north-west, are valuable lead mines, opened in 1835. The seats are Ballykilty, Abbeyview, Rathluby-house, Dangan-house, Knockpogue-castle, Coogan-house, and Quinville-abbey,—the last the residence of John Singleton, Esq.; the chief antiquities are a cromlech, Quin-abbey, Quin-church, the ruins of five castles, Shankill-church, and the ruins of Earl's-house; and the principal hamlets are Ballyhannan, Keavagh, and Carrowroe. The road from Killaloe to Ennis, the road from Newmarket to Crusheen, and the direct road from Limerick to Kilfenora, pass through the interior.

The lead and silver mines of Kilbricken, situated within the adjoining parish of Doora, 2 miles north-west of the village of Quin, may be noticed in this place. "In the year 1833, attention was awakened by the circumstance of the accidental discovery of lead ore, by persons in his employment, on the estate of John M'Donnell, Esq., of New Hall, near Ennis. The first specimens were found by persons while cutting the new line of road between Moriessk and the new town of Clare; after which more important discoveries were made on the farm of Monieve, by the tenant, John Egan, while cutting a drain through his bog. The specimens and description of soil and calcareous spar, in which these stones of ore were discovered, having been submitted to the inspection of Mr. Taylor, in London, he determined on sending agents to examine the district, and in consequence of their report, some experienced miners were despatched from England, through whose exertions about twenty-five tons of lead ore were raised and shipped, which sold at a very high price, being found to assay for lead 76 per cent., and for silver 120 ounces per ton. At this time, however, the rush of water from the surrounding bogs was found to be an insuperable obstacle to further progress, without the aid of machinery, and it was then determined to stay the proceedings until a steam-engine of sufficient power to contend against the difficulty should be despatched from England. This engine was erected and put to work in 1837; operations are now going on upon an extensive scale, and great hopes are entertained of a successful result, but it is too soon to form an accurate opinion upon this point."

The village of Quin stands on the road from Newmarket to Crusheen, and on the right bank of the river Rine, 3 miles east of Clare, and 3 north by east of Newmarket-on-Fergus. Area, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 173; in 1841, 173. Houses 30. Fairs are held on July 7 and Nov. 1. A dispensary here is within the Ennis Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 10,650; and, in 1839–40, it received £122 11s., and expended £146 3s. The village itself is a wretched collection of poor cabins; but it contains the modern and substantial though plain church and Roman Catholic chapel of the parish, the ruins of the old church, and the unroofed but otherwise well-preserved pile of Quin-abbey,—one of the most perfect and imposing old monastic edifices in Ireland. The abbey is a beautiful, stonework building of black marble, erected in 1402, repaired in 1604, and surmounted by a lofty square tower; and it is described in the following terms by Bishop Pococke: "Quin is one of the finest and most entire monasteries that I have seen in Ireland; it is situated on a fine stream, with an ascent of several steps to the church; at the entrance one is surprised with the view of the high altar entire, and of an altar on each side of the arch of the chancel. To the south is a chapel with three or four altars in it, and a very Gothic figure in relief of some saint; on the north side of the chancel is a fine monument of the family of the Macnamaras of Rance, erected by the founder; on a stone by the altar the name of Kennedye appears in large letters; in the middle, between the body and the chancel, is a fine tower built on the gable ends. The cloister is in the usual form, with couplets of pillars, but is particular in having buttresses round it by way of ornament; there are apartments on three sides of it,—the refectory, the dormitory, and another grand room to the north of the chancel, with a vaulted room under them all; to the north of the large room is a closet, which leads through a private way to a very strong round tower, the walls of which are near ten feet thick. In the front of the monastery is a building, which seems to have been an apartment for strangers, and to the south-west are two other buildings." Mr. Dutton, in his statistical survey of the county, published in 1808, states that the abbey remained nearly in the same state as when described by Bishop Pococke, but greatly disfigured by the custom of burying within its walls; and Mr. Trotter, who visited it in 1817, says, "We were astonished at beholding it. Quin-abbey is one of the most perfect ruins in Ireland, and of wonderful beauty. Its tower, cloisters, and aisles deserve great attention. There we saw an incredible quantity of bones and skulls, long blanched by Time's resistless hand—they were piled in great quantities in the abbey." The south end is much superior in neatness of execution to the adjoining parts; and a curious representation of the crucifixion occurs in stucco, on the wall near the high altar, but seems to have escaped the observation of most writers of Irish books of travels. The original abbey, or some ecclesiastical foundation on its site, is alleged to have been built at an early period, and was destroyed by fire in 1278; and the present structure was erected in 1402, by Mac-Cam-Dall MacNamara, lord of Glancoilean, and was granted in Dec. 1583, with its manors and advowsons of Dureunwall, Ichance, Downagour, and various other possessions, to Sir Turlough O'Brien of Ennistymon.

Quin parish is a rectory and a vicarage, in the dio. of Killaloe. The rectory is part of the sinecure benefice of OGDASHIN: which see. Tithe composition, £71 1s. 6½d. The vicarage, jointly with the vicarages of CLONEY and DOWRY [which see], constitutes the benefice of Quin. Vicarial tithe composition of the parish of Quin, £81 4s. 7½d. A proportion of tithes called the prebendal, and amounting, in compounded value, to £23 1s. 6½d., in each parish of the benefice, is appropriated to the prebend of Tulloh. Length and breadth of the parochial union of Quin, each 7 miles. Pop., in 1831, 8,548. Gross income, £302 3s. 10½d.; nett, £268 6s. 7½d.

Patron, the Earl of Egremont. The church was built about the year 1792, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 55. The Roman Catholic chapels of Quin, Cloney, and Dowry, have an attendance of respectively 650, 500, and 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 3,093; the Protestants of the union, inclusive of 8 dissenters, to 84, and the Roman Catholics to 9,094; 2 daily schools in the parish—one of which was in connection with the Kildare Place Society—had on their books 95 boys and 42 girls; and 4 daily schools in the union had on their books 225 boys and 104 girls.

QUINCE, or SQUINCE, a small inhabited island in the parish of Myross, barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It lies within about a furlong of the nearest part of the mainland, and 5 furlongs south by west of the headland at the west side of the entrance of Glendore harbour. It produces an herbage which recovers and fattens diseased horses. A tolerably well-sheltered anchoring-ground occurs between its north side and the mainland.

QUINTIN, a small bay in the parish of Witter, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on the east coast of the county, 2½ miles east of Portaferry, and 3 north by east of Ballyquintin Point, or the entrance of Lough Strangford. On its shore stand trifling remains of a castle of some of the followers of John De Courcey.

QUOILE, the tidal or estuarial part of the Anacloy or Ballinahinch river, baronies of Lecale and Dufferin, co. Down, Ulster. It commences a little below Downpatrick, and extends 3 miles north-eastward to Lough Strangford, and, to a certain degree, constitutes a limb of that great and singular marine inlet. The chief islets in it are Hare Island, Castle Island, Gore's Island, Gibb's Island, Shane's Island, Long Launches Island, Little Launches Island, Salt Island, Shark Island, Green Island, and Jackdaw Island. Quoile Quay, near its head, in the parish of Saul, and about a mile from Downpatrick, is the port of that town, and is frequented by vessels of considerable burden, which bring up coals, timber, slates, iron, &c., and carry away comparatively large quantities of agricultural produce.

QUOLAGH, a bay in the barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated on the south-east side of the Kenmare estuary; it commences 3½ miles east-north-east of Cod's Head, and 4 south-south-east of Lamb's Head; it measures 1½ mile across the entrance, and penetrates the land east-north-eastward to the extent of 2½ miles; and it is partly covered by the small island of Innisfenard, but is quite exposed to the west. At its head is an anchoring-ground; and on its extreme shore is the hamlet of Longslane.

RACAVAN, or RATHCAVAN, a parish in the barony of Lower Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the town of BROUGHSHANE: which see. Length, south-west by westward, 8½ miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 17,563 acres, 36 perches,—of which 2 roods, 25 perches lie detached. Pop., in 1831, 4,479; in 1841, 5,356. Houses 926. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,651; in 1841, 4,416. Houses 771. The surface reaches to within 3 miles of Glenarm, and descends to within ½ a mile of Ballymena; and it includes the greater part of the southern half of the valley of the Braid, and a grand and romantic portion of the heights which are piled round the central water-shed of the county. Slemish mountain, the highest ground, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,457 feet. The soil of the valley-grounds is light in colour and in texture; and though well cultivated, and favourable for potatoes and oats, it is not suitable for wheat, or even for barley. Whether its comparative infertility is occasioned by some property in itself or by the vicinity of the mountains, seems not to have been ascertained. Yet the white thorn, which is supposed to indicate considerable strength of sub-soil, flourishes in the district, and well-kept fences of it ornament much of the country between Broughshane and Ballymena, and impart to the landscape an aspect of improvement and comfort. The road from Ballymena to Glenarm, and that from Carrickfergus to Ballymoney, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of SKERRY [which see], in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £316 16s. 1d. The church was built about 67 years ago, at the private expense of the ancestor of Earl O'Neill. Sittings 400; attendance, from 70 to 80. There is a Presbyterian meeting-house in Broughshane. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 142 Churchmen, 3,825 Presbyterians, 4 other Protestant dissenters, and 751 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools at Teeloy and Lisnamurgan were usually attended by about 85 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 211 boys and 122 girls. In 1842, the National Board had 4 schools at respectively Broughshane, Racavan, Buckna, and Lisnamurrian.

RADDONSTOWN, or BALRADDAN, a parish in the barony of Upper Deece, co. Meath, Leinster. It lies on the southern verge of the county, and contains part of the town of KILCOCK: which see. Length, southward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,621 acres, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 651; in 1841, 634. Houses 119. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 424. Houses 76. The greater part of the land is of prime quality. The river Rye flows on the southern boundary; and the Grand Canal approaches within a few yards of the parish at Kilcock. The seats are Raddonstown-house, Stream-house, Calgath-house, Knocknatulla-house, Newtown-Prospect, and Dolinstown-house,—the last the residence of A. U. Gladstones, Esq. The principal hamlet is Knocknatulla.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio.

of Meath. Tithe composition, £120; glebe, £1 10s. The rectories of Raddonstown, BALFEIGHAN, KILCLOAN, GALLOW, and DRUMLARGAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Raddonstown. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 1,915. Gross income, £485 3s. 9½d.; nett, £427 13s. 9½d. Patron, the Crown. A curate receives a salary of £90. The church, though very old, is in tolerable condition. Sittings 130; attendance 50. The Raddonstown and Kilcloan Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 380 and 420; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Batterstown. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 658; the Protestants of the union to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 1,873; a pay daily school in the parish was usually attended by about 45 children; and there were two daily schools in the other parts of the union.

RAGGED-ISLAND, a small island in the parish of Myross, barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It lies ¼ a mile from the nearest part of the mainland, and 1½ mile east by south of the entrance of Castle-Haven. It measures ¾ of a mile in length, and extends from north-east to south-west.

RAGHLEY, or RAUGHLEY, a peninsula, and a fishing-village and harbour, in the parish of Dromcliffe, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. The termination of the peninsula is the most westerly land in the barony, and lies 7½ miles north-west of Sligo, in a straight line, but 10 miles by the nearest practicable road. The peninsula commences in the vicinity of Lissadill-house, and measures 3¼ miles in length, and about 2½ in breadth; and its coasts, though not picturesque or attractive, possess much curious interest, from exhibiting the effects of the long and powerful action of the tides, both upon limestone rock and upon a permeable and comparatively flat shore. "Near the small fishing-village of Raughley, and on the western side of the small peninsula which also bears that name," says Mr. Fraser, in "the naturally caverned limestone rock has aided the formation of that remarkable feature called here the Pigeon Holes. At high incoming tides, particularly when impelled by the westerly winds, the sea rushes by various narrow subterraneous channels into a large, deep, open basin, at a considerable distance from the shore, where the agitated waters roar, boil, and foam, to an extent which is often terrific; at all times the hoarse murmurings of the retiring waves through the low vaulted caverns is sublime. Adjoining the island of Raughley, as it is here called, the devastating effects of the drifting sea-sand along the flat shore are seen to a fearful extent. The process has long been going on, but within the last 20 years it has greatly increased, and during that period, hundreds of fertile acres have been ruined. Instead of endeavouring to check the progress of the sand, as has been successfully done in many parts of the British coasts, and in this very neighbourhood, by Lord Palmerstown, both landlord and tenant here retreat as it advances,—the latter, however, clinging to their wretched hovels so long as the roofs sustain the superincumbent mass in which they are imbedded. There are few more desolate scenes in our island than that which the once fertile plains of Raghley now presents. It requires no stretch of the imagination, as at Bannow, to describe what may have been the appearances of this place; the remains of many houses can still be traced, and at least a hundred yet inhabited huts, nearly overwhelmed, presenting more the appearance of the dens of wild animals than the habitations of human beings. The fragments of the ancient church, with the taller of the rude tombs, are still seen peeping over the accumulating sand; and the ruins of Artarmon-castle, the former seat of the ancestors of Sir Robert Gore Booth, Bart., the present possessor, still preside over the desolate scene. At the western point of this district, the small but beautifully verdant Knock Lane rises to a height of several hundred feet from the water's edge; from it the whole of the adjoining tract can be distinctly traced, as also the mouth of Sligo bay and the subjacent coast. Along the latter, from the numerous scattered rocks, the broken waves dash and foam with inconceivable fury against the low beetling headlands." Raghley is a fishing and a coast-guard station; and, in 1836, there were employed in the fisheries within its district 99 row-boats and 495 fishermen. An artificial harbour has been constructed, at the cost of £1,606 8s., partly contributed by Sir Gore Booth and the Dublin Committee, but chiefly advanced by government. The work consists of a very neat stone pier, extending nearly 200 feet from the top of the beach to low water, with a kant or return of 40 feet at the head, all substantially built in hammered limestone, paved on the seaward side and end, with a cordon course and parapet of sound masonry; an inner harbour or dock, excavated within the land, a statute acre in area, lined with stone, and provided with a small groin pier, of 75 feet in length, on the side of the entrance, opposite the main pier; and a small reservoir, provided with a stone dam and sluice, to retain back-water for scouring the harbour. "The quay wall is in hammered limestone, of good scantling, 14 feet high, and 40 feet long along the head or kant; thence 300 feet along the pier and dock, with two stairs, the exterior one accessible by small boats at low water neap-tides; this quay proceeds 200 feet further, in a more sloping form, to the dam of the reservoir, making the whole extent of quay 540 feet. The opposite side of the entrance is also quayed for 75 feet along the groin, and 160 feet more along the entrance. The dock is of a triangular form, 142 feet on either side, lined with a sloping stone pavement, and with a slip for hauling up boats on the land at the northern vertical angle. The beach on the north side of the groin has also been cleared and levelled for the purpose of hauling up boats. The whole of the piers and quays are substantially and neatly executed, and provided with stone mooring-posts. Raghley Head affords the most advantageous site for a fishing station in the bay of Sligo. It may be approached on one side or the other in all winds, and is in the immediate vicinity of the fishing grounds outside of Carriganean. At a quarter of a mile from the head, is the winter turbot ground. At half-a-mile, all round the Wheaten Rock, the Seal Rocks, and at the west end of the Black Rock, there is abundance of rock cod, &c. Two miles off, along the south shore of the bay, are the turbot bank of Portevad, Ruarybraddogh bank, for haddock and cod, and the whiting bank of Tubberpatrick. The out-shore of Sligo ledge abounds still more in cod, ling, &c., but there are no boats fit for proceeding thither except in fine weather, as the shore has no place for protecting large craft. The village is built at the isthmus, which is only 50 fathoms across, and the yawls are launched on either side, according to the wind. The inside is a broad shallow strand, and only accessible at high water; the outside is a small cove, opening to the north-west, and in winds from that quarter, which are the most severe on this coast, a tremendous sea sets into it, so as to wash over the isthmus, and wreck all boats which are not removed high up on the land." [Nimmo's Coast Survey.] Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 122; in 1841, 170. Houses 32.

RAGHTINMORE, a mountain in the parish of Clonmany, barony of Inishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It overhangs the east side of the entrance of Lough Swilly; and is the loftiest of the bleak and sterile heights on that side of the Lough. Its summit is situated $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Dunaff Head; and has an altitude of 1,656 feet above sea-level.

RAHAN, or RAGHAN, a parish in the barony of Fermoy, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Mallow, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of BALLYMAGOOLEY, which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 10,083 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,781; in 1841, 4,061. Houses 673. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,849. Houses 637. The surface is part of the south side of the valley of the Blackwater, and part of the north side of the chain of Nagles mountains. About six-sevenths of the land are of good quality, but in a state of bad cultivation; and the remaining seventh is waste mountain, all capable of being reclaimed and improved. The principal seat is Rockforest, the residence of Sir James L. Cotter, Bart. The road from Mallow to Fermoy passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £242 6s. 2d.; nett, £174 0s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £242 6s. 2d.; and are inappropriate in Col. Longfield, of Longueville. The church was built in 1792, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and a donation of £184 12s. 3d. from the late Sir James L. Cotter, Bart. Sittings 150; attendance 35. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 72, and the Roman Catholics to 3,843; a parochial daily school, supported by annual subscription, and by a donation of £8 a-year from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, was usually attended by about 15 children; and 4 other daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from subscription, and one with £12 a-year from William Latouche, Esq., and a bequest of unreported amount from the late Henry Cotter, Esq.,—had on their books 138 boys and 66 girls.

RAHAN, or RAGHAN, a parish in the barony of Ballycowan, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Tullamore, King's co., Leinster. Length, southward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $4\frac{1}{2}$; area, 14,985 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,032; in 1841, 4,311. Houses 705. The surface is a flat, bleak, dismal expanse of bog, traversed across its middle by the Grand Canal, bounded along part of the west by the sluggish and ditchy Brosna, drained westward in the interior by the bog-stream Clodagh, and partially intersected and patched with belts and pendicles of good land. The parish is remarkable chiefly as a retreat of monasticism, both ancient and modern; it possesses ruins of an old abbey in the interior, and vestiges of a quondam convent on the southern boundary; and it is the site of both an existing convent and a Jesuits' College. The seats are Rahan-lodge and Derrycooley-house. Two constabulary stations occur respectively in the north, and on the banks of the canal.—This parish is a vicarage, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Meath. The vicarage forms part of the benefice of FICAL: which see. Vicarial tithe composition, £71 9s. 6d.; glebe, £78 7s. 14d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £138 9s. 2½d.; and are impropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £55 7s. 8½d.; glebe, £15. Gross income, £107 7s. 8½d.; nett, £105 17s. 2½d. Patron, the incumbent of Fircal. The church was built in 1732. Sittings 120; attendance, from 15 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapels of Killina and Kilpatrick, have an attendance of respectively from 700 to 800, and from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. The Convent chapel has an attendance of from 70 to 100, and is under the care of the parochial Roman Catholic clergyman. The Jesuits' College chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 500; and is under the care of the Jesuits of the college. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 179, and the Roman Catholics to 3,964; a daily school in the nunnery was supported and taught wholly by the nuns, and was attended by from 50 to 60 girls in summer, and from 30 to 40 in winter; a boarding school at the Jesuits' College had on its books 50 boys; and 7 other daily schools—one of which was salaried with £2 a-year from the vicar, £2 from the curate, and £4 and other advantages from Mr. Acres, one with £10 from the National Board, and one with £10 from the London Irish Baptist Society—had on their books 333 boys and 106 girls. In 1842, the National Board had two schools at respectively Rahan and Killina.

RAHARA. See RAHARROW.

RAHARNEY, or RATHFARNE, a village in the parish of Killucan, barony of Farbill, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the rivulet Deel, and on the road from Killucan to Ballivor, 2 miles east-north-east of Killucan, and 4½ north of Kinnead. It contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a constabulary barrack; and in its vicinity are the seats of Joristown, Grangebeg, Graddoustown, Graugemore, Wardenstown, and Curristown. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 259; in 1841, 190. Houses 34.

RAHARROW, or RAHARA, a parish in the barony of Athlone, 4½ miles south-east of Athleague, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, east-south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,362 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches,—of which 161 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches are in Lough Ballagh. Pop., in 1831, 1,630; in 1841, 1,514. Houses 272. The whole of the land is profitable; most of it is good in either tillage or pasturage; and the highest ground, Wind-Hill, has an altitude above sea-level of 489 feet. Lough Ballagh lies on the southern boundary, and has a surface-elevation above sea-level of 219 feet. The seats are Lackan-house, Rahararrow-house, and Longfield-house; and the villages and hamlets are Lackan, Rahararrow, Dally's-village, New-mountain, and Ballagh. The road from Athleague to Athlone, passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLENVOY [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £66 5s. 9d.; glebe, £10 1s. 3d. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Kilmain and Killenvoy, are compounded for £186 7s.; and are impropriate in the Incorporated Society. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilmain, St. John's, and Killenvoy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 19, and the Roman Catholics to 1,518; and a hedge-school had on its books 45 boys and 30 girls.

RAHEEN, a village in the parish of Knocklong, barony of Coshlea, about 6 miles east by south of Bruff, co. Limerick, Munster. Pop., in 1831, 174. Houses 24.

RAHEEN, a village in the parish of Clonagh and Clonagheen, barony of West Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the road from Mountrath to Ballyroan, 3½ miles north by west of Abbeyleix, and 4½ south-east by east of Mountrath. A dispensary here is within the Poor-law union of Abbeyleix, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 6,600; and, in 1839, it expended £52 1s. 6d., and administered to 1,567 patients. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin, takes name from Raheen, and has chapels here and at Springmount. In the vicinity of the village are the seats of Tinnakill and Raheen. Pop. not specially returned.

RAHEENS. See CASTLEBAR.

RAHELTY, or RATHALTY, a parish in the barony of Eliogurty, 3 miles north-east of Thurles, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,875 acres, 38 perches,—of which 1,385 acres, 5 perches form a detached district of 2 miles by 1½, situated a little south of the main body, and nearly 2 miles east of Thurles. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 1,740, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,174; in 1841, 1,765. Houses 287. A considerable portion of the eastern district of the main body is bog, but the remainder of the main body and the whole of the detached district prevalently consist of good land. The main body contains a constabulary barrack, and is traversed by the road from Thurles to Moyne; and the detached district contains the seats of Archerstown-house, Rathmannahouse, and Turtulla-house, and is traversed by the roads from Thurles to Two-Mile-Borris and Kille-naule.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of THURLES [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £98, and the rectorial for £90; and the latter are impropriate in the representatives of Nathaniel Taylor, Esq. of Noan. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 1,211; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RAHENY, or RATHENY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 920 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 608, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 612; in 1841, 722. Houses 117. The surface lies on the middle of the northern sea-board of Dublin bay; consists, for the most part, of excellent land; is traversed by the Dublin and Drogheda railway, and by the road from Dublin to Howth; and, in common with the adjacent districts, is brilliant and beautiful, at once in natural luxuriance, in artificial decoration, and in free command of a most lovely and gorgeous landscape. The principal of its mansions and villas are Maryville, Raheny-park, Watermill-cottage, Raheny-house, Millbrook-cottage, Edenmore, Walmer-cottage, Belmont, and Foxhall. The shore is much frequented for sea-bathing, and terminates in a fine strand, highly suitable for the purpose. The village stands 4 miles north-east of Dublin, on the north road thence to Howth, and about 5 furlongs from the shore. It contains the parish-church, an elegant schoolhouse, a dispensary, and several commodious and ornamental villas. The church bears an inscription, which states it to have been built in 1712, but which may possibly refer only to an extensive alteration or a thorough repair; and the pile is thought by some persons to have been really built in 1609. It is a small and humble structure, and has at its west end an elevated pier, perforated with niches, one of which contains a bell. "This species of flat bell-turret," remarks Mr. Brewer, "requires little attention as an architectural object; but is worthy of notice at this place, so near to the usual entrance of Ireland from Britain, on account of its frequent occurrence in the smaller ecclesiastical buildings of this country." The dispensary is within the North Dublin Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 4,106; and, in 1839, it expended £97 19s., and administered to 1,309 patients. A court of petty-sessions is held on every alternate Saturday. The village, together with the adjoining lands, was for several generations in the possession of a distant branch of the ancient family of Grace of Queen's county, and the county of Kilkenny; and so early as the reign of King John, it gave the title of Baron to John De Courcey, supposed by the best genealogists to have been a natural son of Sir John De Courcey, Earl of Ulster, and one of the first Anglo-Norman conquerors of Ireland. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 282; in 1841, 295. Houses 49.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £142 3s. 6d.; glebe, £157 7s. 6d. Gross income, £302 0s. 1d.; nett, £267 8s. 11d. Patron, the Crown. Sitings in the church 100; attendance, from 10 to 50. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 103 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 530 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was supported principally by private subscription, and the other wholly with £40 a-year from the rent of 8 cottages under the will of the late Samuel Dick—had on their books 82 boys and 72 girls.

RAHILL, a parish in the barony of Rathvilly, 2 miles north by west of the village of Rathvilly, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,684 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 269; in 1841, 498. Houses 76. The surface includes the most northerly ground in the county, is traversed by the road from Tullow to Baltinglass, and consists, in general, of very good land. The summit of Rahill Mound, in the north, has an altitude of 499 feet above sea-level. The seats are Rahill-cottage and Broughilstone-house.—This parish is an improprietor curacy, and part of the benefice of RATHVILLY [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £61 10s. 9d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £122 19s. 6d.; and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Leighlin cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 21, and the Roman Catholics to 292; and two free schools, the one for males and the other for females, and each endowed with £30 a-year under the will of Benjamin D'Israeli, had on their books 49 boys and 75 girls.

RAHINE. See RAHEEN and CASTLEBAR.

RAHOLP, a village in the parishes of Saul and Ballyculter, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It stands 3 miles north-east of Downpatrick, on the road thence to Strangford. It contains a school; and in its vicinity are the ruins of a church. Pop. not specially returned.

RAHOON, a parish, partly within the municipal borough of Galway, and partly in the baronies of Galway and Rahoon, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains part of the town of GALWAY: which see. Length, westward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, 3½. Area of the borough and the barony of Galway section, 11,014 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 281 acres constitute the borough section, 232 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches are water. Area of the Moycullen section, 4,154 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which 28 acres, 19 perches are water. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 14,140; in 1841, 14,433. Houses 2,370. Pop., in 1831, of the borough and the barony of Galway section, both of which then lay in the quondam county of the town of Galway, 13,510; of the Moycullen section, 630. Pop., in 1841, of the borough section, 6,377; of the barony of Galway section, 7,133; of the Moycullen section, 923. Houses, in 1841, in the borough section, 1,035; in the barony of Galway section, 1,182; in the Moycullen section, 153. The surface extends westward from the Corrib river to a point on the shore of Galway bay nearly 3 miles beyond Barna, and northward from Galway bay to very nearly the foot of Lough Corrib; it has already, to a considerable extent, been noticed in the articles on the CORRIB river, the town of GALWAY, and the villages of BARNA and NEWCASTLE; it is strictly identical with the western parts and suburbs of the town of Galway, and by far the best portion of the northern sea-board of Galway bay; and it presents considerable variety of surface,—contains a considerable aggregate of good lands and pleasant grounds,—commands superb views of the Burren mountains, the intricate eastern shoreline of Galway bay, and the fine perspective of the Arran islands,—and offers agreeable drives along the shore, and round what is called by courtesy the Circular Road; yet, in spite of all its advantages, it has a prevailing bleak, broken, and rocky character,—abounds in squalid huts, and nauseous displays of filth and debasement,—and too sadly harmonizes in its country parts with the prevailing disagreeableness and dirt of the great town upon its eastern margin. Salt-hill road and village, along the shore in the vicinity of the town, are pleasant localities, thickly powdered with good villas, and neat lodges and cottages, and deservedly frequented by multitudinous families of both town and country for the purposes of summer sea-bathing. The large fishing village of CLADDAGH [which see], is an unique feature; and MUTTON-ISLAND [which also see], figures conspicuously in the bay. A coast-guard station, with its clean cottages, occurs beyond Claddagh, and adjacent to Salt-hill. A rather large baths-house on the shore in front of Salt-hill was, not many years ago, in common with a large pendicle of reclaimed and embanked land, overwhelmed by a tempestuous onset of the sea. A neat and comfortable, but small new baths-house, was, soon after this calamity, erected farther to the west, and on a more eligible site. The villa, the seat of the Very Rev. Warden Daly, and West Lodge, the seat of James O'Hara, Esq., are pleasant features on the western outskirts of the town; and the series of villas and cottages at and near Newcastle, fling decoration over the outlet toward Oughterard and Clifden. Two principal seats in the parish are Rahoon-house, J. J. Bodkin, Esq., and Barna-house, Mr. Lynch. Other seats, principally villas and cottages ornées, are Rook-lodge, Newcastle-cottage, Newcastle-house, Straw-lodge, Belmont, Shantalla-house, Nile-lodge, Taylor's-hill-house, White-Strand-house, Sandymount, Seamount-lodge, Kingstown-house, Bath-lodge, St. Helen's, Albana-villa, Ashley-park, Bushy-park, Lakeview, Glenlough, Albana-cottage, St. Oran's-cottage, Newpark, Brownville, Woodstock-house, Barna-lodge, Glenacarra-lodge, Nermon-lodge, Marino-cottage, East Derryloughan-house, West Derryloughan-house, and Furragh-house. The principal hamlets, or segregations of from 3 to 19 huts, are Derrygragh, Lettergunnet, Polleany, Ballymahawn, Ballyvody, West Knockaunakit, East Knockaunakit, Forramoybeg, Forramoybegmore, Knockaunacurra, Trusk, Cloghscoltia, Aille, Corballynorgun, Corballylynch, Corcullen, Atty-shonock, Tomabrooky, Ballybourke, Cappagh, Bal-

lyheigewaun, Boherrard, and Litteragh. A height 2½ miles north-west of the town has an altitude above sea-level of 355 feet; and Lough Inch, situated on the boundary between the baronies, and the largest of numerous small lakes within the parish, has a superficial elevation of 118 feet.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice and wardenship of Galway. Tithe composition, £117 1s. 6d. The Bushy-park and the Barra Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively from 300 to 400, and from 600 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to one of the divisions of the large Roman Catholic chapel of Galway. The chapel of the Presentation Convent at the town has an attendance of 200, and is under the care of the clergymen who officiate in the parochial chapels. The chapel of the Presentation Convent at Poulroona has an attendance of 200; and is under the care of a chaplain. The chapel of the Dominican friary at Claddagh has an attendance of from 700 to 800; and is under the care of the Dominican friars. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 406 Churchmen, 18 Presbyterians, and 14,540 Roman Catholics; a daily school was taught by the nuns of the Galway Presentation Convent, had on its books 529 girls, and was supported by £30 a-year, and the usual accompanying advantages from the National Board, the proceeds of a collection at an annual charity sermon, and the produce of the children's needlework; a free school at Killourky had on its books 9 boys and 20 girls, and was supported by £9 a-year from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; a classical and mathematical school had on its books 8 boys; and 7 common pay daily schools had on their books 200 boys and 65 girls. In 1842, the National Board had schools at Galway and Bushy-park, and in Galway workhouse.

RAHUE, RAHUGH, or RATHUGH, a parish in the barony of Moycashel, 3 miles south-east of Kilbeggan, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, west-south-westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 4,973 acres, 2 roads, 15 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,129; in 1841, 1,255. Houses 209. The surface lies on the southern margin of the county; and is traversed by the Kilbeggan branch of the Grand Canal, and by the road from Tyrrel's Pass to Tullamore. The land has, in general, a light soil, and averages, in annual value, from 25s. to 30s. per plantation acre. A very considerable proportion of the surface, however, is bog. The highest ground is in the north-west, and has an altitude of 393 feet above sea-level. The only seat is Judgeville; the only hamlet is Rahue; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of Rahue-abbey, and the castles of Mountrath and Kiltobber. Archdall alleges that the founder of the abbey was a St. Aid, who died in 568.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARNURCHER [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithe composition is reported in cumulo with that of four other vicarages. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £64 12s. 3d.; and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The Baptist meeting-house has an attendance of about 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbeggan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 140 Churchmen, 14 Protestant dissenters, and 995 Roman Catholics; and 3 pay daily schools—one of which was also a boarding school, and classical and mathematical school—had on their books 39 boys and 16 girls, and were attended by about 12 other children.

RAILSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 3½ miles south-east by east of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 904 acres, 1 road, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 290; in 1841, 256. Houses 32. The surface consists of arable land, worth about 30s. per plantation acre per annum. The only seat is Ballyduagh-house.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of FETHARD [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £73 15s. 11½d. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school was usually attended in summer by about 50 children.

RAILWAYS. See ARMAGH, BELFAST, BERRHAVEN, CORK, DUBLIN, KINGSTOWN, LIMERICK, LEINSTER, ULSTER, and many other articles, particularly those on most of the counties and the business towns.

RALOO, or RALLOO, a parish in the barony of Lower Belfast, 3½ miles south-west of Larne, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 6,103 acres, 3 roads, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,171; in 1841, 2,179. Houses 408. One-fourth of the land is extremely good; one-fourth is middle rate; and one half is bad, boggy, and mountainous. The road from Larne to Carrickfergus and Belfast passes through the interior. The chief hamlets are Glenoe, Mackey's Town, and Raloo. "In the parish of Raloo," says a pretty well-known antiquarian writer of Carrickfergus, "are 16 large stones standing closely together, called, in the Scottish idiom of the neighbourhood, Ceannorth's Wa's. They are situated on a swelling eminence; and from several stones of a similar size lying about, and others removed within memory to the adjoining fences, it is evident that formerly a considerably greater number stood here than at present;—and from an examination of their probable number, it is certain there could not have been less than thirty. The greatest height of those remaining is about 4½ feet above the ground; and on these rested a stone about 6 feet in length by 4½ feet in breadth, which many years ago was cast from its level position by the lovers of destruction and mischief. A few years ago, on removing some large stones on the east side, whitish ashes were found underneath, and amongst these were numerous particles of a dead white colour, which fell into dust on their being exposed to the air. These particles were supposed to have been bones in their last stage of decay. The original names of these stones have fortunately been less corrupted than those of numerous other relics of antiquity; from which circumstance we may fairly conclude, that such monuments were temples of the sun.—Cean grioth, from which the present name is evidently derived, literally signifies 'the head of the sun,' the worship of which great luminary being prior to the introduction of Christianity into this kingdom, the great object of Pagan adoration. At some distance is a hill encompassed by an earthen embankment and a trench, in digging within which have been found stone hatchets, with spear and arrow-heads made of flint. These last are called elf stones, and are generally believed to have been discharged by fairies at cattle, against whose power charms are still used by the credulous. A little northward are two rows of large grey-stones standing upright; the rows are about 16 inches asunder, and a few inches between each stone. In an adjoining field are several caves, believed to have been the winter habitations of the ancient inhabitants of the country, who were called Pehta (Picts).—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CARRICKFERGUS [which see], in the dio. of Connor. The church was quite recently erected by the Church-Extension Society. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 200 to 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Larne. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,773 Presbyterians, 143 other Protestant dissenters, and 363 Roman Catholics; and 6 daily schools—each of three of which was salaried with £8 from the National Board—had on their books 196 boys and 88 girls.

RAMELTON, or RATHMELTON, an alias name of the river LEANAN: which see.

RAMELTON, or RATHMELTON, a post and market town in the parish of Aughinish, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the road from Strabane to Rathmullen, and on the river Leanan, a little above its entrance into Lough Swilly, 4½ miles east of Kilmacrenan, 5 south-south-west of Rathmullen, 6 north-north-east of Letterkenny, 10½ west by north of Londonderry, 19½ north-north-west of Strabane, and 12¼ north-north-west of Dublin. The vale or glen of the Leanan is picturesque and beautifully wooded; and the immediate environs of the town are agreeably varied, considerably improved, and as rich in scenes of romance and beauty as some of the districts of Ireland most celebrated by tourists. Within 2 miles of the town are Shellfield-house, Croghan-hill, Killydonnell-abbey, Ballyarr-wood, Drummonaghan-wood, Glen-carrn-house, Ballyarr-house, Clara-house, and Fort-Stewart,—the three last the seats of respectively J. Cochran, Esq., J. Watt, Esq., and Sir James Stewart, Bart. The town presents in its interior a pleasant and prosperous appearance; and it contains a church, two Presbyterian meeting-houses, and a Methodist meeting-house. The chief appliances of industry are extensive corn-mills, large corn-stores, a brewery, a bleaching-green, and numerous linen-weavers' looms. In the town are two small inns, at which cars can be hired; and on the Leanan, immediately below the town, and at the commencement of the river's small estuary, is a landing-place at which small sea-borne vessels take in and discharge cargoes. Fairs are held on May 16, July 18, and Nov. 16. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Thursday of every month. In 1841, the Ramelton loan-fund had a capital of £2,167, circulated £9,692 in 3,272 loans, realized a nett profit of £171 1s. 1d., and expended for charitable purposes £275. A dispensary in the town is within the Millford Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 21,194 acres, with a pop. of 6,908; and, in 1839-40, it expended £122 3s. 11½d., and made 3,537 dispensations of medicine to 1,466 patients. Area of the town, 39 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,783; in 1841, 1,428. Houses 245. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 68; in manufactures and trade, 140; in other pursuits, 69. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 18; on the directing of labour, 134; on their own manual labour, 116; on means not specified, 9.

RAMOAN, or RATHMOAN, a parish on the coast of the barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the town of BALLYCASTLE: which see. Length, south by eastward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 12,006 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,739; in 1841, 4,807. Houses 844. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,056; in 1841, 3,110. Houses 570. At the western extremity of the coast is the headland of KENBANE: which see. The magnificent and curious mountain of KNOCKLAYD [which also see], lifts its summit of 1,685 feet of altitude above sea-level on the southern boundary, and spreads a great mass of its body and skirts within the interior. The surface, with the exception of this mountain and of three bogs, is all arable land; and though very various in quality, it generally has a good, productive, light soil. The three bogs bear the names of Cairn-Saggart, Cairn-Duff, and Cairn-Sampson. An extensive coppice, the remains of an ancient forest, which formerly clothed the skirts and sides of Knocklayd, exists on the southern border. The principal plantations are those upon the demesnes of Glenbank and Clarepark; but they are of no great extent. The Glenshesk rivulet flows on the eastern boundary; and a tiny estuary forms a small harbour at Ballycastle. The rocks, like those of most of the coast of Antrim, are principally basalt and indurated chalk; and both are quarried—especially the latter—under the name of limestone. Some fine crystals have been found at Knocklayd; and some fine pebbles, chalcedony, zeolite, belemnites, and dendrites, have been found upon the shore. A tolerably good salmon fishery exists at the mouth of the Glenshesk; herrings, in great quantities, sometimes visit the bay; and rock-cod, mullet, red gurnet, sea-trout, turbot, soles, and flounders, are pretty abundant along the coast, but, in consequence of the boldness of the shores and the violence of the surf, they cannot be caught during the months of winter. The demesne of Clarepark is situated on the coast, 1½ mile north-west of Ballycastle, and on the road to Ballintoy; and the demesne of Glenbank is situated in Glenshesk, 3½ miles south by east of Ballycastle, and on the road to Broughshane. The views from the coast are extensive and very brilliant and varied. "North-east lies the island of Rathlin, above which, on a clear day, the dome-like mountains of Jura seem to rise,—

'As if some viewless hand had traced
An airy palace on the sky.'

To the east the sea-view is terminated by the lofty mountains of Argyleshire, above whose summits the steep crags of Arran are faintly seen, softened by distance into a delicate and almost ethereal tinge of blue. South-east, the basaltic promontory of Fair-Head projects its grave and impressive outline to the sea. Due south, Culfeightrin extends, dotted with white houses, and interspersed with the monastic ruins of Bonamarga, Churchfield, &c. South-west, Knockleade rises in a graceful waving line on the horizon, while Danish raths, distant cottages, and the spire of Ballycastle church glittering above the trees, give an admirable finish to the whole. Kenbane-castle, anciently belonging to a chieftain of the sept of MacAllister, is situated on a chalk cliff which projects with a lofty perpendicular front into the ocean; it consists at present of only one massive tower, and, in consequence of the romantic character of its site and its appearance, it is much frequented by parties in summer. Dunniny-castle is distant about half-a-mile from Ballycastle, and is situated on the verge of a rock, which rises nearly 300 feet above the ocean; but it survives in only a few fragments, and does not figure in any historical record or even plausible tradition. Gobbin's-Heir-castle is situated on the banks of the Glenshesk rivulet, about a mile from Ballycastle, and appears to be the oldest extant building in the district. "In the massive ruin which remains, no sculpture is visible as in the other neighbouring castles, no cornice, no dawning of taste, to relieve this ponderous load of human toil, which seems intended more for imposing terror than for exciting admiration; the situation, however, is pleasing. All history of this castle is also involved in obscurity; but imagination has supplied the deficiency of authentic accounts, by inventing many a wondrous tale of fairies and spectres, who are still said to frequent it." Another castle, the most modern of the four within the parish, stands at Ballycastle, and gives name to that town. Several raths occur, some terminating in a pointed apex, and others having the form of a truncated cone. Several caverns occur in the coast between Ballycastle and Kenbane-Head; and one of these is remarkable for its height and beauty, forms a superb Gothic arch, penetrates a considerable way into the coast, and produces a series of admirable echoes under the power of a French horn. The fata morgana is occasionally seen upon the coast.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the chancellorship of Connor cathedral, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £400; glebe, £39. Gross income, £439; nett. £343 7s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1812, by means of a loan of £369 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 150. The chapel-of-ease at Ballycastle was built in 1754, at the cost of £2,769 4s. 7½d., all defrayed by the late Col. Hugh Boyd; and it is served by a chaplain, who has a gross income of £55 8s. 5½d., and a nett income of £25 8s. 5½d. Sittings 300; attendance 200. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 200 and 150. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of from 20 to 100. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 300 and 150; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united, and are under the care of an officiate. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,718 Churchmen, 1,549 Presbyterians, and 1,710 Roman Catholics; 6 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 423 children; and 11 daily schools had on their books 301 boys and 296 girls. One of the daily schools was a charter school, salaried with £22 a-year; one was a National school, salaried with £8 a-year; and four were schools of the London Hibernian Society, salaried or aided in the usual way by that society, and two of these four salaried also with respectively £7 a-year from Miss Boyd, and £5 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society. In 1842, the National Board had one school for boys and another for girls at Moyarget.

RAMOR (LOUGH), a lake in the parishes of Castleraghan, Lurgan, and Munterconnaught, barony of Castleraghan, co. Cavan, Ulster. It has a surface-elevation of 270 feet above sea-level; measures 3½ miles in length, and 1 mile in breadth; and comprises an area of 102 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches in the parish of Castleraghan, 774 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches in the parish of Lurgan, and 965 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches in the parish of Munterconnaught. Its form is demisemicircular, commencing with a direction toward the east, and terminating with a direction toward the south. Its feeding-streams are Virginia-Water and the other rivulets of the south-east district of the county; and its superfluous waters form the river BLACKWATER: which see. Numerous islets lie sprinkled upon its bosom, and are, for the most part, tufted with wood. Its outlines are, in several places, considerably varied; and its shore, are diversified with demesnes, plantations, fine farms and the town of Virginia. "On the western end, the shores are beautified by the plantations of Lord Hertford's fine deer-park, which stretch for two miles around them, and connect with the improvements of Fort-George, the residence of the Rev. John Rowley, rector of the parish, and also with the plantations of Fort-Frederick, the beautifully situated demesne of Richard Scott, Esq."

RAMSFORT, a demesne in the parishes of Kildavan and Gorey, barony of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. The mansion is the seat of Abel Ram, Esq., and is a handsome modern structure, after designs by Mr. Semple, and situated 1½ mile north of the town of Gorey. The former mansion was a magnificent edifice, and was destroyed during the rebellion of 1798. "At that melancholy period," says Mr. Brewer, "the insurgents battered this house from the elevation termed Gorey-Hill, with two six-pounders and one curriole gun. After they had obtained possession of the building they burned it, leaving the bare walls to reproach the perpetrators with this act of Vandalism, so disgraceful, in all respects, to a civilized country, as being levelled at once against the arts and against distinguished private virtue. This ruined mansion had been erected by the late Colonel Ram, in 1751 and the following year, after the designs of Mr. George Semple, the able architect of Essex-bridge, and other public structures, in the city of Dublin. It occupied the site of a former building, that in its turn had replaced a more ancient dwelling, both of which were consumed by accidental fire. The family of Ram has enjoyed a high share of consideration in the county of Wexford for more than two centuries; the first of the name who settled here being Dr. Thomas Ram, a native of Windsor, in Berkshire, who is mentioned in our list of the bishops of Leighlin and Ferns. That prelate, at the time of the settlement of this county, obtained from the Crown extensive grants of lands, the greater part of which has descended to his posterity."

RAMSGRANGE, a village in the parish of St. James and Dunbrody, barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the road from Ballyhack to Tintern and Clonmines, 1¼ mile north-east of Duncannon, and 2 miles east of Ballyhack. Here is a Roman Catholic chapel. Fairs are held on March 17, May 1, Nov. 1, and Dec. 20. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 220; in 1841, 183. Houses 80.

RAM'S-ISLAND, an island in the parish of Glenavy, barony of Upper Masarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. It lies across the entrance of Sandy bay, in Lough Neagh, 1¼ mile west of the nearest part of the mainland, and 3½ miles south-west by west of the village of Crumlin. Its area is 6 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches. It is seen from all parts of the lake, like a mass of dark foliage on the surface of the water; it possessed much beauty by nature, and has acquired surpassing loveliness from the embellishments of art; and it is known in one of the songs of the peasantry as "Bonny Ram Island." It was greatly beautified by a former proprietor of the name of Whittle, who planted it with a profusion of shrubs and trees, laid out upon it an orchard and a garden, and laboured to render it both a handsome and a picturesque object; and it has been gorgeously decorated by its present proprietor, Earl O'Neill, who erected upon it an extremely pretty and most tasteful cottage, adopted it as his occasional residence, and converted its surface into a most luxurious demesne. "The entire ground is laid out into walks, and covered with verdure. Several hundred rose-trees and those plants and flowers which constitute the pride of our gardens, all flourish luxuriantly. Even those sides of the island which are almost perpendicular are adorned with all those creeping plants and hardy shrubs which are adapted to the situation." The island seems to have been, at no very remote period, connected with the continent; and when the lake is at its summer-level, a bank is seen extending from the island to Gartree Point. A pillar-tower stands on the island, 43 feet in height, 30 feet 5 inches in circumference, and 2 feet 8½ inches in thickness of wall. In the first story is the door; in the second, a window facing the south-east; and in the third, a window facing the north, and measuring 3 feet by 1½. "There are two rests for joists, and in the first story there is a projecting stone about 5½ feet from the surface. Certain letters or characters appear to re cut in the stones in the inside; but so obliterated are they by time, that they are quite illegible. A hollow sound or echo is heard on entering the building: this induced a person who lived in the island to dig 5 feet below the surface, where he found several human bones and some coffin boards. A skeleton was discovered near the tower some time since, and bones and skulls in many parts of the island." An old fisherman of the name of David Macarevy obtained possession of the island by prescriptive right; Conway Macneice, Esq., purchased it about 40 years ago, for 100 guineas, from Macarevy; Mr. Whittle, then an inhabitant of the parish of Glenavy, but afterwards a merchant in Liverpool, obtained it in exchange for an adjoining farm, from Mr. Macneice; and the Right Hon. Earl O'Neill purchased it from Mr. Whittle.

RAMULLEN. See RATHMULLEN and KILLLOUGH. RANDALSTOWN, a post and market town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Drummah, barony of Upper Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the river Main, on the road from Banbridge to Coleraine, and on the direct road from Belfast to Londonderry, 2 miles north of the nearest part of Lough Neagh, 4 north-west by west of Antrim, $5\frac{1}{2}$ east of Toome-bridge, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south of Ballymena, 17 north-west by west of Belfast, and $8\frac{1}{2}$ north of Dublin. The environs consist of a beautiful and richly wooded portion of the glen or vale of the Main; and they are seen with fine effect, both above and below the town, from the bridge across the river. Earl O'Neill's gorgeously wooded demesne occupies most of the vale southward to Lough Neagh, and constitutes by far the largest and most attractive feature of the landscape. See SHANE'S CASTLE. The town has a pleasant site, and a neat appearance; and it contains a church, two Presbyterian meeting-houses, a barrack, a market-house, and a comfortable inn. A parade for the military was laid out in front of the barrack, and is now the town mall or public promenade. The market-house is a handsome building, and has over it an assembly-room. A dispensary in the town is within the Antrim Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 47,464 acres, with a pop. of 19,810; and, in 1839-40, it expended £71 15s., and made 2,520 dispensations of medicine. In 1840, the Randalstown loan fund had a capital of £4,200, circulated £14,988 in 3,860 loans, cleared a nett profit of £234 14s. 4d., and expended for charitable purposes £35 2s. 6d. The principal trade carried on is the spinning of cotton and the weaving of calico. Iron-works were formerly in operation about a mile from the town, and on the Main water; but, in consequence of either a want of fuel or a deficiency of ore, they were discontinued. An abundance of agricultural produce is sold at the weekly markets; a very tolerable linen market is held on the first Wednesday of every month, and fairs are held on July 16, and Nov. 1. A court of petty-sessions is held on the third Tuesday of every month. The seneschal of the extensive manor of Edenduffcarrick holds in Randalstown his manor-court, exercising a jurisdiction in personal actions to the extent of £20; and he likewise holds a leet-jury of 23, who annually present a few pounds to be levied off the manor for the repair of the manor-pound, and of that part of the market-house in which the court is held. Charles II., by a charter of Sept. 15, 1683, "according to a commission of the 14th March in the same year, in consideration of a fine of £200 from Rose, Marchioness of Antrim, and according to an agreement and orders of composition of the 2d and the 4th of August, granted to her the manor of Edenduffcarrick, &c., and further appointed, ordained, and declared that the town of Ironworks, alias Main-water, with its rights, members, and appurtenances, within the said manor, should be called for ever by the name of the borough of Randalstown, and by that name he constituted it a free borough, and granted that the said borough and the greater number of the inhabitants of the said town, and their successors for ever, should have authority to return two members to the parliament of Ireland. And he further granted to the inhabitants and their successors, that the sheriffs, &c. of Antrim, to whom writs of election were directed, should make precepts to the seneschal of the manor of Edenduffcarrick for the electing and returning the burgesses." The borough limits included simply a narrow stripe of land along the west side of the Main, and are still recollected. Not any corporation appears to have been constituted. The right of sending two members to parliament was formally or professedly that of a potwalloping borough, but was practically the private property of the ancestors of Earl O'Neill; and the whole of the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union was paid to Charles Henry St. John, Earl O'Neill. Area of the town, 67 acres. Pop., in 1831, 618; in 1841, 588. Houses 108. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36; in manufactures and trade, 59; in other pursuits, 24. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 61; on their own manual labour, 40; on means not specified, 10.

RANELAGH, a suburb of the city of Dublin, in the parish of St. Peters, barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south of the Grand Canal, $\frac{1}{4}$ north-east of Rathmines, $\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Donnybrook, $\frac{1}{2}$ east by north of Harold's-Cross, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-east of Dublin-castle. It began to be greatly improved about half-a-century ago; and it now contains a large number of good houses, and is both an extensive and a pleasant suburb. An elegant mansion of the bishop of Derry formerly stood at Ranelagh, and was surrounded by public gardens; and a Carmelite convent, having about 12 nuns, and educating about 150 poor children, now stands near the mansion's site. Ranelagh gives the title of Viscount in the peerage of Ireland to the noble family of Jones, descendants of Sir Richard Jones of Middleton in Lancashire, and of his son Thomas Jones, archbishop of Dublin, and Lord-chancellor of Ireland. In 1628, Sir Roger Jones of Durham's-town in Westmeath, and son of the archbishop, was created Baron Jones and Viscount Ranelagh; and, in 1674, Richard, the third Viscount, was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Ranelagh. In 1711, at the death of the Earl, all the titles became extinct; and, in 1750, those of Baron Jones and Viscount Ranelagh were revived in favour of Charles Jones, Esq. The suburb or village of Ranelagh comprises two sections, called North and South. Pop., in 1831, of both sections, 1,999. Pop., in 1841, of North Ranelagh, 932. Houses 154. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 14; in manufactures and trade, 59; in other pursuits, 121. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 40; on the directing of labour, 75; on their own manual labour, 25; on means not specified, 54. Pop., in 1841, of South Ranelagh, 1,358. Houses 177. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 32; in manufactures and trade, 70; in other pursuits, 170. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 66; on the directing of labour, 138; on their own manual labour, 44; on means not specified, 24.

RAPE-MILLS, a hamlet in the parish of Reynagh, barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. It stands 3 miles north by west of Birr, on the road thence to Banagher. It has a police-barrack; and adjacent to it are the residences of Mount-Erin, Hill-house, and Ballaghanohr-house. Pop., in 1831, 64. Houses 9.

RAPHARN, an alias name of Lough Feogh, in the barony of Burrischoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. See FEUGH.

RAPHOE, a barony of the county of Donegal, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Kilmacrennan and Innishowen; on the east, by the counties of Londonderry and Tyrone; on the south, by the county of Tyrone; on the south-west, by the baronies of Tyrhugh and Bannagh; and, on the west, by the barony of Boylagh. Its length, south-westward, is 24 miles; its greatest breadth is 14½; and its area is 220,723 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches,—of 2,082 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches are fresh water, and 771 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches are tideway of the river Foyle. The river Swilly, and the upper part of Lough Swilly describe most of the northern boundary; the lower part of the river Finn, and the upper half of the river Foyle describe most of the eastern boundary; the Mournebeg rivulet describes part of the southern boundary; and the rivers Deel and Finn flow eastward through the interior. The northern district, and the district along the Foyle, consist for the most part of low and fertile land; and, though considerably diversified in surface, comprise few lofty hills, and only one mountain,—and even this situated on the southern verge of the districts, and possessing no greater an altitude than 888 feet above sea-level. The other districts consist, in a general view, of a congeries of uplands, divided into three bands or sections by the vales of the Deel and the Finn. The principal heights on the north screen of the Deel are Cronaglack, 1,127 feet above sea-level,—Cark, 1,198 feet,—Cronamuck, 1,132 feet,—Herd's-Seat, 781 feet,—Mullafin, 934 feet,—and Bennior, 629 feet; the principal between the Deel and the Finn are Three-Tops, 1,177 feet,—and 4 other heights, respectively 707, 707, 634, and 722 feet; and the principal, south of the Finn, are Altmapote, 1,199 feet,—White-Horse, 907,—Barnesmore, 1,225,—Iron-hill, 902,—a height on the east side of the Gap of Barnesmore, 1,489,—Crough, 1,260,—Lismullyduff, 807,—Brandy-hill, 601,—and another height, 603.—This barony contains part of the parishes Conwall and Arney, and the whole of the parishes of All-Saints, Clonleigh, Convo, Donaghmore, Killea, Kiltrevogue, Leck, Raphoe, Rymoghy, Stranorlar, and Taughboyne. The towns and principal villages are Newtown-Conyngham, Ballindruit, Convo, Castle-Finn, Killygordon, Carrigans, Raphoe, Manor-Conyngham, Ballybophey, Stranorlar, Creaghdooss, St. Johnston, and part of Lifford. Pop., in 1831, 66,673; in 1841, 65,472. Houses 11,216. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 8,123; in manufactures and trade, 2,976; in other pursuits, 803. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 212; on the directing of labour, 3,319; on their own manual labour, 8,237; on means not specified, 134. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 9,883; who could read but not write, 6,371; who could neither read nor write, 11,693. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,756; who could read but not write, 10,251; who could neither read nor write, 14,206.—Raphoe barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Letterkenny, Londonderry, Strabane, and Stranorlar. The total number of tenements valued is 9,544; and of these, 5,102 were valued under £5,—1,830, under £10,—815, under £15,—540, under £20,—373, under £25,—241, under £30,—289, under £40,—143, under £50,—and 211, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £70,739 12s. 5d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1840 were £5,261 8s. 6d. and £5,306 3s. 3d., and under the grand warrants of spring and summer 1841, £7,657 13s. 2d. and £5,582 8s. 3d.

RAPHOE, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, south-south-westward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, from ¼ to 5; area, 13,224 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,227; in 1841, 5,694. Houses 1,030. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,819; in 1841, 4,332. Houses 790. The surface is agreeably varied, and consists, for the most part, of fertile and well cultivated arable land. The seats are the quondam episcopal-palace, the deanery, Oakfield-house, and Greenhills-house,—the last the residence of W. Fenwick, Esq. The road from Lifford to Letterkenny, and that from Stranorlar to Londonderry, intersect each other in the interior.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the deanery of Raphoe cathedral, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £900; glebe, £150. Gross income, £1,050; nett, £771 1s.; but these sums are exclusive of respectively £426 5s. 10d. and £390 2s. 7d. arising from renewal fines and rents of lands belonging to the deanery. Patron, the Crown. Two curates receive each a salary of £75. The benefices of Stranorlar, Leck, Killygarvan, and Lettermacward, were formerly united to the benefice of Raphoe; but by order in Council, dated March 24, 1835, these benefices were “disappropriated from and out of the deanery of Raphoe, each of the benefices of Leck, Killygarvan, and Lettermacward, with its respective perpetual cure, was erected into a separate and distinct parish or benefice; and the rectory and vicarage of Raphoe benefice which alone constituted the new corps of the deanery; and in the parish of Stranorlar, as there were two endowed perpetual cures, one named Stranorlar, and the other Kiltrevock, the rectory and vicarage of Stranorlar were united to the perpetual cure of Stranorlar, and erected into a separate and distinct parish or benefice. And it was further directed by said order, that the dean of Raphoe and his successors shall continue in the possession of the several glebes belonging to the deanery, with the exception of those of Drumdany and Drumfad, which were united to the rectory and vicarage of Killygarvan, to the use of the incumbent thereof and his successors for ever.” The church is an old building, and serves as the cathedral of the diocese. Sittings 500; attendance 300. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 375. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,149 Churchmen, 2,552 Presbyterians, and 2,730 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools at Raphoe, and 2 at Creggan and Milltown, were usually attended by about 225 children; and 10 daily schools had on their books 332 boys and 173 girls. One of the daily schools was aided with £350 a-year from royal endowment; one, with £7 from the National Board; one, with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction; and one, with £7 from the Association for Discourteasing Vice.

RAPHOE, a post and market town, and the seat of a diocese, in the parish and barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the road from Stranorlar to Londonderry, 1½ mile west-south-west of the road from Lifford to Letterkenny, 2 east-north-east of Convo, 4½ west-north-west of Lifford, 6¼ north-east of Stranorlar, 6¼ south-east of Letterkenny, 11¼ south-west of Londonderry, 8½ west-north-west of Belfast, and 108 north-north-west of Dublin. The environs are beautifully diversified in surface, abounding in undulations, and occasionally shooting up in considerable hills; they possess much fertility of soil, great beauty of cultivation, and considerable embellishment of wood and demesne; they contain, at the distance of about 2 miles from the town, a hill which commands a very extensive and a highly opulent panoramic view of a great section of the basin of the Foyle; and they boast the presence of the deanery, the quondam episcopal palace, and two or three handsome private seats. The deanery stands at a short distance from the town; and the episcopal palace is an elegant and spacious edifice, and adjoins the south-east side of the town, in the midst of a handsome park. The town itself consists chiefly of a market-place and three small streets; and is well built and respectably inhabited. The cathedral is a plain cruciform edifice, of unknown date of erection, with a square tower, added in the 18th century. The free school was founded by Charles I., and endowed with 2,305 acres of arable and pasture land, and 8,729 acres of mountain and bog. A school for the clothing, instructing, and apprenticing of 20 poor boys, a widows' house for the support of four clergymen's widows of the diocese of Raphoe, and also a public library, were founded a little upwards of a century ago, by Bishop Foster of Raphoe; but the most valuable portion of the books in the library were contributed by Bishop Hall of Dromore. The market-house is a neat structure, and stands in the market-place. An ecclesiastical establishment, usually but erroneously styled a monastery, is said to have been founded at Raphoe, then called Rathboth, by St. Columb, the reputed founder of the great and wide-spread community of the Culdees, and to have been restored and extended by St. Adamnan, the successor of St. Columb in the Hebridean island of Iona; and this establishment is commonly alleged to have been both the nucleus of the town, and the original pile of the cathedral. A dispensary in the town is within the Strabane Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 33,306 acres, with a pop. of 12,017; and, in 1839, it expended £98 19s., and administered to 861 patients. In 1840, the Raphoe Loan Fund had a capital of £2,324, circulated £9,085 in 2,682 loans, and realized a nett profit of £92 16s. 5d. A weekly market for the sale of agricultural produce is well attended; and fairs are held on May 1, June 22, Aug. 27, and Nov. 4. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Saturday of every month. A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Ireland has its seat in Raphoe, exercises inspection over 10 congregations, and meets on the second Tuesday of Feb., May, Aug., and Oct. Two of the ten corporations are at Ballylenman, and the others are at Raphoe, Alt, Donaghmore, Conooy, Newtown-Conyngham, Carnone, St. Johnstown, and Ballindreat. Area of the town, 74 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,408; in 1841, 1,352. Houses 240. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 80; in manufactures and trade, 121; in other pursuits, 79. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 120; on their own manual labour, 128; on means not specified, 19.

The diocese of Raphoe lies wholly in the county of Donegal, and comprises upwards of two-thirds of that county. Its length, southward, is 44 miles; its greatest breadth is 32 miles; and its area is 694,865 acres, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 200,068. The bishopric is alleged by most writers to have been founded in the 9th century by St. Eunan, and by some to have been founded much earlier by St. Adamnan or St. Columb, but it may fairly be pronounced to have had no existence, at least in the strictly prelatial sense of the word, till the 12th century. Gilbert or Gilconage O'Caran was in the see in 1160, and was translated to Armagh in 1175; but he was called bishop of Tyrconnel. Another early bishop is spoken of; but as his name is not given, and no particulars respecting him are recorded, he cannot with propriety be pronounced a person known to history or to ecclesiastical annals. Maelissa O'Dorigh was bishop of Raphoe in 1203; Patrick O'Scanlaine, a Dominican friar, was afterwards bishop, and resigned in 1261; John De Alneto, a Franciscan friar, was bishop in 1261, and resigned in 1265; Corbrac O'Scoba, a Dominican friar, was bishop in 1266, and died in 1275; Florence O'Ferral was bishop in 1275, and died in 1299; Thomas O'Nathan, archdeacon of Raphoe, became bishop in 1299, and died in 1306; Henry Macanrossain became bishop in 1306, and died in 1319; Thomas O'Donnell, abbot of Ashroe, became bishop in 1319, and died in 1337; Patrick Magonail became bishop in 1360, and died in 1366; Richard Macrassain became bishop in 1366; John, a Cistercian monk, became bishop by papal provision in 1397; Cornelius MacCormic became bishop in the same year as the preceding, and died in 1399; Anthony became bishop in 1399, and died in 1413; Robert Muire, a Franciscan friar, became bishop by papal provision in 1414; John MacCormic became bishop in 1415, and died in 1419; Laurence O'Galchor I., dean of Raphoe, became bishop by papal provision in 1419, and died in 1438. "It appears," say the annals, "that upon the death of Laurence O'Galchor I., the see was vacant for about four years. But John Prene, archbishop of Armagh, was defender of both the spiritualities and the temporalities, and that with a vengeance. For O'Donnell, prince of his clan, leaguings with the dean and chapter of Raphoe, having usurped and seized the revenues of the bishopric, Prene calling them to account, prosecuted them to suspension, excommunication, and interdict, declaring at once that O'Donnell was a heretic, since he was obstinate. He deprived the dean and chapter of their benefices and offices, and disabled them from obtaining others. And to disable them still further, he granted forty days' indulgences (I suppose from his own penances) to whoever would fall upon their persons and seize and dissipate their substance. And he took care that this should not be a brutum fulmen, for he had recourse to the secular arm of Henry, the eldest son of O'Neil, to execute his sentence, giving him to understand that if he neglected a due and speedy execution of it, he should incur the same himself." John Mac-Gilbride became bishop in 1438; Laurence O'Galchor II. became bishop in 1469, was proceeded against "for incontinence and several other enormous crimes," and died in 1477; Menelaus MacCarman became bishop in 1484, and died in 1515; Cornelius O'Cahan was in the see in 1550; Donat Magonail was in the see in 1563, and died in 1589; George Montgomery was in the see in 1605, held it in conjunction with the sees of Derry and Clogher, and resigned in 1610; Andrew Knox, bishop of Orkney, became bishop of Raphoe in 1611, was soon after made a privy councillor, and died in 1632; John Leslie, bishop of Orkney, became bishop of Raphoe in 1633, and resigned in 1661; Robert Leslie, bishop of Dromore, was translated to the see of Raphoe in 1661, and resigned in 1671; Ezekiel Hopkins, dean of Raphoe, became bishop in 1671, and resigned in 1681; William Smith, bishop of Killalla and Achonry, was translated to Raphoe in 1681, and was translated in 1693 to Kilmore and Ardagh; Alexander Cairncross, archbishop of Glasgow, was translated to Raphoe in 1693, and died in 1701. "Cairncross," say Harris and Ware, "was ill treated alike by both parties;—was driven from Glasgow for not being a Presbyterian, and deposed by King James for not being a Papist. It was Bishop Burnet who procured his translation to this see. He was sent to Ireland partly to open an inlet and harbour in his diocese to a colony of the Scottish Episcopal clergy." Robert Huntington, a prominent figure in history, was made bishop of Raphoe in 1701, but died in the same year; John Pooley, bishop of Cloyne, was translated to the see of Raphoe in 1702, and died in 1712; Thomas Lindsay, bishop of Killaloe, was translated to Raphoe in 1713, but resigned in the same year, and was afterwards translated to Armagh; Edward Syngue was made bishop of Raphoe in 1714, and was translated to Tuam in 1716; Nicholas Foster, bishop of Killaloe, was translated to the see of Raphoe in 1716; and William Barnard became bishop in 1744, Philip Twisden in 1747, Robert Downes in 1753, John Oswald in 1763, James Hawkins in 1780, Lord J. G. Beresford in 1803, William Magee in 1819, and William Bisset in 1822. By the Act of 1833, the see of Raphoe became united to that of Derry, and since 1831, it has been held by Dr. Richard Ponsonby, who previously was bishop of Killaloe. The gross and the nett amount of Episcopal income, upon the average of 3 years ending on Dec. 31, 1831, are respectively £5,787 2s. 2d. and £5,052 11s. 2d. The dignities of the cathedral, together with the gross amount of income derived from the benefices which constitute the corps, their respective dignities, are, the dean, £2,135; the archdeacon, no emolument; the prebendary of Drumholm, £903 10s. 7d.; the prebendary of Killymard, £705 3s. 1d.; the prebendary of Inver, £500; and the prebendary of Clondehorky, £700.

Number of parishes in the diocese of Raphoe, 35; of benefices, 34; of resident incumbents, 31. Tithe composition belonging to the benefices, £11,562 5s. 24d.; glebes, £4,765 13s. Gross income, £16,803 7s. 3½d.; nett, £13,935 8s. 7d. Patron of 5 benefices, the Crown; of 15, the diocesan; of 5, incumbents; of 9, laymen and corporations. Number of stipendiary curates, 15; gross amount of their stipends, £1,135. Number of churches, 34; sittings, 10,598. Cost of building 21 and of repairing and enlarging 2 of the churches, £18,814 8s. 6½d.,—of which £7,021 10s. 4½d. were gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £6,764 12s. 3½d. were lent by that Board, £3,007 13s. 10d. were contributed by private donation, and £2,020 12s. 0½d. were raised by parochial assessment. New churches have recently been built, chiefly by means of contributions from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, at Aughannish, Kilbarrow, Leck, and Tullyobigley; a church was recently built at Lahy, at the cost of private parties; and the churches of Convoys and Clondehorky were recently enlarged, chiefly by aid from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. In 1834, the number of preaching-stations connected with the Establishment was 7; of Presbyterian meeting-houses, 27; of Protestant dissenting meeting-houses, not Presbyterian, 14; and of Roman Catholic chapels, 36. In the same year, the inhabitants consisted of 33,507 Churchmen, 28,914 Presbyterians, 24 other Protestant dissenters, and 145,385 Roman Catholics; each of 2 benefices contained not more than 200 members of the Established church, each of 8 not more than 500, each of 12 not more than 1,000, each of 9 not more than 2,000, and each of 3 between 2,000 and 5,000; 261 daily schools, which made returns of their attendance, had on their books 9,284 boys and 5,109 girls, 2 other daily schools which made no returns were computed to be attended by 110 children, and 136 of the total number of schools were supported wholly or partially by endowment or subscription; and of these 136 schools, 4 were in connection with the National Board, 3 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 3 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, 8 with the Kildare Place Society, and 43 with the London Hibernian Society. The Roman Catholic diocese of Raphoe is still unnumbered, and is divided into 27 parishes or parochial benefices. The Catholic Directory for 1842 says, "Although twenty years ago, at the commencement of the present bishop's appointment, there were only 23 priests in the entire diocese, there are now 50 on active duty, and work for 10 more." The new college at Letterkenny is in a flourishing condition. The bishop's residence is at Letterkenny. The names of the parishes, and of the sites of their respective chapels, are 1. Killygarvan, 2. Killygarvan and Tully; 3. Killybegs and Killyaghty; 4. Killybegs and Killyaghty; 5. Stranorlar; 6. Stranorlar; 7. Limskeel; 8. Glenties and Flinthorn; 9. Raphoe; 10. Conroy and Drumkeen; 11. RASCANNEL AND AGHACOORA, a bog in the barony of Clanmaurice, 1½ mile south-west of Lixnaw, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, eastward, 1½ mile; breadth, ½; area, 1,118 acres. It is a very wet red bog, on a limestone bottom. An old canal, serving as a main drain, was formed up the side of the bog to the deer-park, by one of the Earls of Kerry; and, though much filled up, might be cleared for navigation. Some tolerable meadow has been produced, upon a portion of bog between 6 and 7 feet deep, between the drain and the limestone rock. Estimated cost of total reclamation, £466.

RASH. See MOUNTJOY-Forest.

RASHARKIN, a parish in the barony of Kilconway, 5 miles north of Portlone, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, westward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 5; area, 19,337 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 84 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches are in the river Bann, and 2 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are in lakes. Pop., in 1831, 7,481; in 1841, 7,507. Houses, 1,311. The surface lies on the western border of the county; and is bounded on the whole of the west end by the river Bann. The eastern district is nearly all bog; and the central and the western districts prevalently consist of low light land, of an excellent quality for flax, oats, and clover. The roads from Abinghill and Ballymena to Ballymoney, and that from Killybegs to Cushendall, pass through the interior. The principal mansion is Hazelbrook; and the chief hamlet is Rasharkin.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Connor. Vicarial tithe composition, £292 7s.; glebe, £46 10s. One portion of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £55 13s. 8d., belongs to Robert Hurvey, Esq.; another, compounded for £51 18s. 4d., belongs to Sir Thomas Staples, Bart.; another, compounded for £51 18s. 4d., belongs to Edward Caulfield, Esq.; and another, compounded for £46 3s. 1d., belongs to the chaplain of Castle Dawson chapel. The vicarage of Rasharkin, and the rectories of FINVOY and KILRAGHTS, and the grange of KILDALLOCK, or BALLYBRASHANN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Rasharkin, and the corps of Rasharkin prebend. The parishes are not contiguous. Area of the whole, 26,454 acres, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 10,300; but this is exclusive of the perpetual curacy of Finvoy. Gross income, £811 17s.; nett, £731 18s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 400; attendance, from 40 to 50. There is a church also in Finvoy. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses in Rasharkin parish have an attendance of respectively 300 and 500. There are also three Presbyterian meeting-houses in Kilraghts, and one in Finvoy. The Roman Catholic chapel of Rasharkin has an attendance of 900. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Finvoy; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, these two chapels are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of Rasharkin parish consisted of 663 Churchmen, 4,089 Presbyterians, 16 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,032 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union, exclusive of Finvoy, consisted of 724 Churchmen, 6,097 Presbyterians, 16 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,374 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools in Rasharkin parish were usually attended by about 560 children; and 17 daily schools in Rasharkin, 3 in Kilraghts, and 1 in Kildallock, had on their books 669 boys and 307 girls. One of the daily schools in the parish was salaried with £2 from the rector; one, with £3 from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £6 from the National Board, and £6 from Miss Beirne; and one, with £13 from Miss Beirne. In 1842, one National school at Dunminning was salaried with £12, and attended by 39 boys and 24 girls; one at Kilerreen was salaried with £8, and attended by 29 boys and 17 girls; one at Ballymacdonny was salaried with £8, and attended by 28 boys and 21 girls; one at Bellooughy was salaried with £8, and attended by 36 boys and 46 girls; one at Gortereby was salaried with £8, and attended by 39 boys and 46 girls; one at Dromore was salaried with £10 13s. 4d., and attended by 31 boys and 23 girls; one at Drumcon was salaried with £8, and attended by 31 boys and 22 girls; one at Killycowan was salaried with £8, and attended by 29 boys and 12 girls; and one at Rasharkin was salaried with £8 and attended by 38 boys and 44 girls.

RASHEDAGH, or RANEDOGH, a village in the parish of Conwall, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the northern verge of the barony of Raphoe, on the right bank of the river Swilly, and on the road from Letterkenny to Glenties, 34 miles west by south of Letterkenny. Fairs are held on the 11th day of every month. Pop. not specially returned.

RASHEE, a parish in the barony of Upper Antrim, 21 miles north-north-west of Ballyclare, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-eastward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 6,400 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches,—of which 3 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches are water. Pop., in 1841, 1,545. Houses 258. Both the Census of 1831, and the Ecclesiastical Reports, return it as part of BALLYEASTON: which see. Part of the surface is mountain; and part is good arable land. The road from Ballyclare to Broughshane, and the south road from Kella to Lame, intersect each other in the interior. The highest ground, Big Colton mountain, forms part of the water-shed between the Six-Mile-Water and the Glenwherry river, and attains an altitude of 1,139 feet above sea-level. The principal seat is Tilderg-house.—This parish is a rectory, and forms part of both the benefice of CAIRNCASTLE, and the perpetual curacy of BALLYEASTON [see these articles], in the dio. of Connaught. Rectorial tithe composition, jointly with that of Ballyear, £130 15s. 4d.; curatist tithe composition, jointly with that of Ballyear, £69 4s. 6d. The church is of unknown date. Sittings 200; attendance, from 30 to 80. All other statistics are given under the word BALLYEASTON.

RATAINE, RETAINE, or RATHAYNE, a parish in the barony of Lower Navan, 3½ miles north-north-east of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,631 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 370; in 1841, 403. Houses 71. The surface consists wholly of profitable land; and is traversed across its east end by the road from Trim to Navan. The seats are Philpottstown-house and Ratayne-cottage,—the former the residence of John T. Young, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ARDDRACAN [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The tithe composition is returned in cumulo with that of the other rectories of the benefice. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 373; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RATASS, or RATHASS, a parish in the barony of Trughenackry, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains a small part of the town of TRALEE [which see], and stretches eastward thence up the vale of the Lee, and along the road to Castle-Island. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 2,365 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,365; in 1841, 2,838. Houses 410. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,065. Houses 312. A considerable portion of the surface is mountain; but the low grounds consist of good land. Ballybeggan-house, situated about 2 miles east by north of Tralee, is the principal seat; and was described by Dr. Smith, in 1756, as "an handsome modern house, built soon after the Revolution, the old house having been burnt down by the Irish." "Here," says he, "are some good old improvements which escaped the universal devastations of the times, particularly some fine avenues of walnut, chestnut, and other trees; with a large, old, but thriving orchard, planted in a rich limestone ground, beneath which are several subterraneous chambers lined with stalactical exudations. These caves have a communication with each other; and there is a large stream of running water that flows under ground, which empties itself at a considerable distance into the open air; and, what is very surprising, this underground current is not destitute of fish, as not only eels, but also trout have been taken out of it." In the vicinity of the site of the mansion formerly stood a high and strong castle, which commanded an important pass between Tralee and Castle-Island, and was reduced during the wars in the reign of James.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoc. Tithe composition, £330 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £30. Gross income, £368 18s. 5½d.; nett, £312 6s. 4½d. Patron, the Crown. The rectory of Ratass, and the sinecure rectory of Killanear, and part of the sinecure rectory of Ardferd, constitute the corps of the deanery of Ardferd cathedral. Gross income of the sinecure portions of the corps, £212 10s. 7d.; nett, £178 10s. 11d. The incumbent holds also the benefices of Kilmore, Kilmacneave and Lisbunny, in the dio. of Killaloe; and is resident in these benefices. A curate for the occasional duties of Ratass receives a salary of £13 6s. 11d. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 103 Churchmen, 4 Protestant dissenters, and 2,422 Roman Catholics; there was neither church nor chapel; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 74 boys and 43 girls.

RATESH, a village in the parish of Killeoin, barony of Dunmore, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands 6 miles west-north-west of Tuam, and 12 miles south of the mail-road from Dublin to Westport. Within a mile of it are Killeona church, a Roman Catholic chapel, the ruins of Kilshammy church, a National school, a site of a castle, Blindwell-house, Millburn-house, Rockwell-house, Cartrinch-cottage, and the hamlets of Ironpool, Beagh, Beaghwell, Ummoon, Carrabaan, Ballyhear, Cloonteen, and Derryglass-hill. Area of the village, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 809. Houses 59.

RATH, a parish in the barony of Inchiquin, 12 miles south-south-west of Corrofin, co. Clare, Munster. Length, westward, 6½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 2½; area, 8,488 acres, 3 roads, 38 perches,—of which 151 acres, 1 road, 87 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,521; in 1841, 2,647. Houses 398. The surface consists variously of mountain, moor, bog, rocky ground, lake, and arable land; and it is to a considerable extent unprofitable, and contains very little good soil. A height on the northern boundary has an altitude of 629 feet above sea-level; and Slievenacarrowduff, near the centre, has an altitude of 506 feet. Loughs Inchiquin, Attydaun, Ballycullinan, Shanally, and Drumcara lie on the boundaries; and the small lake Raha lies in the interior. Among the antiquities are the ruins of Rath-castle, Moyhill-castle, Bohnell-castle, Maghera-castle, and three other castles.—Kylewore-fort, Kylesbreedra, and Knockaraheen-fort, and the ruins of a church. The hamlets are Knockreagh, Ballinallecka, Knockmagarra, Knocknacarta, Cloncarraigh, Martryroe, Martrybeg, Martrymore, West-Knockarradaun, and East-Knockarradaun; and the principal residences are Adelphi-house, Appleville-house, Rockstown-house, and Cahoe-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILNEBOY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithes composition, £25 11s. 8d.; glebe, £19 16s. 10d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £51 3s. 4d.; and are appropriated to the prebend of Rath in Killaloe cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 64, and the Roman Catholics to 2,645; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and £15 from Mr. Syngé—had on their books 74 boys and 84 girls.

RATH, a village in the parish of Druncullen, barony of Eglisli, King's co., Leinster. It stands 4 miles south-west of Frankford, on the road thence to Birr. In the village are a Roman Catholic chapel and a constabulary barrack; and within a mile of it are the seats of Dovehill, Thomastown, Raheen-glass, and Springfield. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 107. Houses 15.

RATH, a quondam parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Rathvilly, 4 miles north by west of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster.

RATHANGAN, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the baronies of West Ophaly and East Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. Most of the West Ophaly section, containing the town of Rathangan, and comprising the townlands of Ballinure, North Ballysooghlan, South Ballysooghlan, Boherkill, Ballygaddy, Bonaghmore, Coolelan, Cushingale, Inchanearl, Killinthomas, Killyguire, Kilnabooley, Mullantine, Newtown, Rathangan, Rathangan demesne, and Sheean, was transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, to the barony of East Ophaly. Pop. of this district, in 1831, 2,324; in 1841, 2,398. The present West Ophaly section is uninhabited. Length of the parish, south by eastward, 5½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 3½. Area of the West Ophaly section, 50 acres, 1 road, 19 perches; of the East Ophaly section, 11,480 acres, 5 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,915; in 1841, 2,901. Houses 498. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,958. Houses 536. The northern district is the narrowest, and consists wholly of bog; and the other districts consist of land of middle-rate quality, and worth, on the average, about 21s. per plantation acre. A hill on the southern boundary has an altitude of 769 feet, above sea-level; but the highest ground in the interior has an altitude of only 280 feet. The Feagile rivet runs along the northern boundary; and the Little Barrow runs through the interior. The Monastereven branch of the Grand Canal, and the roads from Portarlinton to Robertstown and from Monastereven to Carbery, also pass through the interior. The seats are Tullylo, Ophaly-castle, Mount-Prospect, Rathangan-house, Kilmoney-cottage, Mount-villa-lodge, Killinthomas-house, and Prestonbrook. A prominent and pleasant feature on the southern margin of the bog district is Killinthomas wood.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £555 7s. 1d.; glebe, £43 10s. Gross income, £598 17s. 1d.; nett, £517 13s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan one turn, and the Duke of Leinster two turns. The incumbent holds also the benefice of St. Andrews in the city and dio. of Dublin; and equally divides his time between his two benefices. A curate for Rathangan receives a salary of £70. The church was built in 1828, at the cost of £700, raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 150; attendance, from 60 to 120. The Quakers' meeting-house has an attendance of 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kildare. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 217 Churchmen, 38 Protestant dissenters, and 2,743 Roman Catholics; 3 daily schools—one of which was chiefly supported by Lord Harberton, and the other two aided by the National Board—had on their books 85 boys and 119 girls; and 3 other daily schools were supported wholly by fees, and were usually attended by about 75 boys and 43 girls.

RATHANGAN, a small market and post town, in the parish of Rathangan and barony of East Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the Little Barrow river, on the north bank of the Monastereven branch of the Grand Canal, at the intersection of the road from Prosperous to Portarlinton with that from Kildare to Philipstown, and immediately north of the route of the proposed main-trunk railway from Dublin to the south and south-west of Ireland, 4½ miles north-north-west of Kildare, 5½ north-north-east of Monastereven, 7½ north-east by east of Portarlinton, and 28½ west-south-west of Dublin. It contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a Quakers' meeting-house, a dispensary, and a constabulary barrack. The dispensary is within the Edenderry Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £106 11s. 7d., and administered to 1,800 patients. Fairs are held on Whit-Tuesday, Aug. 26, March 25, and Nov. 12. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Monday of every month. The town is advantageously situated for country business, and commands the amplest facilities of communication by canal; but, though it has of late years experienced improvement, it enjoys far less prosperity than might be acquired from the fair use of its advantages. Several large flour-mills are situated on the Little Barrow. In May 1798, a body of rebels entered Rathangan, and massacred a number of the inhabitants; and they were not expelled from the town without considerable slaughter among their rude soldiery, and the capture of several of their leaders, who afterwards were tried and executed. Area of the town, 60 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,165; in 1841, 1,033. Houses 162. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 87; in manufactures and trade, 103; in other pursuits, 31. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 112; on their own manual labour, 89; on means not specified, 7.

RATHASPECK, or RATHASBUCK, a parish 5 miles south-south-west of Athy, and partly in the barony of Fassadining, co. Kilkeenny, but chiefly in the baronies of Slievemargy and Ballyadams, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 6 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{2}{3}$. Area of the Fassadining section, 639 acres, 3 roads, 30 perches; of the Slievemargy section, 3,438 acres, 2 roads, 15 perches; of the Ballyadams section, 4,138 acres, 3 roads, 17 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,082; in 1841, 4,133. Houses 720. Pop. of the Fassadining section, in 1841, 500. Houses 91. Pop. of the Slievemargy section, in 1831, 1,697; in 1841, 1,760. Houses 313. Pop. of the Ballyadams section, in 1831, 1,859; in 1841, 1,673. Houses 316. The Fassadining and the Slievemargy sections, and the south-western and western parts of the Ballyadams section, are prevarily mountainous and better adapted for pasture than tillage; but the remaining part of the Ballyadams section, and a belt along the east of the Slievemargy section, comprise some good arable land, and present a warm and pleasant appearance. Hacket's-hill, near the centre of the Slievemargy section, has an altitude of 885 feet above sea-level; a height about 1 mile north of Hacket's-hill, has an altitude of 895 feet; and the highest ground in the Ballyadams section, is at the church, and has an altitude of 375 feet. The collieries of Mullaghmore are situated near the centre of the Ballyadams section; and several extensive collieries are situated in the Slievemargy section, and immediately connected with Doonane and Newtown collieries in the adjoining parish of Killabon. "The glebe or rather church-land of Rathaspeck," says Gorton, "was undermined by the collieries of Dunane, part of the great coal-field of Leinster, in consequence of which the last church became insecure, and was abandoned." The seats are Gracefield-house, Inch-house, Milltown-house, and Boley-house. We formerly culled from an extensive description by Brewer a few brief interesting notices of GRACEFIELD [which see]; and we now copy from the same author a notice of the other artificial objects of chief interest within the parish. "The monastic ruins of Rathaspeck, the Bishop's-fort, on the estate of Sir William Grace, Bart., formerly presented an interesting object from the house of Gracefield. Its ivy-mantled walls, high belfry, and large eastern window, were conspicuous in the scenery at the distance of about half-a-mile to the north. From the materials of these ruins, the adjoining church of Rathaspeck parish has lately been erected, which, in common with most buildings of the kind in this country, wants the characteristic appendage of a comfortable vicarage-house. In the topographical collections of Sheffield Grace, Esq., F.S.A., a faithful representation of these very ancient remains, as they appeared previous to 1813, is preserved. Their Gothic simplicity, and apparent antiquity, with the broken outline of the monastery walls, present a happy subject for the pencil. The monastery was apparently on a small and humble scale, and was probably only a cell, subordinate to the more considerable religious establishment of Old-Court, situated on the townland of Clonpierce, about two miles from hence. To the family of O'More, princes of Leix, the foundation of this structure, and of that last-mentioned, are ascribed. At the distance of about 150 yards to the south-west of these ruins are the remains of a Rath, or fort, the appellation of which evidently assists in forming the name of this parish; and the adjunct of 'Asbuck' (Bishop) is strongly indicative of primeval importance. Under the site of buildings connected with the former church, three vaulted chambers continued, until the year 1813, in perfect preservation, in one of which was a well of remarkably fine spring water. In these vaults were found, some few years back, two cumbrous door-keys, with curiously constructed wards and handles, together with an ill-shaped drinking vessel, and some coins. In the adjoining fields have, likewise, been discovered several relics of antiquity, including many pieces of ancient coin, a short dagger, or sword, of brass, and a pin, five inches long, with a chased brooch, of the same metal, adorned with four yellow stones. These ornamented brooches were formerly used for fastening the collar of the loose cloak, mantle, or toga, of the ancient Irish. It may also be remarked, that a tract of land, consisting of about four acres, on the north and south sides of the church, have been long remarkable for containing vast quantities of human bones. A fond tradition thus accounts for the circumstance of these traces of mortality lying over so considerable an extent of surface. When the 'great plague' raged in this country, and all human effort to arrest its fury was unavailing, the monastic boundaries of Rathaspeck offered a secure asylum to the despairing people. Whoever took refuge within these holy limits escaped contagion; for such was the unalterable virtue of the place, that those who arrived there sick died in a few hours, without spreading the infection, and were buried on the spot where they breathed their last. Several thousands of people are said to have been interred here at that time, and the numerous temporary habitations erected by the survivors, suddenly converted these sequestered scenes of religious meditation into the resemblance of a large and populous town. The origin of this tradition cannot, perhaps, be satisfactorily developed; but it is a singular fact, that, on leveling a long earthen bank, of considerable thickness, and covered with low scrubby underwood, forty-two fire-places were found in a line, at the distance of about 20 feet asunder. They were chiefly constructed of small flat brick, and had no appearance of being designed for grates. The castle of Milltown (Ballyvulling) and Inch-house, its opposite neighbour on the western hill, are also situated on the estate of Sir William Grace. We are not enabled to ascertain the origin of the former building; but its antiquity is evidently great, and beyond the reach of local document or tradition. One square tower constitutes the principal remains of this structure, to which is attached a modern dwelling-house. Most of the outworks, consisting of walls and earthen mounds, are now levelled, whilst stagnant fish-ponds occupy the site of the surrounding fosse. The situation of this castle would appear to have been calculated for domestic comfort, rather than for defensive warfare. The building is placed by the side of a shallow rivulet, and is well sheltered by hills in every direction, except towards the south. "This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £300; nett, £258 18s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1813, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 90; attendance 90.

* The Census of 1831 states the pop. in 1831, at 3,556; but makes no notice of the Fassadining section.

The Roman Catholic chapel of Wolfhill has an attendance of 375; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in the parishes of Ballydamms and Tullowmoy. The Roman Catholic chapel at Doonane has an attendance of 1,220; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killahane. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 78 Churchmen, 13 Protestant dissenters, and 3,941 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools, held in the two Roman Catholic chapels, were usually attended by about 550 children; and 5 daily schools were supported wholly by fees, and had on their books 200 boys and 183 girls. In 1842, the National Board had 2 schools at Wolfhill.

RATHASPECK, a parish in the barony of Forth, 2½ miles south-south-west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, west-north-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from ¾ to 2; area, 2,804 acres, 1 rood, 31 perches. Pop., in 1831, 626; in 1841, 787. Houses 100. The extreme west is part of the Forth mountains; but the other districts lie low, and prevailingly consist of good land. The summits of the hills called Carrickfoyle-Rock, and Carrickadea-Rock, and situated on the western boundary, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 687 and 776 feet. The seats are Crubstown-house, Rathaspeck-house, Haystown-house, Johnstown-castle, Fairfield-house, and Lannerstown-house. The roads from Wexford to Duncormack and Clonmaines pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Patrick's of Wexford, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £120 9s. 7d. A curate for Rathaspeck and Kildavin receives a salary of £69 4s. 7d. The church was enlarged in 1824 by means of a loan of £278 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 190. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 176, and the Roman Catholics to 500; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 60 children; and a daily school was wholly supported by Mrs. Grogan Morgan, and had on its books 76 boys and 74 girls.

RATHASPECK, a parish in the barony of Moygoish, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains the small town of Rathaspeck; which see. Length, south-eastward, 5 miles; breadth, from ¾ to 2½; area, 7,664 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches,—of which 134 acres, 24 perches are in Lough Glen, 198 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches are in Lough Glen, and 48 acres are in the river Inny. Pop., in 1831, 2,170; in 1841, 2,185. Houses 333. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,565; in 1841, 1,585. Houses 248. Lough Glen lies on the western boundary, and has a surface-elevation of 206 feet above sea-level; Lough Iron lies on the eastern boundary, and has a surface-elevation of 204 feet above sea-level; the river Inny flows along the south-eastern boundary; and the creeping rivulet, called the Black-river, flows through the interior to Lough Iron. The surface lies on the western margin of Westmeath, is all low, and forms part of the great plain of the central counties of Leinster. The western district is prevailingly boggy; but the other districts consist, for the most part, of good land. The seats are Rockfield, Fairhill, Nough-lodge, Newpark-cottage, and Newpass-house,—the last the residence of Mr. Whitty. The mail-road from Dublin to Sligo traverses the interior.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Glebe, £18. Gross income, £110 6s. 7d.; nett, £100 6s. 3½d. Patron, Sir John Bennett Piers, Bart. The tithes are compounded for £128 5s.; and are impropriate in the patron. The church was built in 1814, by means of a gift of £733 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged in 1821, by means of a loan of £184 12s. 3½d. from that Board. Sittings 250; attendance 190. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 375; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rasmagh. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 218 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, and 1,955 Roman Catholics; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 40 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 a-year from the Ardagh Association and £1 from the curate, and one with £10 from the Ardagh Association and £4 from Mr. Crawford—had on their books 92 boys and 75 girls.

RATHBARRY, a parish, 3 miles south of Clonsilla, and partly in the western division of the barony of East Carbery; but chiefly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Carbery section, 876 acres; of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 4,809 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,748; in 1841, 2,726. Houses 429. Pop. of the Ibane and Barryroe section, in 1841, 2,543. Houses 396. The surface lies on the east side of Ross Harbour; its vantage-grounds command superb views of the intricate coastline, and the adjacent and intersecting seas away to Toe Head; its coast is picturesque, diversified, and occasionally bold and romantic; and its interior is greatly beautified with Lord Carbery's handsome demesne of CASTLE-FREEKE, which see. Rathbarrycastle, the original pile on the site of the present mansion of Castle-Freke, was an ancient fortified residence of the Barrys.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition, £174 2s. 11½d.; glebe, £4 10s. Gross income, £178 12s. 11½d.; nett, £169 4s. 3d. Patron, the Rev. Henry Stewart and his heirs. One portion of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £174 2s. 11½d., is impropriate in Capt. Roberts and in Thomas Wade Post, Esq.; and another portion, compounded for £63 7s. 11½d., is appropriate. The church was built in 1825, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 45. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ardfield. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 67, and the Roman Catholics to 2,466; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 17 children; and two daily schools—the one of which was supported with £30 a-year from Lord Carbery, and the other salaried with £15 from the National Board—had on their books 87 boys and 75 girls.

RATHBEGAGH, a parish, 2½ miles north-east of Freshford, and partly in the barony of Fassadining, but chiefly in that of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, eastward, 2½ miles; breadth, from ¾ to 2½. Area of the Fassadining section, 854 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches; of the Galmoy section, 2,469 acres, 33 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 786; in 1841, 1,014. Houses 108. Pop. of the Galmoy section, in 1841, 886. Houses 136. The river Nore, pursuing a southerly course, forms the line of division between the two sections; and the small lake Power lies in the Fassadining section. The highest ground is on the south-west border of the Galmoy section, and has an altitude of 252 feet above sea-level. In comparatively very ancient times, copper and silver ores were found in this parish; and

• This is the statement of the Ecclesiastical Authorities. The Census of 1831 makes the figure, 2,536; but takes no notice of the Carbery section.

The first money coined in Ireland is alleged to have issued from Rathbegg. The seats are Beech-Hill-house, Sweethill-house, and Brookville-house. Rathbegg parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Achnours (which see), in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £215; glebe, £30. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 81, and the Roman Catholics to 630; and 2 daily schools were jointly salaried with £16 a-year from the National Board and £24 from local contributions; and had on their books 120 boys and 100 girls.

RATHBEGGAN. See BEHEENA.
RATHBEGGAN, a parish in the barony of Rathoath, 2½ miles south by west of the village of Rathoath, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, east by southward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,865 acres; 3 roads, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 282; in 1841, 304. Houses 47. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Dunshaughis to Dublin. Nearly in the centre is the hamlet of Black-Bush. This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicar (tithe composition, £443 1s. 6d.; glebe, £15. Gross income, £458 1s. 6d.; nett, £132 4s. 7d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £18 9s. 2½d.; and are inappropriate in the patron. The church was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings, 150; attendance, from 15 to 20. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 33, and the Roman Catholics to 258.

RATHBIN, a suppositions parish in co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Mr. Tighe, in his Statistical Observations relative to the county of Kilkenny, says, "Moncktown and Rathbin were probably in the barony of Gowran, but their situations are not known." The Fourth Report of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenue and Patronage, states Rathbin to be a rectory, and part of the benefice of Burnchurch, in the dio. of Ossory, and assigns to it as a parish in 1881 a population of 158; yet that very Report declares it to be "unknown as a parish," and represents it as a mere titular denomination in the incumbent's titles. The First Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction returns Rathbin, Garraun, and Moncktown, as three parishes, and assigns to them unitedly a pop., in 1831, of 158, all Roman Catholics.

RATHBOURNEY, a parish in the barony of Burren, 2½ miles south-west of Ballyvaughan, co. Clare, Munster. Length, southward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 9,633 acres, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, 849; in 1841, 1,000. Houses 177. By far the greater part of the surface is mountainous; and very much is exceedingly rocky, and either quite waste or merely pastoral. Cappanavulla mountain, on the northern boundary, has an altitude of 1,023 feet above sea-level; a height on the southern boundary has an altitude of 635 feet; a height on the eastern border has also an altitude of 635 feet; and a height on the western border has an altitude of 920 feet. The hamlets are Knockatun, Lisavara, Cahirmacraun, and Crough; the chief seat is Ballydallan-house; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of Loughlin castle, Craggan-castle, Johnsgrove-house, and two churches, and the sites of Lisavishen-castle and another castle. The road from Ballyvaughan to Ennistymon traverses the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Kilmora. Tithe composition, £100. The rectories of RATHBOURNEY, AMOREHUR, GLANINAGH, and KILLONAGHAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Rathbourny. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 1,370. Gross income, £330; nett, £312 5s. Patron, the diocesan. The church is of unknown date.

Sittings, 60; attendance, 9. The Roman Catholic chapel of Rathbourny and Killonagh have an attendance of respectively 600 and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish of Rathbourny consisted of 1 Churchman, and 900 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 21 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, and 4,020 Roman Catholics; a pay daily school in the parish had on its books 12 boys and 50 girls; and there was also a daily school in Killonagh.

RATHBOYNE, or BALMATHBOYNE, a parish 2½ miles south by east of Kells, and partly in the barony of Lower Navan, but chiefly in that of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, west by southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2. Area of the Lower Navan section, 509 acres, 2 roads, 23 perches; of the Upper Kells section, 3,392 acres, 1 road; 27 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,271; in 1841, 1,235. Houses 170. Pop. of the Upper Kells section, in 1831, 1,031; in 1841, 1,069. Houses 104. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and is traversed, across the west end, by the road from Kells to Athboy. Two seats are Cortown-castle, Ballybeg-house, and Charlesfort,—the last the residence of John Tindall, Esq. Adjoining Ballybeg is the oldest and most extensive tree nursery in Ireland.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Kells [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £277. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Mohernee and Boyerstown, in the parish of Ardaraun. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 94, and the Roman Catholics to 1,176; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £16 a-year from Mr. Tysdall—had on their books 50 boys and 68 girls.

RATHBRAN, a parish in the barony of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the town of STRATFORD-UPON-SLAKEY; which see. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,831 acres, 3 roads, 1 perch. Pop., in 1831, 2,833; in 1841, 2,221. Houses 335. The surface is bisected south-south-westward by the Slaney; and consists of a pleasant and beautiful portion of the valley and all-screens of that river. The elevation above sea-level of the Slaney's bed at the point where the stream leaves the parish is 394 feet. The summit of Rathoran mountain on the southern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 1,256 feet; the summit of another height on the northern border has an altitude of 945 feet; and the most remarkable height, additional to these, is Rathnagree, a little north-west of Rathoran. The seats are Saundersville, Goldenfort-house, Ballyhook, Ballinacrow, and Saunders-grove,—the last the residence of R. S. Saunders, Esq., and presenting a close resemblance to the old English manor-house. The other features and objects of interest will be noticed in connection with Stratford. The interior is traversed by the road from Dublin to Wexford, by way of Blessington and Newtownbarr.—This parish was formerly a part of the parish of Ballyglass, but is now a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Glebe, £21. Gross income, £113 7s. 1d.; nett, £98 14s. 11½d. Patron, the Hon. John Wingfield. The tithes belong to the incumbent of Ballyglass. The church was built in 1790, at the private cost of the late Edward, Earl of Aldborough. Sittings 150; attendance 60. The Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,050; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballyglass. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 310 Churchmen, 139 Presbyterians, and 2,468 Roman Catholics; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 40 children; and 6 pay daily schools—one of which was a classical school for boys—had on their books 160 boys and 125 girls.

RATHBRAN, co. Mayo. See RATHREA.

RATHBRIDE, a hamlet in the parish of Tully, barony of East Ophaly, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands adjacent to the north-west extremity of the Curragh of Kildare, and 2½ miles north-north-east of the town of Kildare. A fair is held on July 5. In the vicinity are Rathbride-house, Rathbride-cottage, and Rathbride Hare-Park,—the two latter within the limits of the Curragh and within the parish of Kildare. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

RATHCAVAN. See RACAVAN.

RATHCLARE, a village in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. Post-town, Buttevant. Fairs are held on April 26, July 1, Nov. 1, and Dec. 17. Pop. not specially returned.

RATHCLARIN, a parish in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, 4½ miles south by east of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of KILBRITTAIN: which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,801 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,775; in 1841, 2,907. Houses 471. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,619. Houses 428. The surface is washed on the south, partly by the Arigadeen river, but chiefly by the upper stretch of the bay of Courtmacsherry. The land is, in general, of only middle-rate quality; but in consequence of the facility with which sea-manure can be procured, it is of greater value than land of the same quality at a distance from the coast.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £650; glebe, £36. Gross income, £686; nett, £615 10s. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built about the year 1650. Sitings 200; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 140, and the Roman Catholics to 2,563; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 8 children; and 6 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 a-year from the rector and £8 from the Association for Discouraging Vice, one with £6 from Mr. Sealy, one with about £14 from the London Hibernian Societies, and one, which admitted 40 poor children, with £4 from the Roman Catholic clergyman—had on their books 267 boys and 197 girls.

RATHCLINE, or RATHLINE, a barony of the county of Longford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Moydoo; on the east, by the barony of Abbeyshrule; on the south, by the county of Westmeath; and on the west, by the county of Roscommon. Its greatest length, west by northward, is 10½ miles; its breadth varies from ¼ of a mile at the east end to 9½ miles near the west end; and its area is 48,839 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches,—of which 8,820 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches are water. Lough Ree forms five-sixths of the western boundary, and upwards of one-half of the southern boundary; and the rivers Shannon and Inny trace the remaining parts of the respective boundaries. The surface of the barony is everywhere low, and comprises a large aggregate of bog. The eastern district is traversed by the Royal Canal.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Cashel, Rathcline, and Shrule, and part of the parishes of Kilcounack, Noughaval, and Taghshinny. The towns and chief villages are Keenagh, Lanesborough, and part of Ballymahon. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred one townland and part of another in the parish of Noughaval, from the barony of Abbeyshrule to that of Rathcline.—pop., in 1841, 26. Pop. of the barony of Rathcline, in 1831, 14,375; in 1841, 14,569. Houses 2,436. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,910; in manufactures and trade, 490; in other pursuits, 204. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 71; on the directing of labour, 833; on their own manual labour, 1,651; on means not specified, 49. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,180; who could read but not write, 1,493; who could neither read nor write, 2,839. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 719; who could read but not write, 1,702; who could neither read nor write, 4,030.—Rathcline barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Longford. The total number of tenements valued is 2,864; and of these, 1,581 were valued under £5,—573, under £10,—202, under £15,—150, under £20,—82, under £25,—55, under £30,—52, under £40,—28, under £50,—and 41, at and above £50.

RATHCLINE, or RATHLINE, a parish in the barony of Rathcline, co. Longford, Leinster. It contains the town of LANESBOROUGH: which see. Length, south by westward, 6 miles; breadth, from ¼ to 4½; area, 12,883 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches,—of which 1,820 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches are in Lough Ree, 93 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches are in the river Shannon, and 96 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are in Lough Bannow. Pop., in 1831, 3,036; in 1841, 3,095. Houses 496. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,646; in 1841, 2,792. Houses 448. The Shannon and Lough Ree form the whole of the western boundary; and Lough Bannow lies in the northern part of the interior. The islands of Lough Ree which belong to the parish are Little Island, Inchmahon, Goats' Island, Bushy Island, and Inchmundermot. The land of the parish is nearly all low and level; a considerable part of it is bog; and the greater part has a limestone soil of a light and poor description. Rathcline-house, the seat of Luke White, Esq., is situated on the shore of Lough Ree, 1½ mile south of Lanesborough; and some comparatively high grounds on its demesne command a good view of the naked and boggy country which flanks the Connaught side of Lough Ree. The other seats are Mount-Davis, Salisbury-lodge, and Clonbonyhouse. The road from Dublin to Roscommon traverses the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £131 3s. 4d.; glebe, £45. Gross income, £176 3s. 4d.; nett, £154 11s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £262 6s. 8d., and are inappropriate in Messrs. Armstrong. The church was built at the private cost of the Lanesborough family. Sitings 200; attendance 9. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 900 and 150; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 3,013; and 5 hedge-schools had on their books 192 boys and 105 girls. In 1842, a National school at Lanesborough was salaried with £15 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 141 boys and 133 girls.

RATHCOFFEY, a demesne in the parish of Balraheen, barony of Ikenahy and Oughlery, 3 miles north-north-east of Clane, co. Kildare, Leinster. Archibald Hamilton Rowan, Esq., purchased from Richard Wogan Talbot, Esq. of Malahide, the manor of Rathcoffey, built upon it the present mansion, and, with the exception of one ancient gateway, levelled to the ground an old castellated and fortified pile, which had long been the residence of the Wogan family. The Wogans were of Welsh extraction, and settled in Ireland so early as toward the close of the 13th century; but they became merged by marriage alliances, into the families of Talbot, of Malahide, and Browne, of Castle-Browne. Sir John Wogan was Viceroy of Ireland in the reign of Edward I. The Castle of Rathcoffey was captured in June 1642, by Colonel Monk, who afterwards became Duke of Albemarle; and, on this occasion, he made seventy prisoners, most of whom were executed in Dublin as rebels.

RATHCONNELL, a parish in the barony of Moyasbel and Magheradermon, 6 miles east-north-east of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, south-westward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 15,659 acres, 1 road, 12 perches,—of which 231 acres, 2 roads, 30 perches are water. Pop., in 1881, according to the Census, 3,002, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 2,946; in 1841, 3,605. Houses 611. About 405 acres are bog; and the remaining portions of the land average in yearly value about 35s. per plantation acre, prevailing consist of low and level grounds, upon a limestone subsoil, and constitute very fine grazing districts; but though much better adapted for pasturage than for tillage, they have very largely and increasingly been broken up for tillage, and are now principally devoted to the growth of wheat, bere, oats, and potatoes. Loughs Drin, Pot, Slevin, Roch-Hole, Sheevir, Black, and White lie on the boundaries; and Loughs Brittas and Black in the interior. The fine demesne of Knockdrin, the residence of Sir Richard Levinge, Bart., occupies the extreme west; presents a splendid specimen of mixedly natural and artificial scenery; abounds in decorations of wood and water; is presided over by a handsome, modern, castellated mansion; and contains a hill which gives it the name of Knockdrin, and which is sheeted all over with wood, and forms one of the most remarkable features within a considerable expanse of circumjacent country. The other seats are Cooksborough-house, Rathconnell-cottage, Clonlort-house, Reynella-house, Knockbrack-house, Edmondstown, and Killynan-house. The principal hamlets are Pass-if-you-can, Newtown, Cloghan, Drumman, and Ligidillon. The road from Mullingar to Castle-town-Delvin, and that from Castle-Pollard to Killucan pass through the interior.—This parish is a separate benefice, consisting of part rectory and part vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. "It is observed," says the Report of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenues and Patronage, "that the benefice of Rathconnell, as at present constituted, was anciently an union of the parishes of Rathconnell and Turin; and that the whole of the tithes of Rathconnell belonged to the incumbent, who only enjoyed the vicarial tithes of the parish denominated Turin." Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £184 12s. 3d.; glebe, £42 8s. 11d. Gross income £231 8s. 11d.; nett, £177 3s. 4d. Patron, the Marquis of Drogheda. The rectorial tithes of the Turin portion of the benefice are compounded for £184 12s. 3d., and are inappropriate in Nicholas Ogle, Esq. of Dysert. The church is situated on the eastern border of the parish, and was built in 1798, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £369 4s. 7d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 120; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Mountain. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 208 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, and 2,784 Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 45 boys and 12 girls.

RATHCONNELL, one of three denominations of a bog, in the baronies of Farbill, and Moyasbel and Magheradermon, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It lies along the north bank of the Royal Canal, from 1 mile to $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Mullingar. The other denominations than Rathconnell, are Wood-Down and Great-Down. The entire bog comprises an area of 2,505 acres; and lies from 292½ to 336½ feet above the level of high water in Dublin bay. It is in general very firm; and has long been the principal source for the supply of fuel to Mullingar. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,590 17s. 10d.

RATHCONRATH, a barony of the county of Westmeath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Moygoish; on the east, by the barony of Moyasbel and Magheradermon; on the south-east, by the barony of Moyasbel; on the south, by the baronies of Moyasbel and Clonloman; and on the west, by the barony of Kilkenny-West and the county of Longford. Its length, south-westward, is 10 miles; its greatest breadth is 7; and its area is 48,415 acres, 23 perches,—of which 207 acres, 3 roads, 33 perches are water. The surface comprises some bog, and several hills and undulations; but, in general, it forms part of a great fertile plain. The principal heights are the hills of Ushnagh, Rathconrath, and Skeagh, all situated in the east, and possessing an altitude above sea-level of respectively 802, 479, and 426 feet.—This barony contains part of the parish of Dysert, and the whole of the parishes of Ballymore, Ballymorin, Churchtown, Conry, Killure, Piercetown, Rathconrath, and Templepatrick. The principal villages are Rathconrath, Ballymore, and Moyvore. Pop., in 1881, 15,064; in 1841, 15,317. Houses 2,652. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,203; in manufactures and trade, 308; in other pursuits, 161. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 56; on the directing of labour, 630; on their own manual labour, 1,982; on means not specified, 64. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,908; who could read but not write, 1,563; who could neither read nor write, 3,206. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 714; who could read but not write, 1,796; who could neither read nor write, 4,358.—Rathconrath barony lies partly in the Poor-law union of Athlone, and partly in that of Mullingar. The total number of tenements valued is 2,426; and of these, 1,380 were valued under £5,—324, under £10,—206, under £15,—93, under £20,—79, under £25,—62, under £30,—78, under £40,—55, under £50,—and 149, at and above £50.

RATHCONRATH, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Rathconrath, 6 miles west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 5 miles; breadth, from 1 to $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 8,745 acres, 3 roads, 7 perches,—of which 51 acres, 1 road, 33 perches are in Mount-Dalton lake. Pop., in 1831, 2,862; in 1841, 3,378. Houses 599. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,627; in 1841, 3,165. Houses 561. The number of townlands is 22. The proportions to one another of arable land, meadow land, and pasture land, are 13, 1, and 33; but the last of these classes includes a considerable extent of bog and morass. The only hills are those of Rathconrath and Skeagh, with altitudes above sea-level of respectively 479 and 426 feet. Mount-Dalton lake lies chiefly within the parish of Rathconrath, but partly also within the adjoining parish of Churchtown. The principal bogs are those of Killabee and Balnacarra. The rivulet Rathconrath issues from the former of these bogs, and runs northward toward the Inny; and the rivulet Sheawn, though small, traces the boundary-line with the parochial union of Piercetown. Limestone and black flag are quarried; and limestone gravel is raised and used as a natural manure. The seats are: Mount-Dalton-house; Rathcastle; Oldtown-house; and Meakcourt-house. The first of these seats was built about the year 1790; by Count Richard D'Alton, a count of the Roman Empire, and a distinguished officer in the Austrian service. A pyramidal monument, fifty feet high, situated on a rising ground amidst a handsome plantation, and commanding a very extensive and interesting prospect, was built within the Mount-Dalton demesne, by the same gentleman and his brother, General James D'Alton, in honour of George III., the Emperor Joseph II., and the Empress Marie Therese; and three of its sides are adorned with profiles of these sovereigns in white marble, while the fourth bears the D'Alton arms and a suitable inscription. At the death of Count Oliver D'Alton, the last male heir of the ancient family of D'Alton, the Mount-Dalton estates were inherited by his three sisters. The chief antiquities within the parish are ten Rath, one of which contains several rooms or recesses, the ruins of Milltown-castle, Shornstown-castle, and another castle, and the ruins of the former church of Rathconrath, enclosing the burial-place of the remains of General D'Alton. The chief of the raths, or Rath-Connrath-par excellence, adjoins the village, has an altitude above sea-level of 470 feet, and commands an extensive view of the beautifully undulated circumjacent country. The road from Mullingar to Ballymahon passes through the central district of the parish, and the Royal Canal passes across the northern district. The village of Rathconrath stands on the Mullingar and Ballymahon road, and on the eastern verge of the parish; but it is a very poor place, and is remarkable only for containing the church and a constabulary barrack, for giving its name to the parish and the barony, and for giving the title of baron-palatine to the families of D'Alton and Owen. The Owen race of barons of Rathconrath became extinct in the male line towards the close of the reign of Elizabeth, at the death of Sir Richard Owen, uterine brother of Hugh O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 235; in 1841, 213. Houses 88. This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £267; glebe, £27 14s.; Gross income, £294 14s.; nett, £189 19s. 1d.; Patron, the Earl of Lanesborough. The church was built in 1800, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 20 to 25. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Empress. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 90, and the Roman Catholics to 2,825; a hedge-school at Irishtown was usually attended by about 45 children; and 8 daily schools at Milltown, Rathconrath, and Shornstown, had, on their books 189 boys and 117 girls. The school at Milltown was salaried with £10 a year from the National Board; and that at Rathconrath, with £3 and other advantages from the rector. In 1842, the National Board had one school at Milltown, and another at Irishtown. RATHCOOLE, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 8½ miles north-east of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,572 acres, 3 roads, 25 perches, of which 285 acres, 33 perches had detached a little to the north-east. It contains the village of JOHN SWELL, which see. Pop., in 1831, 1,225; in 1841, 1,283. Houses 192. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 929. Houses 137. About one-half of the surface, from the northern extremity southward, is mountainous, and the remainder consists of nearly equal proportions of good land and inferior land. The highest ground is in the extreme north, and has an altitude of 1,099 feet above sea-level. The principal residences are Mount-Ross and Sandford's-court; and the chief antiquities are ruins of a church and two castles. This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £81 8s. 10d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £162 17s. 10d.; and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Canice Cathedral. The vicarages of Rathcoole and KILKYRAN (see that article), constitute the benefice of Rathcoole. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2; Pop., in 1831, 1,331. Gross income, £109 19s. 11½d. nett, £93 4s. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Clonmattagh, and the benefice and prebend of Aghour, in the dio. of Ossory; and is non-resident in Rathcoole. A curate for Rathcoole receives a salary of £30. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Dunmurry in St. John's parish, and to Mandlin-street chapel in Kilkenny. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish and the union amounted to 24; the Roman Catholics of the parish to 1,226; the Roman Catholics of the union to 1,334; and a pay daily school in the parish had on its books 70 boys and 30 girls. RATHCOOLE, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 14 mile north-west by north of Bethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, west-south-westward, 8½ miles; extreme breadth, 8½ acres; 5,904 acres; 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,501; in 1841, 1,077. Houses 240. The surface consists of arable and pasture land of the yearly average value of about 30s. per plantation acre. The principal seats are Derry-lusk-an-house, the residence of Wray Palliser, Esq.; Rocklow-house, the residence of Benjamin Frend, Esq.; Annesgift, the residence of George Gough, Esq.; Coolinoye-house; Athsallagh-house; Prospect-house; Coolmore-house; and Rathcoole-castle. The chief antiquities are the ruins of two churches, the site of a third old church, the site of an old castle, and the ruins of a castle. The road from Bethard to Cuskel traverses the interior. This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of FETHARD (which see), in the dio. of Cuskel. Tithe composition, £365; glebe, £33 13s. 0d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 56; and the Roman Catholics to 1,642; and a pay daily school had on its books 16 boys and 4 girls. RATHCOOLE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, formerly in the barony of Upper-cross, but now in the barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 4,705 acres, 1 road; 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,409; in 1841, 1,527. Houses 276. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 971. Houses 164. About 600 acres are mountain-common; but the remainder of the surface consists, for the most part, of excellent land. One height on the south-west boundary has an altitude of 721 feet above sea-level; one on the eastern boundary has an altitude of 388 feet; and three in the southern and mountainous district have altitudes of respectively 663, 1,008, and 1,308 feet. Two corn-mills are situated in the north. The principal seats are Sladmore; Rathcoole-house; Ballymakilly-house; and Johnstown-house; the last the residence of John Kennedy, Esq. The northern district is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Limerick; and the southern district extends to the south-western extremity of the county, and contains part of the Saggart-Hill group of mountains. The transference of the parish from Uppercross to Newcastle was made by the Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 96. The village of Rathcoole stands on the Dublin and Limerick mail-road, 2 miles south-east of Newcastle, 7½ north-east by east of Naas, and 8 south-west by west of Dublin. It contains the parish-church, a dispensary, two schoolhouses, and a constabulary barrack. The dispensary is within the Celbridge Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 10,013 acres, with a pop. of 3,157; and, in 1839-40, it expended £86 10s., and administered to 1,505 patients. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 602; in 1841, 556. Houses 112. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 74; in manufactures and trade, 31; in other pursuits, 13. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 34; on their own manual labour, 80; on means not specified, 1.—Rathcoole parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £250; glebe, £27. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £60 and are appropriated to the deanery of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. The vicarage of Rathcoole, and the chapelry of CALLAGHSTOWS [see that article], constitute the benefice of Rathcoole. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 1,476. Gross income, £304 16s.; nett, £287 10s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1736, by means of private subscription, and the rents of economy land; and was, not very many years ago, repaired and re-slated by means of a loan of £129 4s. 7½d. from John Kennedy, Esq. Sittings 200; attendance, from 45 to 60. In 1834, the Protestants of the union amounted to 145; the Roman Catholics of the parish to 1,280; the Roman Catholics of the union to 1,344; one daily school in the parish was almost wholly supported by Mr. Latouche, and had on its books 37 boys and 26 girls; and another daily school in the parish was supported wholly by fees, and was usually attended by about 40 children in summer, and between 20 and 30 in winter.

RATHCOONEY, a parish in the barony of Cork, 4 miles east-north-east of the city of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of GLANNIRE, and SALLYBROOK; which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,152 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,988; in 1841, 3,376. Houses 518. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,473. Houses 389. The surface is bounded on the east by the Glannire rivulet, and on the south by the river Lee; it possesses, along both streams, a large amount of finely picturesque character; and it consists of rich arable land in the south, and light, poor arable and pasture land in the north. The mail-roads from Cork to the east and the north-east pass through the interior. The former parish-church, now an old and venerable ruin, measures 42 feet in length and 21 feet in width, and has a principal window at the east end, two small and narrow windows on the south side, and a small and narrow window on the north side. The small cemetery attached to it is still a favourite place of interment, and contains several old tombstones. Rath or intrinchements are numerous.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £300; glebe, £18. The rectories of RATHCOOLE, CAHIRLOG, and LITTLE-ISLAND [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Rathcooney, and the corps of Rathcooney prebend. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½. Pop., in 1831, 5,907. Gross income, £1,005; nett, £836 19s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Brinny and Knockavilly in the dio. of Cork; but he is resident in Rathcooney. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built in 1784, by means of private subscriptions. Sittings 300; attendance 230. The Rathcooney Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Templemichael and Dunbullogue. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Cahirlog. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 174, and the Roman Catholics to 2,661; the Protestants of the union, exclusive of 18 Dissenters, to 453, and the Roman Catholics to 5,443; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 40 children; 7 daily schools had on their books 199 boys and 171 girls; and 9 daily schools in the union had on their books 292 boys and 199 girls. One of the daily schools in the parish was salaried with £24 a year from the rector; one, with £4 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and £10 6s. from subscription; one, with £5 17s. 6d. from subscription, £10 from the Kildare Place Society, and £4 from the Cork Diocesan Education Association; one, with £8 from the National Board, and £9 from subscription; and one, with £12 from the National Board, and £10 Irish from a bequest by the late Rev. M. O'Keefe.

RATHCOR (LOWER AND UPPER), two villages in the parish of Carlingford, barony of Lower Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Lower Rathcor, the larger of the two, is situated on the north shore of Dundalk bay, 2 miles west of Cooley Point, and ½ south of Carlingford; and Upper Rathcor is situated between 2 and 3 furlongs inland from Lower Rathcor. In the vicinity are a coast-guard station, Ballug-house, Ballug-castle, and the hamlets of Templetown, Maguire's-Cross, the Bush, the Acre, and Riverstown. Area of Rathcor, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 274; in 1841, 175. Houses 30.

RATHCORE, a parish, partly in the barony of Upper Deece, but chiefly in that of Lower Moylenragh, co. Meath, Leinster. The Moylenragh section contains the town of ENFIELD; which see. Length of the parish, west by northward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 4½. Area of the Deece section, 1,078 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches; of the Moylenragh section, 12,804 acres, 26 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,455; in 1841, 3,546. Houses 555. Pop. of the Deece section, in 1831, 402; in 1841, 445. Houses 76. Pop. of the rural districts of the Moylenragh section, in 1841, 2,720. Houses 430. The surface lies on the southern margin of the county; and is traversed by the Royal Canal and by the mail-road from Dublin to Galway. A small quantity of it is bog and morass; much is good meadow and grazing ground; and most is very good or even excellent tillage land. The interior contains a watershed between the basin of the Liffey and that of the Boyne. The principal hamlets, with their respective pop. in 1831, are Rathcore, 73; and Blackwater, 60. Rathcore is situated 23 miles north of Enfield, on the road to Togher, and is the site of the parish-church. The principal seats are Newcastle-house, Ballinderry-house, Springmount, Rahenstown, Johnstown, and Rhyndville,—the three last the residences of respectively R. G. Bonford, Esq., J. H. Rourke, Esq., and R. S. Rhaynd, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £309 4s. 7d.; glebe, £62 2s. Gross income, £431 0s. 7d.; nett, £394 8s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £438 9s. 2½d., and are appropriated to the see of Meath. The church was built in 1788. Sittings 120; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rathmaylan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 133 Churchmen, 2 Presbyterians, and 3,286 Roman Catholics; and 4 hedge-schools at Enfield, Rathcore, Ballycaran, and Ballinascree, were usually attended by about 130 children. In 1842, two National schools at Baconstown had on their books 121 boys and 123 girls.

RATHCORMACK, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Barrymore, co. Cork; Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4; area, 13,995 acres. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 5,113, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 5,143; in 1841, 5,324. Houses 815. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,539; in 1841, 4,003. Houses 614. The surface consists of part of the valley and hill-screens of the river Bride; and is traversed southward by the mail-road from Dublin to Cork. About three-fourths of the land are fit for tillage, and possess a good soil; and the remaining fourth is unclaimed mountain, all capable of improvement and cultivation. On the north side of the Bride's valley, is a range of hills, terminating in a summit called Cairn-Tierna, or the Thane's or Lord's Heap; and on this summit is a large, rude heap of stones, said to have been the judgment-seat of a very ancient and primitive toparchy, and the central-spot of the place of assembly on which the families of a sept, in the days of tanistry, elected their chiefs. Dr. Smith regards the tradition respecting this object as evidence that cairns were sometimes of very different character and purpose from sepulchral monuments. The hill of Cairn-Tierna is a conspicuous feature in an extensive landscape. Lismear, the pleasant seat of Lord Riversdale, and the ancient residence of the descendants of Mac-Adam Barry, is situated on the Bride closely adjacent to the town, and contributes to the scenery of the warmest portion of the parish, the features of a manorial mansion and a beautifully planted demesne. This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £842; glebe, £64. Gross income, £906; nett, £819 17s. 2d. Patron, William Smith, Esq. of Headborough, co. Waterford. A curate receives a salary of £100. The church was enlarged in 1828, by means of a loan of £276 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 300; attendance, from 40 to 170. The Wesleyan Methodist chapel has an attendance of 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,500; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Gurtroe. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 310, and the Roman Catholics to 4,891; a Protestant Sunday-school was usually attended by about 80 children; and 8 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £7 a-year from the rector, one with £12 from the National Board, and one with £10 from Lord Riversdale, and £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice—had on their books 197 boys and 123 girls.

RATHCORMACK, a market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Rathcormack, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the river Bride, and on the road from Dublin to Cork by way of Kilkenny and Clonmel, 3½ miles south by west of Fermoy, 4½ north-north-east of Watergrasshill, 9½ north-north-west of Middleton, 14 north-north-east of Cork, and 112 south-west by south of Dublin. It is a pretty place, pleasantly situated, and beautifully environed; it consists principally of one street; and it has a church, a Methodist meeting-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, one or two schools, and a sessions-house. A dispensary here is within the Poor-law union of Fermoy, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 12,573; and, in 1839-40, it expended £70 14s., and administered to 3,000 patients. Fairs are held on Aug. 12, and Oct. 20. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Tuesday of every month. The nearest point of any projected railway, occurs on the Dublin and Cork line at Mitchellstown. The public conveyances are coaches and other vehicles in transit from Cork to Fermoy, Clonmel, Kilkenny, and Dublin. The town, though a parliamentary borough, or a place possessing the parliamentary franchise, does not appear to have been incorporated. A charter of 33 Charles II. erected the town into a free borough, gave it the power of sending two members to parliament, and vested that power in its freeholders and inhabitants; and the compensation of £15,000 for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union was all paid to the trustees of the will of the late Lord Riversdale. Area of the town, 49 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,574; in 1841, 1,321. Houses 201. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 102; in manufactures and trade, 98; in other pursuits, 51. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 105; on their own manual labour, 111; on means not specified, 22.

RATHCORMUCK, co. Waterford. See RATHCORMUCK.

RATHCOURSEY, a village in the parish of Garranekenneff, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 165. Houses 28.

RATHCROGHAN. See RAGH-CROGHAN.

RATHDOWLAN, an ecclesiastical parish in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, ¾ of a mile; breadth, ¾; area, 357 acres. Pop. not specially returned. The political topography of the kingdom treats it as merely a township of the parish of Ballinadee. Rathdowlan is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Ballinadee, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £35. All other statistics are mixed up with those of BALLINADEE; which see.

RATHDOWN, a Poor-law union in the counties of Dublin and Wicklow, Leinster. It includes a small part of the co. Dublin baronies of Dublin and of Uppercross, the greater part of the co. Dublin barony of Rathdown, and the whole of the co. Wicklow barony of Rathdown; and it comprehends an area of 51,154 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 39,391. It ranks as the 61st union, and was declared on Aug. 8, 1839. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are, in co. Dublin, Dundrum, 2,020.—Blackrock, 6,136.—Kingstown, 6,571.—Stillorgan, 2,799.—Killiney, 3,713.—Glencullen, 2,282.—and Rathmichael, 1,290; in cos. Dublin and Wicklow, Bray, 5,710; and, in co. Wicklow, Powerscourt, 4,002.—and Delgany, 3,404. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 8 and 24; and of the latter, 4 are elected by the division of Blackrock, 4 by Kingstown, 3 by Bray, 2 each by Dundrum, Stillorgan, Killiney, Glencullen, Powerscourt, and Delgany, and 1 by Rathmichael. The Blackrock division lies within the baronies of Dublin and Rathdown-Dublin; the divisions of Kingstown, Stillorgan, Dundrum, and Glencullen, lie within Rathdown-Dublin; the divisions of Rathmichael and Killiney lie in Rathdown-Dublin and Uppercross; the division of Bray lies in Rathdown-Dublin and Rathdown-Wicklow; and the divisions of Powerscourt and Delgany lie in Rathdown-Wicklow. The number of tenements valued in the barony of Dublin district, is 88,—in the Rathdown-Dublin district, 4,171,—in the Uppercross districts, 356,—in the Rathdown-Wicklow districts, 1,636,—in the entire union, 6,251; and of this total, 2,631 were valued under £5,—925, under £10,—400, under £15,— 351, under £20,—347, under £25,—280, under £50,—376, under £40,—190, under £50,—and 761, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £168,396 8s. 3d.; the total number of persons rated is 6,330; and of these, 351 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—969, not exceeding £2,—020, not exceeding £3,—876, not exceeding £4,—and 316, not exceeding £5. The workhouse is situated in the parish of Rathmichael; it was contracted for on July 21, 1840,—to be completed in March 1841,—to cost £1,500 for building and completion, and £1,100 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 8 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £49 12s. 9d.—and to contain accommodation for 600 paupers; it was first opened for the admission of paupers on Oct. 12, 1841; and it contained 348 pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843. The total expenditure of the union previous to the opening of the workhouse amounted to £655 9s. 7d.; and the expenditure from the date of opening till Feb. 6, 1843, amounted to £5,126 15s. 11d. The medical charities within the union are fever hospitals at Bray, Enniskerry, and Rathdown, and dispensaries at Bray in co. Dublin, Bray in co. Wicklow, Booterstown, Dundrum, Enniskerry, Kilternan, Stillorgan, Killiney, Kingstown, and Rathdown; and, in 1839-40, they received £771 17s. from subscription, £654 19s. from public grants, and £58 14s. from other sources,—expended £802 5s. 3d. in salaries to medical officers, £175 16s. 5d. for medicines, and £630 14s. 5d. for contingencies,—and administered to 311 intern and 15,609 extern patients. The fever hospital officially reported to be at Rathdown, is really situated at Monkstown; it serves for a district containing a pop. of 29,288; and, in 1839-40, it expended £135 2s. 2d., and admitted 180 patients. The Rathdown dispensary does not seem to have any defined district; and, in 1839-40, it expended £178 14s. 9d., and administered to 1,232 patients.

RATHDOWN, a maritime barony of the county of Dublin, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony and the bay of Dublin; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by the county of Wicklow; and, on the west, by the barony of Uppercross. Its length, westward, is 7½ miles; its greatest breadth is 7 miles; and its area is 32,870 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. It contains the whole of the beautiful and brilliant sweep of coast from Blackrock, round by Dalkey and Killiney, to Bray; it comprises the greater portion of both the southern sea-board and the southern background or perspective of the bay of Dublin; it contains, in its upland district on the southern margin of the county, one or two of the most magnificent panorama-viewing summits in Ireland; and it, in consequence, both forms and commands some of the most superb landscapes within the United Kingdom. The chief summit of Killiney hills, on the coast immediately south of Dalkey, has an altitude above sea-level of 472 feet; and the Three-Rock Mountain, the Two-Rock Mountain, Prince-William's-Seat, and three other principal summits in the southern district, and upon the margin of the county, have altitudes of respectively 1,479, 1,763, 1,825, 1,103, 1,350, and 1,618 feet. The other parts of the barony consist, in a general view, of rich champaign ground, and are very profusely powdered with manions and villas, and embellished with wood, shrubbery, lawn, and garden. The Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 96, transferred part of the parish of Rathfarnham from the barony of Newcastle to that of Rathdown,—pop., 4,364; two townlands of the parish of Rathmichael from Tippercross to Rathdown,—pop., 778; and the whole of the parish of Dalkey from Uppercross to Rathdown,—pop., 1,419.—The barony of Rathdown, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Booterstown, Donnybrook, Monkstown, Rathfarnham, and Taney, and the whole of the parishes of Dalkey, Kilgobbin, Kill, Killiney, Kilmarud, Kiltierman, Old Connaught, Rathmichael, Stillorgan, Tully, and Whitechurch. The towns and chief villages are Kingstown, Booterstown, Dalkey, Stepaside, Gallopington-Green, Killiney, Bullock, Cabinteely, Glashule, Honey-park, Little-Bray, Rathfarnham, Ponds, Roundtown, Stillorgan, Dandrum, Windy-Harbour, Ballyboden, Edmondstown, part of Williamstown, and part of Blackrock. Pop., in 1831, 29,288; in 1841, 38,775. Houses 6,051. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,883; in manufactures and trade, 1,932; in other pursuits, 2,358. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 848; on the directing of labour, 2,835; on their own manual labour, 3,124; on means not specified, 686. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 8,159; who could read but not write, 2,527; who could neither read nor write, 4,686. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 8,708; who could read but not write, 4,078; who could neither read nor write, 5,902. Rathdown barony lies partly in the Poor-law union of South Dublin, but chiefly in that of Rathdown. The total number of tenements valued is 4,474; and of these, 1,850 were valued under £5,—538, under £10,—323, under £15,—237, under £20,—100, under £25,—207, under £30,—313, under £40,—149, under £50,—and 647, at and above £50.

RATHDOWN, a maritime barony in the north-east of the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Dublin; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by the baronies of Newcastle and North Ballinacree; and, on the west, by the barony of Lower Talbotstown and the county of Dublin. Its length, westward, is 9½ miles; its greatest breadth, southward, is 5½ miles; and its area is 34,381 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches,—of which 93 acres, 1 rood, 23 perches are in Loughs Bray. The surface is one of the most exquisitely varied, powerfully romantic, and generally interesting districts in even the county of Wicklow; and it boasts, upon its coast, the grand promontory of Bray Head,—upon its boundaries, the Scalp and the Glen of the Downs,—and, in its interior, Glencree, Loughs Bray, the Sugarloaf mountain, the glen of the Dargle, and the vale of Powerscourt. The chief summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are, in the interior, the Great Sugarloaf, 1,651 feet; and, on the boundaries, Kippure, 2,473 feet,—Prince-William's-seat, 1,828 feet,—War-hill, 2,250 feet,—and Douce, 1,384 feet.—This barony contains part of the parish of Calary, and the whole of the parishes of Bray, Delgany, Kilmacanogue, and Powerscourt. The only town is the larger part of Bray; and the principal villages are Delgany, Killinacraig, and Enniskerry. Pop., in 1831, 11,652; in 1841, 11,423. Houses 1,767. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,091; in manufactures and trade, 448; in other pursuits, 415. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 148; on the directing of labour, 512; on their own manual labour, 1,185; on means not specified, 114. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,148; who could read but not write, 917; who could neither read nor write, 1,777. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,985; who could read but not write, 1,163; who could neither read nor write, 2,602.—Rathdown-Wicklow barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Rathdown. The total number of tenements valued is 1,636; and of these, 797 were valued under £5,—283, under £10,—132, under £15.—81, under £20,—51, under £25,—68, under £30,—38, under £40,—40, under £50,—and 140, at and above £50.

RATHDOWN, an old and ruined castle, and the site of a quondam village, on the coast of the parish of Delgany, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Bray Head, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of the village of Delgany, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. "Beside a little stream in a deep ravine, and on the bold sea-beaten shore, stand the ruins of the once strong and extensive castle of Rathdown. The ground plan may be distinctly traced by the heaps of ruinous masonry, now all grass-grown, which, like lifeless bodies that occupy the very spot on which they perished, lie regularly and artificially arranged in square, and circular, and other usual architectural forms. The basement of one large square tower may still be seen, the walls of which are four feet in thickness; in the eastern side was a circular-headed window, the architrave of which is yet tolerably perfect. Wild and deserted as the whole of this district, from the Windgate-road to the beach, now appears, with scarcely a comfortable residence, it was once the site of the village of Rathdown, and surrounded by baronial and ecclesiastical edifices. The castle, St. Crispin's cell, and the parish-church, were within short distances of each other and of the village." (Guide to Wicklow.)

RATHDOWNEY, a parish in the barony of Clandonagh, Queen's county, Leinster. It contains the town of RATHDOWNEY, and part of the village of DOONAGHMORE; see these articles. Length, west by northward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, $5\frac{1}{2}$. But these measurements include the parish of Rathsarán, which lies isolated in the centre of Rathdowney; and they at the same time include a detached district of Rathdowney, which lies 1 mile north-east of the main body, and measures 2 miles by $1\frac{1}{2}$. See RATHSARÁN. Area of Rathdowney, 17,116 acres, 2 roads, 28 perches,—of which 1,585 acres, 12 perches are in the detached district. Pop., in 1831, 6,654; in 1841, 6,756. Houses 1,058. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,207. Houses 836. A large proportion of the surface, especially in the west, is bog; and the remainder consists partly of good arable land, but principally of good grazing-ground. Nearly all the parish is flat, tame, and wholly or partially repulsive; and the main body borrows some slight relief from one or two low hills in Rathsarán. The chief seats are Lisduff-house, Harristown-house, the Cottage, Lackland-house, and Beechfield-house; the principal hamlet is Errill, situated $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of the town of Rathdowney; and the chief antiquities are the site of an abbey on the south-west border, the ruins of a Roman Catholic chapel, and of Clonburren-castle on the south border, the ruins of two churches in the south-east, the site of a castle in the east, the ruins of a friary, a church, and a castle, at Errill, and the ruins of Ballagh-castle and Graigneavallagh-house in the centre. The road from Monrath to Thurles traverses the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £250; glebe, £418 16s. 9d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £500; and are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Canice cathedral. The vicarage of Rathdowney and the rectories of GLASHERE and KILDELLIG [which see], constitute the benefice of Rathdowney. Pop., in 1831, 7,576. Gross income, £866 6s. 9d.; nett, £758 3s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1815, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance, from 80 to 150. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of from 100 to 150. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Grogan, in the parish of Rathsarán. In 1884, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 609 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 6,210 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 617 Churchmen, 5 Protestant dissenters, and 7,144 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 30 children; and 14 daily schools in the union—12 of which were in the parish—had on their books 540 boys and 326 girls. Two of the daily schools in the parish were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and two with the National Board; and one of the former two was principally supported by subscription. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at Rathdowney, and one at Errill. Ledwich, the well-known antiquary, was for some time curate of Rathdowney.

RATHDOWNEY, a small market and post town in the parish of Rathdowney, barony of Clandonagh, Queen's county, Leinster. It stands on the road from Monrath to Thurles, and near the source of the river Erkin, 5 miles south by east of Borris-in-Ossory, 7 west of Castle-Durrow, 9 north-east of Templemore, 10 south-south-west of Monrath, 18 north-north-east of Thurles, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Dublin. It is a poor place, amid a tame country, and without any interior feature of interest. It contains the church, a Methodist meeting-house, the Roman Catholic chapel, two National schools, a constabulary barrack, and a small inn and posting establishment. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Saturday of every month. Fairs are held on Jan. 27, April 1, May 6, July 10, Sept. 12, Nov. 1, and Dec. 15. The route of the projected line of railway from Dublin to Cork approaches within 3 miles of the north-west side of the town. The Rathdowney dispensary is within the Roscrea Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 10,176; and, in 1839, it received £99 6s. and expended £104 10s. 8d. Area of the town, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,214; in 1841, 1,414. Houses 203. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 96; in manufactures and trade, 116; in other pursuits, 52. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 18; on the directing of labour, 126; on their own manual labour, 104; on means not specified, 16.

RATHDRUM, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the south end of the barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, south by eastward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,798 acres, 3 roads, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,688; in 1841, 2,905. Houses 384. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,673. Houses 238. The surface descends to the southern extremity of the barony, at the 'Meeting of the Waters'; it is bounded by the Avonmore river along the whole of the east, and by the Avonbeg along one-half of the west; and it contains some moorish and mountainous ground in the north, but consists, in general, of a comparatively low and a lusciously beautiful and powerfully picturesque portion of the Upper basin of the Ovoca. A rivulet in the north-west descends within the parish from an elevation above sea-level of 973 feet; and the Avonmore, while on the eastern boundary, descends from an elevation of 905 feet to one of 102 feet. The principal demesne is the brilliant one of AVONDALE; which see. The other seats are Avon-Hill-cottage, Ballard-Park, Avon-Park, and Ballinderry-house. The chief hamlet, Ballinderry, is situated 2 miles north-west of the town, and on the western verge of the parish. The road from Dublin to Wexford, by way of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy and Arklow, passes through the interior.—This parlals, according to ecclesiastical topography, is merely one of four denominations of the parish of Rathdrum; the other denominations being BALLYRISK, KNOCK-RATTA, and BALLINACOR [which see]; and the whole being contained, in 1831, a pop. of 8,624. The ecclesiastical parish, comprising the four denominations, is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Its composition, £553 16s. 11d.; glebe, £34 10s. Gross income, £610 14s. 7d.; nett, £506 7s. 7½d. Patron, the Corporation of the city of Dublin. A curate receives a salary of £100. The parochial church was built in 1785, at the cost of £1,476 18s. 5½d., raised by subscription, a loan, and the sale of the materials of the former church. Sittings 500; attendance 500. There are churches also in the chapels of CARYSFORT and BALLINACLASH, [which see]. The Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of from 30 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapels at Rathdrum, Clara, Maerredin, and Greenan, have an attendance of respectively 800, 600, 1,200, and 1,200. In 1831, the Protestants of the quoad civilia parish amounted to 1,038, and the Roman Catholics to 1,650; the Protestants of the quoad sacra parish to 1,889, and the Roman Catholics to 6,735. In 1834, 2 Sunday schools at Rathdrum were usually attended by about 160 children; 3 Sunday schools at Carysfort, Ballinaclesh, and Ballinacor, were usually attended by about 200 children; and 9 daily schools within the quoad sacra parish had on their books 218 boys and 181 girls, and were attended by about 59 other children. One of the daily schools was a Royal chartered school, supported by about £133 a year from the income of vested land; one was salaried with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one with £22 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one, with £20 from the Earl Fitzwilliam, and educates 12 children free; one, with £20 from subscriptions, guaranteed by Capt. Bury and the rector of Castle-Macadam; one, with £10 from Mr. Kenna; and the remaining three were partly supported by the rector of Rathdrum. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at Maerredin, one in Rathdrum workhouse, one at Tromperstown, one at Muckloe, and one at Glenmalur.

RATHDRUM, a market and post town in the parish of Rathdrum, barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the west bank of the river Avonmore, and on the road from Dublin to Wexford, 2½ miles east by north of Ballinacor, 6½ south-west of Rathnew, 7½ south-west by west of Wicklow, 9½ north-north-west of Arklow, 20 south by west of Bray, and 30 south of Dublin. The approach from the Glanely road is highly picturesque, and commands two fine views of the Avonmore, winding gracefully along a pleasing vale. The town occupies the acclivity and the summit of a hill, which overlooks the vale below, and is seriously and permanently disadvantageous for the purposes of both thoroughfare and trade; and though Rathdrum has enjoyed more patronage and stimulating, and commands a much greater scope of country for marketing, than most places of its amount of population, it continues to be unprosperous, and is a poor and miserably-looking place. In consequence of the steepness of the hill on which the town stands, and whose summit has an altitude of 759 feet above sea-level, the public road passes a few perches to the west; but a branch road leads up to the centre of the town, and conducts over the summit. The town contains the parish-church, the Roman Catholic chapel, a daniel-hill, a workhouse, a dispensary, two comfortable inns, and some schools. The daniel-hill crowns the summit of the hill, and is a square structure, extending 200 feet in front, and ornamented with a cupola, a clock, a bell, and the Rockingham arms; and it was built in 1793, at the cost of £3,500, the whole of which was contributed by Earl Fitzwilliam, the proprietor of the town. The total of sales at this establishment during 12 years ending in 1800, was 55,042 pieces of woollen; but the manufacture which it was designed to establish and promote has eventually proved an entire failure. Fairs are held on Jan. 2, Feb. 16, March 13, April 5, May 25, June 19, July 5, Aug. 31, Oct. 10, Nov. 11, and Dec. 11. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Thursday of every month. The public conveyances in 1839 were a car in transit between Dublin and Arklow, a coach between Dublin and Enniscorthy, and a coach and a mail-coach between Dublin and Wexford. The name Rathdrum is a corruption of Rathdrin, the name of the seats of the chiefs of Coolan, situated in the vicinity; and the site of the town is supposed also to have been that of the ancient Durum, which Ptolemy mentions as the city and the metropolis of the Meaurin. In 1565, Rathdrum was taken by the Lord-deputy Fitzwilliam from Phieagh MacHugh O'Byrne, one of the most turbulent and powerful of the Irish enemies of the government of Queen Elizabeth. Area of the town, 88 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,654; in 1841, 1,232. Houses 146. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 59; in manufactures and trade, 84; in other pursuits, 49. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 60; on their own manual labour, 85.

The Rathdrum Poor-law union ranks as the 77th, and was declared on Sept. 25, 1840. It lies wholly in co. Wicklow, and comprehends an area of 207,358 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 51,689. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are Newcastle, 7,521; Killiskey, 2,025; Arklow, 8,325; Kilbride, 2,365; Castle-Macadam, 5,155; Dungarstown, 3,796; Wicklow, 4,743; Rathdrum, 6,688; Glendalough, 2,600; Roundwood, 2,354; Glanely, 2,849; and Aughrim, 3,077. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 10 and 30; and of the latter, 4 are elected by each of the divisions of Arklow, Newcastle, and Rathdrum, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The barony of Newcastle contains the divisions of Newcastle and Killiskey; the baronies of Newcastle and Arklow contain the divisions of Wicklow and Glanely; the baronies of Newcastle and North Ballinacor contain the divisions of Roundwood; the barony of North Ballinacor contains the division of Glendalough; the baronies of Newcastle, Arklow, North Ballinacor, and South Ballinacor contain the division of Rathdrum; the barony of South Ballinacor contains the division of Aughrim; and the barony of Arklow contains the division of Arklow, Kilbride, Castle-Macadam, and Dungarstown. The number of tenements valued in the Arklow districts is 3,433,—in the North Ballinacor districts, 1,632,—in the South Ballinacor districts, 591,—in the Newcastle districts, 2,642,—in the entire union, 8,298; and of this total, 4,140 were valued under £5,—1,074, under £10,—1,092, under £15,—484, under £20,—324, under £25,—233, under £30,—345, under £40,—219, under £50,—and 767, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated, is £133,318 18s. 4d.; the total number of persons rated is 8,781; and of these, 871 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—2,018, not exceeding £2,—632, not exceeding £3,—300, not exceeding £4,—and 334, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on June 16, 1840,—to be completed in Sept. 1841,—to cost £6,600 for building and completion, and £1,200 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 5 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches obtained for an annual rent of £10 18s. 6d.,—and to contain accommodation for 600 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was March 8, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,012 6s. 10d.; and the total previous expenditure was £733 15s. 10d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 376. The medical charities within the union are the County infirmary at Wicklow, fever hospitals at Arklow, Wicklow, and Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, and dispensaries at Arklow, Aughrim, Calary, Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, Rathdrum, and Redcross; and, in 1839-40, they received £550 13s. 2d. from subscription, £1,626 19s. 5d. from public grants, and £2 from other sources. The Rathdrum dispensary serves for a district of 83,509 acres, with a pop. of 14,711; and, in 1839-40, it expended £107 7s. 7d., and made 5,047 dispensations of medicine.

RATHDRUMMIN, a parish in the barony of Fennard, 2½ miles east-south-east of Dunleer, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,211 acres, 27 perches. Pop., in 1831, 640; in 1841, 710. Houses 119. The surface consists of tolerably good land, and is all in tillage. The seats are Walshestown-house and Kiltullagh-house. The hamlets are Rathdrummin and Ardholies; and the former had, in 1831, a pop. of 171. The road from Drogheda to Amnagassou passes across the western wing; and the road from Dunleer to Clogher passes through the interior. A large Danish rath, in good preservation, measuring 60 yards in diameter, and surrounded by a double fosse and mounds, the exterior of which measures 130 yards in diameter, is situated in the vicinity of the hamlet of Rathdrummin.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £86 6s. 8d.; glebe, £20. The rectories of Rathdrummin and CARRICKBOGOT, and the vicarage of PORT [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Rathdrummin.—Pop., in 1831, 1,789: Gross income, £310 4s. 1d.; nett, £286 7s. 5d.: Patron, the Crown. The church is situated at the hamlet of Rathdrummin, and was built in 1814, by means of a loan of £461 10s. 8d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 8 to 10. The Roman Catholic chapel at Walshestown has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel at Hacket's-Cross in the benefice of Ternonfocan. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 662; the Protestants of the union to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,794.

RATHEANICH, the unknown site of an early ecclesiastical establishment, in the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. Archdall, who, with exquisite facility, makes every early Celtic station an abbey, and every early Christian minister a bishop, says, "St. Brugach, the son of Degad, was bishop of Ratheanich about the beginning of the 6th century; from which period we can learn nothing of it."

RATHEASPUICINNIC, the site of an early church, in the barony and county of Antrim, Ulster. Yet such historical notices as exist of the foundation is deeply tinged with the fabulousness of much of the hagiology of St. Patrick; and Archdall's account of it says, "St. Patrick founded a church here, and appointed St. Vinnoe bishop of it. It is in the territory of Hua-derchain, a valley in the barony of Antrim. There are four churches in this valley; one of which, Rathmore, probably is Ratheaspuicinnic."

RATHERNAN, a parish in the barony of Connell, 3 miles north-west of Newbridge, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,140 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,010; in 1841, 977. Houses 155. The intersection of a tongue of Kilmagee parish, not more than about 1 furlong in mean breadth, cuts Rathernan into two mutually detached parts, the northern one of which comprises an area of 1,376 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. A very large proportion of the parochial surface is bog; and the remainder consists, in the aggregate, of poor light land. The whole surface is a bleak portion of the low and far-spreading tableau of the county; and it contains the Hill of Allan, and the summit-ground of the Bog of Mounds, whose altitudes above sea-level are respectively 676 and 318 feet. Rathernan-house is the only seat. The Leap of Allen is on the western margin. The Grand Canal impinges on the extreme north; and the road from Kildare to Robertstown passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMAOGES [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £118 4s.; glebe, £21 15s.; in 1834, the Protestants amounted to 129, and the Roman Catholics to 923; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RATHEARNE. See RAHARNEY.

RATHEARNHAM, a parish, partly in the barony of Uppercross, but chiefly in that of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. The Rathdown section containing the villages of RATHFARNHAM, PONDS, and ROUNDTOWN: see these articles. Length of the parish, south by westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 2. Area of the Uppercross section, 200 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches; of the Rathdown section, 2,581 acres, 30 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,573; in 1841, 4,460. Houses 707. Pop., in 1841, of the Uppercross section, 75; of the rural districts of the Rathdown section, 2,479. Houses in these respectively, 13 and 381. The whole parish formerly lay within the barony of Newcastle; and it was politically transferred to its present position by the Act 5 and 6 Victoria, cap. 96. The parochial surface is bisected by the river Dodder, possesses agreeable undulations and other natural diversities, consists for the most part of excellent land, presents the utmost profusion of mansion and villa decoration, borrows from the vicinity of the Dublin hills much protection and great scenic power, and exhibits a richer combination of beauty, romance, and seclusion, than any other portion of the crowded and gorgeous environs of the metropolis. The roads from Dublin to Glencree, and to Blessington, pass through the interior. The principal seats are Barley-hill, Edenbrook, Willbrook, Fonthill-abbey, Barton-lodge, Silveracre, Rathfarnham-castle, Landscape, Newtown-house, Newtown-cottage, Rathgar-house, Mountainview, West Bourn, Prospect-villa, Pearmount, Tranquilla, Terrace, Garville, Annefield, Glenpool-place, Mount-Tallant, St. John's, Bessborough, Scholarstown-house, Hayfield, Boden-park, Terenure-house, Fortfield, and Kimmoge,—the three last the residences of respectively Frederick Bourne, Esq., Sir William MacMahon, Bart., and the Right Hon. F. Shaw.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Peter's, in the dio. of Dublin. (See DUBLIN, COUNTY OF THE CITY OF.) Tithe composition, £290 15s. 4d.; Two curates for Rathfarnham receive each a salary of £50. The church was built in 1780, partly by means of a gift of £369 4s. 7d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 700; attendance, from 300 to 450.—The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 400 to 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Tal-laght and Crumlin. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 880 Churchmen, 14 Protestant dissenters, and 3,549 Roman Catholics; a daily school, in connection with the London Hibernian Society, was supported almost wholly by subscription, and had on its books 38 boys and 40 girls; a Roman Catholic daily school was supported by collections at charity sermons in the chapel, and was usually attended by from 60 to 90 children; a third daily school was aided with £2 a-year from the archdeacon of Dublin, and was usually attended by from 20 to 40 children; and a daily school at the Loretto nunnery was supported chiefly by the nuns, and had on its books 145 girls. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at respectively Rathfarnham and Loretto.

RATHFARNHAM, a large and pleasant village in the parish of Rathfarnham, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the right bank of the Dodder, and on the road from Dublin to Glencree and Laragh, or at the commencement of the Military-road, 2 of a mile south of Roundtown, 1½ mile west-north-west of Dundrum, and 3 miles south of Dublin. It has, in some parts, a rural and pleasing character; and its principal thoroughfare is flanked with the boundaries of demesnes, and shaded and overhung with trees. Its church is a respectable structure, ornamented with a neat spire, but otherwise destitute of architectural decoration; it is built of rough stone, with coigns of squared stone at the angles of the tower and other parts of the building; and its windows have wooden frame-work, and are of dissimilar forms. The only other noticeable public buildings are the Roman Catholic chapel and the schools. A dispensary in the village is within the South Dublin Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 2,724 acres, with a pop. of 4,573; and, in 1839, it expended £143 2s. 9d., and administered to 1,234 patients. A fair is held on July 10. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Tuesday of every month. Rathfarnham-castle, situated in a once noble demesne, at the south-east extremity of the village, was not long ago esteemed a magnificent building, and boasted a gorgeous picture-gallery, and a superb series of garden and pleasure grounds, but it was allowed to fall into decay in consequence of the prolonged non-residence within it of its proprietor, the Marquis of Ely, and it now prosaically, though usefully, figures as an extensive dairy. "The mansion termed Rathfarnham-castle, long a seat of the Loftus family, and now the property of the Marquis of Ely," said Mr. Brewer in 1825, "is an extensive fabric, in the style often termed modern Gothic, an appellation by no means improperly applied to an edifice, in the design of which particulars of Grecian and embattled architecture are licentiously mingled. The great hall is entered from a terrace, by a portico of eight Doric columns, which support a dome, painted in fresco, with the signs of the zodiac and other devices. This room is ornamented with antique and modern busts placed on handsome pedestals of variegated marbles; and has three windows of stained glass, in one of which is an escutcheon of the Loftus arms, with quarterings finely executed. Several other apartments exhibit considerable splendour of arrangement, and contained, until lately, numerous family portraits, and a valuable collection of paintings by ancient masters. The castle of Rathfarnham was founded by Archbishop Loftus. On the breaking out of the rebellion in 1641, Sir Adam Loftus, of Rathfarnham, held a garrison in this castle, in order to cover the city against the irruptions of the sept of O'Byrne and O'Toole. Adam, the grandson of that gentleman, and the son of Sir Arthur Loftus, Lieutenant-colonel of Sir Charles Coote's regiment, and governor of the town of Naas, was, by privy seal, dated the 5th of January 1685, and by patent, the 29th of the same month, created baron of Rathfarnham, and Viscount Lisburn. His only daughter Lucia, by Lucia, daughter to George Brydges, Lord Chandos, marrying Thomas Lord Wharton, carried the Rathfarnham estate into her husband's family. Lord Lisburn, the father of Lady Wharton, was killed by a cannon shot, on the 15th September 1691, commanding a regiment in the service of King William, at the siege of Limerick; and Philip, late Duke of Wharton (who was also Earl of Rathfarnham, and Marquis of Carlow), sold this estate in 1723, to William Conolly, Esq., speaker of the house of commons, for the sum of £62,000, from whose successors, as we believe, it passed to the late Marquis of Ely. The mansion has been lately deserted as a residence by its noble proprietor, and the best pictures, together with the family portraits, and have been removed from the halls, to which they afforded appropriate and estimable ornaments. The demesne lands of the castle are laid out with considerable judgment, and are entered from the Rathmines road by a splendid gateway, ranking among the best productions of this species of architecture to be witnessed in Ireland." On May 23, 1798, a body of rebels broke out into insurrection at Rathfarnham, where the Earl of Ely had the command of a yeomanry corps of cavalry; and they went into skirmishing action with the yeomanry, and forced them to retreat. Area of the village, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,572; in 1841, 644. Houses 98. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 53; in manufactures and trade, 56; in other pursuits, 40. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 57; on their own manual labour, 69; on means not specified, 20.

RATHFEIGH, or RATHFAYGH, a parish in the barony of Skreen, 4½ miles south-south-west of Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, southward, 2½ miles; breadth, from 1 to 2½; area, 2,887 acres, 3 roods, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 385; in 1841, 301. Houses 47. The land is, in general, of an indifferent quality. The seats are Skerry-bill, Woodland-house, Dorea-cottage, and Gilliamstown-cottage. The hamlets are Rathfeigh and Edoxtown. The road from Duleek to Summerhill, and that from Slane to Dublin, intersect each other in the interior. — This parish is nominally a chapelry, but practically a rectory, and part of the benefice of SKREEN (which see), in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £180; glebe, £5. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Skreen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 387; and a hedge-school had on its books 21 boys and 24 girls.

RATHFRAN, a small estuarial bay, and a fishing harbour, in the parish of Templemurry, barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It opens immediately north of Ross-point, on the west side of Killalla bay, 2½ miles south of Kileumman Head; and it penetrates the land nearly two miles south-westward, with a mean breadth of about ½ a mile, and receives at its head the united waters of the rivulets Breaghwy, Rathroe, Duwoven, and Cloonaghmore. The peninsula of Ross, which flanks its south-east side, is curiously intersected by the sea at high water; and the creeks behind it have a valuable soil, and would richly repay the cost of embankment and reclamation. The estuarial bay of Rathfran is nearly all dry at the ebb of the tide; but the channel, which is kept open by the stream along its north-west side, though narrow and rather troublesome, for yaws, is safer and less broken than the channel on the bar of Killalla; and though no quay has as yet been built, an excellent situation for one occurs at the old saltworks on the north-west side.

RATHFRILAND, or RATHFRYLAND, a market and post town in the parishes of Drumballyrone and Drumgath, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the intersection of the roads from Newry to Downpatrick, from Warcuppoint to Droemore, from Rostrevor to Lisburn, and from Kilkree to Banbridge, 3 miles north of Hilltown, 7 north-east by east of Newry, $7\frac{1}{4}$ south-south-east of Banbridge, $7\frac{1}{2}$ west by south of Castlewelling, $27\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Belfast, and 57 north by half east of Dublin. It stands on the acclivities or ascent of a small hill, and radiates, downward, in a series of streets, toward the five roads which meet at its site. The rock on which it stands, and of which its houses are built, is a firm, close, gritty sandstone, abounding near the surface of the adjacent lands, easily cut into squares, pillars, urns, and vases, and yielding, in the quarries whence it is raised, a dry and bright-coloured sand, of excellent use in garden walks. The summit of the hill on which the town stands commands an extensive view of the surrounding country; and is crowned by some slight remains of an old castle, anciently one of the fortified mansional residences of the Magennis, Lords of Iveagh, and tribute-payers to the proud and oppressive O'Neills. The castle was originally a large pile, but it was pulled down by the first Protestant proprietor of the town after the rebellion of 1641, and used as a quarry for the erection of the inn and other houses of the town. The present public buildings are a Presbyterian meeting-house formerly belonging to the Seceders, a Covenanters' meeting-house, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a market-house; and within two miles of it are another Covenanters' meeting-house, another Roman Catholic chapel, and the parish-church of Drumballyrone. The Rathfriland dispensary is within the Newry Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 48,500 acres, with a pop. of 25,000; and, in 1839, it expended £124, and administered to 1,026 patients. A considerable proportion of the inhabitants are employed in the linen manufacture. Fairs are held in Feb.; April, June, Aug., Sept., and Dec. A court of petty-sessions is held on the third Friday of every month: One car runs to Newry, one to Banbridge, and another in transit between Newry and Downpatrick. The manor of Rathfriland, which includes the town, was granted by Charles II. to Alderman Hawkins of London, in guerdon of services rendered to Protestant refugees; and it still belongs to the alderman's descendant, the Hon. General Meade. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 2,001; in 1841, 2,183. Houses 433. Area of the Drumballyrone section, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 724; in 1841, 733. Houses 144. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 43; in manufactures and trade, 109; in other pursuits, 19. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 73; on their own manual labour, 84; on means not specified, 3. Area of the Drumgath section, 45 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,277; in 1841, 1,450. Houses 289. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 42; in manufactures and trade, 224; in other pursuits, 56. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 180; on their own manual labour, 90; on means not specified, 27.

RATHGAR, a village in the parish of Rathfarnham, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands 1 mile north by east of the town of Rathfarnham, and 2 miles south of Dublin-castle. Here, and in the immediate vicinity, are Rathgar-house, numerous villas, some ranges of neat houses, an extensive bleaching-green, muslin, calico, and silk print-works, and an extensive quarry of calp and black flinty limestone. Pop. not specially returned.

RATHGORMUCK, or RATHCORMACK, a parish in the barony of Uppertin, co. Waterford, 4 miles south-west of Carrick-on-Suir, Munster. Length, south-south-westward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, 5; area, 17,965 acres, 8 roods; 19 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,252; in 1841, 2,498. Houses 333. The greater part of the surface consists of the loftiest summits, declivities, and glens of the Monavoughl or Cummeragh mountains; and is remarkable for the great average altitude of its water-levels, and of the basis of its mountains. Its lakes are only ponds in extent; but they possess a wild and sublime interest in the loftiness of their elevation, and the stern grandeur of their scenery. Lough Cummeragh lies on the southern border, and has a surface-elevation of 1,630 feet above sea-level. Loughs Connistillomore and Connistillogbeg, lie on the southern boundary, and have an elevation of upwards of 4,200 feet. Lough Coumdoula lies in the centre, and has an elevation of 1,533 feet. Lough More lies in the western border between two mountains of respectively 2,181 and 2,478 feet of altitude. The river Mahon rises within the south-eastern border, at an elevation of upwards of 2,630 feet; the rivulet Nier traces the southern boundary from an elevation of upwards of 1,200 feet; a rivulet, tributary to the Suir above Carrick, traces the north-western boundary from an elevation of 1,066 feet; and the Clodiagh rivulet issues from Lough More, and runs eastward through the interior. The principal summits of the Cummeragh mountains within the parish, named in an order from south-east to north-west, have altitudes of severally 2,504, 2,028, 2,478, 2,181, and 1,751 feet above sea-level; and the principal hill-summit north of the Clodiagh has an altitude of 816 feet. The valley land of the eastern and northern districts is generally arable and fertile. Shanekill-house, the only seat, stands on the eastern border, immediately south of the Clodiagh; and Rathgormuck, the only village, stands on the eastern border, $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile north of that stream. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 130. Houses 23. The south road from Portlao to Clonmel, passes through the interior of the parish. "At Rathgormuck," says the Rev. Mr. Ryland, "the church occupied a large space of ground, and there are near it traces of former improvements. The west wall of the church is still standing, and exhibits some remains of its Saxon architecture, which appears to have been afterwards, in some degree, replaced by Gothic arches, clumsily affixed to the exterior of the doors and windows."—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of MOTUELL [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £167 3s. 6d., and the rectorial for £241 4s.; and the latter are inappropriate in the daughters and co-heiresses of the late Col. Hardy. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Motuell. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 2,306; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided with £5 a-year from Lady Osborne—were usually attended by about 120 children. In 1843, a National school in Glenpatrick was salaried with £15 a-year, and had on his books 49 boys and 28 girls; but don't boast.

RATHGRAFF, or RATGRAVE, a parish in the barony of Donaghry, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It contains the town of CASTLE-POLLARD; which see. Length, south by westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 6,024 acres; 1 road, 22 perches, — of which 4½ acres; 22 perches are in Lough Gloe. Pop., in 1831, 3,612; in 1841, 3,606; Houses 601. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,094; in 1841, 2,296. Houses 394. The surface consists, for the most part, of arable and fertile land. The principal seat is Kintark-house, the beautifully wooded residence of W. D. Pollard, Esq.; and the other seats are Drumintan and Freaghmore. Lough Gloe lies on the eastern boundary, and has a surface-elevation of 268 feet above sea-level; and the river Gloe issues from it, and runs westward across the interior. This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe-composition, £104 2s. 9½d.; glebe, £27 6s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £83 6s. 8½d., and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Westmeath. The vicarages of Rathgraff, LICKLA, FAUGHALSTOWN, and MOYNE, and the curacies of FAYORAN, ST. MARY'S, and ST. FEIGHAN'S-OF-FORE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Rathgraff. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 7. Pop., in 1831, 13,206. Gross income, £609 11s. 4d.; nett, £444 16s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Kileash, in the dio. of Lismore, and the chaplaincy of Wilson's Hospital, in the city of Dublin; and is non-resident in Rathgraff benefice. A curate receives a salary of £75, and has the use of the glebe-house, offices, and garden. Part of Rathgraff-parochial union constitutes the perpetual curacy of Moyne. The church of Rathgraff is situated at Castle-Pollard, and was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £2,769 4s. 7½d. from the late Board of First Fruits;—Sittings 300; attendance, from 150 to 300. There is a church also in Moyne. The Roman Catholic chapels of Castle-Pollard, Bohorbay, Carlanstown, and Tullystown, have an attendance of respectively from 800 to 1,200, from 200 to 400, about 400, and from 500 to 600; those of Colinstown and Fore have an attendance of respectively from 800 to 500, and from 400 to 600; and those of Faughalstown and Moyne have an attendance of respectively about 400, and from 500 to 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, each of these sets of chapels is mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of Rathgraff parish amounted to 378, and the Roman Catholics to 3,190; the Protestants of the union—exclusive of the perpetual curacy of Moyne—amounted to 787, and the Roman Catholics to 12,527; a Sunday school in Castle-Pollard was usually attended by about 85 children; 7 daily schools in Rathgraff parish had on their books 195 boys and 111 girls; and 22 daily schools in the union, exclusive of Moyne, had on their books 762 boys and 453 girls. One of the daily schools in the parish was salaried with £5 5s. a-year from the vicar, £5 5s. from the Earl of Longford, and £5 5s. from Mr. Pollard; and one was a boarding and daily school, whose charge for each boarder was £32 a-year.

RATHGRAINE. See TARA.

RATHGRANAGHER, a village in the parish of Kilmainmore, barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands 2½ miles north-east of the village of Kilmain, on the road thence to Ballindine. Area, 3 acres. Pop., in 1841, 137; Houses 25.

RATHHENDRICK, a hamlet in the parish of Loughan, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 95; Houses 18.

RATHJORDAN, a parish in the barony of Cl n-

William, 3 miles east of Six-Mile-Bridge, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 4; area, 1,064 acres. Pop., in 1831, 400; in 1841, 473. Houses 62. The surface is bounded on the south by the Camogue river; and wholly consists of good arable and pasture land. This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLYBROOD [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £70; glebe, £7 1s. 7½d. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RATHKEALE, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Lower Connello, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 12,065 acres. Pop., in 1831, 8,800; in 1841, 8,293. Houses 1,313. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,828; in 1841, 4,002. Houses 624. The surface is a rich, beautiful, and well-cultivated portion of the valley of the Deel; and is traversed by the road from Limerick to Killarney. Among its seats are Beechmount, Thomas Lloyd, Esq.; Mount Brown, S. Brown, Esq.; Stoneville, J. Massey, Esq.; Nauteman, Thos. H. P. Royse, Esq.; Elmhill, Ion Studdert, Esq.; and Glenville, W. Massey, Esq.; and immediately west of it is Castle-Matress, or Castle-Matrix, the seat of Lord Viscount Southwell, erected in the reign of Elizabeth. John Southwell, Esq. of Berham, the descendant of an ancient English family, immigrated into Ireland in the reign of James I.; his grandson, Sir Thomas Southwell of Castle-Matress, was created a baronet in 1682; the grandson of this first baronet, also Sir Thomas Southwell, was created Baron Southwell of Castle-Matress in 1717; and Thomas, the third Baron Southwell, was advanced to the dignity of Viscount in 1776. A colony of German Protestants were introduced by this noble family to the estates of Castle-Matress, and were afterwards induced to settle on some adjacent estates; and, under the name of Palatines, they continue to impress a peculiar character on both the social and the economical character of the whole district immediately around the town of Rathkeale, and extending from Castle-Matress eastward to Adare. The Palatines settled in this district about a century and a half ago; and were about sixty years ago noticed in the following terms by Farar, the historian of Limerick:—"They preserve their language, but it is declining; they sleep between two beds; they appoint a burgo-master to whom they appeal in all disputes. They are industrious men, and have leases from the proprietors of the land at reasonable rents; they are consequently better fed and clothed than the generality of Irish peasants. Besides, their modes of husbandry and crops are better than those of their neighbours. They have by degrees left off their sour kront, and feed on potatoes, milk, butter, oats and wheaten bread, and some meat and fowls of which they rear many; they keep their cows housed in winter, feeding them with hay and oats straw; their houses are remarkably clean, to which they have stables, cow-houses, a lodge for their plough, and neat kitchen-gardens; the women are very industrious, and perform many things which the Irish women could never be prevailed on to do; besides their domestic employments and the care of their children, they reap the corn, plough the ground, and assist the men in every thing." In short, the Palatines have benefited the country by increasing tillage, and are laborious, independent people, who are mostly employed on their own small farms. "Even now," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "they are very different in character, and distinct in habits, from the people of the country. We visited several of their cottages, or, as they are better pleased to call them, 'houses,' in the neighbourhood of Adare; and the neatness, good order, and quantity and quality of the furniture—useful and ornamental—too surely indicated that we were not in a merely Irish cabin. Huge stretches of bacon hung from the rafters; the chairs were, in several instances, composed of walnut, tree, and oak; massive and heavy although rudely carved chests contained, as we were told, the house linen and woollen, and the wardrobes of the inhabitants. The elders of the family preserve in a great degree, the language, customs, and religion of their old country; but the younger mingle and marry with their Irish neighbours. The men are tall fine stout fellows, as our Irish friends said, "to follow;" but there is a calm and stern severity and reserve in their aspect that is anything but cheering to a traveller to meet, particularly after being accustomed to the brilliant smiles, and hearty "God save ye kindly," so perpetually on the peasant's lips and always in his eyes. This characteristic is also remarkable in the cottages—the women are sombre looking, and their large blue eyes are neither bright nor expressive; they are slow to bid you welcome; and if they rise from their seats, resume them quickly, and hardly suspend their occupations to talk with you; not that they are inebriate—they are simply cold, reserved, and of that high-toned manner which is at ease with or careless of the presence of strangers. In their dealings they are considered upright and honourable; like the Quakers of old, they do not interfere with either politics or religion, are cautious as to land taking, and in the troublous times, when the generality of persons were afraid to walk forth, the quiet Palatine pursued his avocations without let or hindrance, being rarely if ever molested. Many of the old Palatines used to have their bibles buried with them, and this accounts for our being unable to find any other than English bibles in their houses. We failed, indeed, to discover any books in their own language; but one of the elders told us, they had given many of them to the soldiers of the German legion as keepsakes, while that body was quartered in the neighbourhood. There are at present, both as regards their customs and traditions, only a relic of the past, and yet one so strongly marked and so peculiar, that it will take a long time before all trace of the fatherland is obliterated. Their superstitions, also, savour strongly of the banks of the Rhine; but they are careful in communicating them, which may proceed from their habitual reserve. Rathkeale parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £656 6s. 2d.; glebe, £43 18s. 9d. The rectories of Rathkeale, Kilsannell, Clounagh, Clounsmine, and Duxdownell [see articles], constitute the benefice of Rathkeale. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Pop., in 1831, 11,497. Gross income, £1,324 12s. 5d.; nett, £1,111 1s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the united benefice of Clonmel and Templeroia in the dio. of Cloyne, and the vicarage archdeaconry of the dio. of Tuam; but he is resident in Rathkeale. Two curates for Rathkeale and Kilsannell receive each a salary of £75. The church of Rathkeale was built in 1832, by means of a loan of £1,500 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance, about 200. There is a church also in Kilsannell. The Rathkeale Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of about 120; and there is a Methodist meeting-house also in Kilsannell. The Rathkeale Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 3,000 to 4,000; and there are Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilsannell and Clounagh. In 1834, the inhabitants of Rathkeale parish consisted of 701 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 8,478 Roman Catholics. The inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,022 Churchmen, 8 Protestant dissenters, and 10,363 Roman Catholics; and 16 daily schools in the union—13 of which were in the parish—had on their books 440 boys and 250 girls. One of the schools in the parish was sanctioned with £8 a-year from the London Hibernian Society; and £20 from subscription; one, with £20 from the London Hibernian Society and from subscription; one, with £10 from Cull White; and one, with about £10 from the London Hibernian Society, and about £30 from subscription. In 1843, the National Board had two schools in the town of Rathkeale; and one in Rathkeale workhouse.

RATHKEALE, a market and post town in the parish of Rathkeale, barony of Lower Connello, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands on the right bank of the river Deel, and on the road from Limerick to Killarney, 4 miles south-south-east of Askeaton, 6 north-north-east of Newcastle, 6 south-west by west of Adare, 13½ north-west by north of Charleville, 14 south-west by west of Limerick, 30 north-east by north of Killarney, and 108 south-west by west of Dublin. It consists principally of one street, about a mile in length; it contains many good houses and shops; it ranks as the second town of importance in the county; and it boasts a prosperous appearance, and a beautiful and far-sweeping periphery of environs. Its retail trade is extensive; and its corn trade is important. Fairs are held on Jan. 6, Feb. 7, March 10, April 4, May 8, June 1, June 19, July 17, Aug. 25, Sept. 18, Oct. 15, Nov. 18, and Dec. 13. The town has a bridewell, and is the seat of courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions, the latter held on the second Thursday of every month. The nearest point of projected railway occurs on the Shannon line, in the vicinity of Askeaton. The public conveyances, in 1838 were two cars to Limerick, a car to Cork, a mail-coach and a car in transit between Limerick and Tralee, a car in transit between Limerick and Killarney, and a car in transit between Limerick and Newcastle. In the reign of Elizabeth, Rathkeale sustained a siege by the English troops; and at a subsequent period, it acquired a considerable increase to its prosperity in the colonization of the Palatines. Its workhouse, its fever hospital, and its dispensary, will be noticed in the next paragraph. A priory for Augustinian canons of the order of Aroacia, was founded at Rathkeale, by a person of the name of Harvey. Area of the town, 93 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,972; in 1841, 4,201. Houses 689. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 239; in manufactures and trade, 302; in other pursuits, 225. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 68; on the directing of labour, 304; on their own manual labour, 317; on means not specified, 77. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 754; who could read but not write, 239; who could neither read nor write, 638. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 625; who could read but not write, 345; who could neither read nor write, 1,043.

The Rathkeale Poor-law union ranks as the 3d, and was declared on Dec. 27, 1838. It lies wholly in co. Limerick, and comprehends an area of 108,340 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 67,373. Its electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, are, in the barony of Shanid, Kiltergus, 489; Kilmoyle, 166; Loughill, 252; Shanagolden, 475; Dunmylan, 202; in the baronies of Shanid and Lower Connello, Lisnakeery, 294; in the barony of Lower Connello, Askeaton, 539; Rathkeale, 1,167; Crough, 477; Nantinan, 260; and Kilsannell, 215; in the barony of Kenry, Ivarts, 192; Kilsennan, 411; Ardcanmy, 258; Kildimo, 350; and North Adare, 133;

in the barony of Coshma, South Aclare, 391; in the baronies of Coshma and Upper Connello, 744; and in the barony of Upper Connello, Kilkenny, 174. The number of valued tenements in the Coshma districts is 1,125; in the Lower Connello districts, 2,742; in the Upper Connello districts, 184; in the Kenry districts, 1,353; in the Shanid districts, 1,778; in the entire union, 7,182; and of this total, 2,612 were valued under £5, 1,287, under £10, 854, under £15, 305, under £20, 403, under £25, 226, under £30, 407, under £40, 200, under £50, 649, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £139,246 18s.; the total number of persons rated is 7,182; and of these, 691 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1, 389, not exceeding £2, 570, not exceeding £3, 389, not exceeding £4, and 343 not exceeding £5. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 10 and 30; and the Board meet on every Monday. The workhouse was constructed for on Oct. 28, 1839, to be completed in Dec. 1840, to cost £6,666 for building and completion, and £864 for fittings and contingencies, to occupy an area of 6 acres, purchased for £350, and to contain accommodation for 600 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was July 26, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £3,403 3s. 6½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,411 14s. 4d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 3, 1843, was 244. The medical charities within the union are fever hospitals at Rathkeale and Adare, and dispensaries at Rathkeale, Adare, Askeaton, Glinn, Pallas-Kenry, Scough, and Shanagolden; and, in 1839-40, they received £584 10s. from subscription and £756 6s. 10d. from public grants, expended £816 5s. in salaries to medical officers, £255 5s. for medicines, and £212 6s. for contingencies, and administered to 390 intern and 13,149 extern patients. The Rathkeale fever hospital is capable of simultaneously accommodating 24 patients, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 13,576; and, in 1839-40, it expended £233 4s., admitted 226 intern patients, and administered to 1,014 extern patients. The Rathkeale dispensary serves for the same district as the fever hospital; and, in 1839-40, it expended £118, and administered to 902 patients.

RATHKELTY. See RAHELTY.

RATHKENNAN, a parish in the barony of Lower Kilnamanagh, 2 miles west-south-west of Holycross, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 786 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 235; in 1841, 277. Houses 35. The surface lies a little west of the right margin of the Suir, and is traversed by the road from Holycross to Clonoulty. This parish is a perpetual curacy, and part of the benefice of HOLYCROSS [which see], in the dio. of Cabel. The tithes are compounded for £43 12s. 1d.; and are impropriate in William Pennefather, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 230; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RATHKENNY, a parish, 4 miles north-west of Slane, and formerly in the barony of Lower Navan, but now in that of Upper Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 5,490 acres, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,903; in 1841, 2,177. Houses 395. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Navan to Drumecondra, and by that from Slane to Nobber. The chief seats are Rathkenney-house in the north, and Mullagh-house in the south; and the principal hamlets are Rathkenney, Windy-harbour, and Mullaghmore.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithes composition and gross income, £191 16s. 3½d.; nett, £173 8s. 4½d. Patron, Thos. Hussey, Esq. The incumbent holds also the perpetual curacy of Ballymakeenny, in the dio. of Armagh; and is non-resident in Rathkenney. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £193 2s. 1½d., and are impropriate in Andrew Caldwell, Esq. The church is situated at the village of Rathkenney, but is of unknown date of erection. Sittings 80; attendance, from 6 to 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,200 to 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Slane and Stackallen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 43, and the Roman Catholics to 2,030; and a hedge-school had on its books 39 boys and 23 girls. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at Rathkenney were salaried with £15 and £9 Gs. 8d. from the National Board, and had on their books 132 boys and 137 girls.

RATHKIERAN, or RATHKRYAN, a parish of two sections, in the barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The southern section contains the church, and is situated 4½ miles west-north-west of Waterford. Length, south-south-westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½. The other district lies 2 miles north of the nearest part of the southern district. Length, southward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the whole, 3,478 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 1,511, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,408; in 1841, 985. Houses 135. The southern section consists, for the most part, of good land; contains Bungrooly hamlet, and the seat of Ashgrove-house; and is traversed by the road from Waterford to Clonmel. The northern section has in its centre a hill whose summit attains an altitude of 726 feet above sea-level, and contains Rochestown-house, Listrollap hamlet, and the site of Rochestown-castle.—This parish is an appropriate rectory, and impropriate vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory; the rectory belongs to the dean and chapter, and the vicarage to the vicars choral of St. Canice's cathedral. A curate is appointed by the vicars choral, and receives a salary of £35. The church was officially reported in 1834, to be attended only by the minister and his clerk. The Roman Catholic chapel at Molincin has an attendance of 1,684; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Corrigan, in the parish of Portnecally, and to that of Killinacup in the parish of Tubrid. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 450 children; and 2 daily schools—one of which was attached to a nursery at Molincin—had on their books 200 boys and 250 girls.

RATHLAOGHIN. See TARA.

* Both the Census of 1831, and the Ecclesiastical Authorities appear to include in Rathkieran a tithe-free portion of the parish of Pulross which lies around the village of Molincin, and which is ecclesiastically under the care of the curate of Rathkieran.

RATHLIN, or RAGHERY, a parish and an island, in the barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It consists of a main district, extending east and west; and of a subordinate district, extending southward from the east end of the main district. Length of the main district eastward, 34 miles; extreme breadth, 14. Length of the subordinate district southward from the north-east extremity of the main district, 23 miles; extreme breadth, 4. Area of the whole, 3,398 acres, 3 roads, 10 perches. Of which 30 acres, 2 roads, 14 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,040; in 1841, 1,010. Houses 165. The island is called Kinea by Pliny; Ricina by Ptolemy; Riduna by Antonius; Recun and Reclin by the Irish historians; Racinda by Buchanan, Rachlin by Ware, Rathlin by almost all modern writers and mapmakers, and Racbery or Ragbery by its own inhabitants; and the radix of its name is supposed by Dr. Hamilton to be Rath-Erin, 'the fortress of Ireland';—and by other writers to be Riadalean, 'the habitation of the waters.' Bull-Point, at the south-western extremity of the main district, lies 34 miles north of Kenbane Head; Rue-Point at the southern extremity of the subordinate district, lies 24 miles north-west of Fair Head; and Altacarra, at the north-eastern extremity of both districts, lies 124 miles south by east of the island of Islay, and 14 west by north of the Mull of Kintyre. The marine sweep or large indentation between Bull-Point and Rue-Point, and washing nearly one-half of the coast of the island, is called Church bay; and both this bay and the channel between it and the mainland of Ireland, are so scourged by a powerful current and by a conflux of tides, chafing in recesses and recoiling from headlands, as to be continually in agitation, and often very dangerous. "Upon approaching the coast of the island," says the author of the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "an exact analogy is observable in its geological structure, to the mainland; and on that point of it lying immediately opposite Kenbane Head, a singular combination of dykes occurs; apparently continuations of those which, at the latter place, appear to have been attended with such extraordinary disturbances. Three black dykes are here seen traversing the chalk, which is converted into a finely granular marble. These dykes are a little to the west of Church bay. Here also, at a place called the Black Rock, fragments of the old sandstone are found associated with blocks of syenite, in great abundance. The shores of Ragbery rise very abruptly from the sea, particularly about Kentraun, 318 feet above its level. Here the cliffs appear to be continued down under the water with artificial perpendicularity. The principal landing-place is at Church bay, where the visitor must not expect to find either a village or an inn. The island is the property of Mr. Gage, who holds it by a lease in perpetuity, under the Countess of Antrim. This gentleman is completely lord of the isle, and banishes his subjects to the continent of Ireland for misconduct, or repeated offences against his laws. The extreme western end of the island is called Kenrainer, and is 352 feet above the ocean; here is the Bull-Point, an elevation of 280 feet. At the same end of the island is a fresh-water lake, called Lough Cliggin, whose height above the high-water mark is 238 feet. And near Ushet is Lough Runalin, only 144 feet above the same level. It may be observed, that the surface is in general greatly elevated above the ocean, the lowest point, Altahony, being 89 feet high, and the highest, Blieve Ard, 372 feet. The mean elevation is 200 feet. Formerly distinctions existed between the inhabitants of each end of the island, and the qualifications of Ushet and Kenrainer men were looked upon as totally dissimilar. This, however, is now quite extinguished. Near Ushet, at a place called Doon Point, the disposition of the basaltic columns is very remarkable, some being perpendicular, others horizontal, and others curved. The base of this little promontory is a natural pier or mole. Above this is a collection of columns of a curved form, apparently assumed in conformity with the surface on which they rest, and inducing a belief that they were so moulded when in a state of softness; and above both these arrangements, there is a variety of differently disposed columns, partaking of every position in which basalt has been discovered at other places. About the one-fourth of the entire surface of the island consists of rocks and stony pastures; and the remainder consists of tolerably good arable land. Rathlin was, at an early period, the scene of mutual predatory expeditions between the Irish and the Scotch; it was used by both nations, in their alternate successes, as a place of both retreat and depot; and it belonged, for a considerable period, to the principality, lordship, or kingdom of the Scottish Hebrides. Several tumuli were recently discovered in the centre of the island, and were found to contain various ancient implements of war, such as brazen swords, spears, and a large fibula, which are supposed to have been deposited in the course of very early conflicts. The celebrated Robert Bruce of Scotland, during the ebb of his fortunes in his wars with Baliol, took refuge on the north-east coast of Rathlin, in a castle which tradition asserts to have been built by the Danes, and to have been the seat of most oppressive power exerted by them upon the inhabitants. The ruins of the castle are situated about 3 furlongs south of Altacarry Point; and though now reduced to mere fragmentary remains, they are peculiarly interesting, from the fact that their mortar embodies some cinders of sea-coal, which bear a close resemblance to those of the coal of Ballycastle, and which appear clearly to prove that the use of sea-coal in the north of Ireland was of considerably earlier date than is generally supposed. On the beach, at a little distance from the castle, is a natural cavern, with a wall in front, evidently intended for defence, called Bruce's Cave; which oral history states was also used as a place of retreat by the Scottish chieftain; and it is here worthy of record, that in the summer of 1797, every male adult in Ragbery, except the parish priest and one other gentleman, took the test of United Irishmen in the gloomy recess of Bruce's cavern. Adjoining is a small haven, called Port-na-Sassanach, and near it a field of battle is pointed out, called the Englishmen's graves,—a pit or hollow remains, where the dead were probably interred in one common grave. This action is believed to have taken place in 1551-2, when an English army, who landed here, were totally defeated by the M'Donnells. Bruce, during his exile here, was accompanied by some of his principal followers, amongst whom were Sir Robert Boyd, Sir James Douglas, and Angus M'Donnell, sixth King of the Isles, and sovereign of Ragbery, which island was at this period accounted part of his dominions. Early in the spring of 1507, Angus returned to Kintyre, to circulate a report of the death of Bruce, and also to secretly draw together a body of troops, to act when occasion might require in behalf of his illustrious friend. Soon after, Boyd and Douglas also took leave of Bruce, and departed for Arran; and effecting their landing in safety, ten days after they were followed by Bruce, who, receiving by his spies favourable intelligence from the mainland, landed at Turnberry, in Carrick, and, with 300 followers, cut to pieces a body of English quartered in that neighbourhood. However, soon after, succours arriving to his enemies, he was obliged to seek shelter in the wilds of Carrick, the patronal country of his family.—St. Connall, a predecessor of St. Columba, is said to have landed on Rathlin with the intention of acting as a missionary, but to have been instantly seized by 60 military men, and expelled from the island. A Culdean church or other establishment was founded on Rathlin, some say by St. Columba, in 633; and, by the former class of authorities, it is alleged to have been placed under the care of the Deacon Colman, son of Roi. In 796 and in 973, Rathlin was invaded and ravaged by the Danes. In 1551, the English attempted to take possession of it, but were repulsed, with the loss of one vessel. In 1558, the Scotch took possession of it; but were soon expelled, with dreadful slaughter, by the Lord-deputy Sussex, the representative of the English power. A dreadful massacre is traditionally said to have been perpetrated in Rathlin, by the Scottish clan of the Campbells; and, in 1575, General Morris, at the head of a body of men from Carrickfergus, landed on the island, and slew 240 of its inhabitants.—Rathlin parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor.—Tithe composition, £60; glebe, £18 15s. Gross income, £106 9s.; nett, £98 14s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £60, and has the use of a house and garden rent-free. The church was built in 1815, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 3d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 80; attendance, from 40 to 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 151, and the Roman Catholics to 932; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 37 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £12 a-year from the rector, and two with respectively £12 and £13 from the London Librarian Societies—had on their books 108 boys and 85 girls.

RATHLINE. See RATHCLIFFA.

RATHLIN-O'BIRNE, a group of islets in the parish of Kilbarrow, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies 19 miles west-north-west of the nearest part of the parish and the barony to which it belongs, and about a mile west of the south-western extremity of the parish of Glencolumbkille and barony of Bannagh. It screens the north side of the entrance of Donegal bay; measures about 6 furlongs by 4; and consists principally of Large Island, Small Island, and Gull Island.

RATHLOGAN, a parish in the barony of Galway, 4 miles north-north-east of Celbridge, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, west by northward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 2; area, 484 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1841, 218. Houses 34. The ruins of the old church exist; and the mail-road from Dublin to Cork, by way of Cashel, passes across the western district.—This parish is bounded on the south by the parish and rectory of Fertagh, in the dio. of Ossory; and is ecclesiastically regarded as part of that rectory. See FERTAGH.

RATHLYNAN, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 4½ miles north-east of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,781 acres, 3 roods, 30 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 1,190, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,354; in 1841, 1,347. Houses 182. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Tipperary to Thurles. The seats are Ballinaclogh-house and Lackagh-house; and the chief antiquities are the ruins of one castle and the sites of two other castles. A constabulary station occurs near the centre.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINTEMPE [which see], in the dio. of Cashel.—Tithe composition, £200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 1,412; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school. RATHMACKNEE, a parish in the barony of Forth, 3½ miles south by west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,861 acres, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 549; in 1841, 573. Houses 94. The land, in general, is good; and the surface declines slowly to the south-south-east. The seats are Smagborough-house, Rathjamey-house, Bloothill-house, and Shortallstown-house. The chief antiquities are the site of a church, and the well-preserved ruins of Rathmacknee-castle.—the latter the property of H. K. G. Morgan, Esq., recently falling to decay, but now roofed and completely restored.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £339 2s. 11d.; glebe, £36. Gross income, 175 2s. 11d.; nett, £159 1s. 2½d. Patron, the Corporation of the city of Dublin. The church was built in 1817, by means of a gift of £738 10s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Killiney, Kilmacree, and Drinagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 57, and the Roman Catholics to 486; and a pay daily school was salaried with £4 10s. from subscription, and had on its books 30 boys and 16 girls.

RATHMELTON. See RAMELTON.

RATHMICHAEL, a parish, 2 miles north-west by north of Bray, and on the coast of the barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, eastward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,608 acres, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,296; in 1841, 1,447. Houses 233. The western district is mountainous, and partially waste; but the other districts lie low, consist of good and well-cultivated land, and are, to a large aggregate extent, disposed in villa and demesne grounds. The Scalp is on the western boundary; the Loughlinstown rivulet traces most of the northern boundary; and the Ballycorus lead-mines, lead-works, and shot manufactory, are situated in the western district. A height which overhangs the Scalp has an altitude above sea-level of 793 feet; and two heights respectively on the north border and on the coast have altitudes of respectively 158 and 62 feet. A martello tower stands on the coast; and the workhouse of the Rathdown Poor-law union stands in the interior.—The principal seats are Springmount, Shankill, Aghmore-cottage, Crankeen, Shanagagh-castle, Shanagagh-cottage, Ballybrat-cottage, Ellerslie, Sharrington, Lord-house, Shankill-castle, Springfield, Silvermount, Shankill-lodge, Claremount, Shankill-house, Emerald, Mullinastill-house, Airhill-house, Home, New-Brighton, Clifton, Shanagagh-house, and Cherrywood-house. Three concentric Druidical circles are situated in the north. The road from Dublin to Bray passes across the eastern district.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £250; glebe, £54 19s. 6d. Gross income, £304 19s. 6d.; nett, £290 14s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of Bray. There is neither church nor chapel in Rathmichael; and the Protestant inhabitants attend the church of Bray. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 174, and the Roman Catholics to 1,109; and two daily schools—one of which was wholly supported by a yearly grant of £30, with some other advantages, and by the proceeds of an annual charity sermon at Bray, and on their books 68 boys and 99 girls. In 1843, the National Board had a school in Rathdown workhouse.

RATHMINES, a suburb of Dublin, in the parish of St. Peter, barony of Uppereros, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Harold's Cross, $\frac{1}{2}$ north of the nearest part of the river Dodder, $\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Milltown, $\frac{1}{2}$ west of Denny's bridge, and $\frac{1}{2}$ south of Dublin castle. So late as about a quarter of a century ago, Rathmines was a poor and obscure village; but it is now a beautiful and rather large suburb, divided into East Rathmines, West Rathmines, and South Rathmines; and though, as to its centre, situated at the various relative distances from adjacent places which we have named, it really commences at Portobello, and extends in a continuous line of nearly two miles in length to the vicinity of the Dodder. Over the greater part of its length, its houses are a continued series of handsome villas and splendid mansions, of every description of fancy construction, from the modern castellated pile to the Italian villa or the modest cottage orce. The ancient castle of Rathmines, situated to the south of the upper end of the suburb, is an irregular, modernized, uninteresting structure, bearing a considerable resemblance to an old whitewashed farm-house, and now occupied as a boarding-house for invalids. The modern castle of Rathmines, situated amidst secluded grounds, to the north of the ancient castle, was not very long ago enlarged and altered into its present form, by Col. Wynne, and afterwards became the seat of successively Sir Jonas Green and the Rev. Thomas Belly; and it is so felicitous an imitation of a true old Norman castle, as to present a very antiquated appearance, composed of such features as round Norman towers, curtain walls, embattled parapets, mullioned windows, label and hood mouldings, oriel windows, and machicolated archways. The church of Rathmines, a handsome Gothic edifice, adorned with a pinnacled tower and a lofty tapering spire, was built in 1828, after a design by Mr. Simple, by means of a gift of £3,230 15s. 4d., and a loan of £400, from the late Board of First Fruits. The architecture, says a brief notice of it in an extinct Dublin periodical, is peculiar, and although the dark colour of the stone used raises rather a heavy appearance, upon the whole it has a pleasing effect. The architect has built for posterity; and this edifice, and other similar structures, although cavilled at by superficial observers, may justly claim precedence over the many gimcrack structures of modern times, mis-called Gothic; in his design he has approximated to the ancient roofed crypts, the roof being a solid arch, and the walls and ceiling in the interior forming a continued vault. The Roman Catholic chapel is also a handsome edifice. The Rathmines dispensary is a private establishment, and affords considerable relief. Both the church and the castle of Rathmines stand on what are called bloody fields; for here occurred that slaughter of the early English colonists of Dublin by the Irish of Wicklow, which gave name to Black Monday; and on these plains, in the year 1699, the stern republican; Colonel Jones, attacked and defeated an army of 19,000 men, who lay encamped here under the Marquis of Ormonde, killing 4,000 and taking 3,000 prisoners. The principal seats, not strictly in the suburb, but within one mile of its centre, are Melrose-villa, Rathmines-castle, Milltown-park, Fortfield, Prospect-villa, Terrace, Tranquilla, Spireview, Ashfield, Garville, Piermont, Sarzey, Rathgar-house, Dartree, Brookfield, Woodpark, Vergermont-house, Milltown-house, Dodder-cottage, Charlemount, Mount-Jerusalem, Mount-Argos, Kilmoge, Elmville, Mount-Talent, Glenpool-place, St. John's, Bessborough, Mountainview, Westbourne, and Newtown-cottage. Pop. of the suburb, in 1831, 1,600; in 1841, 2,429. Houses 379. Area of East Rathmines, 117 acres. Pop., in 1841, 665. Houses 107. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3; in manufactures and trade, 40; in other pursuits, 75. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 45; on the directing of labour, 53; on their own manual labour, 5; on means not specified, 15. Area of West Rathmines, 102 acres. Pop., in 1841, 848. Houses 123. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 19; in manufactures and trade, 38; in other pursuits, 96. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 34; on the directing of labour, 71; on their own manual labour, 19; on means not specified, 20. Area of South Rathmines, 194 acres. Pop., in 1841, 910. Houses 149. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 38; in manufactures and trade, 55; in other pursuits, 84. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 32; on the directing of labour, 82; on their own manual labour, 47; on means not specified, 16.

RATHMOAN. See RAMOAN. RATHMOLYON, a parish, containing a village of the same name, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of Summerhill, barony of Lower Moyfenrath, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-westward, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 9,782 acres; 3 rods, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,674; in 1841, 2,953. Houses 456. The surface is low and flat; forms part of the great plain of Leinster; consists, in general, of light, gravelly land; and is traversed by the road from Summerhill to Mullingar. The seats are Togher-lodge and Tobertyn-house. The village of Rathmolyon is situated in the eastern district; and has been much improved by its proprietor, the Bishop of Ossory. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 208; in 1841, 176. Houses 25. A dispensary here is within the Trin Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 12,782 acres, with a pop. of 3,174; and, in 1839-40, it expended £38 19s. 1d., and administered to 1,216 patients. A constabulary station is situated $\frac{1}{2}$ mile west, the hamlet of Togher 2 west-south-west, and the hamlet of Hollywood $\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of the village of Rathmolyon. This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £207 13s. 10d.; glebe, £43 15s. Gross income, £275 3s. 5d.; nett, £223 12s. 4d. Patron, William Snell Magee, Esq. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £230 15s. 4d.; and are inappropriate in the Earl of Darnley. The church is situated at the village of Rathmolyon, and was built in 1797, at the cost of £443 6s. 6d., defrayed partly by private subscription, and partly by parochial assessment, and recently enlarged by means of contributions of £233 6s. 1d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £120 10s. from private sources. Sittings, previous to the enlargement, 200; attendance, from 40 to 100. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated 5 furlongs south-west of the village, and has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rathcor. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to, 228, and the Roman Catholics to, 2,528; an evening school was usually attended by about 30 scholars; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £5 a-year from the vicar, £8 from the Association for Discontinuing Vice, £5 from the Bishop of Ossory, 24 4s. from Robert Fowler, Esq., and £2 2s. from Lord Darnley—had on their books 109 boys and 78 girls. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at Hogstown were salaried with £23 a year each from the National Board, and but on their books 46 boys and 93 girls.

RATHMORE, a bog of two denominations on the east border of the barony of Maginibby, 1½ mile east of Knockapple, co. Kerry, Munster. The other denomination is Knocknaserd. The bog is bounded, on the south, by the mail-coach road; and requires only surface-draining. The outfalls are the Blackwater and Lower Coolva, of which the latter is in the continuation of the general valley of the Blackwater. Its valley being occupied with bog, and a considerable deposition of sand and gravel on the south side of it, would make us suspect it as having been formerly the channel of a greater body of water than now flows through it. It may have been the channel of the Upper Beheena, or the Amscuttana. It may be observed that the flooding of the Coolva has produced a good deal of grassy meadow on that bog.* Area, 1,371 acres. Estimated cost of reclamation, £508 4s. At the edge of the bog stands the monastery of Rathmore.

RATHMORE, a parish in the barony of Rathvilly, 3½ miles north of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, south by eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 815 acres. 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 225; in 1841, 323. Houses 45. The surface consists of good land; and is traversed by the road from Tullow to Balinglass. The only seat is Rathmorehouse, the residence of C. Putland, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of RATHVILLY [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £160; glebe, £25 4s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 206; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RATHMORE, a parish in the barony of North Naas, 3½ miles east of the town of Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 3½; area, 7,756 acres, 1 rood, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,473; in 1841, 1,495. Houses 229. Newtown Hill, on the southern border, has an altitude above sea-level of 972 feet; a considerable extent of land on the east border is moorish or otherwise of small value; and the remaining districts consist, for the most part, of good land. The seats are Punchestown-house, Rathmore-house, Larch-hill, Duffy-lodge, and Hillsborough-hall. The chief antiquities are a moat at Rathmore, Seagraves-castle, and the ruins of Blackhall-castle, and Athgarrit-house. The chief hamlet is Rathmore.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £179 19s. 1d.; glebe, £24. The rectory of Rathmore, and the vicarage of KILTELL [see that article], constitute the benefice of Rathmore. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 2,228. Gross income, £262 15s. 11d.; nett, £208 10s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated at the hamlet of Rathmore, and was built about 78 years ago, partly by means of a gift of £415 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, 200 10s. 150; attendance 70. The Endstown and Cross Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 800 and 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Kilbride in the benefice of Blessington. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 123, and the Roman Catholics to 1,368; the Protestants of the union to 142, and the Roman Catholics to 2,122; and 3 daily schools in the parish—two of which was salaried with £25 a-year from subscription, and one with £30 from the benefaction of Erasmus Smith—had on their books 73 boys and 58 girls.

RATHMORE, a parish in the barony of Lune, 2½ miles north-east of Athboy, co. Meath, Leinster.

Length, eastward, 3½ miles; breadth, from 2 to 2½, area, 5,345 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,635; in 1841, 1,780. Houses 280. A considerable extent of bog is situated in the eastern district; but the remainder of that district, and the whole of the central and western districts, consist, for the most part, of good land. The road from Athboy to Kells passes across the western district. The seats are Ballyboy-house and Moyagher-house. Rathmore was formerly the residence of the noble family of Bligh, Earls of Darnley. John Bligh, Esq., the first of this family who settled in Ireland, was a citizen and drysalter of London, who came to this country in the time of Cromwell's government, as an agent to the adventurers for the estates forfeited in the rebellion of 1641. He speedily became an adventurer himself, subscribing the sum of £600 to a joint-stock in which two other speculators were concerned; and on casting lots among other adventurers, the allotment for himself and his associates fell in the baronies of Lume and 'Mohergallion' in this county, on property which had chiefly belonged to the Gormanstown family. He seated himself at Rathmore, a part of the estate thus easily acquired, and shortly augmented his purchases. In the first parliament after the Restoration, Mr. Bligh was returned member for Athboy, which town sent two representatives to the House of Commons, previous to the Union. He was afterwards joined in several lucrative commissions under government. Thomas, his only son, who erected into a manor the principal estates of the family in this neighbourhood, was also enpowered, by grant from King William, to hold 500 acres in demesne, and to impale 800 acres for deer. John, grandson to the founder of this family, was created Baron Clifton of Rathmore in 1721, Viscount Darnley of Athboy in 1728, and Earl Darnley in 1725.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ATHBOY [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, exclusive of that of the rectory of Moyagher, £184 12s. 4d. In 1834, all the parishioners, with one exception, were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RATHMOYLAN, a parish on the south-east of the barony of Galtier, 1½ mile south-west of Dunmore, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 2,455 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches—of which 661 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches form a detached district ¼ of a mile to the west. Pop., in 1831, 789; in 1841, 817. Houses 183. The detached district constitutes the extremity of the peninsula on the east side of Trannore bay, and terminates in Brownstown Head, whose summit has an altitude above sea-level of 102 feet. The main body lies midway between Trannore bay and Waterford Harbour; it includes Swine's Head, and has a bluff and rocky coast; and it, in general, presents a low and level surface, and consists of indifferent or rather poor land. The principal residences are Seaview-cottage and Cliff-cottage. A coast-guard station occurs in the main body. The principal hamlet is Ballymacaw; and the chief antiquity is the ruin of the old church. A loan fund was in operation within the parish in 1841, but has since become extinct.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILLEA [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £35 7s. 8d., and the rectorial for £71; and the latter are inappropriate in George Ivie, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 85, and the Roman Catholics to 725; a pay daily school had on its books 42 boys and 10 girls; and an evening school, held thrice a week, was usually attended by about 20 scholars. BATHMUGHE, the site of an ancient town on the coast of the barony of Lower Dunluce, co. Antrim, Ulster. Archibald says, "It was formerly a principal town of the Dalriadans, and an episcopal seat and monastery; but is now reduced to a small village with a church."

BATHMULLEN, a village in the parish of Killygarvan, barony of Kilmacrenn, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the shore of Lough Swilly, 1½ mile north-west of the island of Inch, 3½ south-west by south of Buncrana, 5 north-east of Ramelton, and 5½ east by north of Millford; but the first and the second of these distances are measured across Lough Swilly. It consists principally of a single street; and it has a church, a modern battery, and some vestiges of ecclesiastical and castellated ruins. A monastery for Carmelites or White friars was founded at Rathmullen by MacSwine, Fannagh. A dispensary here is within the Millford Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 10,032 acres, with a pop. of 3,943; and, in 1839, it received £91 18s. 9d., and expended £80 10s. 6d. A ferry plies regularly to the opposite shore of Lough Swilly. A natural ledge of rock at the town serves as the harbour, and might be improved into a good pier for about £700. Boats usually take the beach, and lie there with safety. In 1830, the fishing craft and fishermen within the district of Rathmullen, amounted to 21 open sail-boats with 92 men, and 502 row-boats with 2,567 men. A court of petty-sessions is held in the village on the second Friday of every month. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, 639. Houses 123. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 38; in manufactures and trade, 52; in other pursuits, 47. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 41; on their own manual labour, 61; on means not specified, 19.

RATHMULLEN, a parish, comprising four principal and mutually detached districts, on the coast of the barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. The eastern district contains the town of KILLCORN [which see], and measures 1½ miles by 1; the central district terminates on the south in St. John's Point, at the east side of Dundrum bay, and measures 1½ mile by 1; the western district rests its southern and broadest end on the middle of the coast of Dundrum bay, and measures 2½ miles by 2; and the northern district lies 4½ miles north-north-east of Killcough, and measures 1½ mile by ½. Area of the whole, 8,369 acres, 3 roods, 1 perch,—of which 9 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 2,742, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 2,895; * in 1841, 2,603. Houses 483. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,380; in 1841, 1,453. Houses 239. The surface consists, in general, of good land. Janeville, the residence of Capt. Brown, is situated in the central district, near St. John's Point. The road from Killcough to Castlewellan passes across all the three southern districts; and that from Killcough to Downpatrick passes through the northern district.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Vicarial tithe composition, £229 9s. 1d.; glebe, £5 18s. 9d. Gross income, £274 9s. 11d.; nett, £247 9s. 10d. Patron, alternately the Earl of Carriek and Viscount Bangor. The rectorial tithes, excepting those of two townlands, are compounded for £113 17s.; and are impropriate in the Earl of Bangor, Stephen Wolfe, Esq., and Miss Hamill. The church is situated in the western district, and was built in 1701, out of monies arising from the forfeited impropriations. Sittings 200; attendance 74. A chapel-of-ease is situated at Killcough, and was built about the year 1812, at the private expense of the Rev. James Hamilton, incumbent of Rathmullen. Sittings 175; attendance, from 100 to 120. A chaplain for the chapel-of-ease receives an income of £98 6s. 1½d. gross, or £94 9s. 9½d. nett, arising from endowment by Viscount Bangor, from augmentation allowance out of Boulter's fund, and from a glebe of 6 acres, 1 rood, 36½ perches. The Roman Catholic chapels of Killcough and Rosglass have an attendance of respectively about 400 and about 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Bright. In 1834, the parishioners, including those of the transferred townland of Rosglass, consisted of 540 Churchmen, 279 Presbyterians, and 1,957 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, was usually attended by about 50 scholars; and 5 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £6 from the London Hibernian Society, and one with £14 from the National Board—had on their books 198 boys and 149 girls. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at Killcough, and one at Rathmullen.

RATHNAYEOGE, or RATHNAYEOGH, a parish in the barony of Ikerrin, 4 miles south-west of Roscrea, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, south-westward, 4½ miles; breadth, from 2 to 2½; area, 5,152 acres, 3 roods, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,387; in 1841, 1,635. Houses 258. Part of the surface is mountainous; part is moorish or mossy; and part is tolerably good arable land. The mountainous district is a portion of the Devil's Bit range; and sends up its loftiest summit, a little north of the centre of the parish, to the height of 779 feet above sea-level. The seats are Lussduff-house, New Grove, Honey-mountain-house, and Summerhill-house. The chief antiquities are three old castles, and the ruins of a church. The road from Roscrea to Toomevara, and that from Templemore to Borris-o'-kane, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DENKEIRIN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £253 9s. 8½d.; glebe, £36 6s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 1,395; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RATHNEW, a parish on the coast of the barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the village of Rathnew, the village of BALLINALEA, and part of the town of Wicklow: see these articles. Length, westward, 4½ miles; breadth, from 2 to 3½; area, 8,640 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches,—of which 207 acres, 3 roods are, in Broad Lough. Pop., in 1831, 3,718; in 1841, 3,754. Houses 580. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,869; in 1841, 2,786. Houses 439. The coast consists principally of the low, sandy, district called the MURROUGH; which see. Carriek mountain, on the south-western boundary, has an altitude of 1,252 feet above sea-level. The surface of the interior possesses much diversity of outline, many beauties of feature, and great decoration of dress; and it is ploughed by the stream of the VENTRY, afterwards called the LEITRIM: see these articles. Newarth or Newarth-bridge [see NEWARTH], is a pleasant feature upon the stream; and the hamlet of ASHROD, [which also see], is surrounded by luscious scenery. Rossana, the beautiful seat of Daniel Tigue, Esq., and formerly the occasional residence of the well-known authoress of Psyche, stands amidst parks

* The reason of this discrepancy appears to be, that the townland of Rosglass, belonging to the parish of Killeesh, but lying detached from the main body of that parish, was by order in Council of date Dec. 9, 1834, transferred from Killeesh to Rathmullen, and, in consequence, is included by the Census of 1831 in Killeesh, but included by the ecclesiastical revision of that Census in Rathmullen.

and grounds which boast some remarkably fine oaks and Spanish chestnuts. Cronroe-house, the seat of Isaac A. Eccles, Esq., commands an extensive view of the circumjacent country. The other seats are Upper Tinakelly, Lower Tinakelly, Broomfield-house, Cronykeery, Clonmannon-house, Killoughter, and Claremont, — the two last the residences of respectively H. T. Redmond, Esq., and John A. Leonard, Esq. The mail-road from Dublin to Wexford passes across the interior. The village of Rathnew stands on this road, at the point where it forks into the lines toward respectively Wicklow and Rathdrum, 2 miles north-west of Wicklow, 6 south of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, and 23½ south-south-east of Dublin. Area, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 544; in 1841, 118. Houses 20. — This parish is a chapelry, and part of the benefice of Wicklow [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The title composition belonging to the incumbent, jointly with that of three other chapelries, amounts to £383 6s. 8d.; and the rectorial tithes, jointly also with those of the other chapelries, are compounded for £766 15s. 4d., and are appropriated to the prebend of Wicklow, in St. Patrick's cathedral. A school-house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 20 to 30. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,150 Churchmen, 7 Presbyterians, 26 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,659 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools had on their books 121 boys and 146 girls; and 9 daily schools were usually attended by about 370 children. Two of the daily schools were supported principally, and two wholly, by subscription; one was salaried with £20 a-year from the National Board, and from £20 to £30 from subscription; and one was salaried with £28 from subscription.

RATHOWEN, a village in the parish of Rathaspeck, barony of Moygoish, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo, 3½ miles south-east of Edgeworthstown, 10 north-west of Mullingar, and 49 west-north-west of Dublin. It contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a school, a constabulary barrack, a small court-house, and a good inn and posting establishment. Fairs are held on May 15 and Dec. 12. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. In the vicinity are the seats of Fairy-hall, Newpark-cottage, Newpark-lodge, Ardglass-house, and Newpass, — the last the residence of Mr. Whitty. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 605; in 1841, 550. Houses 85. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 47; in manufactures and trade, 27; in other pursuits, 21. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 39; on their own manual labour, 48; on means not specified, 3.

RATHPATRICK, a parish at the south-east extremity of the barony of Ida, and county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It lies along the Suir and the Barrow, immediately above their confluence, and 2 miles north-east of Waterford. Length, eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,479 acres, 1 rood, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,627; in 1841, 1,774. Houses 220. The surface is agreeably varied, consists of middle-rate land, and possesses a large aggregate of villa decoration. The highest ground is on the eastern border, and has an altitude of 405 feet above sea-level. The principal seats are Kilmurray-castle, Larkfield-house, Belview-house, Prospect-house, Springfield-house, Snowhaven-house, Glasshouse, Snowhill-house, Valetta, and Fraser's-Hall. The chief hamlets are Slieveroe and Drumdowney. The principal antiquities are the ruins of Rathpatrick church, the site of another old church, and the ruins of Gorteen-castle. The road from Waterford to New Ross passes through the interior. — This parish is a vicarage; and part of the benefice of Rossercon [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £66 9s. 2½d., and the rectorial for £100 0s. 11½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the corporation of the city of Waterford. The Roman Catholic chapel at Slieveroe has an attendance of 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Glenmore and Kilkulleheen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 1,622; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 240 children; and a pay daily school had on its books 21 boys and 19 girls.

RATHREAGH, a parish in the barony of Ardsagli, 3½ miles south of Edgeworthstown, co. Longford, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,023 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches, — of which 31 acres, 2 roods, 22 perches are in the river Inny. Pop., in 1831, 1,056; in 1841, 1,123. Houses 176. A considerable proportion of the surface is bog; and even the remainder is, in general, but indifferent land. The highest ground is in the west, and has an altitude of 203 feet above sea-level. The river Inny describes part of the southern boundary. The seats are Newport, Newtown-lodge, Shawbrook, Lurgan-cottage, and Fox-hall. The road from Mullingar to Rosemount passes through the interior. — This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILGLASS [which see], in the dio. of Ardsagli. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £71 11s. 10½d., and the rectorial for £33 3s. 5½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Col. Fox. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilglass. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 129 Churchmen, 44 Presbyterians, and 918 Roman Catholics; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 148 boys and 101 girls.

RATHREAGH, or RATHRAN, a parish in the barony of Tyrerley, 3½ miles west by north of Kilkalla, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, north-west by westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 4,164 acres, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,851; in 1841, 1,664. Houses 275. About one-half of the surface is boggy and waste ground; and the remainder is land of inferior quality. The rivulets Rathroe and Cloonallaghan effect the drainage; and the road from Ballina to Ballycastle passes across the interior. The seats are Courthill-house, Springhill-house, Tonroe-house, and Farnhill-house. The principal hamlets are Ballycaurraun, Ballyglaw, Ballyinteenmore, and Flannellystown. The family of Dexter, who afterwards took the name of MacJordan, says Archdall, "founded a monastery here for Dominican friars in the year 1274. Other writers give this foundation to Sir William Burgh, surnamed the Greyhanded, and for some time Lord-justice of Ireland. There is a small village here, consisting of a few wretched cabins; and the walls of the monastery, with its sacred edifices, still remain. — This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLYSAKERRY [which see], in the dio. of Kilkalla. Vicarial tithe composition, £80. Part of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £38, is appropriated to the prebendship of Kilkalla cathedral; part, compounded for £2 10s. 1d., is appropriated to the archdeacon of Kilkalla; and part, compounded for £38 15s., is inappropriate in the vicars choral of the two cathedrals of Dublin. RATHVILLY, a barony of the north-east of co. Carlow, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by co. Kildare; on the north and the east, by co. Wicklow; on the south, by co. Wicklow and the barony of Forth; and on the west, by the barony of Carlow. Its length, westward, is $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth is $8\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 44,806 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches. The principal heights in the north are Rulhill Mound, Knockova, and a hill $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north-north-east of Hacketstown, whose summits have altitudes of respectively 489, 503, and 672 feet above sea-level; and the principal in the east are Oonstable-hill, and a height $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north-east of Clonmore, whose summits have altitudes of respectively 750 and 722 feet. A considerable district in the north-east is waste; but most of the other parts of the barony is profitable and good land. The general contour of the surface is undulated; and the general drainage is effected by the river Slaney. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townlands of Bennickerry in the parishes of Urrlin and Ballinacarrig, and the townland of Baubertown in the parish of Killerrig, from the barony of Rathvilly to that of Carlow.—pop., in 1831, 303; the townlands of Castle-Grace in the parish of Aghade, Castle-Grace and Dreluge in the parish of Ballon, and Newtown in the parish of Boreogh, from Rathvilly to Forth,—pop. 134; the townland of Ladystown in the parish of Balinglass, from Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, to Rathvilly,—pop. 88; and the townland of Templewen in the parish of Fennagh, from the barony of Carlow to that of Rathvilly,—pop. 457.—The barony of Rathvilly, as now constituted, contains the whole of the parishes of Adristan, Clonmore, Haroldstown, Rulhill, Rathmore, Rathvilly, Straboe, and Tullow-Phelim, and part of the parishes of Ardoyne, Balinglass, Cryerim, Fennagh, Hacketstown, Kiltegan, and Kinnough. The towns and chief villages are Tullow, Rathvilly, and Hacketstown. Pop., in 1831, 17,503; in 1841, 19,272. Houses 3,139. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,301; in manufactures and trade, 759; in other pursuits, 296. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 78; on the directing of labour, 1,205; on their own manual labour, 1,956; on means not specified, 117. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,904; who could read but not write, 1,712; who could neither read nor write, 2,824. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,608; who could read but not write, 2,642; who could neither read nor write, 3,206.—The barony is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Carlow, Balinglass, and Shillelagh. The total number of tenements valued is 2,504; and of these, 1,038 were valued under £5,—437, under

RATHVILLY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Rathvilly, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 9,212 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 3,474, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,187; in 1841, 3,493. Houses 583. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,173; in 1841, 3,044. Houses 500. The river Slaney traces the whole of the western boundary; but does not descend while there to a lower elevation than about 300 feet above sea-level. The principal heights in the parish are Knockevagh in the north, and a rising-ground in Lisnevagh demesne, with altitudes above sea-level of respectively 503 and 472 feet. The land throughout the parish is, for the most part, good. The principal seats are Lisnevagh-house and Cromwell's Fort-house; and the chief antiquities are, Rathvilly mount, Knockagan Rath, Tobenstown Rath, the ruins of Kilbrackan church, and Mount-Neill-house, and the sites of a castle and another old church. The road from Balinglass to Tullow, and that from Hacketstown to Castle-Dermot, pass through the interior. The village of Rathvilly stands at the intersection of these roads, and on the left bank of the Slaney, 5 miles west by north of Hacketstown, and 5 north by east of Tullow. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, March 25, June 24, and Nov. 12. A dispensary here is within the Balinglass Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 18,153 acres, with a pop. of 6,167; and, in 1839-40, it expended £82, and administered to 1,347 patients. In 1843, the Rathvilly Loan Fund had a capital of £1,021, circulated £2,531 in 791 loans, cleared a net profit of £12 6s. 3d., expended for charitable purposes £12 15s. 11d., and had 39 depositors or proprietors of its capital. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 301; in 1841, 449. Houses 83. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 42; in manufactures and trade, 36; in other pursuits, 9. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 36; on their own manual labour, 44; on means not specified, 3.—Rathvilly parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £784 12s. 4d. The rectories of Rathvilly, RATHMORE, and STRABOE, and the inappropriate curacy of RABILL [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Rathvilly. Length, 10 miles; breadth, $\frac{5}{8}$. Pop., in 1831, 3,876. Gross income, £1,146 17s. 4d.; net, £970 19s. 2d. Patron, alternately the Crown and the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £29 4s. 7d. The church is situated $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south of the village, and is an old building of unknown date of erection. Sittings 230; attendance 160. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Rathvilly and Tinnock have an attendance of respectively 2,000 and 850; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 216, and the Roman Catholics to 3,219; the Protestants of the union to 254, and the Roman Catholics to 3,939; and 6 daily schools in the union—4 of which were in the parish, and 3 of these 4 salaried with respectively £10, £5, and £3 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 343 boys and 392 girls. In 1843, two National schools at Rathvilly were salaried with £15 and £11 a-year; and two at Knockishen were salaried with £15 and £8.

RATHWIRE, a village in the parish of Killeucan, barony of Farhill, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Killeucan to Tyrrell's Pass, 5 furlongs south-south-west of Killeucan, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Kinnegad. In its eastern vicinity is Rathwade-lodge. Area of the village, 15 acres. Pop. in 1831, 265; in 1841, 258. Houses 47.

RATHYNE, or RATHENIS, the site of an old monastery, in the south-east corner of the barony of Fethallagh, 6 miles south-east of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Atchdall—who, however, requires to be read in every such passage with large allowances for his credulity—says, “St. Carthage, alias Mochuda, erected a famous monastery at Rathynin, where he presided during the space of forty years, over 607 monks, who supported themselves and the neighbouring poor by labour. There was also a celebrated academy under the direction of this saint. But in the huly days of Easter, A. D. 630, he and his monks were driven out of the abbey by King Blathmac, who, as Keating observes, was incensed against them by the monks of a neighbouring abbey. St. Carthage took refuge at Lismore in the county of Waterford, where he died on the 14th of May, 636.”

RATOATH, a barony in the south-east of the county of Meath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by the barony of Skreen; on the east, by the county of Dublin; on the south, by the barony of Dunboyne; and on the west, by the baronies of Upper Dece and Lower Dece. Its length, west by northward, is 84 miles; its greatest breadth is 7½; and its area is 35,607 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches. The surface is flat, unvaried, and uninteresting. The land, for the most part, consists of a stiff soil, upon a substratum of tenacious clay, or what the farmers locally term a lelea; but beneath this substratum is invariably found a strong blue limestone gravel, the copious use of which has rendered the soil exceedingly fructiferous in wheat. “Every attempt to drain this kind of ground,” says the statistic of the county, “proves ineffectual until the stratum of yellow clay is entirely cut through, by carrying the drain fairly into the gravel, when it is as easily freed from surface-water as any other soil.” This barony contains part of the parishes of Colmullin and Trevet, and the whole of the parishes of Ballymaglasson, Cookstown, Crickstown, Donaghmore, Dunshaughlin, Greenogue, Kilbrew, Killeegan, Rathbegan, Rathreagan, and Ratoath. The principal villages are Ratoath, Dunshaughlin, Ashbourne, and Greenogue. Pop., in 1831, 6,685; in 1841, 6,214. Houses 978. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 803; in manufactures and trade, 168; in other pursuits, 130. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 28; on the directing labour, 324; on their own manual labour, 713; on means not specified, 36. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,137; who could read but not write, 402; who could neither read nor write, 1,289. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 637; who could read but not write, 544; who could neither read nor write, 1,479. Ratoath barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Dunshaughlin. The total number of tenements valued in 1849; and of these, 223 were valued under £5, 98, under £10, 41, under £15, 81; under £20, 21, under £25, 17, under £30, 24, under £40, 10, under £50, 4, and 178, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £35,217 5s. 1d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, was £907 11s. 5d.

RATOATH, a parish in the barony of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the village of Ratoath; see next article. Length, north-westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 9,331 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,779; in 1841, 1,597. Houses 266. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,227; in 1841, 1,064. Houses 172. The surface, though slightly undulated, is prevaillingly very flat and has a tame appearance; but the land is, for the most part, good and luxuriant. The Danish mound, called the moat of Ratoath, constitutes an arresting feature amidst the expanse of comparatively naked and uninteresting country. The manor of Ratoath, the seat of J. Corballis, Esq., adjoins the village. The other chief residences are Coxey-lodge, Baltrassa, Mullinam, Jamestown, Laggore-house, Leesvalley, and Mount-Pleasant; and the hamlets and chief farms are Loughlinstown, Ballyhack, Ballybin, Glasarn, Mullinahob, Frigreen, Harlockstown, Jamestown, Moortown, Ballymore, Doghtog, Twentypark, and Flemington. The road from Dunshaughlin to Swords, and the direct road from Navan to Dublin, pass through the interior. This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tith composition, £335; glebe, £19 10s. The rectories of Ratoath, CREEKSTOWN, COOKSTOWN, KILLEEGAN, DONAGHMORE, and GREENOGUE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ratoath. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 3,057. Gross income, £788 7s. 3d.; nett, £604 8s. 7d. Patron, alternately the Crown and Thomas Lee Norman, Esq. A curate receives a salary of £80. The church is situated in the village of Ratoath, and was built in 1817, by means of a loan of £743 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, about 50. The Ratoath Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 300 at one service and 800 at another. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Killeegan, Creekstown, and Donaghmore. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 35, and the Roman Catholics to 1,803; the Protestants of the union to 126, and the Roman Catholics to 3,150; 2 daily schools in the parish were salaried with each £7 10s. a year from the National Board and £10 from subscription, and had on their books 113 boys and 113 girls; and 6 daily schools in the union had on their books 232 boys and 147 girls, and were attended by about 30 other children.

RATOATH, a village, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish and barony of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Ashbourne to Dunshaughlin, with the nearest but least frequented road from Dublin to Navan, 2 miles west of Ashbourne, 3 east by south of Dunshaughlin, 10½ south-east of Navan, and 10½ north-west by north of Dublin. The features of chief interest in the village itself and its immediate vicinity, are the neat parish-church; the large Roman Catholic chapel; the mansion-house of the manor of Ratoath; the Danish mound or moat of Ratoath, alleged to have been the scene of a convocation of petty princes convoked and held by Malachy the first monarch of Ireland; and some slender vestiges of an old abbey, which, as it existed in the 15th century, was possessed of 40 acres of land, of the yearly value of 6s. 8d. A perpetual chantry of three priests is said to have, in Roman Catholic times, existed in the parish-church. Ratoath seems to have been a borough, by prescription; but does not appear to have ever received any extant or traceable charter of incorporation. There was formerly a provost or portreeve of the borough, as well as a seneschal of the manor; but no trace exists of any other municipal officers; and the right, which the borough enjoyed, of sending two members to the Irish parliament, appears to have been vested in the freeholders of the manor. When the borough was disfranchised at the Legislation Union, a sum of £15,000 was paid as compensation to George Lowther, Esq., the patron, under the provisions of the Act 40, George III., cap. 9. Fairs are held on April 18, June 1, and Nov. 21. A dispensary in the village is within the Dunshaughlin Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 24,847 acres, with a pop. of 4,616; and, in 1839-40, it expended £83, and administered to 1,547 patients. Area of the village, 73 acres. Pop. in 1831, 352; in 1841, 533. Houses 94. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 61; in manufactures and trade, 30; in other pursuits, 17. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 37; on their own manual labour, 63; on means not specified, 4.

RATTOO, a parish in the baronies of Iraghtic Connor and Clanmaurice, 6½ miles west-south-west of Listowel, co. Kerry, Munster. The Clanmaurice section contains the villages of BALLYDEUFF and DRUMMARTINE; which see. Length, westward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2¼. Area of the Iraghtic Connor section, 1,188 acres; of the Clanmaurice section, 7,042 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,117; in 1841, 3,800. Houses 597. Pop. of the Iraghtic Connor section, in 1831, 174; in 1841, 206. Houses 28. Pop. of the rural districts of the Clanmaurice-section, in 1841, 3,146. Houses 477. The surface is part of the basin and immediate valley of the Casben river; and comprises a comparatively large aggregate of bog, partly reclaimed and partly in a morassy state. Among the seats are Rattoo, the residence of Mr. Gunn; Ballycoun, the residence of Mr. Stock; and Ballyhorgan, the residence of Mr. Stoughton. A large tract of the low and marshy ground around the confluence of the Feale and the Brick was, about a century ago, drained and converted into good meadow and pasture by the ancestor of Mr. Gunn. Several local names of farms and townlands are thought to afford evidence of the ancient prevalence of fire-worship in the district; and the existence of a number of lands under the name of Burgess lands is supposed to indicate that Rattoo was anciently a corporate town. "It is in some old records called Rathtoo," says Dr. Smith; "and in it stood an abbey of canons regular of the order of St. Austin, which had been originally a preceptory belonging to the knights hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, founded by one Friar William, and confirmed by Miles Fitz-Miler, in the reign of King John. It was again changed into Arican canons, and dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul; in November, 1200, it was burned down by the Irish upon the approach of Sir Charles Wilmot's forces to this part of the country. It is said, that there were formerly 7 churches in the place, and some old manuscripts mention it to have been a bishopric: which notion the high ancient round tower standing in the churchyard (being for the most part erected near cathedral churches in Ireland) seems to countenance." The pillared tower is now partly dilapidated. The interior of the parish is traversed by the road from Ballyhenry to Tralee, and by that from Causeway to Listowel.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory, and vicarage, in the dio. of Ardert and Aghadoe, and possesses no ecclesiastical provision. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Ballyheigue and Killurry. In 1824, the Protestants amounted to 21, and the Roman Catholics to 3,313; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 153 children. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at Slieve-Adara, two at Ballyduff, and one at Drumartin.

RAVEL (THE), a rivulet of the county of Antrim, Ulster. It rises in the barony of Carey, and flows south-westward and westward, principally on the boundary between the baronies of Kilnawry and Antrim, to Mairi Water at a point 2½ miles south-south-west of Clough Mills. Its length of run is between 8 and 10 miles.

RAVEN-POINT, a low and sandy headland, in the parish of St. Margaret's, barony of East Shelmalier, co. Wexford, Leinster. It has an altitude of 29 feet above sea-level, and terminates the low, narrow, sandy peninsula, at the north side of the entrance of Wexford Harbour.

RAVENSDALE, a demesne in the parish of Ballynascannan, barony of Lower Dandalk, co. Louth, Leinster. It is situated 6 miles north-north-east of the town of Dandalk, on the eastern slopes of the narrow valley between the hill of Feede and Claremount Curn, and on the great north road from Dublin to Belfast. The two heights which overhang the two sides of the valley have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 771 and 1,074 feet; and the little river Flurry meanders along the valley, and supplies the demesne with a small but beautiful artificial lake. "There are few places," says Mr. Fraser, "where wood and water, crag and rock, hill and dale, are more happily blended than at Ravensdale Park; and nowhere, on this line of road, is there such a lovely display of picturesque features." The proprietor is Thomas Fortescue, Esq., the representative of the Barons and Viscounts Clermont. The Right Hon. James Fortescue, the first of the family who resided at Ravensdale, and who long represented the county of Louth in parliament, and died in 1782, formed the present improved, picturesque, and richly wooded demesne out of a tract so wild that it might fairly be called a waste. Some little distance south of the demesne are Ravensdale Lodge and Ravensdale Bridge.

RAY. See RAYMOCHY.

RAYE (THE), a rivulet in the west of the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It flows into the Atlantic between the Ballynass and the Guidroe rivers. "In this stream," says the Fishery Report of 1838, "there is a great quantity of salmon caught. It is unprotected, owing to so many proprietors having property along its banks, and none of them paying proper attention to its preservation. This valuable river is now entirely in the hands of poachers; and there can be no doubt that if it were properly preserved, it would possess a most profitable fishery, as the salmon caught in it are of the best quality, and, considering its present unprotected state, are very abundant."

RAYLESTOWN. See RAILSTOWN.

RAYMOCHY, or RAY, a parish in the barony of Raphoe, 4½ miles north by west of the town of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It contains the village of MANOR-COSYNGHAM; which see. Length, south-south-westward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 15,280 acres, 3 roads, 29 perches,—of which 97 acres, 38 perches are tideway. Pop., in 1831, 5,754; in 1841, 5,793. Houses 981. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,501. Houses 940. The surface is washed along the north-west by the upper part of Lough Swilly; it contains a considerable aggregate of bog and mountain, yet consists, for the most part, of arable land of middle-rate quality; it is traversed by the road from Letterkenney to Londonderry, and by that from Raphoe to Buncrana; and its north-western district comprises some beautiful interior scenery, and commands extensive and interesting views of the waters and shores of Lough Swilly. The seats are Green-cottage, Leslie-hall, and Kilmaghy; and the other artificial objects of principal interest are the hamlet of Ballybea and the ruins of an old monastery.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. At the composition, £650; glebe, £254 13s. 10d. Gross income, £904 13s. 10d.; nett, £746 8s. 2d. Patrons, the Provost, Fellows, and Scholars of Trinity College, Dublin. The incumbent holds also the archdeaconry of Raphoe. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is situated at Manor-Conyngham, and was built in 1792, by means of £553 16s. 11d. contributed by the landed proprietors of the parish, and £92 6s. 13d. raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 250; attendance 90. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other of the Secession Synod, have an attendance of respectively 250 and 600. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Manor-Conyngham, and has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Taughboyne and All-Saints. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 530 Churchmen, 2,962 Presbyterians, and 2,375 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools at Manor-Conyngham, Galderagh, Ballycoddish, Lahadish, and the Roman Catholic houses, were usually attended by about 317 children; and 12 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £7 a-year from subscription, one with £6 and 16 acres of land from the Dublin Charter school Society, and one with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction and £1 16s. 11d. from subscription—had on their books 308 boys and 157 girls.

RAYMUNTERDONNY, a parish on the west coast of the barony of Kilmacreegan, 41 miles south-west by south of Dunfangan, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length of the main body, north-north-westward, or to the shore, 6 miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2½. Length and breadth of a detached district, situated ½ of a mile south-west of the southern extremity of the main body, each 1 mile. Length of a detached district, situated 2½ miles north-east of the middle of the east side of the main body, 1½ mile; breadth, ½. Length of a detached district, situated 1½ mile north-west of the preceding, and 2 miles from the main body, ½ of a mile; breadth, ½. Area of the whole, 12,613 acres, 2 roads, 10 perches,—of which 17 acres, 1 road, 4 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,193; in 1841, 2,238. Houses 456. Upwards of two-thirds of the surface is mountainous, wild, and partially or totally waste; and the remainder is, on the average, tolerably good land. Muckish, on the eastern boundary of the main body, has an altitude of 2,190 feet above sea-level. See MECKISH. The only seat is Ballycannel-house; and the chief hamlet is Port-town. The road from Dunfangan to Dunglo passes across the main body.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £102 12s.; glebe, £227 9s. 10d. Gross income, £330 1s. 10d.; nett, £279 17s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1803, by means of a loan of £415 7s. 8½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 65. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 263 Churchmen, 15 Presbyterians, and 2,020 Roman Catholics; and a Protestant parochial daily school was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. a-year from Robinson's Fund, and was aided with some other advantages, and had on its books 73 boys and 13 girls. In 1843, a school at Dunmore was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board, and had on its books 50 boys and 20 girls.

REARY. See REARYMORE.

RED-BAY, a bay in the parishes of Layd and Ardclinis, barony of Lower Glenariff, co. Antrim, Ulster. From Gerron Point, which screens the south side of its entrance, the bay extends a little upwards of 2½ miles landward and westward to the mouth of the Glenariff river; but though penetrating the land thus far within the prevailing coast-line to the south, it really is a mere sweep or crenature of the sea, and is so completely open to all the winds which career along the coast, as to afford scarcely any protection to sea-vessels. The whole of the southern cliffs, screes, and even all the head and the north-west shores of the bay, are full of scenic power and character and beauty; but they have already, for all purposes of general description, been sufficiently noticed in the articles ARDCLINIS, GERRON, FEARAN-PATRICK, CLOCKEN-STOOKEN, GLENARIFF, and CUSHENDALL; which see. On the south shore is Brylodge, the seat of Mr. Dobbs; at the mouth of the Glenariff river is the small neglected hamlet of Waterfoot; and a little north of that hamlet, on the way to Cushendall, are the caves and the ruined castle of Red-Bay. "The caves are excavations, probably formed at some remote period by the inroads of the tide, which is now excluded by the embankment in front in a species of soft red sandstone. There are three of tolerable magnitude, one of which is very appropriately converted into a smith's forge, and affords a very Cyclopean appearance. A second is reported, in all probability with sufficient reason, to have been the residence of a female, whose trade was the sale of illicit spirits. The third is now converted to any important purpose. On the extreme end of the southern cliffs, stands the ruined castle of Red-Bay, upon a similar argillaceous conglomeration. Beneath the bank are three distinct excavations of considerable dimensions; one of which was, not long since, used to dispense the blessings of education in, by a poor schoolmaster, but is now degraded into a nightly sheep-pen. The new road here passes outside the cliff, close to the shore; and in excavating the red clay to continue this new line, a lofty Gothic archway has been fantastically cut in the bank through which the road to Cushendall passes. The castle, which is now totally ruined, stands in a very commanding but very exposed situation. It was built by the Bissets, from whom the Antrim family derive this barony; but of its former extent or style of architecture nothing important can now be traced." [Guide to the Giant's Causeway.]

RED-CITY, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, ½ of a mile south-west of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, ½; area, 722 acres, 2 roads, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 364; in 1841, 238. Houses 93. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and is traversed by the road from Fethard to Cahir.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition and gross income, £86; nett, £84 5s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Tullamaine, in the dio. of Cashel, and the benefice of Emly, in the dio. of Emly; and is non-resident in Red-City. A curate receives £5 a-year for performing the occasional duties of Red-City and Tullamaine. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

REDCROSS, a parish in the barony of Arklow, 5½ miles north of the town of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 6,247 acres, 3 roads, 14 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,928; in 1841, 1,867. Houses 229. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,257. Houses 183. The surface is hilly and much diversified; and it consists of land of very various character, and in very various condition. One height on the northern boundary, and another on the western border, have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 894 and 790 feet. The seats are Temple Lyon-house, Ballyrogan-house, Kilpatrick-house, Kilmurray-house, Ballykeen-cottage, Orons-cottage, and Ballykeen-house. The principal antiquities and marvellous curiosities are the sites of two churches, the ruins of a church, the rat rock, and the round ball. The direct road from Wicklow to Newbridge, and the old hilly road from Rathdrum to Arklow, pass through the interior. The village of Redcross is pleasantly situated on these roads, nearly in the centre of the parish. Fairs are held on Jan. 6, March 17, May 6, June 20, Aug. 6, Sept. 23, and Dec. 15. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. A party of the county constabulary are stationed in the village. The Redcross dispensary is within the Rathdrum Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 12,474; and, in 1830-40, it expended £154 19s. 2d., and made 4,572 dispensations of medicine to 2,238 patients. Area of the village, 32 acres. Pop., in 1841, 310. Houses 46.—This parish was constituted out of portions of the parishes of Dunganstown, Castle-Macardan, and Kilbride, and is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Gross income, £96 3s. 1d.; nett, £76 3s. 1d. Patrons, the incumbents of Dunganstown, Castle-Macardan, and Kilbride. The church was built in 1828, by means of a gift of £675 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 240; attendance, from 150 to 230. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 380, and the Roman Catholics to 1,165; and 2 daily schools—the one of which was salaried with 47 a-year from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and the other with £10 from the London Hibernian Society, and a sum not reported from Mrs. Lumley Foot—were usually attended by about 75 children.

RED-HALLS, a demeene in the parish of Templecoran, barony of Lower Belfast, 4½ miles north-east by north of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. It is washed on the east by the upper part of Lough Lerne, and bounded on the west by the road from Lerne to Carrickfergus. It is well-wooded and tastefully disposed, and forms a large and beautiful feature of the sea-board district of the barony; but in consequence of its lying low, it does not itself command any extensive views. Its proprietor is G. Kerr, Esq.

RED-HILLS, a village in the parish of Annagh, barony of Tullaghgarvey, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Ballycastle to Enniskillen with that from Belturbet to Coutehill, 3½ miles north of Ballyhaise, and ½ east of Belturbet. Fairs are held on the 24th of every month. Adjoining it is Red-Hills-house, the seat of Mr. White. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 103. Houses 20.

RED-ISLAND, an islet in the expansion of the Lee called Lough Mahon, barony and county of Cork, Munster. It is situated a little below the demeene of Oldcourt; and, in ridiculous allusion to a dancing or "hopping" family of the name of Delamain, who at one time possessed it, it is now popularly called Hop-Island.

RED-ISLAND, an inhabited islet in Lough Strangford, co. Down, Ulster.

RED-ISLAND, an islet 3 furlongs north-east of Skerries, parish of Holmpatrick, barony of East Ballyrothery, co. Dublin, Leinster. It has a martello tower. See SKERRIES.

RED-ISLAND, an islet in the parish of Noughaval, barony of Kilkenny-West, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It lies in Lough Ree, near the south-east side of Inchurk.

RED-LION. See LARGY, co. Cavan.

REDWOOD, a ruined castle, in the parish of Larches, barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It is situated a little below Portumna-bridge, and in the vicinity of the boat stations and harbour of the Inland Steam Navigation Company.

REE (Lodon), a large and long lacustrine expansion of the Shannon, between the baronies of South Ballintubber and Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaght, and the baronies of Ratheline and Kilkenny-West, in respectively co. Longford and co. Westmeath, Leinster. It makes a slight curvature to the west over its upper half, but, with this exception, extends direct from north to south; it measures 14 miles in length, and 5½ in maximum breadth; it presents the largest expanse of water over the lower two-fifths of its length, or from St. John's bay to near its foot; it commences a few perches below the bridge of Lanesborough, and terminates about 1½ mile above the bridge of Athlone; and it is politically distributed as follows, among six parishes in co. Roscommon, 4 in co. Longford, and 4 in co. Westmeath:—1,388 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches in Cloontuskert, 939 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches in Kiltewan, 964 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches in Kilmeane, 911 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches in Kilinvoxy, 3,616 acres, 20 perches in St. John's, 2,757 acres, 15 perches in Kiltroom, 1,820 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches in Ratheline, 6,290 acres, 3 roods, 23 perches in Cashel, 176 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches in Shriel, 36 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches in Noughaval-Longford, 2,391 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches in Noughaval-Westmeath, 535 acres, 2 roods, 7 perches in Kilkenny-West, 3,529 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches in Bunown, and 1,206 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches in St. Mary's. The surface-elevation above sea-level is 124 feet in summer and 120 in winter. The greatest depth does not exceed 75 feet; and even this occurs not in any large portion of the lake, but only in holes or hollows of the bottom, such as are common in limestone countries. The principal islets and isles in the Roscommon portions are Ballyclare Islands, Ferriach, Kilmanny Island, Dog's Island, Cribby Islands, Long Island, Little Island, Horse Island, and Yellow Island; in the Longford portions, Inchmadermot, Goat's Island, Little Island, Busby Island, Inchmagh, Chawinch, Friar's Island, Muckinish, Inchelarraun, Lavevan Island, Horse Island, Black Island, Sand Island, King's Island, Long Island, Nut Island, and Saint's Island; and in the Westmeath portions, Inchbolin, Hag Island, Lavevan Island, Red Island, Lichurk, Inchmore, Nut's Island, Hermon's Island, Illanbogmore, Illanbeg, Illanabagh, Illanfan, Illanbillaun, Crow Island, Grace Island, Bulrush Island, Hare Island, Pat Island, Temple's Island, and Friar's Island. The shores of the lake are for the most part intricate and considerably diversified; but they are occasionally boggy, generally bare of wood, everywhere destitute of mountains, and aggregately of very second-rate scenic character. "No mountains," says Mr. Weld, "give along these shores to give grandeur and solemnity to the scenery, like those upon Lough Allen; yet fine swelling grounds, which in many parts might almost be classed as highlands, bound the lake on either side; and the intricacy of the shores, the broad bays and deep inlets, the rocky points and bold promontories, the numerous and diversified islands, form combinations of a delightful description, which render every part of the passage, whether up or down the lake, whether along one shore or along the other, interesting. Nevertheless places occur, more particularly towards the head of the lake, on the Roscommon side, where bays extend down to the water's edge; but these are generally backed by rising grounds, so that it is only when passing close in under shore, that the deformities are seen, otherwise these bays contribute to variety, and give more importance to the hills; and to the eye of the painter, their dark sombre blue often affords peculiar value in the landscape, contrasted with the blue tints or silvery lights upon the waters. The greatest deficiency in the scene is the want of wood; and considering how many are the rugged head-lands, where the ground in its present natural and uncultivated state is of little or no value, except for rough pasturage, yet which, if properly planted and fenced, would soon produce trees and yield considerable profit, it is lamentable to think that more attention should not have been paid to a subject so intimately connected with the national wealth; and the consequent prosperity and improvement of the people. Timber likewise might be readily transported along the lake to a sure market. Young plantations may be seen, however, upon a few parts of the shores, and still more on the distant hills; but chiefly for ornament near dwelling-houses. Here and there also, a few groves of full-grown trees remain standing, affording decided evidence that timber of considerable size and value may be produced on apparently light and rocky soil. The trees at St. John's, on the Roscommon shore, might be cited as an example. The rocky shores of Cashel, county Longford, Sir George Featherstones, covered with most thriving plantations, also afford irrefragable proof that profit as well as embellishment might be obtained even within the duration of a single generation. Some of the islands also bear fine trees. The best wooded one is Hare Island, near the Westmeath shore, at the southern end of the lake, the property of Viscount Castlemaine, who has converted it into pleasure-grounds, and constructed a faulciful cottage, residence, embowered within the old trees.—The remains of antiquity, both military and ecclesiastical, along the shores of Lough Ree, are peculiar sources of interest, standing as monuments of the predilection which the ancient inhabitants of the country entertained for the confines of this beautiful sheet of water, whether in reference to the strength of certain places as military positions, or to the calmness and retirement which others afforded for the purposes of religion and elevation. Rocky promontories were usually the seats of the former; and islands were selected for the church and the monastery.

The navigation of Lough Ree is by no means devoid of risk to those who are unacquainted with its sunken rocks and shoals; and the depth of water is liable to considerable variation. Thus, rocks which when the lake is full may be safely passed, are in dry seasons brought near the surface, and become perilous; whilst, on the contrary, rocks which at ordinary periods are distinctly visible, and consequently easily avoidable, become, when the waters rise, concealed without being covered to a sufficient depth, to float a boat. For trading boats of burthen, the worst and most difficult part of the passage is near Lanesborough, at the entrance into the first bay or inlet, going downwards from the town, where the channel is narrow and tortuous; the passage becomes more troublesome in proportion as the waters fall; the bottom here is soft and muddy. According to Mr. Longfield's survey, the greatest depth of water in the lake does not exceed 75 feet; but this depth does not extend to any large portion of the lake, but is rather confined to holes or hollows in the bottom, such as usually occur in limestone countries; in many instances the soundings within a few feet are reduced to one-half. It may readily be conceived from these circumstances, that the heavy boats commonly used on the canals, and on the river, are but ill-adapted to navigate the lake; those which ply both on the canals and upon the river are provided commonly with moveable masts; and as the Upper Shannon affords no regular trackways for horses, the passage is effected partly by sails, partly by poling, which last, on the soft bottoms that so frequently occur, is very laborious. The passage of the lake is never attempted in these boats without a favourable wind, or the appearance of the continuance of easy weather. Lough Ree is, however, provided far better than Lough Allen by nature, with places of refuge; and safe anchorage is found in some of the deep and well-sheltered bays. But along the whole Roscommon shore, there is not a single public quay for boats of burthen, and but few places naturally favourable for loading or unloading. Neither is there a public road, leading down to the lake, excepting at the bay of Kilmore and at St. John's. No villages are scattered along its shores; nor does there appear to be any place interested in or connected with the navigation of the lake, except it be some miserable little hamlet or some cluster of cabins, where the boatmen may perhaps land to replenish their humble store of provisions or procure a glass of whiskey, probably illicitly sold. * * The whole traffic of Lough Ree is confined, or very nearly so, to the intercourse between Lanesborough and Athlone, and vice versa. Manure, indeed, may be occasionally conveyed from Athlone, and a chance load of slates or foreign timber dropped along the shores; potatoes or corn may also be carried to or from one market to the other; but there can scarcely be said to exist any steady, regular traffic, except it be for the few cargoes of native coal brought down from Lough Allen; and this coal is neither in request for the distilleries and breweries of Athlone, nor for the steam-boats on the lower lakes of the Shannon; the former chiefly consume turf, the latter sea-borne coal.

No part, probably, of the whole course of the Shannon, most certainly no part of the Upper Shannon, affords so many advantageous positions for towns and villages as the shores of Lough Ree; and, were the example followed of Holland or Switzerland, those two regions of industry and perseverance, where the population spreads down to the lakes, the rivers, and canals, as affording the means of frequent and ready intercourse, the waters of Lough Ree might become enlivened with the sail and oar, and the cheerful notes of commerce be echoed from shore to shore. At present, except for the accidental appearance of the light skiff wafted over the surface by the zephyr, the face of the lake is a scene of solitude, silence, and melancholy. * * Lough Ree," says the Second Report of the Commissioners for the Improvement of the river Shannon, "is another fine sheet of broad water, with, however, a very soft shoaly bank at its northern extremity, and a somewhat intricate rocky passage, though of small extent, in the middle. At Lanesborough, situated at the northern extremity of the lake, is an obstruction giving a fall of 9 inches or a foot, which is passed by a lock, and thence there is deep water, with a few occasional shoals, but no difference of level to affect the navigation, up to Tarrion-Barry,—a distance of 8 miles. The slight obstruction at Lanesborough can be easily removed, so as to form a continuous navigable course; and thus, for the whole extent between Killaloe and Tarrion-Barry, a distance of 85 miles, there will be an unrivalled lake and river navigation, with an abundant depth of water throughout, and having but two locks—one at Meelick, nine miles above the northern extremity of Lough Derg, and the other at Athlone, close to the southern extremity of Lough Ree. This portion of the river, passing as it does through the centre of Ireland, nearly in a north and south direction, is connected with Dublin by means of the Grand and Royal Canals, which join the Shannon; the former at Shannon Harbour, near Banagher, to the north of

Lough Derg, and the latter at Tarrimon-Barry, 8 miles to the north of Lough Ree. Owing to the peculi-arity of the Shannon, a navigation of this kind would, of course, have been comparatively useless. The banks are flat, and very slightly elevated above the surface of the water, and, consequently, are liable to floods. The river is usually of considerable width, but frequently shallow near the banks—circumstances which would render the formation of towing-paths difficult, and in many parts (particularly in the lakes) quite impracticable; while the prevailing southwest wind is very adverse to the use of sails in passing down the river. These inconveniences were formerly felt, and, consequently, even in the best and most open parts of the river, no regular traffic was undertaken. But all such difficulties vanish on the introduction of steam-power—a system which, even under the obstructions of the present imperfect navigation, has already been successfully practised by the Island Steam Navigation Company, though at great comparative expense, owing to the necessity of using small vessels in some parts of the river, and large and powerful ones on the broad waters of Lough Derg. It is most desirable that steam-vessels, of dimensions suitable to Lough Derg and Lough Ree, should also have a facility of passing through the intermediate part of the river; consequently we have no hesitation in proposing that the two locks in the Middle Shannon, with the few necessary swing bridges, should be of dimensions suitable to such large class of steamers; the chambers of these locks to be 140 feet long and 40 feet wide.

REEKS (THE). See MACGILLICUDDY.

REENASKIDDY, a hamlet on the shore of Cork Harbour, nearly opposite Cove, co. Cork, Munster. Its name means Skiddy's Headland. In the vicinity of the hamlet is a martello tower.

REEF DUNEGAN, a demesne and a sheet of water, 11 mile north by east of the town of Bantry, County of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster. The demesne is well planted, and is the residence of Daniel O'Sullivan, Esq., the brother-in-law of Daniel O'Connell, Esq. The sheet of water measures about half a mile in length, and is separated from the head of Bantry Bay by a narrow neck of land.

REGINALD'S TOWER. See WATERFORD

RIFISK, or RIEEK, a parish in the barony of Mid-Ward, 31 miles south-west by south of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, south-south-eastward, 31 miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 8,200 acres. 2 roads, 12 perches,—of which 12 are 3 rods, 38 perches are in Lough Bally-cannon. Pop., in 1831, 371; in 1841, 1,072. Houses 160. The surface is varied in outline, and very diversified in quality of soil. A height on the northern border has an altitude above sea-level of 457 feet. Lough Bally-cannon lies on the south-eastern boundary.
The soil has 15 worth 40s. per plantation are per acre, and the worst is worth 5s. and qualities between bad and middle-rate prevail. The only seat is Bally-cannon. The road from Waterford to Ronnebeg passes through the interior. This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMEADEN (p. 107), in the dioc. of Waterford. Vicarial tithes commuted, £79 18s. 6d.; glebe, £4 3s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £32 18s. 6d., and are in-applicable in the Corporation of Waterford. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and a parish of 1,000 and of 16 books, 14 boys and 11 girls.

BELICK MURRY, & RELICK MURRY. See 170.

REYNARD, one of several denominations of a bog in the parishes of Cairu and Killemeach, barony of Iveragh co. Kerry, Munster. The chief of the other denominations are, Ochoormony, and Derreen. The bogs lie at the east end, and on the south-east side of the sound or harbour of Valentia. "These bogs," said Mr. Nimmo, in 1814, "are bounded on the west side by the Valentia harbour and creek of the Derreen, navigable for boats up to the bridge of Agouane; on the east, they have the hill of Beuntyne, rising to the elevation of 1,260 feet; on the south-east, Knockatarriff, exceeds to 1,330 feet; the head of the bog itself, about 200 feet above the sea, and it descends to lower water mark. The whole bog contains 2,051.54 Irish acres, or 3,323 English acres; from which deduct 88.87 Irish acres of Derreen, 40.20 of Ochoormony, 11.33 of a croft, 118.52 of Reynard, and 4.50 of other patches, in all, 2,239.77, leaving of waste bog 1,789.70 Irish acres, or 2,830 English acres. The water flowing through this from a basin of 3,000 acres, should suffice for the irrigation of 600 acres, no great difficulty can occur as to the application of it. The bog is thin, being from 4 to 6 feet deep only of black bog. Flooding drains only will be requisite. The bog otherwise very well suited for improvement, as shell-sand is delivered on its edge for 10d. per ton, and limestone for 2s. 6d. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,000 to £2,500."

REYNOLDSVILLE, RAYSVILLE, or RYNSVILLE, a village in the parish of Oranmore, 14 mile south-south-west of the town of Oranmore, barony of Duhallow, co. Galway, Connaught. It constitutes a comparatively long single-sided street, consists chiefly of comfortable lodges and cottages; and has become favourably known as a resort of sea-bathers and a retreat for invalids. A creek of Galway bay approaches within 2 furlongs of its south-west end, and Reynville Point, the headland which screens the north side of the entrance of this creek, is situated 1½ mile to the west-south-west. In the vicinity of the village are the residences of Reynville-lodge, Reynville-castle, Park-house, Kilcunni-cottage, Scabhall-house, Rockhill-house, and Rocklands. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 222. Houses 27.

RENVILLE, a headland, and various other objects, in the parish of Ballinakill, barony of Ballinacorney, co. Galway, Connaght. The headland terminates the long peninsula between Killary Harbour and Ballinakill Harbour, and is situated 6 miles west by south of the entrance to Killery, and 27 west-north-west of Oughterard. The demesne of Renvyle, the residence of Henry Blake, Esq., is situated on the coast, 2 miles east of the headland. Though greatly exposed to the fury of the Atlantic, and surrounded by a singularly wild and inhospitable tract of country, it has been worked by skill and perseverance into a scene of great culture and decoration, and made the centre of improvements which may be traced for several miles along every road, by which the demesne is approached. The mansion, though small, is commodious; and its walls are encased in slate to protect them from the effects of the sea-spray. The detached hill of Renvyle forms an important feature in the house-scenery; and from it, to the west, you command a view of the inhabited islands of Inishboinn and Inishurk, the larger of the numerous islands which are scattered around; on the north, the harbour of Killery, with Mullibee, the loftiest of the western mountains, guarding its entrance, and the cone of Crough Patrick towering over the lesser heights of Morisk; in the distance, Clew Island, lying about Clew bay, and backed by the lofty cliffs of Achill.

ROGHTY. See ROTCHTY.

RERYMORE, REARYMORE, or REARY, a parish in the barony of Timmelind, 5½ miles west by north of Mountmellick, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 6½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 3½ area, 13,948 acres, 2 roads, 7 perches, of which 11 acres, 3 roads, 19 perches are in Lough Duff. Pop., in 1831, 2,729; in 1841, 2,916. Houses 480. The southern half of the parish consists of a wild, lofty, and impracticable part of the Slievebloom system of mountains, and contains the sources of the river Barrow, and a watershed between that river and the Shannon's affluent of the Clodiagh; and even the northern half, though comparatively low and containing a large proportion of arable land, is to a considerable extent encumbered with bog or disposed in natural pasture. The Gorragh rivulet, a tributary of the Clodiagh, traces the southern part of the western boundary, and after leaping down a waterfall, has still an elevation of 888 feet above sea-level; the Glenlaghan and Glenbarrow rivulets rise close on the southern boundary, at very lofty elevations, and proceed northward down their respective glens to the formation of the Barrow, near the centre of the parish; and the Barrow flows north-north-eastward through the interior of the northern district—along a new channel to the east of its former course—and then so deflects as to run eastward along a considerable part of the northern boundary. Lough Duff is situated on the northern border. The lofty line of summits called the Cones extends along the southern boundary; the line of summits called the Ridge of Cappagh extends along the south-eastern boundary; Baunreughony mountain, with an altitude of 1,676 feet above sea-level, is situated at the south-east corner; Antonian mountain, with an altitude of 1,114 feet, is situated on the eastern boundary; and Knockanastumba and another mountain, with altitudes of respectively 1,359 and 1,261 feet, are situated in the interior of the southern district. The seats are Reryvale-house and Barrow-house. The chief antiquities are the site of a church, the ruins of Rerymore church, and the ruins of Rathcoffey bridge. The road from Mountmellick to Birr crosses the interior at the base of the mountains.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of OREGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Vicarial tithe composition, £73 7s. 6d.; glebe, £80. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £146 14s. 11½d.; and are impropriate in General Dunne of Brittas. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 197, and the Roman Catholics to 2,499; and 3 daily schools—one of which was supported by subscription, and one was salaried with £0 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 79 boys and 63 girls.

RETAINÉ. See RATAINE.

REYNAGH, or RYNAGH, a parish in the barony of Garrycastle, King's co., Leinster. It lies on the western verge of the province, and contains the town of BANAGHER: which see. Length, north-north-westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 8,826 acres, 2 roads, 20 perches,—of which 112 acres, 2 roads, 37 perches are in the river Shannon. Pop., in 1831, 4,721; in 1841, 5,106. Houses 823. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,270. Houses 378. The Shannon describes the north-western boundary; it contributes to Reynagh the lower part of the island of Bullock; and in winter, it is here subject to prolonged and extensive overfloodings. A large proportion of the parochial surface is bog; and the remainder consists, in general, of tolerably fair land. The seats are Mount-Corteret-house, Claremont-house, Milltown-house, Hill-house, Mount-Erin, Ballagha-noher-house, Castle-Garden-house, and Cuba-Court. The principal hamlets are Rapemills, Coolfin, and Timolin. The chief antiquities are ruins of a church, a monastery, and two castles; "Archdall" alleges the original of the monastery to have been founded in the 6th century by St. Regnacia, and to have been prosided over by Talacia, the mother of St. Flimin. —This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Meath. Vicarial tithe composition, £144 3s. 10d.; glebe, £173 18s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £144 3s. 10d.; and are impropriate in several persons. The vicarages of Reynagh and GALLIN [see that article], constitute the benefice of Reynagh. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 9,781. Gross income, £681 7s. 11d.; nett, £609 6s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Ballygorth, in the dio. of Meath, but is resident in Reynagh. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is situated in Banagher, and was built in 1829, by means of a loan of £2,030 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; sittings 450; attendance, from 250 to 300. The church at Cloghan in Gallin has an attendance of about 40. One meeting-house serves for both Baptists and Methodists. The Banagher and the Gallin Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively from 1,500 to 2,000, and from about 1,500 to 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 516, and the Roman Catholics to 4,277; the Protestants of the union to 650, and the Roman Catholics to 9,269; 4 pay daily schools at Banagher, Clonculleen, Garbally, and the Ridge, were usually attended by about 145 scholars; 6 other daily schools in the parish had on their books 200 boys and 82 girls; and there were also 10 daily schools in Gallin. One of the schools in Reynagh, was salaried with £12 a-year from the National Board and £3 3s. from subscription; one was salaried with £2 Irish from the vicar and £8 from the Association for Discouraging Vice; and one was a royal endowed school, attended by 5 boarders and 6 day scholars, and supported by large fees from the scholars, and by the proceeds of an endowment of from 360 to 400 acres of land. In 1843, a daily school and an infant school in Banagher were salaried with respectively £20 and £12 6s. 8d. from the National Board.

RHEBAN, a barony. See NARRAGH.

RHEBAN, an old castle, and the site of a quadrangular town, in the parish of Churchtown, barony of West Nuthagh and Rheban, co. Kildare, Leinster. The site of the town is on the right bank of the Barrow, 2½ miles north-west by north of Athy; and it is alleged to have been a seat of population so early as the second century. The castle stands on this site, immediately overhanging the Barrow, "and"—says a writer in an extinct Irish periodical—"it was built, or greatly enlarged, in the early part of the thirteenth century, by Richard de St. Michael, when this and Donnamore, an adjoining district, were erected into a barony, and granted to him in fee, of which he was created baron. Rheban was found of consequence to the first English settlers, who repaired and strengthened the castle; as also the opposite one of Kilberry, both intended to protect a ford on the river. The name of this castle was anciently Baiba or Righ-ban, that is, the habitation of the king; and though now in ruins, some idea can be formed of its former grandeur. Its massive walls, its millions of windows, with its imposing situation,—show it to be a place designed to awe the surrounding country, and forcibly call to mind the days when the chivalrous De St. Michael held his court here in feudal splendour, and lorded it over the petty chieftains of the borders of the Pale. In 1325, in the absence of the English settlers, Rheban, Donnamare, and all their dependencies, were taken by O'Moore. In 1424, Thomas Fitzgerald, Lord Offaley, and afterwards seventh Earl of Kildare, marrying Darrohen, daughter of Anthony O'Moore, speeived in dower the manors of Rheban and Woodstock. In 1642, the Marquis of Ormond took Rheban from the rebels, after an obstinate resistance. In 1648, it was taken by Owen Roe O'Neil, who was afterwards defeated by Lord Inchiquin, and compelled to surrender Rheban and Athy. Near the castle is a very high conical mount, thought to have been a sepulchral mound, raised over some king or chieftain, and though artificial in a great degree, there was, nevertheless, advantage taken of a natural height, as may be seen by the undisturbed beds of gravel that are now taken from it for road purposes."

RHINESHARK. See RINESHARK.
RHODE, or ROAD, a hamlet in the parish of Ballyburley, barony of Warrenstown, King's co., Leinster; it is situated 4½ miles north-east of Philipstown, and 5½ west of Edenderry. A dispensary here is within the Edenderry Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £154 3s. 3d., and administered to 1,143 patients. At the hamlet is a Roman Catholic chapel; and within a mile of it are the residences of a Clonm-house, Coolville-house, Ballyburley-house, Grovesand-house, Greenhedge-house, Rathmoyle-house, Killare-house, Tobberdaly-house, and Ballyburley-cottage. Pop. of the hamlet, in 1831, 55. Houses 8.

RHYNAGH. See REYNAGH.
RIAGH-CROGHAN, or RATHCROGHAN, the site of a quondam town in the parish of Elphin, 2½ miles north-west of Tulsk, barony and county of Roscommon, Connaught. "This," says an old work, "was a royal residence, and the ancient capital of Connaught. The only remains of this ancient city are the Naastaghnan, where the states of Connaught assembled, and the Sacred Cave. Near Croghan stands Religna Riagh, or the resting-place of the kings of Connaught Oia. It consists of a circular area of about 200 feet diameter, surrounded with a stone ditch greatly defaced. Several transverse ditches are within the area; also heaps of coarse stones piled upon each other, specifying the graves of the interred persons. From the construction of this cemetery, it appears to have been erected in the latter ages of paganism." All traces of the Naastaghnan, however, have disappeared; and the Sacred Cave, if such a thing ever existed, cannot now be distinguished among the numerous caverns which perforate the limestone grounds of the district.

RICHARDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Ardee, 2½ miles east of the town of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. Length eastward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1 mile; area, 1,089 acres, 2 roads, 38 perches. Pop., in 1831, 537; in 1841, 542. Houses 104. The surface consists of prime land; and is bounded along the north by the river Dee, and traversed along the interior by the road from Ardee to Drumragh. The only seat is Richardstown-castle.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of STANANON [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. But though the parish is called a vicarage, the whole of its tithes, compounded for £117 17s. 11d., are inappropriate in Viscount Ferrar. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 494; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

RICHARDSTOWN, or BALLYRICHARD, a hamlet in the parish of Drangan, barony of Middlethird, 5½ miles south-east by east of Kallenale, co. Tipperary, Munster. Adjacent to it is Ballyrichard-house.

RICH-HILL, a small market and post town in the parish of Kilmore, barony of West O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. It stands on the road from Armagh to Belfast, 3 miles south-east by south of Loughgall, 4 east-north-east of Armagh, 4½ north by west of Market-hill, 5 west-north-west of Tandragee, 6 south-west by west of Portadown, 26 south-west of Belfast, and 04½ north of Dublin. It stands on high ground, in the midst of a beautifully undulated, and richly wooded country; and it both possesses an interesting appearance in itself, and acquires warmth and picturesqueness, from the close embrace of the demesne of Rich-hill, the residence of the Richardson family, proprietors of the town and the circumjacent estate. The demesne is well enclosed and profusely wooded; and its mansion stands in full view of the street, and is a castellated pile of apparently the same date as that of Lurgan. The town is airy and neat; and has an excellent market-house, a Methodist meeting-house, a Presbyterian meeting-house, an Independent meeting-house, and a Quakers' meeting-house. Within about a mile of it are the seats of Annagh-hill, Ballyerry, Drumard-house, Fieldmount, Sandymount, Hockley-lodge, Course-lodge, Showin-house, Greenmount, Springvale, Cole-hill, Killynalarvagh-house, Fruitfield, Broomfield-house, and King's-hill. In 1843, the Rich-hill Loan Fund had a capital of £2,528, circulated £10,577 in 2,770 loans, cleared a nett profit of £75 4s. 11d., expended for charitable purposes £20, and had 19 depositors or proprietors of its capital. Fairs are held on Shrove-Tuesday, July 26, and Oct. 15. The weekly sales of linen, about 40 years ago, averaged in value £1,500 per week; and the linen trade of the town and its vicinity continues to be proportionately extensive and prosperous. Area of the town, 28 acres. Pop., in 1831, 937; in 1841, 752. Houses 147. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 53; in manufactures and trade, 91; in other pursuits, 28. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 95; on their own manual labour, 59; on means not specified, 8.

RICHMOND, a village in the parish of Clontarf, barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. It constitutes a beautiful and comparatively retired little suburb of the city of Dublin; and it extends along the left bank of the Tolka river immediately above Ballybough-bridge, and 14 miles north-east of Dublin-castle. Both in and around it are numerous handsome lodges and villas. Area of the village, 110 acres. Pop., in 1841, 570. Houses 87. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 25; in manufactures and trade, 25; in other pursuits, 62. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 17; on the directing of labour, 50; on their own manual labour, 22; on means not specified, 23.

RICHMOND-HARBOUR, the western terminus of the Royal Canal, at the confluence of the Camlin river with the Shannon, on the island of Cloondara, parish of Killashee, barony and county of Longford, Leinster. Much confusion of nomenclature exists in consequence of the crowding of various names upon localities closely adjacent to one another, and not very well defined; but in strict propriety, Richmond Harbour is the mere terminus of the canal, with its docks, basins, and warehouses.—Cloondara village is, with its Roman Catholic chapel, its schoolhouse, and its constabulary station, the village adjoining the canal terminus, and on the left bank of the Camlin.—Castletown is the hamlet at the east end of the bridge across the Shannon; and 5 furlongs north-north-west of the village of Cloondara.—Farnonbarry is the village at the west or Roscommon end of the bridge across the Shannon, and Fisherstown is the hamlet on the left bank of the Shannon, a little below the foot of Lough Forbes, and nearly a mile above Castletown. The name of Richmond Harbour was given to the terminus of the canal in honour of the Duke of Richmond, who, when Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, was present at the opening of the navigation. A new and deep cut of canal was proposed by the Commissioners for the improvement of the navigation of the river Shannon, to be made from the foot of Lough Forbes along the island of Clonsilla, to the Shannon at the mouth of the Canlin, and end of the Royal Canal navigation; and this great and important work, designed to render the upper Shannon practicable for much larger craft than could formerly ply in it, was estimated to cost £47,152 4s. 6d. to be done in 1841.

RIGG-BANK, a fishing-bank about a mile south of the Copeland Islands, barony of Arles, co. Down, Ulster. The marks for it are Black Head of Island Magee, outside of Great Copeland, but not so far as the Cross Isle, and Bullyvester-house on the centre notch of Serabo. It seems to have been formed in the wake of the Copeland Islands; and it has a surface of clean sand in a depth of 9 or 10 fathoms of water. It abounds in clean and plentiful trawling ground for flat fish, &c. Thurst is said to have anchored upon it, and it is used by the boats of the island.

RINGABELL, See RINGABELLA.

RINGAGONAGH, See RINGACONAGH.

RINGCORAN, See RINCURRAN.

RINGCREW, an old monastic castle in the parish of Templemichael, barony of Cosmore and Cusbridge, co. Waterford, Munster. It crowns a cliff and precipitous height on the right margin of the river Blackwater, 2 miles above Coughbals and is now a desolate and fragmentary ruin of picturesque appearance. It originally belonged to the Knights Templars, and having been forfeited to the Crown, was, with Strucally, Ballintra, and other lands, granted in 1686 to Sir Walter Balguy, from whom it passed by sale to the first Earl of Cork. In the vicinity is Kincore-cottage, a house of the name.

RINCURRAN, or RANCORAN, a parish, partly in the barony of Kinnalea, but chiefly in that of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. The Kinsale section contains the village of Cove, and part of the town of Kinsale; see these articles. Length, 7 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$. Area of the Kinnalea section, 1,362 acres; of the Kinsale section, 8,055 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 3,815; but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 3,758; in 1841, 3,506. Houses 559. Pop. of the Kinnalea section, in 1831, 412; in 1841, 384. Houses 60. Pop. of the rural districts of the Kinsale section, in 1841, 1,994. Houses 320. The surface occupies a large portion of the peninsula between Kinsale Harbour and Oyster Harbour; and it consists, variously, of pasture ground and tillage land; parts of which are good, and other parts light and sandy. This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dioc. of Cork. The population, £461 10s. 9d.; glebe, 4s. Gross income, £466 10s. 9d.; nett, £385 9s. 9d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Carrigrohilly, in the dioc. of Clonfert, but is resident in Luncrum. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 160; attendance 150. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 201, and the Roman Catholics to 3,498; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 20 children; and a daily school was salaried at £42 a-year from subscription, and had on its books 220 boys and 22 girls. In 1841, the population, £461 10s. 9d.; glebe, 4s. Gross income, £466 10s. 9d.; nett, £385 9s. 9d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £146 13s. 10d., and are bay, barony of Qualter, co. Waterford, Munster. A vast ridge of sand, covered with sea-beds, accumulated by the ceaseless action of the tide, stretches along the whole length of Traamore bay, and separates what is called the backstrand of Ringabank from the open coast, and also prevents the further inroads of the ocean. This backstrand, now almost a sheer waste, contains 1,000 Irish acres, and if the different proprietors who are interested would unite, under proper management this large improvable tract might soon be rescued from the influence of the tide. A small stream runs into this bay at its eastern end; and in strong southerly winds, the tide rushes with dreadful velocity up the channel of this river. The small estuarial mouth of the stream is called Ringabank Harbour; and in spite of its being at once shallow, swept with a powerful current, and in a great degree unsheltered, it offers the only chance of safety, or only possible asylum to any vessel, which becomes embayed in the fearfully perilous bay of Traamore. See TRAMORE.

RING (THE), See BLACKROCK, co. Cork.

RING, or RINGARINDEL, a small fishing-harbour on the east shore of Clonkilly bay, about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the town of Clonkilly, barony of Ibane and Barryson, co. Cork, Munster. A curved pier, 220 feet in length, and quay-faced on each side, was constructed here by the late Fishery Board, and has been a very useful work, not only for the purpose of the fishery, but also as a commercial harbour, and as a safety asylum for small craft.

RINGABELLA, a rivulet and a cove, in the barony of Kerrycurryh, co. Cork, Munster. The rivulet rises near the Carrigaline river, and runs between 8 and 9 miles partly west-south-westward, but chiefly southward and eastward, to the west side of the outer harbour of Cork, at a point $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Cork Head. The cove is simply the estuarial mouth of the rivulet; and it is sandy and hazardous in the interior, and has a dangerous sandy shoal across its entrance. The fishermen of the cove, of Ringabella, were formerly residents at Crossbarry, and had there fine and well-appointed boats; but, when their lands fell out of lease, they were obliged to sell their large boats, to purchase inferior ones, and to remove to Ringabella. A pier is greatly wanted for their accommodation. The entrance of Ringabella is on the south side of the cove; and a hill rises on the north side, and commands a view of the coast as far as to the Old Head of Kinsale.

RINGAGONAGH, or RINGACONAGH, a parish in the barony of Decies-within-Drum, 4 miles south-south-east of Dungarvan by the road, but only 2 miles in a straight line, co. Waterford, Munster. It contains the village of Ringavilla; which see. Length, eastward, 4 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 2; area, 2,246 acres, 1 rood, 16 perches. Pop. in 1831, 2,423; in 1841, 2,381. Houses 420. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,327. Houses 370. The surface extends along the whole of the south side of Dungarvan Harbour, and along the immediately adjacent part of the Atlantic. Helwick Head, in the extreme east, has an altitude of 231 feet above sea-level. The coast along the north is a low beach, forsaken by the ebb tide; and the coast along the Atlantic is bluff and rocky, and contains Paper's Cliff, Muggart's bay, and Carrickbrean. The interior surface consists, for the most part, of moderate land. The principal residences are Newnery, and Helwick lodge. This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dioc. of Lismore. Annual tithe composition, £73 10s. 11d.; glebe, £2 10s. Gross income, £79 6s. 11d.; nett, £59 10s. 5d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £146 13s. 10d., and are impropriate in the patron. The church is situated at Ringville, and was built in 1822; by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 60; attendance 20. An Independent meeting-house has an attendance of 16. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 2,494; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 46 boys and 24 girls. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at Mullinahorna were salaried with respectively £8 and £10 from the National Board, and had on their books 100 boys and 67 girls. The Ringanagh dispensary is within the Dungarvan Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 4,332; and, in 1830, it expended £78 10s., and administered to 1,006 patients.

RINGAROGA, or DENNISGAL, an island in the parish of Creagh, eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It lies in Baltimore Harbour, and extends south-south-westward from the vicinity of Innishbeg to the vicinity of Innisharkin, and opposite the town of Baltimore. Its length is 2 miles; its extreme breadth is 1 mile; and its area is about 790 acres. An excellent causeway and bridge, constructed by Sir W. Becher, Bart., the proprietor, now connects it with the mainland. Pop., in 1831, 786.

RINGCURRAN. See RINCURRAN.

RINGONAGH. See RINGONAGH.

RINGRONE, a parish in the baronies of Kinsale, Courcy, and eastern division of East Carbery, and 2 miles south-south-west of the town of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. The Courcy section contains the villages of BALLINSPIITTE, BALLYMACKEAN, and KILCOLEMAN; see these articles. Length of the whole, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Area of the Kinsale section, 1,380 acres; of the Courcy section, 5,307 acres; of the Carbery section, 2,353 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,968; * in 1841, 5,455. Houses 896. Pop. of the Kinsale section, in 1831, 1,002; in 1841, 1,147. Houses 185. Pop. of the Carbery section, in 1831, 1,205; in 1841, 1,131. Houses 190. Pop. of the rural districts of the Courcy section, in 1841, 2,727. Houses 441. The surface extends along the Brandon river, opposite and immediately above the town of Kinsale; it also extends so along the Atlantic as to include the OLD HEAD OF KINSALE [which see]; and it consists, for the most part, of land of a light quality. The chief antiquity is the ruin of the ancient castle of Ringrone; and this gives the title of Baron to Lord Kinsale. The mayor of Ringrone had anciently thirty knights fees, was much more extensive than at present, and constituted for a time an entire barony.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £750; glebe, £1. Gross income, £731; nett, £606 2s. Patrons, the diocesan every alternate turn, and either Lord De Clifford or Lord Kinsale the other turn. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was built about the year 1780, by subscription and assessment. Sittings 150; attendance 25. A new church, however, is in process of erection, to contain 150 sittings, and to be completed by means of a contribution of £629 7s. 4d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. A school-house at the Old Head is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 3,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballinacree. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 130, and the Roman Catholics to 4,399; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 11 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was wholly supported by the rector—had on their books 135 boys and 79 girls.

RINGSEND, a suburb of the city of Dublin, in the parish of Donnybrook, barony and county of Dublin, Leinster. It stands at the mouth and the confluence of the Liffey and the Dodder, on the south side of the Liffey, on the east side of the Dodder, opposite the end of the North Wall, immediately west of the village of Irishtown, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Dublin-castle. It is a dingy, dirty, disagreeable place; and jointly with Irishtown, forms one of the most befuddled skirts of the city. A bridge, with a handsome elliptical stone arch, here spans the Dodder; and the wet docks of the Grand Canal Company, and graving docks capable of accommodating six large vessels, are immediately adjacent. The district of Ringsend and Irishtown constitutes a royal donative chapelry, erected for the use of the revenue officers and the inmates of the garrison at the Pigeon-house. The chapel was built in the reign of Queen Anne, and is kept in repair by the Board of Works. Sittings 600; attendance, from 500 to 550. The chaplain is appointed by the Crown; and receives a salary of £184 12s. 4d., payable by warrant on the Treasury. The Wesleyan Methodist chapel at Ringsend has an attendance at 150. There is a Roman Catholic chapel at Irishtown. Area of the town of Ringsend, 64 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,755. Houses 150. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 75; in manufactures and trade, 208; in other pursuits, 84. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 106; on their own manual labour, 174; on means not specified, 26.

RINGVILLE, a village in the parish of Ringanagh, barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands near the south strand of Dungarvan Harbour, 2 miles west of Helwick Head, and 23 in a straight line south-south-east of the town of Dungarvan. It contains the parish-church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a schoolhouse, a graveyard, and the ruins of an old church. Area, 25 acres. Pop., in 1841, 264. Houses 55.

RINROE, a cove in Broad-Haven, parish of Kilcommon, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is an excellent landing-place, and offers an exceedingly good site for a fishery pier.

RINVILLE. See REXVILLE.

RIVER-CHAPEL, a village in the parish of Ardamine, barony of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the Aghboy rivulet, 3 miles south-west of Courtown Harbour, and 3 miles south-east of Gorey. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel and a schoolhouse; and within a mile of it are Oughton's-cottage, Ovenavorrach-cottage, Courtown-house, Kilbride-house, Ballinacray-cottage, Middleton-house, Harbournview, and Ardamine-house. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 248. Houses 52.

RIVERSTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Carlingford, barony of Lower Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. It stands on the left bank of the Big river, and on the road from Carlingford to Dundalk, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of the shore of Dundalk bay, and $\frac{3}{4}$ mile south-south-west of Carlingford.

RIVERSTOWN, a village in the parish of Temple-Esk, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated at the confluence of two affluents of the Glanmire river, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-east of the village of Glanmire. It was formerly called Ballyrosheen, 'the town of the little rose.' Adjacent is the demesne of Riverstown, the seat of Mr. Brown, containing a very considerable extent of the largest and finest trees in the county. Dr.

* The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the population of 1831 at 4,938.

Smith says respecting this demesne: "It is a pleasant seat of the Lord Bishop of Cork. The house is beautified with several pieces of wood, performed by the Franchin brothers. The river of Glanvine runs through his gardens, banked into serpentine canals, which are stocked with carp, perch, &c., the river being grated at both ends. A pleasant park, stocked with deer, comes close to the garden walls. The adjacent country is here lately improved, well laid out, and cultivated. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 241; in 1841, 134. Houses 23.

RIVERSTOWN, a village in the parish of Kilmacallane, barony of Timahilly, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands on the river Union, and on the road from Sligo to Carrick-on-Shannon, 1½ mile east of the Sligo and Dublin mail-road, and 4½ south-east by south of Collooney. It contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a Methodist meeting-house, a dispensary, a schoolhouse, and a constabulary barrack. The dispensary is within the Sligo Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 48,173 acres, with a pop. of 17,223; and in 1830-40, it expended £111 2s. 9d., and administered to 1,476 patients. In the northern vicinity is Cooper's hill, the seat of A. B. Cooper, Esq. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 421; in 1841, 369. Houses 61. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 18; in manufacturing and trade, 39; in other pursuits, 12. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 28; on their own manual labour, 27; on means not specified, 2.

ROACH, or Roche, a parish in the barony of Upper Duhallow, 8½ miles north-west of the town of Duhallow, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, east-south-eastward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½ acres, 3,300 acres. Road, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,426; in 1841, 1,373. Houses 255. The surface consists, for the most part, of tolerably good arable land. The Castletown river describes a large proportion of the southern boundary, and the road from Newtown-Hamilton to Duhallow traverses the interior. The seats are Roach-house, Shortistone-house, and Falmore-house. The principal antiquity is the ruin of Roach-castle, situated on the top of a rocky hill, which commands a good view of the circumjacent country. "The building," says Mr. Brewer, "is of an irregular form, the design having been accommodated to the natural circumstances of the site. The date of erection is not known, but, according to a family tradition, this castle was constructed by a lady named Rose Verdun, of the ancient family of the Verduns, once powerful in this district, and in the midland counties of England. This Lady Rose, adds the tradition, married into the family of Bellevue, and the name of the castle is a corruption of her Christian appellation. To whichever race may belong the honour of founding this building, it is certain that a branch of the ancient and distinguished family of Bellevue was seated here for several ages. In regard to the dimensions of the structure and its former character, we are informed in the Kouthima that 'the great chlord which is the front and longest side, is about eighty yards; and the versed side, or breadth, about forty.' At the opposite corner to that of the main dwelling, was formerly a tower of defence, and underneath a Sally port. Roach-castle was defended for King Charles I. in 1649, and is said to have been demolished by Oliver Cromwell. This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of BARROSTOWN (which see), in the dio. of Armagh. The tithes are compounded for £264 11s. 10d., and are wholly impropriate in John Pratt, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 45, and the Roman Catholics to 1,404; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ROAD, See ROAD.
ROADFORD, a village in the parish of Kilmilagh, barony of Corduff, co. Clare, Munster. It stands within a mile of the shore, on the river Aille, and on the road from Milltown-Mulvey to Black Head. 5½ miles north-west by north of Ennistymon. Within 1½ mile of it are the seats of Doonin-castle, Glash-na-more-house, Gortadale-house, Arnan view, and Aughasa-vogher-house, the hamlets of Carrunbeg, Ballady, Tooclay, Arduban, Cromgort, and Fishers' street. The ruins of Kilmilagh church, Thomallin church, Doonmellin castle, and Doonagore castle, and these objects and features of two hills, a constabulary station, Carrickatohill quarry, a quondam silver mine, &c. Tonnaw fort, Aughasinna fort, Moanveg fort, &c. Glasha fort, and a cave. Area of the village, 12½ acres. Pop., in 1841, 126. Houses 23.

ROANISH. See ROANISH.

ROAR. See ROAR.
ROARING-WATER, a hamlet, a rivulet, and a bay, in the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. The hamlet stands at the head of the bay, and on the road from Skibbereen to Skilly, and Dumanus, 4½ miles west by north of Skibbereen. The rivulet runs less than 5 miles south by westward to the head of the bay, at the hamlet. The bay, into a limited sense, opens at Scheme Island with a width of 1½ mile, penetrates the land north-eastward to the extent of 3 miles, sends off from the middle of its north-west side an arm of 1½ mile in length north-westward to Ballydehob, and has completely sheltered anchoring-ground behind two islets at the descent of the Ballydehob arm. But, in a large sense, it opens between Cape Clear in the south-east and Long Island in the north-west, with a width of 4½ miles; penetrates the land north-eastward to the extent of 8½ miles; and includes the greater part of the crowded and intricate archipelago between Ballydehob Harbour and Crookhaven, having within its area, in addition to islets, and isles, the considerable islands of Carry's Castle, Middle, Calf, West Calf, East Calf, Annadripoll, Mutton, Scheme, Horse, and Whitehall. The shores are much diversified by deep interlacings of land and water, and the channels and sounds among the islands, or between them, and the mainland, contain various good anchoring grounds.

ROBE (THE), a river of the county of Mayo, Connaught. It rises on the east side of the hill of Ballybreaghany, 3½ miles north-north-east of Clare, in the barony of Clanmorris, and pursues a very circuitous and sinuous course, past the towns of Hollymount and Ballinrobe, to the middle of the east side of Lough Mask. A straight line from its source to its embouchure extends 12½ miles south-westward; and yet the length of the river's course, even exclusive of all minor sinuosities, is at least 22 miles. Most of the upper and middle parts of the stream are uninteresting; but much of the lower parts, particularly in the immediate vicinity of Ballinrobe, possesses considerable beauty.

ROBEEN, a parish in the barony of Kilmain, 1½ mile north-west of Hollymount, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, west-north-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 4; area, 10,907 acres, 26 perches, of which 667 acres, 9 perches are in Lough Carra, and 82 acres. A road, 24 perches are in small lakes, and the river Robeen. Pop., in 1831, 3,193; in 1841, 3,544. Houses 641. The surface, in a general view, is low and flat, and consists of good land. Lough Carra lies on the north-western boundary, and places within Robeen the islets of Castle, Bush, and Otter. Lough Aglinny lies on the southern border. The river Robe traces a considerable part of both the eastern and the southern boundaries. The seats are Brownstown-house, Garriestown-house, Cornfield-house, Mountview, Fogher-house, Beechgrove-house, Newgrove-house, and Bloomfield-house;—the last the residence of the Rev. Francis L. Rutledge. The principal antiquities are the ruins of Robeen castle and another castle. The mail-road from Dublin to Westport passes through the interior. This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILCOMMON of HOLLYMOUNT (which see), in the dio. of Tullam. The church stands on the eastern verge of the parish, adjacent to Hollymount, and was enlarged about the year 1818; by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 60 to 100. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Roundfort, in Kilsinnon. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 84, and the Roman Catholics to 3,342; a hedge-school at Brownstown was usually attended by about 40 children; and two other daily schools were salaried with each £8 a year from the National Board, and had on their books 70 boys and 67 girls.

ROBERTSTOWN, a village in the parish of Kilmacogue, barony of Connell, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the Grand Canal, at its summit-level; between Ballinac and Tickenin, 23 miles south-west by west of Prosperous, 7½ north-north-east of Kildare, and 20½ west-south-west of Dublin. The country around it is, for the most part, bleak, mossy, and a dismally dreary portion of the great bog-region of the province; and respectively on its eastern and its southern skirts commence the great mossy expanses of the Bog of Lullinmore and the Bog of Moanah. The principal residences near it are Robertstown-house and Ainsborough-house. The village has a corn-station. Fairs are held on Jan. 1; March 1; May 7, May 29, June 24, Aug. 15, and Nov. 20. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. A dispensary here is within the Naas Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 5,802; and, in 1839-40, it expended £54 2s. 6d., and administered to 719 patients. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 281; in 1841, 314. Houses 51.

ROBERTSTOWN, an ecclesiastical parish in the barony of Lower Kells, 2½ miles north-west of Nobber, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,647 acres, 28 perches. Pop., in 1831, 335. The surface consists of good land, and is politically included in the parish of Kilbeg. Robertstown parish is a rectory; and part of the benefice of Newgrove (which see), in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £78 10s. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 60 boys and 32 girls.

ROBERTSTOWN, a quondam parochial chapel-ry, adjacent to Rathfrimack, in the barony of Barrymore, and dio. of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster.

ROBERTSTOWN, or CASTLE-ROBERT, a parish in the barony of Shanid, 1½ mile north-east by east of Shanagolden, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 3,006 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,794; in 1841, 2,914. Houses 350. The surface is a rich and beautiful portion of the sea-board of the estuary of the Shannon, consists of excellent land, and is traversed by the road from Limerick to Turbow, and by the route of the proposed Shannon line of railway. The islands of Foyers and Achraus (which see), are on the coast. The hamlet of Robertstown stands on the Dublin and Turbow road, near the head of a small estuarial creek off the Shannon. This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Limerick. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £110 14s. 3d., and the rectorial for £256 18s. 7d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Cork. The vicarages of Robertstown and DUNMOLLY (see that article), constitute the benefice of Robertstown or Castle-Robert. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 3,408. Gross income, £189 6s. 11½d. nett, £178 4s. 11½d. Patron, the Earl of Cork. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Lightermurrough in the dio. of Cloyne, and that of Monastereagh in the dio. of Limerick; and is non-resident in Robertstown. A curate receives a salary of £10 for performing the occasional duties. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Shanagolden and Kilmoylan. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 1,842; the Protestants of the union to 38, and the Roman Catholics to 3,606; 3 pay daily schools in the parish were usually attended by about 270 children; and there were also 3 daily schools in Dunmoylan.

ROBINSTOWN, a village in the parish of Kilskeary, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 146. Houses 29.

ROCHESTOWN, co. Wexford. See AMBROSSETOWN.

ROCHESTOWN, a parish in the barony of West Iffa and Offa, 2½ miles south-south-east of Cahircity, Tipperary, Munster. Length, west-south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,003 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches,—of which 10 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches are in the river Suir. Pop., in 1831, 411; in 1841, 488. Houses 68. The surface lies on the left bank of the Suir, and consists of excellent tillage land. The seats are Rochestown-house and Shamrock-lodge; and the antiquities are the ruins of a church and a castle. This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ARDFINNAN (which see), in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £95; glebe, £26 8s. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 20, and the Roman Catholics to 418; and a pay daily school had on its books 71 boys and 25 girls.

ROCHESTOWN, or BALLYWILLIAM, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 1½ mile north by west of Six-mile-Bridge, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 1,163 acres. Pop., in 1831, 190; in 1841, 273. Houses 39. The surface lies within the north side of the basin of the Cammogne, and consists of good land. Here is an old castle. This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Emly. Vicarial tithe composition, £20. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Cahircorney in the dio. of Emly. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ROCHESTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Monkstown, 1½ mile south by east of Kingsdown, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Limerick. It lies exposed to the sea-air, and used to be frequented by persons to drink gout's whey. Adjacent to it is the residence of Rochestown-house. An obelisk was erected here by the late John Meas, Esq., and is a landmark and a conspicuous object for many miles around. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

ROCHFORD, a demesne in the parish of Moylicker, barony of Fartullagh, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It is situated on the east shore of Lough Ennel, 3½ miles south-south-west of Mullingar; and is the property and residence of S. F. Hopkins, Bart. "The extent and beauty of the undulating grounds which stretch along the lake, the profusion of fine trees everywhere through them, and the situation and style of the whole place, render Rockfort one of the first residences in this portion of the country.

ROCK-CLOSE. See BLARNEY.

ROCKCORRY, a village in the parish of Ematris, barony of Darryl, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It stands on the road from Monaghan to Cooteshill, and on that from Ballybay to Drum, 4½ miles west by south of Ballybay, 5 east-south-east of Newbliss, and 8 south by west of Monaghan. It presents decided appearances of industry and comfort. A weekly market used to be held for yarn, and to be spiritedly attended; and fairs are held on the last Wednesday of every month, for purposes of general trade. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. A dispensary here is within the Cooteshill Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £84 7s. 10d., and administered to 2,062 patients. In the village are a meeting-house and a constabulary barrack; and within a mile of it are a Roman Catholic chapel, two school-houses, the lakes of White-Lough, Carravog, Clossagh, Drumlona, Cooteshill, and Drumsin, and the residences of Glenburn-cottage, Brushford-house, and Fairfield. The Corry family, who gave name to the village, are reported by Sir Charles Coote, in 1801, to be proprietors of all the adjacent lands and of a fine estate at Ballyborough, and to have worked their demesne of Rockcorry into a beautiful condition, extensively planted, and very carefully and creditably managed. Area of the village 24 acres. Pop. in 1841, 305. Houses 67.

ROCKFARM, extensive limestone quarries on Little Island, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. They extend a mile along the verge of the river Lee, and are situated opposite to Passage-West, and 5 miles east of the city of Cork. Their produce is of the best quality; unequalled for hewing; and, in consequence of both its beautiful colour and its very fine grain, peculiarly adapted for the construction of large buildings. The refuse is converted into lime, and is in much demand for ballasting vessels, preparing roads, and various miscellaneous purposes. The quarried blocks are shipped at 4 wharves within 130 yards of each quarry; and both they and the refuse are conveyed to the wharves by means of a recently constructed railroad. In 1837, the yearly amount of produce was about 12,000 tons of manufactured stone, and 44,000 tons of rough stone, the former sold for 13s. per ton, and the latter for 1s. 4d.; and the quarries daily employed about 100 men, but, if fully worked, were capable of employing 600.

ROCKFOREST, the demesne of Sir James L. Cotter, Bart., in the barony of Ferny, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated on the right bank of the river Blackwater, 3 miles east of Mallow; and the mansion surmounts a rising ground, and commands an extensive prospect of the brilliant valley of the Blackwater.

ROCKHILL, a village in the parish of Bruree, barony of Upper Connello, co. Limerick, Munster. It stands a little west of the road from Limerick to Cork, 1½ mile west by north of the village of Bruree, 4½ north by west of Charleville, and 5½ south of Croon. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Limerick takes designation from Rockhill, and has chapels here and at Bruree and Collesman-Well. Area of the village 8 acres. Pop. in 1841, 319. Houses 56.

ROCKINGHAM, the superb demesne of Viscount Lorton, in the parishes of Boyle, Kilbrynn, and Ardearie, barony of Boyle, 2½ miles east-north-east of the town of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the beautiful, island-studded waters of Lough Key; and, on the south, by a long line of lofty wall, overhanging from within by a bordering of plantation, along the road from Boyle to Dublin. "Rockingham, as it now exists," said Mr. Weld in 1820, "may be considered as the creation of the present and first Viscount Lorton. Originally, or at least, according to the representation in some former views of the place, the house appears to have had a dome, of considerable size; but on the addition of another story, this was removed; at the same time, the ground-plan underwent alterations, and the building was enlarged. The architecture is irregular, neither wholly castellated nor wholly Grecian. The entrance is under an Ionic portico of four columns, corresponding with which a range of other pillars of the same order and proportion appears along the walls of the house, producing from certain points of view a pleasing effect. An extensive ornamental projects from the house on another side. One of the most striking features of the house consists in its perfectly insulated position, no office of any description being visible; but the whole being surrounded by smooth shorn grass, interspersed with beds of flowers and ornamented walks. This arrangement has, been effected, by having most of the offices of the basement story covered over, and subterranean passages carried from underneath the eminence on which the house stands, towards the lake in one direction, and in another towards the stables, which stand at a considerable distance screened out by trees; the covered passage, however, does not reach the whole way to the latter, but merely far enough to prevent the appearance of movement near the mansion. The edifice is wholly built of very beautiful marble, quarried within Lord Lorton's own estate. The demesne of Rockingham consists of gently undulating ground, and its scenery is all of the softest kind; smooth verdant lawns, graceful trees and groves, in some places insulated, in others stretching down to the margin of the lake, and dipping their branches in the water. Few trees of great age or size are at present observable; the largest, probably, are found in an old avenue of beech near some of the original offices. The lake constitutes a delightful appendage to the demesne and pleasure-grounds, and few residences command in their immediate vicinity a richer view of wood and water.

ROCK-ISLAND, a hamlet in the parish of Kilmac, western division of the barony of West-Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on a rocky peninsula adjacent to Crookhaven. Pop. not specially returned.

ROCKMILLS, a village in the parish of St. Nathlash, barony of Ferny, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 19 acres. Pop. in 1841, 461. Houses 88. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 45; in manufactures and trades 28; in other pursuits 16. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 20; on their own manual labour, 57.

ROCKPORT, a small fishery harbour, in the parish of Hollywood, 2½ miles north-east of the town of Hollywood, barony of Lower Castlecomer, co. Down, Ulster. It has a quay, in the immediate vicinity is Rockport-house.

ROCKVILLE, a hamlet in the parish of Widdesburgh, and on the river Philipps, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. In the vicinity is Rockfield-house.

ROCKY-ISLAND, a small island in Cork Harbour, 1 mile south of Cove, barony of Barrymore co. Cork, Munster. It is one great mass of limestone, rising abruptly from the water, and possessing an altitude of between 40 and 50 feet above sea-level. Its surface was levelled for the erection of a gunpowder magazine, and its summit is surmounted by a watch-tower.

RODANSTOWN. See RADDONATOWNS.

ROE (TIRE), a river of the county of Londonderry, Ulster. It rises east of Moneydenny, at the head of Glenshane, on the southern margin of the county, at an elevation of nearly 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, and runs 13 miles northward, and 2 westward, to the middle of the east side of Lough Foyle. The upper part of its course is tumultuous and alpine,—the stream careering along a succession of lofty screened gleams, and sweeping before it the silt and the debris brought down from multitudes of acclivities by multitudes of torrents and tumbling rills; but the lower part of its course is a majestic march through one of the richest plains of Ireland, to a terminating sea-board or shore of liver sand. Its principal affluents are the Owenbeg, the Owenmore, the Gelvan, the Balteagh, the Castle, and the 'Carley riueltets'. "A current derived from so many mountain-streams, must be liable to sudden and impetuous floods; and these floods having to pass through a level and winding channel in the latter stages of their course, must be disposed, on every sudden increase, to overflow the countries nearly on a level with the channel. For this reason, many trifling acres of the finest grounds are with great difficulty defended by embankments, and almost an equal number, for want of such embankments, remain in a state of lottery." The plain around the lower part of the river's course is called Myroe,—a name which means 'the miry flat of the Roe'; and the river itself acquired its name of Roe from the muddy colour of its waters.

ROE, an inhabited island in Clew bay, parish and barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo. Connaght.

ROEBUCK, the northern district of the parish of Fanev, barony of Rathfriland, 3 miles south-east by north of Dublin-castle; co. Dublin, Leinster. Roebuck-castle may, from its antiquity and its commanding character, be regarded as at the core of the district. This building was nearly destroyed in the wars of 1641, and was then the property and residence of Mathew Barnewall, Lord Trimlestown; but it was afterwards restored; and it not very long ago received considerable improvements under the direction of its modern occupant, James Crofton, Esq. The castle commands magnificent and stirring views of the city and bay of Dublin, and of a large expanse of adjacent country. Within 1 mile of the castle, are the villages of Booterstown, Windy Harbour, Dendrum, Sillorgan, Milltown, and Clonskeagh; and the mansions, villas, and lodges of Mount-Dillon, Roebuck-house, Belleview, Roebuck-lodge, Woodview, Milltown-house, Vergemount-house, Dodder-cottage, Montrose, Beech-hill, Marino-lodge, Strand-cottage, Elm-park, Nutley, Merrion-castle, Granville, Trimlestown, Woodbine, Merrille, Simpson-lodge, Beechfield, Chatterfield, Daron-coart, Brooklawn, Marino-house, Owenstown-house, South-hill, Stillorgin-park, Mount-Merrion, Mountain-vale, Thorn-hill, Riddewdale, Lakelated, Anselmont, Edenpark, Kilmacdonagh-house, Romenade, Rockmount, Taney-hill, Roebuck-hall, Castleview, Belfield, Lapidhurst, Roebuck-park, Roebuck-house, Fairybole-cottage, and Springfield.

ROE-ISLAND. See ROE.

ROGERI-CALVI, a quoniam parish in the barony of Condons and Mangibbion, co. Cork, Munster. It was a vicarage, and formed part of the benefice of Clonroche, in the dio. of Cloyne; but it has become completely unincorporated with some other of the parishes which constitute that benefice.

ROGESTOWN, a bar-harbour between the parishes of Lusk and Portlaine, or between the baronies of East Ballythory and Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It opens immediately south of Lusk, has an entrance of less than 1 of a mile in breadth, expands to an extreme interior width of nearly 1 mile, and penetrates the land westward to the extent of 12 mile; but it consists of merely the external tideway of two little rivers, is almost completely dry during ebb-tide, and cannot be entered by even fishing-craft without serious difficulty. It is crossed by the Dublin and Drogheda railway. On its north shore stands Rogerstown-house.

ROLESTOWN, or ROYLESTOWN, a hamlet in the parish of Killossory, barony of Nethercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the left bank of the Broadacadow river, and on the road from Swords to Garristown, 31 miles north-west of Swords. In the vicinity are Rolestown-house, Fieldstown-house, Newbarn-house, Mountain-Stewart-house, Saucers-town-house, and Roganstown-house. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Dublin, takes designation from Rolestown, and has chapels here and at Oldtown. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

RONAN'S-ISLAND, an islet in the upper lake of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. A cottage upon it was built by a wealthy gentleman, of the name of Ronan, who usually retired hither during two or three months in summer for fishing and shooting; and the building has now been for a long time known as a retreat of pic-nic parties making the tour of the lakes. The islet is accessible only at one spot, and in the vicinity of the cottage: it is thickly wooded with oak, arbutus, and other dendritic shrubs; and its summit has an altitude of about 30 feet above the level of the lake, and commands a powerful panoramic view of the noble mountains by which the basin of the upper lake is surrounded. "The surface of this island," says the author of the Guide to Killarney, "is covered with intricate strata of decayed leaves and branches. These at a great depth are bound and united in such a manner, as to form one continued mass of putrified matter, becoming, in proportion to its depth from the surface, darker in colour, until at the bottom, where the dissolution is most perfect, and the pressure greatest, it is one continued black turf. This fact may tend to explain how many of the bogs in Ireland may have been formed; for it is perfectly ascertained that most of the mountains, and even a great portion of the plains, were once covered thickly with forest trees.

RONANISIL, or RONAN, an island in the parish of Inniskeel, barony of Ballyagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies in the entrance of Guibarra bay, 3 miles north-north-east of Durois Head, and 5 miles south of the island of Arran.

ROODSTOWN. See ROOSTOWN.

ROOGAGH (TIRE), a rivulet of the county of Fermanagh, Ulster. It rises on the north-west side of Glenkeel mountain, in the parish of Boho; and flows 7 miles north-westward, chiefly on the boundary between the baronies of Magherahoy and Glenamoy, and on that between the parishes of Innismacintagh and Derinish, to the head of Lough Melvin at the village of Garrison.

ROOSKY, a village, partly in the parish of Mohill, barony of Mohill, co. Leitrim, but chiefly in the parish of Tattinbarry, barony of North Ballynaghibber, co. Roscommon, Connaght. It stands on the river Shannon, and on the road from Drumad to Strokestown; a little below Lough Boffin, and 6 miles north-east by east of Strokestown. A bridge of 9 arches here crosses the Shannon; and one of its arches, not placed in the centre, appears much larger than the other. The Shannon, while passing Roosky, glides so visibly from its usual sluggish condition as to win for its current, at the place the name of the falls of Boosky, and to have occasioned a canal cut of about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile in length to be constructed along the Roscommon bank, to conduct the navigation from Lough Bolin to the part of the river below "the falls." The village is quite a recent seat of population; and its Roscommon section contains the glebe-house of Tarmoharry, a Roman Catholic chapel, a constabulary barrack, and a small court-house. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Friday of every month. Area of the Leitrim section of the village, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 37. Houses 6. Pop. of the Roscommon section, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 293. Houses 50.

ROOTSTOWN, ROOSTOWN, or RUTUSTOWN, a village in the parish of Stabannon, barony of Ardee, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of the town of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. In its vicinity are the seats of Rootstown-house, Mountview, and Drun-castel-house. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 143. Houses 25.

ROSALUCHA, a hamlet on the western margin of the barony of West Muskerry, and of the county of Cork, Munster. It is situated near the lake of Gougane-Barra, and consists of a few poor huts. Pop. not specially returned.

ROSANNA, a demesne in the parish of Rathnew, and on the right bank of the river Vartry, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile north-west of the village of Rathnew, barony of Newcastle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It belongs to the Tighe family; and possesses special interest as the residence of the two late Mesdames Tighe, the one distinguished for her quiet but effective benevolence, and the other celebrated as the authoress of "Psyche." The mansion is large, is wholly built of Dutch brick, stands within a few yards of the river, and commands a rich and very varied home-view. The demesne comprises upwards of 300 acres of land, and is chiefly disposed in luxuriant meadows and noble woods. The course of the river through the demesne is variegated with seats, moss-houses, and rustic bridges; the shrubberies abound with arbutus, laurel, and other evergreens; and the woods contain some curious and beautiful specimens of lime-trees. The demesne is always open to visitors.

ROSAPENNA, a sandy wilderness on the coast of the parish of Clondelohary, barony of Kilmacrennan, co. Donegal, Ulster. "On the Donegal coast, in the vicinity of Horn Head," says a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, "lie the sands of Rosapenna, a scene that almost realized in Ireland the sandy desert of Arabia; a line of coast and country extending from the sea deep into the land, until it almost meets the mountain on which we stood, and exhibiting one wide waste of red sand; for miles not a blade of grass, not a particle of verdure,—hills and dales, and undulating swells, smooth, solitary, desolate, reflecting the sun from their polished surface of one uniform and flesh-like hue. Fifty years ago, this line of coast was as highly improved in its way as Arles, on the opposite side of the bay, now is; it was the much ornamented demesne, and contained the comfortable mansion of Lord Boyne, an old-fashioned manorial house and gardens, planted and laid out in the taste of that time, with avenues, terraces, hedges, and statues, surrounded by walled parks, and altogether a first-rate residence of a nobleman—the country around a green sheepwalk. Now not a vestige of this to be seen; one common waste of sand—no undistinguished ruin covers all. Where is the house? under the sand; where the trees, the walks, the terraces, the green parks, and sheep-walks? all under the sand. Lately the top of the house was visible, and the country people used to descend by the roof into some of the apartments that were not filled up; but now nothing is to be seen. The Spirit of the Western Ocean has risen in his wrath, and realized here the description Bruce gives of the moving pillars of sand in the deserts of Senaar; or it recalls to memory the grand description which Darwin gives of the destruction of the army of Cambyses in the Nubian desert. Nothing indeed can exceed the wintry horrors of the north-westerly storm, when it sets in on this coast, and its force has been for the last half-century increasing. The Atlantic bursting in, mountain-high, along the cliffs—the spray, flying over the barrier mountain, we were standing upon, and falling miles inland,—the sand sleeting thicker and more intolerable than any hail storm, filling the eyes, mouths, and ears of the inhabitants—levelling ditches, overtopping walls, and threatening to lay not only Rosapenna, but the whole line of coast, at some not very distant period, in one common waste and ruin."

ROBERCON, or ROSEBERCON, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It lies opposite New Ross; and is bounded by the river Nore along the north, and by the river Barrow along the east. Length, east-south-eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,705 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,200; in 1841, 1,538. Houses 244. The surface is beautifully diversified, and consists, for the most part, of middle-rate land. The seats are Bawnjames-house and Rosbercon-castle. The village of Rosbercon stands on the left bank of the Barrow, directly opposite New Ross, and therefore is strictly a suburb of that town. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 369; in 1841, 410. Houses 65. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 32; in manufactures and trade, 26; in other pursuits, 20. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 32; on their own manual labour, 38; on means not specified, 4. The village has extensive stores and quays, and occupies such a situation as to be capable of great improvement. Adjacent to it are Clocomh distillery, and the extensive and picturesque remains of Rosbercon abbey. These remains comprise the chancel, the lofty tower, sustained on four pointed arches, and the south wall of an aisle, containing 5 arches and 10 windows. The monastery was founded in 1267, by the families of Grace and Walsh, and dissolved in the 31st year of the reign of Henry VIII. —This parish is a vicarage, in the dioc. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £33 2s. 3d.; glebe, 28. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £65 4s. 6d., and are impropriate in the corporation of the city of Waterford. The vicarages of Rosbercon, DYSERT-MORE, BALLYGURRIN, KILMACREVOGE, SHANNORCH, and RATHPATRICK [see these articles] constitute the benefice of Rosbercon. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 6,790. Gross income, £421 4s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £369 8s. 8d. Patron, the corporation of the city of Waterford. A curate receives a salary of £52. The church is the restored chancel of Rosbercon abbey, and was new-roofed about 18 years ago, and thoroughly repaired about 10 years ago. Sittings 100; attendance, from 80 to 90. The Rosbercon and Tullagh Roman Catholic chapels, the latter in the parish of Dysertmore, have an attendance of, respectively from 120 to 700, and from 1,400 to 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Listerlin. There are Roman Catholic chapels also at Glenmore in Kilmackeroe, and Slieverua in Rathpatrick. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish of Rosbercon amounted to 108, and the Roman Catholics to 1,214; the Protestants of the union to 155, and the Roman Catholics to 6,825; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 30 children, a Roman Catholic Sunday school in the parish by about 200, and 2 day daily schools in the parish by about 85; and there were 2 Sunday schools and 6 daily schools in the other parishes of the union.

ROSCARBERY, ROSSCARBERY, or ROSS, a parish, partly in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, but chiefly in the western division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. The Carbery section contains the town of Roscarberry; see next article. Length, southward, 41 miles; extreme breadth, 21. Area of the Ibane and Barryroe section, 947 acres; of the Carbery section, 12,403 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 8,714, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 8,502; in 1841, 8,839. Houses 1,489. Pop. of the Ibane and Barryroe section, in 1831, 476; in 1841, 555. Houses 95. Pop. of the rural districts of the Carbery section, in 1831, 6,716; in 1841, 6,754. Houses 1,131. The surface ascends from the coast to a hilly watershed, possesses much diversity and beauty, and is watered principally by two rills to the heads of respectively Roscarberry Harbour and Milk Cove. Cahirmore, the seat of Thomas Hungerford, Esq., is situated a little north of the town; Derry, the seat of the Rev. H. Townsend, is situated a little west of the town; Dooneencastle, the seat of Richard Smyth, Esq., is situated on the coast; and Foxhall is situated on the northern border.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ross. One portion of the tithes, compounded for £309 13s., is appropriated to the dean and chapter; and another portion, compounded for £434 10s. 11d., is inappropriate in the vicar choral. A curate and a reader are employed to perform the duties. The parochial church is also the cathedral of the diocese, and has an attendance of 250. A schoolhouse in a remote part of the parish is likewise used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilkerrannore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 450, and the Roman Catholics to 7,967; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 30 children, and a Roman Catholic Sunday school by about 800; and 9 daily schools had on their books 122 boys and 77 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £8 a-year from the dean of Ross and £7 8s. from the vicar; one, with £22 10s. from the National Board and £10 from subscription; one, with £17 10s. from the National Board and £10 from subscription; one, with £10 from the London Ladies' Bazaar Society and £4 from subscription; and one, with £12 from subscription.

ROSCARBERY, ROSSCARBERY, or ROSS, a port and market town, and the seat of a diocese, in the parish of Roscarberry, western division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on a rocky eminence, on the road from Cork to Skibbereen, and near the head of Roscarberry Harbour, 61 miles south-west by west of Clonakilty, 10 east by north of Skibbereen, 32 south-west by west of Cork, and 158 south-west of Dublin. A strand which nearly surrounds the rocky eminence on which the town is situated, appears to have formerly been a bog or morass, but is asserted by tradition, and by Camden, to have been a harbour. Even the actual harbour of Roscarberry, or the inlet of the sea which bears that name, is so very narrow and shallow in the part which approaches the town, as to be impracticable for seaward navigation; while the outer part of it, extending between Gally Head on the east and the entrance of Glandore Harbour on the west, is a completely open or unsheltered sweep of the sea, quite unfit for the purposes of anchorage. The environs of the town are beautiful; and the town itself crowning an eminence and half-bid in wood, its cathedral encircled with trees, and its prolonged and narrow bay flanked by wooded banks, have a strikingly picturesque effect. The interior of the town, however, is very far from being beautiful or pleasant; and its domestic buildings are, in general, of a character below mediocrity. Its chief parts are a large central square, and four narrow streets diverging from the angles. The public buildings are the cathedral, the ruins of a monastery, the Roman Catholic chapel, the market-house, the court-house, the brew-house, corn-stores, an inn, and a post-office.—The cathedral has been altered at different periods, and now possesses no great architectural interest. A tower rises from its west end, surmounted by a spire of hewn stone, 80 feet in height, and quite modern as compared with the body of the cathedral.—In the vicinity are some excavations, which are believed to be of considerable extent, but were never thoroughly explored, and are now closed, and rendered inaccessible. "As some people were lately digging for clay, near the cathedral church of Roscarberry," says Dr. Smith, "a deep subterraneous cavity appeared, which seemed to lead to some caverns that were discovered about 30 years before at the west end of the tower, which were 200 yards from the hole now opened; by descending, several oval chambers were discovered, being mostly 12 feet long and 6 broad, having long narrow passages leading from one to the other. These passages were but 18 inches broad and 3 feet high, so that it was necessary to creep from cell to cell; at one end of each chamber stood a broad flag-stone, resembling the back of a Gothic arch formed of a stiff clay, from the centre of which to the ground it was no more than 3 feet 3 inches high; the walls were made of stone, smoothly plastered, and the whole lined with soot, so that fires had been made in them." The common tradition concerning them is, that they were made by the Danes; but the more intelligent Irish antiquarians say they were inhabited by the Furbolgoes, a people of whom there is much mention in their manuscripts, which name signifies no more than a creeping man, or one who lived in a cave. They were anciently named Terrigene, and, because of their living in caves, Antrichne; hence also the Scythians, from whom our Irish had their origin, were, by the Greeks, named Getae and Gentaie. These subterraneous retreats are very numerous about Roscarberry, the soil being a stiff white clay, and very proper for making these caverns.—The ruins of Roscarberry abbey are situated on a rocky height near the cathedral, and consist of two sides of the chapel, exhibiting marks of a rude and comparatively high antiquity. Near the east end of the north wall is a small and narrow window; and on the south side is a round-headed doorway, both of well-squared sandstone, but destitute of artistic decoration. The stones of which the walls consist are unhewn, but are imbedded in a cement of lime, gravel, and small stones; and the inside of the walls appears to have been covered with a thick coat of lime and gravel, worked into a plaster. The monastery, though usually assigned to Augustinian regular canons, seems really to have belonged to a community of Benedictines, who professed obedience to the Benedictine abbey of St. James, without the walls of Wurtzburg, in the province of Meiss, in Germany. "Ross," says Brewer, under the guidance of Dr. Smith, checked by other authorities— "Ross was formerly distinguished by a monastic foundation and scholastic institution of great celebrity. The ancient name was Rosus Alethra, the field of piety; the origin, or at least the early importance, of the town is ascribed to St. Fachian, one of those innumerable scholars of the 6th century, who imparted to Ireland his bias and greatest pride in sanctity; by rendering it the seat of learning in ages during which the neighbouring countries were plunged in mental darkness, and had no boast but that of triumphant bloodshed. This wise and upright man (as he is honorably designated by the writer of his life) was abbot of the monastery here, and is believed to have been also the first bishop of Ross. He was succeeded, as principal of the celebrated school in his monastery, by St. Connall, and it is asserted by Hammer, quoting from some unknown but ancient writer, that St. Brendan taught the liberal arts in this school. The same writer, but likewise on manifest authority, asserts that the town, which speedily increased and was distinguished as a seminary, was encompassed with walls, by a lady of this country. He adds that, in the wars which ensued between several Irish-septs, and particularly in those between the MacCarthys and O'Driscolls, the religious establishment and its town were nearly demolished. By a charter of King John, this town was granted, under the name of Rosclibric, to Adam Roche, with all its appurtenances, save the demesne of the bishop. A dispensary in the town is within the Skibbereen Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 13,458; and, in 1839-40, it expended £118-18s. 6d., and made 7,182 dispensations of medicine to 8,889 patients. A weekly market is held on Wednesday, and fairs are held on Sept. 19 and Dec. 10. A court of petty-sessions is held on every Wednesday. Many of the inhabitants are employed in weaving. Area of the town, 132 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,522; in 1841, 1,530. Houses 273. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 112; in manufactures and trade, 161; in other pursuits, 78. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 14; on the directing of labour, 137; on their own manual labour, 145; on means not specified, 30.

The see of Ross is usually said to have been founded in the 6th century; yet only two alleged bishops, Fachian and Maclellan, are known to history previous to the Anglo-Norman conquest; and even they may be regarded as bishops in a very primitive sense of that word, just as readily and authentically as in a prelatic sense. In 1172, and during 18 following years, Benedict was in the see. Maurice, who died in 1196, succeeded Benedict. Daniel made himself bishop in 1197. "This fellow," says the record, "ought not to have been ranked among the bishops." He intruded without election upon the see, without so much as having been put in election nomination?; imposing for a time upon the popes by means of the grossest and most impudent forgeries and lies. Florence, a monk, became bishop in 1210; he was in the same year deposed by the pope of the power of ordaining; and he died in 1222. Robert was in the see in 1225. Florence or Egan O'Cloghera resigned the bishopric in 1232. Maurice, chanter of Cloyne, became bishop in 1233, and resigned in 1269, in order to become a Franciscan friar; and he is said to have been "unqualified to govern the see of Ross both from the weakness of his constitution and his want of learning." Walter O'Meara, a Franciscan friar, became bishop in 1282, and died in 1274. Peter O'Mullavan, a Cistercian monk, became bishop in 1275, and died in 1290. Lawrence, canon of Ross, became bishop in 1290, and died in 1309. Matthew O'Tin, abbot, became bishop in 1310, recovered at law several alienated possessions of the see; and died in 1330. Lawrence O'Holleran became bishop in 1331, and died in 1336. Dennis became bishop in 1336, and died in 1377. Bernard O'Connor, a Franciscan friar, was made bishop by papal provision in 1377. Stephen Brown, a Carmelite friar, was made bishop by papal provision in 1402. Walter Formy, a Franciscan friar, was made bishop by papal provision in 1418, and died in 1424. John Blixvorch, a Carmelite friar, and probably a German, was appointed to the see on the death of Formy, but was set aside in consequence of neglecting to expedite in due time his apostolic letters. Cornelius MacElchade, a Franciscan friar, was made bishop by papal provision in 1426. Thady, probably a Welebinan, became bishop in 1438, and died about 1489. Odo or Hugh, became bishop in 1489, and died in 1494. Edmund Courty, a Franciscan friar, was translated from Cloyne to Ross in 1494, and died in 1518. John Inurely, abbot of the Cistercian abbey of Mair, became bishop in 1519; and died in the same year. Bonaventure, a Spaniard, was in the see in 1523. Dermot MacDonnall was in the see in 1544, and died in 1552; yet a person of the name of John was styled bishop of Ross in 1531. Thomas O'Herlehy was in the see in 1503; he in the same year assisted at the council of Trent along with the bishops of Raphoe and Achonry; and he resigned in 1570. William Lyon was made bishop of Ross in 1582; he obtained, in the following year, the sees of Cork and Cloyne in commendam; and he died in 1617. The bishopric of Ross has never since been held separately; and it is now permanently united by law to Cork and Cloyne. See CORK and CLOYNE.

The gross and the nett amount of episcopal income belonging to the see of Ross, as ascertained upon the average of three years ending in 1831, were respectively £1,715 17s. 9d., and £1,388 11s. 6d. The dean of Ross holds, as the corps of his dignity, the sinecure parsonage of Desert, worth in gross amount £91 a year; and holds in addition the benefice of Ballinderry in the dio. of Connor. The prebendary receives £205 a year gross from his corps; and holds also the benefice of Mohill, in the dio. of Ardagh. The chancellor receives £11 1s. 6d. gross from his corps; and holds also the benefice of Templequinn, in the dio. of Ross, and the situation of diocesan schoolmaster of Cloyne, Cork, and Ross. The treasurer receives £63 gross from his corps; and holds also the benefice of Murragh, in the dio. of Cork. The archdeacon receives £74 16s. 3d. gross, from the rectories of Kilmacabea, Killaughbeg, Afladown, Killece, and Killea-kin, and the parsonage of Tullagh without cure; and holds also the benefices of Killeonan, Templeogue, and Ballydeolar, and the sinecure rectory of Canaway, forming the corps of Killaughamillane prebend, in the dio. of Cork. The prebendary of Templeogue receives £428 8s. 8d. gross from his corps. The prebendary of Island receives £231 gross from his corps; and holds also the benefices of Kilgarraile and Dacry in the dio. of Ross. The prebendary of Carrageamore receives £53 7s. 8d. from his corps; and holds also the office of preacher and reader in Ross cathedral. The prebendary of Templebryan receives £70 gross from his corps; and holds also the benefice of Kluagross, in the dio. of Ross. The prebendary of Donaghmore receives £36 18s. 5d. gross from his corps. The vicar choral receives a gross income of £420 12s. 9d.

The diocese of Ross consists of a detached district in the extreme south-west of the county of Cork, and a main body commencing 84 miles from the nearest point of the detached district, and extending along the coast to the head of Courtmacsherry bay.

The detached district measures 26 miles by 4; and the main body, 24 miles by 6. Area of the whole, 185,459 acres, exclusive of two benefices, the contents of which were not reported. Pop. in 1831, 109,649. Number of parishes, 32; of benefices, 23; of benefices consisting of single parishes, 16; of resident incumbents, 17. Tithe compositions belonging to the benefices, £7,840 10s. 10d. 1 glebe, £398 2s. 4d. Gross income, £8,362 11s. 2d.; nett, £7,157 11s. 1d. Patron of 18 benefices, the diocesan; of 4, laymen and corporation; of 1, alternately the Crown and the diocesan. Amount of appropriate tithes, £1,268 15s. 9d.; of impropriate tithes, £2,867 4s. 10d. Number of stipendiary curates, 23; amount of their salaries, £605, besides additional advantages enjoyed by one. Number of benefices with churches, 18; without them, 5. Total of churches, 18; of sittings in the churches, 3,920. Cost of building 16 of the churches, £13,264 18s. 4d.; of which £6,442 6s. 1d. were gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, £4,993 16s. 11d. were lent by that Board, £1,228 13s. 3d. were contributed in private donations, and £600 were raised by parochial assessment and the sale of pews. But at the date of the report, whence these statistics are derived, 9 other places than churches were used for public worship in connection with the Establishment; and since that date, a new church has been built, chiefly by aid from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in the parish of Killaconagh. In 1834, the number of places of worship belonging to Protestant dissenters was 2; the number of Roman Catholic chapels was 27; the inhabitants consisted of 5,688 Churchmen, 2 Protestant dissenters, and 102,308 Roman Catholics; and each of 2 of the benefices contained not more than 20 members of the Establishment, each of 3 not more than 50, each of 2 not more than 100, each of 4 not more than 200, each of 11 not more than 500, of 1 not more than 1,000, and 1 between 1,000 and 2,000. In the same year 90 daily schools, which made returns of their attendance, had on these books 3,712 boys and 2,329 girls; and 29 which made no returns were computed to be attended by 1,043 children; 69 of the total of 119 schools were supported wholly by fees; and of 50 which were supported wholly or partially by subscription, 11 were in connection with the National Board, 5 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 1 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, and 5 with the London Hibernian Society.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Ross is distributed into ten parishes, and is united to the diocese of Clonfert. The names of its parishes, together with the sites of the respective chapels, are, 1. Clonakilly, Clonakilly and Derrera; 2. Rosaberry, Rosaberry and Lisavard; 3. Lislee, Lislee; 4. Kilmee, Kilmee; 5. Ardfield, Ardfield and Milltown; 6. Kilmacabea, Glendora and Ballyhaloe; 7. Aghadown, Aghadown; 8. Skibbereen, Skibbereen and Rath; 9. Islands of Cape and Inishperkin, Inishperkin and Cape Clear; 10. Timoleague, Timoleague and Kilmalinda.

ROSCLOGHER, a barony in the north of the county of Leitrim, Connaght. It is bounded, on the north, by the bay and the county of Donegal; on the east, by the county of Fermanagh; on the south, by the barony of Droghadair; and on the west, by the county of Sligo. Its length, north to south, is 15 miles; its greatest breadth is 10½ miles; and its area is 86,074 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches,—of water, 4,900 acres, 4 perches are water. Lough Glenties lies on the north-east boundary; Lough Glenties lies on the south-west boundary; Lough Glenties lies on the north-west boundary; and Lough Glenties lies in the centre. A view of the configuration of the surface of the barony may be obtained by reference to our article on the county of Leitrim.

—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Killaconagh, and part of the parishes of Clonclare and Rosaberry. The principal villages are, Killybeggar, Langanboy, Killebeggar, and part of Manor-Hamilton. Pop. in 1831, 20,314; in 1841, 22,796. Houses 3,684. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,233; in manufactures and trade, 626; in other pursuits, 181. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 77; on the directing of labour, 726; on their own manual labour, 3,216; on means not specified, 21. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,372; who could read but not write, 1,767; who could neither read nor write, 4,493. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 952; who could read but not write, 2,176; who could neither read nor write, 6,883.—Rosclougher lies within the Poor-law union of Ballyshannon and Manor-Hamilton. The total number of tenements valued is 3,662; and of these, 2,142 were valued under £5, 1,031, under £10, 277, under £15, 110, under £20, 61, under £25, 21, under £30, 18, under £40, 11, under £50, and 11, at and above £50.

ROSCOM, a headland, and a small harbour, in the parish of Oranmore, and barony and county of Galway, Connaght. The headland is situated near the north-east corner of Galway bay, 2 miles west-south-west of Oranmore, and 3, south, by east, of Galway. A pier at the harbour was constructed by means of contributions from the London and Dublin Charitable Societies, and has proved a very useful work. It is the landing-place for large quantities of turf and manure, the shipping place of most of the produce of the Meurough marble quarries, and the resort of about forty-five small fishing-boats.

ROSCOMMON.

An inland county of the province of Connaght. It extends from north to south, and lies slightly west of the centre of Ireland. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Leitrim; on the east, by the counties of Leitrim, Longford, and Westmeath; on the south-east, by King's county; on the south-west, by the county of Galway; on the west, by the counties of Galway and Mayo; and on the north-west, by the county of Sligo. About two-thirds of the entire boundaries are formed by water; and by far the greater portion of these two-thirds consists of the river Suck, along the west, and the river Shannon, with its lacustrine expansion, along the east, to the point at which the two rivers effect their confluence. The actual distance achieved by the Suck upon the boundary, if all the sinuosities of the stream be included, is nearly fifty miles; and the distance achieved by the Shannon and its lakes, upon the boundary, is forty-seven miles measured in a straight line, and at least double that number of miles measured along the sinuosities. The county is very long in proportion to its breadth, and may, as to its outline, be called a very slender oblong, with an expansion on both sides immediately north of the centre. It lies between 53° 16' 13" and 54° 7' 27" north latitude; and therefore has a length of about 46½ miles. Its greatest breadth is about 25 miles in a straight line westward from Rooskey; but its medium breadth is very much less than the maximum; and its breadth at both extremities contrasts to nearly a point. Its area includes 440,522 acres, of arable land, 130,299 of uncultivated land, 6,732 of continuous plantations, 708 of towns, and 29,450 of water.—In all 607,691 acres.

Surface.—The mountains on the shores of Lough

Allen; the Carlew mountains on the northern frontier, the great sandstone ridge of Slievebawn, and the mountain of Slieve-Alwyn in the west, are the principal heights within the county, and constitute its principal features of expressive contour and scenic power. Brahlieve and Slieve-Curkagh, the two loftiest summits adjacent to Lough Allen, have altitudes of 1,098 and 1,377 feet above sea-level; they soar conspicuously above all the other heights of Roscommon, and show their blue peaks in the horizon to very distant parts of the county; and they have steep and rugged sides, and broad perpendicular faces of rock in the loftier acclivities. The Carlew mountains rise slowly from the plains of Boyle to the boundary-line with the county of Sligo, covered with verdure, softly beautiful in character, and attaining an extreme altitude of 863 feet above sea-level. The ridge of Slievebawn extends nearly due southward within from 2 to 4 miles of the Shannon, to the parallel of Lanesborough or the head of Lough Ree; it attains an extreme altitude of 857 feet above sea-level; and it may be seen peering in the horizon from a very considerable distance, especially on the western and adjacent part of the great plain of Leinster. The hill of Fairymount, on the shore of Lough-Glynn in the west, has sometimes been mistakenly pronounced the loftiest ground in the county; and it is a gently rising eminence, with cultivation reaching to its very summit. "The mountains of Brahlieve and Slieve-Curkagh, and of Slieve-Bawn," remarks Mr. Weld, "are the only heights which appear to deserve the appellation of mountain, although it is not easy to say where the term hill should cease to be used, and that of mountain begin. The word 'Slieve,' it may be here observed, signifies in the Irish language, a mountain; so that the application of that term to certain heights shows, tolerably clearly, the general opinion that was entertained of their superior elevation. The other highlands are for the most part distinguished by the epithet mount, as Fairymount, &c." Several other districts of the county than the strictly upland are agreeably diversified with hills and undulations; but though rocks rise in various instances above the plains, they rarely attain a considerable height, or present large, individual, compact masses. "I cannot call to recollection," says Mr. Weld, "a single instance, excepting it he actually amongst the mountains, where the rocks form cliffs, or become remarkable objects in the landscape. Along the Suck, and along the river Shannon, south of Carrick, the shores in several parts are bold, and cliffs occasionally overhang the water; but these in general are formed of compact masses of limestone gravel and indurated clay; and although the bed of these rivers is traversed by ledges of rocks, which form bars in various places, yet these seldom appear above the water, and never rise to a height so as to become picturesque, or even prominent objects in the landscape. The rocks upon which the ancient castles and abbeys are based, invariably of limestone, present the same character of flat ledges, and where cut through for the formation of the fosse or moat, are covered with vegetation and scarcely distinguishable from banks of earth. In the northern parts of the county, amongst the mountains, scenery occasionally occurs, picturesque if not romantic in its nature. Certain parts of the banks of the Suck are also beautiful, and the shores of some of the lakes truly delightful. Indeed, there is scarcely any part of the county which would not be grateful to the eye, if it was but more generally wooded; but the want of timber is very observable." Yet large tracts of flat ground intervene between the diversified districts, traversed by dull and sluggish streams, far and broadly patched or striped with flooded meadows and boggy morasses, and almost totally destitute of even the lowest and poorest description of scenically interesting features. Very large expanses of flat alluvial soil, and also vast plains of bog, flank both the Shannon and the Suck; and though some of the bogs are diversified with all the inequalities of the hills and undulations upon which they repose, some of even the largest ones present flat and featureless surfaces, and are mere wildernesses and sheets of chaos.

Waters.—The periodical or seasonal class of lakes called turloughs make a similarly conspicuous figure in Roscommon as in Galway. The turlough of Mantua is computed to cover an area of a little upwards of 600 acres; another turlough of upwards of a mile in length, lies on the western boundary beyond Lough Glynn; and other turloughs of various sizes occur in most parts of the county, and are particularly numerous in the western and the central districts. The lakes or lacustrine expansions of the Shannon, while the river is in contact with Roscommon, are Loughs Allen, Bodarig, Boffin, Forlies, and Ree. The other principal lakes, are Loughs Arrow, Gara, and Skene, on the north-western boundary; Loughs Key and Meelagh, in the interior of the north; Loughs Glynn and O'Flynn, on the western border; and Loughs Kilglass and Fushinagh, on the eastern border. The chief of the numerous small lakes are Loughs Cullenirwan, Coolagarr, Goat, Cloghna-shade, Collog, Ardakilinn, Finn, Duff, Nablasbarnogh, Aneagh, Gall, Counymore, Saggart, Acrann, Roger's, Feeny, Annaghmore, Nablaghy, Elia, O'Doura, Tully, Radeen, Brackan, Loure, Toomore, Dooneen, Cambo, Lisdaly, Corbally, Cave-town, Booley, Treanamarly, Innisatirra, Shanballybawn, Oakport, Laundry, Druncunney, Drundo, Cloonacolly, Cloonagh, Errit, and Ballinvilla. The two great rivers upon the boundaries—the Shannon along all the east, and the Suck along the southern half of the west—effect nearly all the drainage; the rivers Breeogue and Lung, which flow into Lough Gara, and the river Boyle, which carries off all the superfluous waters of that lake, and runs through Lough Key to the Shannon, are the principal streams in the interior; and part of the catchment basin of Lough Arrow, which lies upon the north-west boundary, and sends off its superfluous waters to Ardnaglass Harbour, is the only territory within Roscommon which does not belong to the river-system of the Shannon.

Climate.—“Mountains,” remarks Mr. Weld, “will sensibly affect the temperature of the regions in their vicinity; and those of the adjacent counties of Sligo, Mayo, and Galway, may severally exercise a powerful influence over the climate of Roscommon, and render the sea-breezes from the west, cooler perhaps than they would otherwise be. The evaporation from the vast extent of water, bog, and marshes, on the borders of the sleepy rivers, might naturally be supposed likewise to lower the temperature. These suppositions meet with a partial confirmation, from the opinions expressed by persons who had been long resident both in Roscommon and in Dublin, and deserving of deference, that the temperature is less mild in Roscommon than it is in Dublin, and that more rain falls, particularly in the northern parts of the county, occasioned by the vicinity of the mountains, which attract the vapours coming from the sea. The period of the maturation of the ordinary fruits, may likewise serve as a sort of guide to determine the difference of climate, after making due allowance for the influence of culture and soil; and in well cultivated gardens in Roscommon, I observed that certain fruits, jargonelle pears, for example, and plums, were barely ripe, whilst the same kinds had already, for the most part, passed off in and about Dublin, in circumstances which serves to give confirmation to the opinions of the persons already mentioned, that the temperature in Roscommon is lower. As for any conclusions to be drawn from the comparative period of the harvest, whether of corn or hay, these are liable to so many variations from the state of the soil, and different systems of agriculture, that it would only lead to error to use them. In the very same district, with the same soil and the same climate, superior husbandry and superior diligence will almost invariably command not only better, but earlier crops; and a very remarkable instance in point, occurred in the town of Roscommon whilst I stopped there, new reaps having by certain persons, few in number, been brought into the market a full fortnight before the general supply; and the period happening to be one of considerable scarcity, these persons obtained half as much more for their produce as they would otherwise have done. Their ground had been better tilled, and sown earlier, and it is almost needless to observe, that the superior prices they received must have operated more or less as a bounty and excitement upon the exertions of others in future years. In the hay-harvest, a difference still more remarkable is observable between the meadows of wealthy proprietors and substantial farmers and those of the poorer classes; but generally through the county, the hay-harvest in weeks, nay months, behind that in the immediate vicinity of Dublin.

Minerals.—By far the greater part of the county is part of the great Glast limestone plain of Ireland. The upper beds of the limestone are usually of a grey colour, and abound with madrepores, chamætes, arclites, and other fossils; but the lower beds are generally of the insipid variety of limestone now called oolite, of a blackish colour, containing such large proportions of argillaceous and silicious earths as frequently to be incapable of conversion into marlstone, and often accompanied with such numerous minute and thin layers of Lydian stone as give the rocks a striped appearance. The strata which follow the oolite beds are commonly a black limestone, of a crystalline structure, and capable of a high polish; yet, in the northern districts, the lower limestone beds, even where they lie in contact with sandstone, are very frequently of a light grey colour, of a crystalline texture, and of an indurated and fine-grained marbly character. Two considerable sandstone districts are insulated within the limestone plain,—the one extending quite across the county in the valley of the Boyle river, and the other identical with the conspicuous hilly ridge of Slieve-Bawn, both similar in general composition, but the former of the old red sandstone class of rocks, and the latter of the yellow sandstone. Little districts or rather peninsulas of sandstone formation occur also on the western border beyond Castlebar, and a quarry of it exists near Ballynagare, in such laminated strata, as to be easily disengaged into very thin flags, and formerly used as succedanea for roofing slates. "The oldest distinct sandstone formation," says Mr. Griffith, "is very unequal and irregular in its stratification. In some places, it forms lofty hills and given ranges of mountains; in others, it does not exceed twenty or thirty feet. This sandstone, which is in beds, and in colour red, grey, or yellowish-white, is, sometimes, though rarely, interstratified with reddish or greyish sandstone slate. Where this happens, it has been mistaken for sandstone of the coal formation; and many fruitless trials for coal have been made in consequence. The hill of Fairymount, to the south of Sligo town, has been supposed to contain coal; as also the hill of Ballylarny, to the north-east of

Lough Key, and close to the coal country. The sandstone of these hills is, however, separated from the coal formation by a succession of beds of limestone, exceeding one thousand feet in thickness. The distinguishing mark between the old oolite sandstone of the coal formation, is, that the first is always below and the second above the first oolite limestone. The old oolite limestone, in numerous places in the vicinity of the coal district, rises through the limestone, forming insulated hills. The inland district on the bank of Lough Allen consists of the series of rocks which constitute the coal formation, and is part of the coalfield of Cannaghua. See ARTICLE, COSSAGUE, LESTRAN, and GENERAL INTRODUCTION. On viewing the coal country from the south, says Mr. Griffith, "it exhibits a steep and straight ridge of high land, rising from 1,000 to 1,200 feet above its base, and extending 14 miles in an east and west direction, but broken in the middle by the great valley of the Shannon. The summits of these ridges are universally flat, and are covered by shallow bog. The strata of the coal formation are arranged with great regularity, and dip or incline conformably with the limestone on which they rest, and contrary to the declivity of the hill; but the continuity of the different beds is frequently broken by the strata of one part of a hill having fallen or slipped down to a lower level from that of the other. These slips frequently occasion a difference of the level in the same bed, of 20, 40, or even 100 yards. A knowledge of the precise direction and amount of the fall of these slips is of the utmost importance to the coal miner, otherwise they must lead to great expense, and possibly to the abandonment of the colliery."

Soils.—Since the date of the celebrated Arthur Young's observations upon Irish soils and husbandry, the county of Roscommon has been very generally and justly known as one of the richest territorial districts in the three kingdoms. A comparatively detailed view of the soils may be obtained by reference to our articles on the several baronies of the county; and the following general view, in the words of the judicious and painstaking statler, Mr. Weld, is satisfactory: "The best ground in the county, producing those fine natural pastures for which Roscommon has been so long celebrated, lies within the limestone districts; such, for example, are the rich fattening pastures in the vicinity of Tulsk and Kilcorky, and the plains of Boyle to the south-east of the town,—not plains, however, so much so account of the evenness of the surface, as the absence of trees. It might possibly be supposed, that from the debris of the sandstone mountains, after the revolutions which appear to have taken place, considerable tracts of sand might have been left; but sands, in the strict sense of the word, are extremely rare in Ireland; and I am not aware of the existence of a sandy road, even of the length of a few perches, in any part of Roscommon, except it be in the immediate vicinity of Lough Acluan. In the western part of the barony of Ballinlougher, now the barony of Castlebar, and there, the sand seemed rather to have been washed up from the lake, and drifted over the adjacent lands by the winds, than to have been deposited from a watery medium, which has spread over the country. Some of the sandstone soils, as in the vicinity of the Cullin mountains, to the north-west of Boyle, are of a very poor description, but capable of great improvement for the admixture of lime, or rather from compost of lime and bog earth, which is to be had readily. Whenever capital comes to be applied more extensively to agriculture in Roscommon, an ample field lies open for its employment in improving the soil in this way; great improvements might likewise be made by draining, in almost every part of the county, and not merely by the deepening of streams in the low grounds, but by making drains in the uplands, where cold, wet, and spewy ground intervenes, throwing up rushes and aquatic plants, in places which would scarcely have been suspected of producing them. Bogs and boggy soils abound; and there are considerable tracts of low marshy ground on the borders of the rivers. On the mountains, dry patches covered with heath, occasionally intervene; but the surface of the mountains far more commonly is wet and boggy. Rich deep loams are met with, as well as extensive tracts of very light, shallow soil, more particularly along the ridges which separate the waters of the Suck and the Shannon, where the limestone rocks are so sparingly covered that the plough for considerable distances cannot be used at all. These tracts are commonly devoted to sheep-feeding. In fine, there is scarcely any one of the inland counties of Ireland which affords a greater variety of soil than Roscommon.*

Agriculture.—Tillage has, for a considerable number of years past, been extending; and it now turns over a much larger aggregate of land than at any former period. The state of husbandry, however, is, in a general view, very bad,—greatly improved on the farms held by large proprietors or wealthy tenants, but in a deplorable and comparatively primitive condition, on most of the smaller farms. "To say nothing," says Mr. Weld, "of the deficiency of produce attributable to bad ploughing, unskilful sowing, want of manures, and an utter inattention to the alternation of green crops with those of corn, potatoes alone excepted, the loss upon what the land actually does yield is considerable from bad and careless stacking, and the general want of barns. The stacks are commonly made very small, resting upon the earth; for in a country so bare of timber and hedge-rows, boughs and bushes are scarce articles. If wet weather comes on and continues long, much of what lies below, next the earth, perishes by attracting moisture; from the want of a broad and firm basis, the frail structure is liable likewise to be swayed by the wind, and the tops and sides losing their original form, and being no longer capable of throwing off the rain, still more damage ensues. To such losses are likewise to be added the depredations from vermin, rats, mice, and small birds, whilst the corn remains out of doors. As for barns, in the English and Continental acceptation of the term, they are literally unknown. The floor of some outhouse, or perhaps even that of the family-room, may be used for thrashing, but a vast proportion of the grain is beaten out in the open air, very commonly near the road-side, where there happens to be a dry spot. These observations, it must be understood, apply to the small holdings; but upon such is raised a considerable quantity of the corn which is thrown into the market from the county of Roscommon. * * The common plough of the small farms is constructed on a bad principle, if principle at all there be to guide the workmen, since for the most part it is put together by guess, and whether the instrument works well or ill is a matter of chance. Mr. Wakefield remarked, that few of the ploughs which he saw had either cats head or swill yard; so that if it was necessary to plough deeper than the instrument, from its original set, would admit, an extra person was employed to press upon the beam; and most ploughs were accompanied by an attendant with a spade to turn back the earth, which, after the plough had advanced, would otherwise revert to its former bed; and the shovelling of trenches was always practised, whether the plough or the spade had been employed. Ploughing was merely marking the land with furrows, and even this was executed so badly, that he ascribed the produce of corn much more to the spade than to the plough. These observations are still strictly applicable to tillage in Roscommon at the present day; but, on the lands of the principal resident gentry, examples may be found in nearly every part of the county, of excellent tillage, with Scotch ploughs of the most approved construction, drawn by a pair of horses, and driven by the ploughman. Where the breadth of corn is small, it might be supposed that sowing, upon which the evenness and product of the crop so much depends, could be executed in greater perfection, but the converse is more commonly the case, and the want of extensive practice here as in other instances, occasions the work to be far less ably performed. The spade, in the usual English acceptation of the term, is utterly unknown in Roscommon, excepting it be in the gardens of the upper classes, and even there it is rare. Its place is supplied by an instrument called the loy, common, as I am informed, in every part of Connaught. * * In certain districts of Roscommon, as in other places where spade husbandry prevails, it is usual for people to exchange labour reciprocally, and to unite in considerable numbers in the fields of individuals in rotations, more especially for the purpose of planting or digging out potatoes. These congregations of workmen give vivacity to the labourer, and are ordinarily scenes of much cheerfulness. * * A slovenly and wasteful system widely prevails of letting the land out, as it is termed, that is, leaving it to nature to recover, after having been exhausted by repeated successive crops of corn, until it will yield, in fact, no more, to repay the expense of seed and cultivation. Nothing can exceed the miserable aspect of the ground thus abandoned, which soon becomes covered with noxious or at least useless weeds, partially intermixed, however, with grasses from which the half-starved cows and calves pick a scanty sustenance. It seems to be totally overlooked, that these weeds still help to exhaust the soil, and by robbing it of nutriment, to impede and delay the accomplishment of that bountiful work which is expected from the hand of nature, and which is rarely denied,—the restoration of fertility. Yet it has been inferred by many persons, and not without apparent foundation, that the fertility of the soil by such treatment is undergoing a gradual and fatal diminution; consequently, that the capital of the country is annually on the decrease. * * * The extensive grazing farms in Roscommon present a very different picture of fertility from the exhausted let-out tillage land. In the former, nature displays her richest verdure, and imagination can scarcely figure to itself more productive pastures. But even here exceptions must be taken to the indolence of man; since, to an extent that could scarcely be credited, thistles are allowed not only to remain year after year in patches through the ground, but annually to increase and spread, so as to become absolutely a plague in the land. Frequent are the instances of sheep being blinded by their punctures, whilst grazing amongst them. I saw many so blinded myself, and was told it was considered quite as an usual occurrence. * These thistles are very commonly a perquisite of the herds, who make some gains by burning them and selling the ashes; a custom as impolitic as can well be imagined, since so far from checking their growth, it is absolutely a bounty held out on their propagation."

* It was in the county of Westmeath, that I first observed thistles in unusual quantities; and on proceeding to the westward they seemed to increase in height, and strength, and number. With the prevalence of westerly winds, the seed cannot fail of being wafted from Connaught to Leinster.

Farms.—The rent of the lands in the immediate vicinity of towns is so high as from £3 to £4 per acre; but that of rough land taken in large extent does not, in some instances, exceed 5s. or 6s. Large farms of several hundred acres very generally pay from 20s. to 25s. per acre; and farms of considerable extent pay from 30s. to 35s., or even more. During the war, rents rose much higher, and not unfrequently reached £3 3s.; and as previous to the war some of the richest grazing land in the county had been let at 12s. on long leases, the mere reletting of them at the current prices of the day became a copious source of fortune. The consolidation of small farms into large has not been much practised; and, in some instances in which it has occurred, assistance was afforded to dispossessed tenants to emigrate. In 1841, there were within the rural districts of the county, 17,472 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres in extent, 8,066 of from 5 to 15 acres, 913 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 895 of upwards of 30 acres; and within the civic districts of the county, 63 of from 1 to 5 acres, 39 of from 5 to 15 acres, 8 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 36 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year there were, in the entire county, 10,530 male farmers, 333 female farmers, 46,324 male servants and labourers of 15 years of age and upwards, 3,023 female servants and labourers of 15 years of age and upwards, 3,583 male servants and labourers under 15 years of age, 568 female servants and labourers under 15 years of age, 39 ploughmen, 115 gardeners, 13 graziers, 1,007 male herds, 17 female herds, 6 care-takers, 4 land-agents, 90 land-stewards, 14 game-keepers, 3 male dairy-keepers, and 34 female dairy-keepers.

Woods.—Though the aggregate extent of wood is very small as compared with the entire area of the county, yet the groves and plantations which adorn the demesnes of the gentry are sufficiently numerous, large, and thriving, to show how very improved an appearance would be produced by a general attention to planting and arboriculture. Trees freely flourish; those which have attained a considerable age are healthy and vigorous; and the woods which adorn some of the principal demesnes are of very considerable extent. Some beautiful reaches of plantations, and many very fine specimens of trees, occur, in particular, upon the demesnes and estates of Monte-Park, Strokestown, Lough-Glynn, Rockingham, Frenchpark, and Mount-Talbot. But "excepting it be near Lough Meelagh in the northern part of the county," says Mr. Weld, "I am not aware of having seen any trees, even of moderate size, which bore the appearance of original growth; but in some ravines, to the west of Castlereagh, and also near the banks of the lower Suck, as well as near Lough Ree, scrubby thickets may be seen which seem to have sprung from old stocks, probably the remnants of former woods. Of modern plantations, not made for ornament, in the immediate neighbourhood of house or demesne, the most extensive are those of Viscount Lorton, at the base of the Curlew mountains, and of Mr. Wills on Slievealbyn, near Ballinlough." In 1841, there were within the county 23 acres of woods and 2,535 detached trees of oak, 126 acres and 56,682 detached trees of ash, 10 acres and 3,165 detached trees of elm, 43 acres and 15,917 detached trees of beech, 326 acres and 20,976 detached trees of fir, 5,759 acres and 111,241 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 445 acres and 7,272 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 6,732 acres and 217,788 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 1,361 acres,—so that the general total of wood was 8,093 acres. The quantities of the continuous woods of older date of plantation than 1791, were 13 acres of oak, 60 of ash, 3 of elm, 13 of beech, 48 of fir, 1,520 of mixed plantations, and 179 of orchards.

Bogs.—“According to the marginal note on the county map by Messrs. Edgeworth and Griffith,” says Mr. Weld, “the bogs of Roscommon amount to 80,908 Irish, equal to 131,057 English, acres, occupying in proportion to the arable land about 29 parts in 100. They are dispersed over the face of the country, in divisions of various sizes, from tracts of thousands of continuous acres to small patches which barely suffice to supply the neighbouring districts with fuel. It is rare to find 4 miles together without the occurrence of bogs, and they are met with in almost every variety of situation; on the summits of the coal mountains and tops of the highest hills; on their sloping sides; on the banks of loughs and rivers; and in the depth of valleys. Several of the bogs on the uplands are comparatively dry, and in their natural state often afford coarse pasturage, which answers for young and hardy cattle; but all the upland bogs are not dry, neither do they all yield pasturage: on the contrary, in situations where it might be least expected, springs, swallow holes, and quagmires occur, dangerous in many instances to approach, and often absolutely impervious to man or beast. The depth of the bogs is various; from that of a few feet to upwards of 7 fathoms. As sources of fuel, the distribution of these bogs over the face of the country may be regarded as a bountiful gift from providence, diffusing comparative comfort amongst many a poor family which, without such an advantage, would suffer extreme misery. A distance of 4 miles intervening between the turbary and the residence is considered in Roscommon a subject of peculiar inconvenience; and a marked difference is observable in the condition of the peasantry who have a plentiful supply of turf at hand upon easy terms, and those who have to fetch it from such a distance, or to pay for it in money. But the fourth part of the surface of the land is not wanted for fuel; and, even if it were, the value of bog is not impaired by draining and cultivation. The growth of the bog plants may be stopped, and consequently the increase of the mass prevented; but the turf from a bog which has been consolidated by draining is more dense, and consequently of more value, and the cultivation of the surface neither lessens nor deteriorates what lies beneath.” The surveys of the bogs of Roscommon, under the commission appointed for the purpose by parliament, were executed in the years 1812 and 1813, by Messrs. Longfield, Griffith, and Edgeworth, and the bogs were classed under four districts. The first by Mr. Longfield, called the Lough Gara district, comprised the bogs which lay in the vicinity of that great body of water, on the western frontier of the county in the baronies of Boyle and Ballinobher. Mr. Griffith undertook the survey of two districts, the first comprising the bogs which discharged their waters into the Upper Suck; the second, the bogs which discharge their waters into the Lower Suck, and into the Shannon. Mr. Edgeworth's, the fourth district, lay between the river Shannon and the ridge of Slieve-Bawn, or the white mountain. Rooskey-Bridge on the Shannon was the most northern part, and Lough Ree the most southern. The whole quantity of bog surveyed was upwards of 100,000 English acres; but the surveys, according to the regulations of the Commissioners, were not to include any bogs of less extent than 500 Irish acres. Notwithstanding the accuracy and intelligence of the engineers, and the confident and almost enthusiastic terms in which they represented the practicality of draining and improving the bogs, and the consequent profits attendant on the measure, yet nothing of any note has been effected since these surveys were made; at least nothing in pursuance of the plans which were then laid down and submitted to the Commissioners and to Parliament. The most remarkable improvements within the county, particularly those in the southern parts, in the vicinity of Athlone, and the largest plantation of timber trees upon bog, were effected before the Commission was issued; these were referred to by the surveyors, in their reports, as examples of what might be done, and they still remain as the principal examples which are to be seen within the county on a considerable scale. Minor improvements have indeed gone on, in various places, and a season has never passed over without some accession of reclaimed bog, as it is called, to the arable surface of the county."

Live Stock.—Some fine horses of good blood are bred in the county, and, though probably inferior to those of a bygone period when racing and hunting were more in vogue, they still bring high prices. At a fair of Ballinasloe 14 or 15 years ago, the sum of £270 a-head was offered and refused for some horses of the Frenchpark stud; and large prices, also, were given for the horse called St. Patrick, which is esteemed to be the highest leaper in Ireland. The favourite race of black cattle in Roscommon are the long-horned Leicester breed. The extensive graziers usually purchase at the fairs their stock of cattle for summer feeding; and they raise on their own farms only a few head of cattle of superior breed. On some grazing farms, 40 bullocks are allotted to 100 acres; and on others 2 bullocks to 3 acres; but on those of the best quality of land, 1 bullock to 1 acre. Though butter-making is practised more or less in almost every part of the county, no extensive dairies exist. A cow is esteemed good, which, in her most profitable season, rears a calf and yields one hundred-weight of butter.—The favourite sheep of Roscommon is a cross between the Leicester breed and the large old Connought breed,—an animal little inferior in size to the latter, with a greater disposition to fatten in a short time, and with less waste or offal on the carcass; and, in consequence of the superior skill and intelligence of the sheep farmers, and the dry and wholesome nature of the sheep-walks, the flocks sent from Roscommon to the fair of Ballinasloe are much superior to those raised in the adjacent countries.—In 1841, there were, within the rural districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 393 horses and mules, 433 asses, 2,358 cattle, 1,420 sheep, 7,310 pigs, and 70,174 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,896 horses and mules, 1,202 asses, 13,851 cattle, 7,485 sheep, 14,433 pigs, and 127,287 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 2,943 horses and mules, 656 asses, 14,244 cattle, 14,303 sheep, 9,372 pigs, and 86,117 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 826 horses and mules, 58 asses, 3,265 cattle, 8,758 sheep, 1,307 pigs, and 12,830 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 1,882 horses and mules, 79 asses, 15,534 cattle, 58,536 sheep, 1,333 pigs, and 14,162 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were, 7,910 horses and mules, £63,280; 2,428 asses, £2,428; 49,255 cattle, £320,153; 90,592 sheep, £99,532; 33,785 pigs, £42,231; and 310,650 poultry, £7,766. Grand total of estimated value of live stock, in the rural districts, £535,410. In the same year, there were within the civic districts of the county 296 horses and mules, worth £2,152; 12 asses, £12; 1,228 cattle, £7,982; 3,200 sheep, £3,520; 863 pigs, £1,079; and 1,929 poultry, £48. Grand total of value of live stock in the civic districts, £14,793.

Manufactures and Trade.—Excellent workmen, in all the ordinary departments of artisanship and domestic trade, are to be found in the chief towns of the county; but, in all departments of common industry, and particularly in the very large and important one of field labour, the excess of numbers over the demand for their services is so great as to occasion a very large amount of idleness and distress. "Employment is scarce, and only a small portion of the peasantry have constant work. Wages are commonly 8d. or sometimes 10d. a-day without diet, or 6d. with diet in summer; and 6d. a-day without diet in winter. In busy times, and in the neighbourhood of the towns, higher wages are paid. The average yearly gains of a labourer are variously estimated, but commonly from £7 or £8, to £10 a-year. Women and children get little employment except at busy seasons, such as potatoe setting and digging, and in harvest when they earn 4d. or 5d., or even 6d. a-day without diet." The linen manufacture, at one time, arose to comparatively great importance in the county of Roscommon; but about the year 1815 it very seriously failed; and, in 1830, when Mr. Weld wrote his statistical survey, it had become nearly extinct. In 1811, when Mr. Wakefield wrote, large quantities of flax were cultivated in most districts of the county; but, in 1830, only a few patches, and these at remote intervals, were to be seen. Other domestic manufactures, such as the coarse stuffs for female apparel—some of which are rather skillfully dyed, in madder red and deep brown—have, for a considerable number of years past, been gradually yielding to the less costly articles of British manufacture which can be procured at the shops. A comparatively large manufacture of iron has fitfully, and at various periods, been conducted within the district of the Roscommon coal-field; and a large manufacture of tobacco-pipes—noticeable principally as a curiosity in economics—is carried on within the barony of Athlone.

We subjoin, as the best means of exhibiting the industrial condition of the county, a vidimus of the statistics of occupations as given in the Census of 1841:—Fishermen, 4; millers, 92; maltster, 1; brewers, 5; distillers, 4; bakers, 111; confectioners, 28; tobacco-twisters, 5; fishmongers, 5; egg-dealers, 68; fruiterers, 3; cattle-dealers, 15; horse-dealers, 3; pig-jobbers, 18; corn-dealers, 4; huxters and provision dealers, 140; butchers, 105; poulterers, 5; victuallers, 102; grocers, 14; tobaccoconists, 4; flax-dressers, 47; carders, 108; spinners of flax, 3,777; spinner of cotton, 1; spinners of wool, 3,636; spinners of unspecified classes, 7,837; winders and warpers, 16; weavers of cotton, 2; weavers of linen, 225; weavers of woollen, 103; weavers of unspecified classes, 948; manufacturer of linen, 1; dyers, 12; clothiers, 5; cloth-finishers, 7; skimmers, 6; curriers, 6; tanners, 2; brogue-makers, 263; boot and shoe makers, 732; tailors, 907; sempstresses, 384; dress-makers, 666; milliners, 30; lace-makers, 11; stay-makers, 7; comb-makers, 4; knitters, 384; hatters, 73; bonnet-makers, 38; cap-makers, 5; gloves, 10; button-maker, 1; hair-dressers and barbers, 10; leather-dealers, 4; wool-dealer, 1; haberdasher, 1; linen-draper, 2; yarn-dealers, 5; woollen-draper, 18; silk-mercers, 2; vendors of soft goods, 15; dealers in old clothes, 6; rag and bone dealers, 16; architects, 4; builders, 10; brick-makers, 2; potters, 23; stone-cutters, 60; lime-burners, 3; bricklayer, 1; stone-masons, 392; slaters, 47; thatchers, 35; plasterers, 15; quarrymen, 7; sawyers, 68; carpenters, 627; cart-makers, 54; cabinet-makers, 20; coopers, 198; turners, 11; mill-wrights, 13; wheel-wrights, 79; ship-wrights, 3; pump-borers, 6; lath-splitter, 1; reed-makers, 3; card-makers, 11; brush-maker, 1; basket-makers, 5; broom-makers, 14; miners, 55; blacksmiths, 491; white-smiths, 20; nailers, 172; cutlers, 4; gunsmiths, 5; braziers and copper-smiths, 15; plumbers, 3; tin-plate workers, 14; tinkers, 13; machine-maker, 1; watch-makers, 8; goldsmith, silver-smith, and jeweller, 1; coach and car makers, 13; rarer and gilder, 1; saddlers, 38; harness-makers, 7; whip-maker, 1; rope-makers, 3; letter-press printers, 17; bookbinders, 4; mat-maker, 1; chandlers and soap-boilers, 11; painters and glaziers, 56; net-maker, 1; sieve-makers, 7; tobacco-pipe makers, 58; upholsterer, 1; feather-dealers, 14; print-seller, 1; booksellers and stationers, 3; ironmongers, 13; merchants of unspecified classes, 32; dealers of unspecified classes, 428; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 147; shop-assistants, 126; tradesmen of unspecified classes, 8; and apprentices of unspecified classes, 2.

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county of Roscommon are the following:—Ardsallagh, Jan. 1, May 16, July 30, and Oct. 19; Athleague, July 11 and Sept. 24; Athlone—exclusively of two held in Jan. and March on the Leinster side of the town—Ascension-day, St. Bartholomew's-day, Aug. 24, March 21, and the first Monday of Sept.; Ballinlough, Sept. 29; Ballintobber, Aug. 25; Ballyfarnon, Feb. 7, April 12, May 21, July 6, Aug. 28, Sept. 19, Oct. 22, and Dec. 20; Ballyleague, June 11 and Oct. 29; Ballymurray, May 10, Aug. 15, Oct. 22, and Dec. 17; Ballinafad, Aug. 27; Belanagase, March 7, May 16, Aug. 1, Oct. 1, and Nov. 7; Belonagh, May 31, July 5, and Oct. 31; Boyle, March 6, April 3, May 30, July 25, Oct. 1, and Nov. 26; Brideswell, Feb. 13 and Aug. 8; Castle-Plunket, May 17, Aug. 13, and Oct. 11; Castlereagh, May 23, June 21, Aug. 23, and Nov. 7; Castle-Sampson, May 7, Aug. 6, Sept. 19, and Dec. 6; Cootehall, May 18 and Nov. 14; Croghan, June 13, Aug. 16-18, and Oct. 29; Dangan, May 25, Aug. 6, and Nov. 9; Elphin, May 3 and Dec. 8; Frenchpark, May 21, July 12, and Sept. 21; Fuerty, May 16, Aug. 4, and Nov. 21; Glinsk, Sept. 18; Greoisk, July 9 and Aug. 16-18; Keadue, Feb. 19, April 2 and 16, June 4 and 7, July 20, Aug. 24, Oct. 16, Nov. 14, and Dec. 24; Killecorkey, March 17, May 3, Aug. 3, and Sept. 29; Kilmelan, July 12 and Oct. 28; Knockroghery, Aug. 21 and Oct. 25; Leekarrow, March 17, June 27, Sept. 27, and Dec. 20; Lough-Glynn, May 25, July 30, Sept. 12, and Oct. 15; Milltown-Pass, May 1, July 23, Sept. 22, and Dec. 20; Mount-Talbot, May 8, June 14, Nov. 1, and Dec. 21; Newmarket, May 2, June 26, and Oct. 5; Rockfield, May 14 and Sept. 28; Roscommon, Whit-Monday, June 4, and Dec. 5; St. John's, July 5; Strokestown, May 15, June 19, Oct. 16, and Nov. 13; Tarmonbarry, Feb. 7, May 7, Aug. 17, and Nov. 2; and Tulske, the Friday before Whit-Sunday, April 6, June 1, and Aug. 18.

Communications.—The whole of the Upper Shannon navigation, and the part of the Middle Shannon navigation which extends from Athlone to the influx of the Suck, are in contact with the county of Roscommon; the Royal and the Grand Canals, though nowhere entering the county, and though having their termini on respectively its eastern boundary at Tarmonbarry, and its western boundary at Ballinasloe, offer to large districts of it the whole of their advantages of communication; the proposed improvements for rendering the Boyle river and Lough Key navigable to the vicinity of Boyle, wholly belong to the interior of the northern half of the county; and the proposed line of canal, to connect the Shannon with the great Connaught lakes and with the bays of Killalla, Westport, and Galway, is projected to pass across the northern interior. The mail-road from Dublin to Galway and Westport passes across the south from Athlone to Ballinasloe; the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo passes across the north, through Boyle; a third main-road enters the county at Tarmonbarry, and forms a direct line from Dublin through the centre of Roscommon to Mayo; and all these three roads are excellent. Numerous roads connect the interior of the county with the several ports and landing-places on the Shannon, and with the canal-port of Ballinasloe; but, in general, they are much too limited in ramification, and not a little discreditable in condition. "In the northern parts of the county towards Lough Allen," says the statist to whom we have already been largely indebted for this article, "several roads have been opened in latter years to facilitate the communication with the port of Sligo, in the laying out of which Mr. Nimmo was employed; and their courses, as might be expected from so able an engineer, are judiciously planned. But whether the foundations of the roads and bridges were less perfectly executed than had been proposed, or to what other circumstances it may have been attributable, these roads do not continue in equally good repair in every place; and with floods many of the smaller bridges had given way shortly before I visited the county. Generally speaking, the roads amongst the hills in the northern parts of the county are by no means so good as those in the middle and southern parts of the county. The roads are very rough also, in some of the western parts of the county, beyond Castlereagh more particularly, where they pass beyond the limits of the limestone district. Limestone and limestone gravel, as generally known, afford materials of the finest quality for road-making; some of the harder silicious sandstone is also good; but where only the larger pebbles and boulders of quartz, greywacke, whinstone, &c., are found, tough and difficult to be reduced to a small size, the roads which have no other supply must, without a heavy outlay, remain of necessity in a rough state. The roads intersecting the county, and affording a communication with the town of Roscommon, are numerous, and many of them are in a state extremely creditable to those who have the superintendence. Pains have also been lately taken in several parts of the county to obviate the inconvenience of hills on the old lines, by turning the roads round their bases. But exceptions might be instanced, where there is still room for great improvements, and not only as to the general line, but as to the state of repair of the present surface. The general improvement of the roads of the county has been very remarkable, however, within the last twenty years, and markets and towns have increased in consequence." Only two of the projected railways, whose plans were made known by the Public Commissioners, enter or traverse any part of Roscommon: the Dublin and Galway line enters at Athlone, and leaves in the vicinity of Ballinasloe; and the Dublin and Sligo line enters a little above Carrick-on-Shannon, and passes up the left bank of the Boyle river and Lough Key, and down the right bank of Lough Arrow.

Divisions and Towns.—The county of Roscommon is divided into the five baronies of Boyle, Frenchpark, Castlereagh, North Ballintobber, and Roscommon, in the north, and the four baronies of Ballymore, South Ballintobber, Athlone, and Moycarne, in the south. A recent arrangement erected the present baronies of Boyle and Frenchpark out of the quondam barony of Boyle, and the present baronies of Castlereagh, North Ballintobber, and South Ballintobber, out of the quondam barony of Ballintobber; and the Acts 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 76, and 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred 4 townlands of the parish of Castlemore and 2 of Killecoleman from the barony of Costello, co. Mayo, to the barony of Frenchpark, and 2 townlands of the parish of Creeve from the barony of Frenchpark to that of Roscommon. The barony of Athlone, as at present constituted, contains 11 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of North Ballintobber contains 2 whole parishes, and part of another parish; the barony of South Ballintobber contains 3 whole parishes, and part of 2 other parishes; the barony of Ballymoe contains 2 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; the barony of Boyle contains 8 whole parishes; the barony of Castlereagh contains 5 whole parishes; the barony of Frenchpark contains 4 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes; the barony of Moycarne contains 2 whole parishes; and the barony of Roscommon contains 12 whole parishes, and part of 3 other parishes.—The towns and principal villages are, in the barony of Athlone, Athleague, Clooneenbeg, Tromau, Curraghboy, Fuerty, Knockcroghery, Bellaugh, Bogangan, and part of Athlone; in North Ballintobber, part of Rooskey and of Hill-Street; in South Ballintobber, Roscommon, Ballyleague, and Cloontuskert; in Boyle, Boyle, Ballyfarnon, Keadue, Battle-Bridge, and part of Carrick-on-Shannon; in Castlereagh, Castlereagh, Castle-Plunket, Bellanagare, and Ballinlough; in Frenchpark, Frenchpark and Lough-Glynn; in Moycarne, part of Ballinasloe; and in Roscommon, Elphin, Strokestown, Tusk, and part of Hill-Street.—By far the greater part of the county of Roscommon is in the diocese of Elphin; and the remainder is distributed among the dioceses of Tuam, Clonfert, and Ardagh. Dr. Beaufort, stating the number of parishes and of churches at respectively 56 and 22, assigns 50 parishes and 20 churches to the diocese of Elphin, 3 parishes and 1 church to the diocese of Tuam, 2 parishes and 1 church to the diocese of Clonfert, and 1 parish to the diocese of Ardagh.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools within the county of Roscommon was 309, of scholars 14,646, of male scholars 8,937, of female scholars 4,968, of scholars whose sex was not specified 711, of scholars connected with the Established church 1,041, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic body 13,262, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 343; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 309, of scholars 15,459, of male scholars, 9,865, of female scholars 5,376, of scholars whose sex was not specified 218, of scholars connected with the Established church 1,032, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic body 14,254, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 173. The educational and ecclesiastical statistics of 1834 are returned according to the diocesan divisions, and may be proximately estimated for Roscommon by reference to the article ELPHIN: which see. In 1843, the National Board had in full operation within the county 45 schools, conducted by 39 male and 17 female teachers, attended by 3,633 male and 2,742 female scholars, and aided during 1843, with £460 10s. in salaries, £23 in free stock, and £49 17s. 5d. in school-requisites at half-price.—The total number of persons committed on charges of felony, during the year 1843, was 713; the number of cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 159; and the number of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 28. Of the 713 committed on charges of felony, 190 were charged with offences against the person, 60 with offences against property, committed with violence, 103 with offences against property, committed without violence, 9 with malicious offences against property, 7 with offences against the currency, and 344 with offences not included in the above categories; 7 were sentenced to transportation, 161 were sentenced to imprisonment, 146 were sentenced to pay fines, 217 were found not guilty on trial, 103 had no bill found against them, and 79 were not prosecuted.—The constabulary force of the county consisted, on Jan. 1, 1844, of 1 third-rate county inspector, 3 first-rate sub-inspectors, 2 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 6 second-rate head-constables, 40 constables, 146 first-rate sub-constables, 28 second-rate sub-constables, and 8 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during 1843, amounted to £13,354 6s. 5½d. The head-quarters of the whole constabulary of the county are at Roscommon; and those of the 7 districts into which they are divided are at Roscommon, Athlone, Boyle, Castlereagh, Elphin, Strokestown, and Lanesborough. Stipendiary magistrates are resident at Roscommon, Castlereagh, and Summerhill. The assizes are held at Roscommon; quarter-sessions are held at Roscommon, Athlone, Boyle, Castlereagh, and Strokestown; and petty-sessions are held at Athlone, Aughrim, Ballintobber, Bellanagare, Ballinlough, Ballyfarnon, Ballydangan, Ballyforan, Brideswell, Boyle, Castlereagh, Clooneen, Cootehall, Croghan, Curraghroe, Elphin, Four-Roads, Frenchpark, Keadue, Kilmore, Leckarrow, Rooskey, Roscommon, Strokestown, and Tusk. The county prison is at Roscommon; and bridewells are at Athlone, Boyle, Castlereagh, and Strokestown. The district lunatic asylum for Connaught, to which the county of Roscommon may send 40 patients, is at Ballinasloe; the county infirmary is at Roscommon; and dispensaries are at Athleague, Athlone, Boyle, Brideswell, Castlereagh, Cloghan, Cootehall, Croghan, Elphin, Frenchpark, Keadue, Leckarrow, Lough-Glynn, Roscommon, Rooskey, and Strokestown. A savings' bank is at Boyle; loan funds are at Ballyfarnon, Croghan, Fuerty, Kilkevan, Knockcroghery, Roscommon, and Tibohin; and workhouses are at Boyle, Castlereagh, and Roscommon. The annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate is £282,274; the annual amount of property valued under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, is £289,364; and the amount of grand-jury presentment for 1841 was £20,015. The only borough now within the county is part of Athlone; but other boroughs wholly within it previous to the disfranchisements at the Legislative Union, were Roscommon, Boyle, and Tusk. The county at large sends two members to the imperial parliament. Constituency in 1841, 1,050; of whom 211 were £50 freeholders, 60 were £20 freeholders, 14 were £20 rent-chargers, 690 were £10 freeholders, and 84 were £10 leaseholders.

Population of the county, in 1792, 86,000; in 1831, 249,613; in 1841, 253,591. Houses, in 1792, 17,137; in 1831, 41,369; in 1841, 44,087. The following statistics are all of the year 1841. Males, 127,016; females, 126,575; families, 46,387. Inhabited houses, 44,087; uninhabited complete houses, 926; houses in the course of erection, 55. First-class inhabited houses, 370; second-class, 4,212; third-class, 20,426; fourth-class, 19,079. Families residing in first-class houses, 436; in second-class houses, 4,733; in third-class houses, 21,447; in fourth-class houses, 19,766. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 36,739; in manufactures and trade, 6,206; in other pursuits, 3,442. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1,052; on the directing of labour, 8,513; on their own manual labour, 35,769; on means not specified, 1,053. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 58,734; to clothing, 3,318; to lodging, 2,856; to health, 62; to charity, 1; to justice, 393; to education, 295; to religion, 119; unclassified, 2,464; without any specified occupations, 5,482. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food, 3,608; to clothing, 16,141; to lodging, 19; to health, 39; to justice, 2; to education, 96; to religion, 2; unclassified, 5,444; without any specified occupations, 50,311. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 31,369; who could read but not write, 16,336; who could neither read nor write, 61,830. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 11,799; who could read but not write, 17,304; who could neither read nor write, 80,764. Males of upwards of 4 years of age attending primary schools, 6,185; attending superior schools, 127. Females of upwards of 4 years of age attending primary schools, 4,533; attending superior schools, 67. Per-centage of males at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 41; married, 54; widowed, 5. Per-centage of females at and above 17 years of age unmarried, 34; married, 54; widowed, 12. Physicians, 22; surgeons, 22; apothecaries, 18; midwives, 16; nurse-tenders, 23. Barriers, 8; attorneys, 12; clerk of the peace, 1; law-clerks, 2; excise-officers, 77; bailiffs, 43; gaol-keepers, 15 males and 2 females. Inspector of schools, 1; school-teachers, 235 males and 64 females; ushers and tutors, 46 males and 3 females; governesses, 29; teachers of music, 8; teachers of dancing, 3; teachers of fencing, 2. Clergymen of the Established church, 38; Methodist ministers, 2; Roman Catholic clergymen, 53; minister of religion whose denominational connection was not specified, 1; parish-clerks, 12; scripture-readers, 5; sextons, 10.

Antiquities.—The raths or hill-forts within the county of Roscommon, amount to upwards of 470 in number; they generally surmount natural eminences; and they contained, within their ramparts, the dwellings of chieftains and their families, usually constructed of earth and hurdles, but sometimes having walls of wood upon a mere basement of earth. "The people generally regard the raths with veneration, and it is held to be unlucky to plough or cultivate them; yet there have been found persons hardy enough to venture upon the trial, and who have derived excellent crops from the soil, without having hitherto suffered any of the calamities to which they may have exposed themselves by the audacious act." A very remarkable ruined fort, of ancient but unascertained date, occurs in the vicinity of Lough-Glynn. The principal existing ruins of the many old castles within the county are those of Ballintobber, Roscommon, Ballinacree, Athlone, and Castle-Island. The fragment or stump of a pillar-tower stands at Oran, between Roscommon and Castlereagh. The chief extant ruins of abbeys are those of Boyle, Roscommon, and Clonsilla;—the last near Frenchpark; yet ruins exist of not fewer than thirty-five old churches, some of which are surrounded with cemeteries still in use; and there were within the county at least the following monastic establishments,—regular canons of the order of St. Augustine at Clontuskert, Dorhan, Roscommon, Inchmacrin, Inchmore, Kilmore, Eadardruin, Clunincapthe, Lisduff, and Monasteren;—a nunnery of canonesses of the order of St. Augustine, at Killarought;—a monastery of Premonstratensians at Trinity Island in Lough Key;—a priory or hospital of crutched friars at Randon;—a Benedictine nunnery at Ardcarne;—a Cistercian or Bernardine abbey at Athlone;—Dominican friaries at Roscommon, Clonsilla, and Tusk;—Observantine monasteries at Bealaneney, Elphin, and Roscommon;—and friaries of the third order of Franciscans at Clonraghan, Knockvicar, Towemona, and Caldrywellagh.

History.—Part of the present county of Roscommon, as well as part of the present county of Galway, was inhabited, at the dawn of record, by a tribe called Auteri, and mentioned by Ptolemy. At a later period, the district which nearly corresponds to the present barony of Roscommon, was inhabited by the sept of O'Conor Ruadh, Rough, or Roe,—meaning the Red O'Conor; the district which nearly corresponds to the present baronies of Castlereagh, North Ballintobber, and South Ballintobber, was inhabited by the sept of O'Conor Dhuine, Dunn, or Don, meaning the Brown O'Conor; the district which nearly corresponds to the present baronies of Boyle and Frenchpark was inhabited by the sept of Macdermot; and the district which nearly corresponds to the present baronies of Ballymore, Athlone, and Moycarne, was occasionally inhabited, and often overrun by the O'Dalys and O'Kellys of the county of Galway. The territories of the O'Conors were called Hy-Onach; those of the Macdermots were called Moylagh; and those of the O'Dalys and O'Kellys were called Hy-Maine or Maine. A small part of the present county of Roscommon, however, belonged to Clanconon, the territory of the Bourkes of the county of Galway; the northern part of the present barony of Boyle belonged to Corcullann, the territory of the O'Hanlys and O'Broonans; the small district of Dealbna-Nnadhath lay somewhere between the Sneek and the Shannon; the small district of Hy-Briun-Sinna lay somewhere on the right bank of the Upper Shannon; and a small district called originally Kierrigia-Ai, and afterwards Clan-Kethern, lay somewhere within the present county of Roscommon, though in what particular part is not known.—Seven years after the Anglo-Norman conquest, while the whole of the county of Roscommon formed part of the kingdom of Connaught, and lay under the sway of Roderic O'Conor, who was then recognised as monarch or supreme ruler of all Ireland, Milo De Cogan, one of the most energetic and warlike of the Anglo-Norman adventurers, advanced at the head of 40 knights, 200 other horsemen, and 300 archers to the town of Roscommon, and there was joined by Murrough O'Conor, son of the sovereign, at the head of a body of Irish insurgents; but, the natives having driven their cattle to a distance, and swept the country of almost all provisions and resources which could be available to an enemy, De Cogan and his army were in great hazard of perishing from famine, and were in consequence obliged to retreat. In 1204, the county was overrun and wasted by William De Burgho Fitz-Adelm, Lord of Limerick; in 1216, the castle of Athlone was erected to command the ford of the Shannon at that town, and to protect the southern districts of the county from invasion; and, in 1268, after the county had been included in a grant of Connaught to the family of De Burgho, and nominally or formally brought into complete subjection to the English power, the castle of Roscommon was erected to prevent insurrection, and to maintain the full sway of the English power. The native princes, however, though professedly recognising the supreme sovereignty of Ireland, were really insubmissive in their hearts; and they, in consequence, kept the county in a state of constant anarchy, and twice became masters of the castle of Roscommon, in a struggle with their Anglo-Norman masters, the De Burghos, for independence. In 1315, "Richard De Burgho, Earl of Ulster, and Fedlim or Phelim O'Conor, Irish prince of Connaught, advanced in conjunction from Roscommon to repel the invasion of the Scotch under Edward Bruce; but O'Conor, seduced by the offers of Bruce, entered into a secret treaty with him; and returned home to guard his own inheritance against his kinsman Roderic, who sought to usurp it. Fedlim, whose treaty with Bruce was not known, was supported by the English, and by their aid they defeated Roderic, who fell in the battle. He now avowed his alliance with the Scots, but was entirely defeated by the English under William De Burgho, brother of Earl Richard, and Sir John Bermingham, at Athenry in Galway, A. D. 1316. The victory utterly broke the power of the O'Conors, who split into clans or septs, of which two have been noticed occupying portions of Roscommon. These two septs became rivals, and wasted their strength in mutual hostilities. Meanwhile, the inheritance of the De Burghos came by marriage to Lionel, Duke of Clarence, son of Edward III., whose descendants afterwards came to the throne in the person of Edward IV., except such of the territories of the family in Connaught as were usurped by some of the younger branches." Connaught was divided into counties, and Roscommon into baronies, in the reign of Elizabeth, and under the viceroyalty of either the Earl of Sussex, Sir Henry Sydney, or Sir John Perrot. During the rebellion in the reign of Elizabeth, the O'Conors remained attached to the English. In 1641, the Ulster insurgents besieged Boyle abbey, overran the county of Roscommon, and were joined by the sept of O'Conor Dhuine. The insurgents won several smart actions with the English party, and long retained possession of the county; but at the termination of the war the estates of their chiefs were confiscated, and given away in portions to immigrants from England and Scotland. The chief of the sept of O'Conor Dhuine, however, re-acquired part of his property at the Restoration, to transmit down to his posterity of the present day. The principal events in the war of the Revolution were the stirring and important ones of the siege of ATHLONE: see that article.

ROSCOMMON, a barony of the county of Roscommon, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the baronies of Frenchpark and Boyle, and the county of Leitrim; on the east, by the county of Leitrim, the barony of North Ballintobber, and the county of Longford; on the south, by the barony of South Ballintobber; on the south-west, by the barony of Ballymoe; and on the west, by the barony of Castlereagh. Its length, east-south-eastward, is 15 miles; its greatest breadth is 13½; and its area is 82,610 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches,—of which 3,023 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches are water. The Shannon, though tracing the whole of the boundary with the counties of Leitrim and Longford, is scarcely 4 miles in contact with this barony, being excluded from by far the greater part of its eastern side by the intervention of the barony of North Ballintobber. Not fewer than forty lakes lie within the limits; but several of them are very small. The great turlough of Mantua lies at the north-west extremity. Mr. Weld, estimating the land within the barony of Roscommon at 55,419 Irish acres, exhibits 48,790 of these as arable land, and 6,629 as bog. The highest land, the most conspicuous object, and by far the most scenic feature, is the ridgy and lofty height of SLIEVERAWN: which see. The surface of the other parts of the barony is prevalently low and champaign, yet exhibits many and agreeable undulations, and wants only hedge-rows and hedge-row timber to present a generally pleasing appearance. "The finest place in the barony of Roscommon," says Mr. Weld, "is Strokestown, the seat of Lord Hartland, situated close to the town of the same name; none other approaches near it, whether in extent of demesne, or grandeur of mansion. There are, however, some gentlemen's seats in the same barony substantially built, and adorned with handsome demesnes well planted, besides many others on a minor scale.

The largest farms in the barony are devoted to grazing, and mostly to grazing bullocks, though many sheep are also fed; indeed, there are no large farms employed in any other manner than in grazing. Many of these farms contain from 300 to 500 acres Irish, and a very few extend beyond 100 acres. Grazing on the more extended system obtains principally towards the southern and western sides of the barony, although there are several large farms to the east and north-east." The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townlands of Carrownamaddy and Creeve, in the parish of Creeve, containing, in 1841, a pop. of 350, from the barony of Frenchpark to that of Roscommon.—This barony, as at present constituted, contains part of the parishes of Creeve, Kilbride, and Kilglass, and the whole of the parishes of Aughrim, Hunlin, Clooncruff, Cloonfinlough, Elphin, Kilcooley, Killukin, Kiltristan, Lissounuff, Ogulla, and Shankill. The towns and principal villages are Elphin, Strokestown, Tusk, and part of Hill-Street. Pop., in 1831, 41,450; in 1841, 43,494. Houses 7,518. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 6,356; in manufactures and trade, 1,062; in other pursuits, 542. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 204; on the directing of labour, 1,177; on their own manual labour, 6,516; on means not specified, 63. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,506; who could read but not write, 3,077; who could neither read nor write, 10,042. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,025; who could read but not write, 3,445; who could neither read nor write, 13,424.—The barony of Roscommon is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Roscommon, Boyle, and Carrick-on-Shannon. The total number of tenements valued is 6,500; and of these, 4,542 were valued under £5,—1,279, under £10,—300, under £15,—83, under £20,—62, under £25,—32, under £30,—43, under £40,—31, under £50,—and 128, at and above £50.

ROSCOMMON, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of South Ballintobber, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, west-north-westward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 9,819 acres, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 8,374; in 1841, 8,191. Houses 1,330. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,894; in 1841, 4,752. Houses 826. The surface is low, flat, and bleak, yet fertile, and possessed of some beauty. The principal country residences are Hazelbrook, Englishtown, Martins-town, and Carrowroe,—the last the seat of Robert Goff, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Elphin. Both the vicarial and the rectorial tithes are compounded for £73 16s. 11d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Earl of Essex. The vicarages of Roscommon, KILTEVAN, and KILBRIDE (see these articles), constitute the benefice of Roscommon. Length and breadth, each 8 miles. Pop., in 1831, 18,615. Gross income, £292 14s. 11d.; nett, £270 2s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in Roscommon, but is of unknown date of erection; and it was recently enlarged by means of contributions of £100 from private parties, and £647 17s. 10d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Sittings previous to the enlargement, 350; attendance 276. Two Roman Catholic chapels, and three private houses used as Roman Catholic chapels, have attendances of respectively 3,000, 500, 450, 400, and 30. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish, inclusive of 6 dissenters, amounted to 591, and the Roman Catholics to 8,240; the Protestants of the union to 737, and the Roman Catholics to 18,907; 18 daily schools in the parish had on their books 543 boys and 362 girls; and 28 daily schools in the union had 970 boys and 523 girls. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with £52 a-year from funds left by the late Lord Ranelagh; one, with about £18 from parochial subscription; one, with £20 from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £10 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and £5 from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £6 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, £3 from the London Hibernian Society, and £1 from Mrs. Day; and one with £10 from the Elphin Diocesan Society, and £2 10s. from the Irish Society. In 1843, two National schools in the town of Roscommon had on their books 127 boys and 145 girls.

ROSCOMMON.

A post and market town, the capital of the county of Roscommon, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Roscommon, barony of South Ballintober, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands nearly in the centre of the county, and at the intersection of the road from Athlone to Castlereagh, with that from Lanesborough to Tuam, 4½ miles north-north-east of Athleague, 6½ west-south-west of Lanesborough, 10 south-south-west of Strokestown, 13½ south-east of Castlereagh, 15 north-west by north of Athlone, and 75 west by north of Dublin.

Site and Environs.—The immediate site of the greater part of the town is the slope of a broad-based or gently rising eminence, too low and spreading to be fairly designated a hill; the site of the two old monasteries, and of other parts of the outskirts, is a flat, bordering upon grounds which only a few years ago were little better than an expanse of morass, but which have been drained and improved into productive meadows; and the immediate environs are a portion of the great and rich plain of the county, remarkable alike for its fertility, its soft and long undulations of surface, its bleak denudation of wood, and the contrast between the opulence of its soil and the poverty of its cultivation. But 7 miles north of the town rises the beautiful and luxuriant hill of Fairmount still adorned with some of the wood which sheeted the demesne of the Mill's family; and away to the north-east, and connected with the hill of Fairmount, extends the more important sand-stone mountain-range of Slievebawn, forming a noble and well-defined background to the flowing and pleasant features of the great plain.

General Description.—Roscommon-castle stands on the northern margin of the municipal borough, a little detached from any actual part of the town. On approaching from the north, the relative position of the castle and the town is plainly observed, the former occupying low ground a field or two to the west of the road, and the latter commencing in the near distance, and extending up the slope of the hill; and on approaching from the west, by the road from Faerty, the castle is seen standing on the verge or at the head of the low expanse of meadow which was formerly morass, and the top of the gaol and some chimneys appear shooting up behind the skirts or shoulder of the eminence on which the body of the town is situated. Castle-street, or the longest and chief thoroughfare within the town, commences 250 yards east of the castle, and extends 650 yards south-south-westward to the centre of the town; it begins with poor and straggling cabins, and continues and terminates with dwellings of nearly the most miserable description; and, having reached very nearly the highest part of the hill, it slightly expands into a narrow oblong or slender square, of 130 yards in length, extending from north to south, and having in its centre the old gaol, and on its side the Roman Catholic chapel. The largest houses in the old part of the town face the central oblong, and are in several instances three stories high; but, even 14 years ago, they had a time-worn appearance, and several were hastening to decay. A miserably poor street, edified with the most horrid hovels, extends 430 yards eastward from the south end or head of Castle-street, along the road to Lanesborough. Another street, also very poor, descends the slope from the south end of the central oblong, and extends 320 yards southward along the old road to Ballinasloe. Another street, greatly superior in the character of its houses to the former, yet narrow, winding, and with low edifices, extends 200 yards westward and west-north-westward from the upper part of the preceding street to the new court-house and the new gaol. Another street, also poor in character, deflects from nearly the middle of the preceding, and descends 320 yards, and past the parish-church, to the south-south-west. Another street, by far the best in the town, and the only one exhibiting much improvement or a tolerable amount of neatness, commences opposite the new court-house, and extends 300 yards south-westward, and 350 yards south-south-westward, to the vicinity of the barrack. "The only much improved part of the town," says Mr. Weld, "is that which lies on the slope below the new court-house, where some excellent houses of three stories, which would be creditable to any town, have been lately erected. These houses, which stand in a row on the opposite side of the way from the court-house, have areas and iron palisades in front, and in the rear small gardens with coach-houses and stables. The rents are about £45 a-year each; and from the readiness with which they have been let, as soon as finished, an inference might be drawn, that the general absence of improvement was rather attributable to the want of capital wherewith to build, than to the want of occupants willing to pay a fair price for good accommodation. These houses have been erected by Mr. Richards, the intelligent and skilful builder of the new court-house, who has left proofs of his taste and judgment in several of the country houses within the county of Roscommon, which he has designed or new-modelled."

In no part of Ireland, perhaps, is a much stronger contrast afforded than what this new part of the town presents, to the old and wretched hovels which may be seen in other quarters, more particularly in the outlets on the Lanesborough side. Nothing in the shape of human habitation can be conceived more abject; no chimneys; no windows; roofs junken and apparently ready to fall in; rags, misery, and filth, within side; and without, dunghills up to the very doors, deposited in trenches hollowed out in lines parallel and close to the walls of the houses, and which, by successive scraping, are rendered deeper and wider year after year. When cleared of the manure, these become so many receptacles for stagnant putrid water, emitting the most noisome effluvia, prejudicial, doubtless, in an eminent degree, to the health of the poor people who are exposed to breathe the contaminated air. In the lower part of the street which runs past the court-house, or rather indeed on the high road which is a continuation of it, yet still standing so immediately in the vicinage of the town as almost to be considered a part of it, there are several substantial country-houses or villas, with full-grown trees and orchards; but, excepting in this one direction, no good houses appear in the suburbs."

The Castle.—The castle of Roscommon, like that of Ballintober, is quadrangular; and it measures, inclusive of its towers, 223 feet in length, and 173 feet in breadth. Four towers defended the four angles; and two towers, in the longest side toward the east, protected the principal entrance. "The towers are round on the outer side, formed on a radius of about 19 feet, with about two-thirds of the periphery of the circle advanced beyond the curtain-walls; whilst the inner parts towards the area or courts of the castle were terminated in various different styles. The towers of the gateway, for instance, were connected with a rectangular edifice on the inner side, which, to judge from the remains of the windows, must have contained the principal habitable apartments of the castle. Of the other towers deviating from the circle, some presented a straight front. In one respect, a similarity of plan appears to have been adopted in the construction of all the towers; the lower parts having been devoted to defence, and the accommodation of the garrison, and the upper parts to the officers and the superior inmates of the castle. In the former, the walls were reinforced, and inner bulwarks and narrow passages afforded a safe retreat from the shot which might have been poured in through the loop-holes. The roof of these parts consisted of thick vaults of stone, some of which remain entire to the present day; but others have been broken away, and the towers completely gutted, from the foundation to the battlements; yet the outer walls stand firm, bidding defiance to time and weather." The windows in the upper stories are airy and even spacious; the largest were in the story next the highest; all were rectangular; and most were divided simply by a Latin cross, while some possessed two, three, and even four uprights in the compartmented manner of the Elizabethan style. The grand entrance is placed, not in the centre of the east side of the castle, but about 11 feet nearer the north end; it exhibits a portal with a pointed arch, of medium sharpness in the angle, and still quite entire; and, from a few feet above the summit of the arch, it has been breached from tower to tower, so as to have lost all the portion of the wall usually pierced with machicolations. Another but smaller gateway stood on the western side of the castle, higher above the foundations, and constructed in a rectangular tower or bastion, 28 feet in width, and advanced 25 feet beyond the exterior wall. No traces exist of a barbican before either of the gateways; nor do any surviving marks appear of an encompassing fosse. Remains of field-works, however, exist at some distance; yet whether these were constructed to defend the castle, or thrown up by assailants to facilitate attacks upon it, is a question of not very easy decision. A large quadrangular enclosure, also, extends on the east side of the castle, parallel to its whole length; and is bounded by lofty walls, and has at the angles small, low, round towers or bastions, easy of access; but whether this enclosure, which is now called the orchard, was appropriated for military exercises and tournaments, or devoted to ordinary recreation or to the peaceful pursuits of horticulture, cannot now be ascertained. The ruins of the castle, though magnificent, imposing, and still comparatively entire, have suffered serious dilapidation both from intentional violence and Vandalic stone-stealing. The whole of the original walls on the north and south sides, though since built up to render the area an enclosure for cattle, were demolished; the curtain-wall between the grand entrance and the north-eastern angle, is rent by a very large breach; many of the mullions of the windows have been torn away, and destroyed; and enormous masses of masonry have been disrupted from the upper parts of the edifice facing the interior area, and thrown down in heaps at the base of the walls.

This Castle must evidently have been, at many periods, a formidable fortress, and a military post of first-rate importance; yet it figures with marvellous indistinctness in authentic record. "The same dull and barren account," observes Mr. Weld, "is transmitted from one writer to another; and although the annals inform us that the castle was built at one period, raised at another, rebuilt, attacked, surprised, besieged, taken time after time, yet in none of the many histories which I have looked into are any particulars given, at least as far as I have been able to find, illustrative of the nature of the military defences or the manner in which the besiegers carried on their approaches; nor is a single incident mentioned in connection with its various destinies calculated to rouse or to interest the feelings. We are told that Sir Robert de Ufford, being Lord-justice, began to build the castle in the year 1268, but 4 years afterwards, in the year 1272, Maurice Fitzmaurice being Lord-justice, the Irish broke out into a cruel rebellion, and razed and destroyed the castle of Roscommon. Again we are informed in the same annals, that in the year 1276, that is 4 years afterwards, the castle of Roscommon was taken, and a great overthrow given to the Englishmen. But of getting repossession of the site, previously to this time, and rebuilding the castle, not a word is said; although it is clear, that after having been razed to the ground, there could have been no castle for the Irish to capture a second time, unless the English had built a new one in the interval. The annals of the next year, 1277, are not less extraordinary, for there it is stated, that Sir Robert de Ufford being Lord-justice a second time, another rebellion broke out, (not characterized, however, in this instance, as a cruel one,) in which the Irish drew such a draught of men, that Thomas de Clare, together with his father-in-law, Maurice Fitzmaurice, the late Lord-justice, and all their forces were closed up in Slew-bonny (Slieve-Bawn Mountain), and only escaped with their lives on giving hostages to make satisfaction to the Irish, and in the meanwhile to yield them up the castle of Roscommon; conditions which, as the compiler of the Annals observed, were deemed hard, and prejudicial to the King's interest. The castle, of course, must have been considered a place of importance, and its defences probably had been materially strengthened since the preceding year, when it fell into the hands of the Irish; but in what manner the English had contrived to force the Irish out of it between 1276 and 1277, we are not told. Again we are informed, that in the year 1506, Sir Henry Sidney, being Lord-deputy, took possession of the castle for Queen Elizabeth, after its having been for 140 years in the possession of the rebels. Yet in the very next sentence, the writer says, the Irish did not hold it all this time, because the Earl of Kildare, who was Lord-deputy in the year 1498, took the castle of Roscommon in an expedition he made to Connaught, and strongly secured it. Strongly, however, as it might have been secured, the Irish must have taken it again, and that perhaps ere much time had elapsed. From the year 1277, when the castle was surrendered to the Irish, to save the lives of De Clare and his English followers, who were hemmed up in the mountains, to the year 1498, when it was captured by the Earl of Kildare, there is a period of 221 years; and from 1498 to 1506, another period of 68 years, making in all a period of 287 years; yet when Sir Henry Sidney took it, the Irish are represented as having held it 140 years only. I have spent more time in researches amongst different authorities, with a view to reconcile these contradictions, and to fill up the gaps in the history, than the subject, in the opinion of some, will be thought perhaps to deserve; and yet at the end have found myself nearly where I began. The history of the castle after this capture by Sir Philip Sidney is also still involved in obscurity. Sir Philip put Sir Thomas L'Estrange in command of it, with a garrison of infantry and twenty horsemen, and the castle made a very brave defence against the Irish in the year 1642. Yet it afterwards fell once more into the possession of the Irish, and continued in their hands until the year 1652, when it was delivered up to Colonel Reynolds, an officer of the parliamentary army, and to him probably was committed the task of demolishing its works, pursuant to the policy of Cromwell, not to leave any strongholds in the country of which the Irish might again possess themselves.—If a veil of obscurity hangs over the military and civil history of this castle, during a long series of years, its foundation, its progress, and its completion are not less involved in darkness and uncertainty. * * That the plan of the castle was brought over from England will admit, I apprehend, of no doubt; and whoever has paid any attention to the architecture of the castles of Conway,* Beaumaris, or Harlech, all built nearly about the same period, and in the reign of Edward the First, will find no difficulty in tracing many particulars in which the castle of Roscommon agrees with them."

The Abbey.—The ruin called Roscommon abbey is one of the most artistically interesting within the county. It stands behind some old villas and villa-grounds, and on a flat meadow or lawn on the southern outskirts of the town, 440 yards east of the barrack, and 480 south-south-west of the parish-church. It is the ruin, not of the whole series of a monastic pile, but only of the great church of a monastery; and like many other old ecclesiastical structures, it appears to have been built neither wholly at one period, nor strictly upon an uniform plan. It measures about 137 feet from east to west, by 23 feet in breadth; and both its transept and its western part—the latter comprising 54 feet of the total length—seem to be additions to the original edifice. The transept is wholly on the north side, and is connected by means of arches with a north aisle. "The arches of communication between the nave and the aisle, varying from 14 feet 7 inches to 15 feet 8 inches in span, are all of the broad lancet kind, and in pleasing proportion; they are 4 in number; the inner pair resting upon two intermediate circular pillars; and the outer pair, on the pillars on one side, and at the other on corresponding pilasters in the walls. The pillars are 8 feet 5 inches in circumference, and in height 10 feet from the base to the lowest moulding of the capitals. Like the circular pillars of Boyle and Tulse, they are composed of numerous pieces of stone, laid in regular horizontal courses, neatly jointed and accurately rounded; the capitals, which are also rounded, are formed of plain horizontal mouldings, varied by projections, and swelling out considerably at the top in graceful curves. On the side of the nave opposite to these arches, the wall is solid to the height of 20 feet; but, above that height, there are six extremely narrow and long lancet windows which still remain nearly quite perfect. Four narrow lancet windows, much of the same character, may also be observed in the northern wall of the chancel. The principal entrance appears to have been at the west; over which are the remains of a once superb window. The mullions indeed are lost, but from what exist of the ornamental mouldings and segments next the casings, there is reason to believe that the window was richly ornamented and beautifully divided. On the outer side, rising from the spring of the arch, at either side of the window, as well as from its summit, slender spire ornaments, richly wrought, may also be still observed. No other part of the actual building exhibits, at present, any traces of embellished workmanship, except it be a small door, opening into the chancel on the southern side, with a pointed arch, above which there are carvings like those of the western windows. The eastern window was spacious, in proportion to the size of the building; but its mullions are all gone, and the shape of the arch alone visible. The same remark will apply to the window in the transept." Near the place of the high altar, and under a chapel-arch in the wall, is a very mutilated tomb, once elaborately sculptured, of the founder of the abbey, Phelim MacCassel Crovdearg O'Connor, king of Connaught, who died in 1265; and among various noticeable modern tombs, is a small marble sarcophagus, a simple and tasteful monument, placed in the chancel by Mr. Richards, to the memory of an infant and favourite child. The monastic buildings immediately connected with the church have all disappeared, and are supposed to have been carried away piece-meal as building material of the neighbouring modern dwelling-houses. Fine trees grow profusely in the vicinity of the church and of these houses, and are dispersed in graceful groups athwart the circumjacent meadow; and, besides giving variety and interest to the whole landscape, they render the view of the ruins far more agreeable than that of most old churches. A tradition prevails that a series of monastic buildings extended all the way from the abbey in the meadow to the site of the present parish-church on the hill; and this tradition is countenanced by the accidental discovery, not many years ago, of some old foundations and of some sculptured stones in gardens behind the houses at the base of the hill, and particularly in the vicinity of a rather remarkable well on the north margin of the meadow. The steeple of the parish-church, too, "contains an ancient door-case, with a pointed arch, which constitutes the principal entrance at present; and in the belfry story there are also ancient windows; but whether these belonged originally to the church, or were taken from some other building and placed as they at present stand, I was not able satisfactorily to ascertain. The steeple does not appear to belong to them, nor they to the steeple. The proportions are extremely pleasing; and it would be well if the builders or designers of our modern ecclesiastical edifices would be at the pains of looking at them with attention; or at other works of the same period not less worthy of imitation."

Roscommon abbey was founded in 1257, or about 11 years before the castle of Roscommon, by Phelim MacCassel Crovdearg O'Connor, king of Connaught, and was dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and apporportioned to the use of a community of preaching or Dominican friars. In 1445, the building having fallen to decay, a papal bull was granted to encourage persons to contribute to its reparation. In 1678 and 1682, it was the meeting-place of provincial chapters of its order. In the 20th year of the reign of Elizabeth, the buildings and property of the friary, comprising the church, the cloister, the hall, the cellars, the orchard, the gardens, 60 acres of land, the advowson of two rectories, and other messuages and tenements, were granted to Sir Nicholas Malbye. A Franciscan friary also was founded at Roscommon in 1269; but, in the following year, it was totally destroyed by fire.—Another and much earlier ecclesiastical establishment, usually, though, we believe, improperly, called a monastery, is said to have been founded at Roscommon, in the 6th century, by St. Conan, Coeman, or Comanus, the son of Faol-ehon, and a disciple of St. Finian, for regular canons of the order of St. Augustine; and this earlier edifice is conjectured—though we think not very soberly—to have furnished the foundations and sculptured stones recently dug up in the vicinity of the well upon the margin of the meadow. The name Roscommon is derived from ‘Ross’ or ‘Ros,’ ‘a pleasant place,’ or a ‘place enjoying a pleasant prospect,’ and the name of the saint who founded this early religious establishment; and it therefore means ‘the pleasant place of Coman.’ “Little could the saint have suspected that, in conferring his name upon the humble spot which he had chosen for his abbey, it would afterwards extend to the surrounding district, and finally be attached to a civil division of the kingdom; which, although small in reference to the whole island, would nevertheless, in the course of time, contain within itself more wealth, more intelligence, more power, than all Ireland could have produced at that early period.”

Modern Public Buildings.—The parish-church is now a sufficiently commodious building, with a square tower. The Roman Catholic chapel was originally the old court-house, and was afterwards used for a market-house, school-house, and other purposes; and it is now remarkable chiefly for its central and lofty site, and for its comparatively great capacity.—The old gaol stands adjacent to the Roman Catholic chapel, in the central quadrangle, and on the highest ground in the town; it is lofty, broad, and spacious; and it forms a remarkable landmark over a circuit of several miles, along the low grounds and bogs.—The county infirmary is a plain brick building, symmetrical in plan, pleasing in front, about 100 feet in length, and consisting of an original central house, and of subsequently added wings, less elevated than the centre. The structure, as is intimated by an inscription over the hall door, “was built for the poor of the county, at the sole expense of Mrs. Walcott, sister of the late Lord-chief-justice Cailfield, of Donamon, 1783.” It contains 44 beds, and cannot admit all the fit cases which apply; yet it is disposed, to a considerable extent, in apartments for the use of the surgeon and his family, and is rather seriously complained of in the official report of 1841. During the year 1839–40, the infirmary received £25 1s. from subscription, £1,183 1s. 10d. from public grants, and £131 14s. 4½d. from other sources, expended £219 15s. 3½d. in salaries to medical officers, £128 12s. 8½d. for medicines, and £932 17s. 7d. for contingencies, and admitted 524 intern patients. The dispensary of the town serves for a district of 34,795 acres, with a pop. of 14,990; and, in 1839–40, it expended £169 2s. 0½d., and made 5,129 dispensations of medicine. The new court-house was built about the year 1830, and is a very commodious edifice. “The principal front, facing towards a large enclosed area common to both court-house and gaol, is under a portico, with four pillars set in pairs; intended, apparently, for the ancient Doric order; but the entablatures are not correct, and the triglyphs are omitted, although the stone was peculiarly favourable for their being represented.” The two courts, devoted to respectively the criminal and the civil business, are of one size, and constructed pretty nearly in one style. The grand-jury room, in an upper story, is a superb apartment, of about 45 feet by 30, finely lighted, and commanding an extensive view over the country; and it is occasionally used for balls and public assemblies. The new gaol has a symmetrical front; but its outer walls form an irregular polygon, which might be inscribed within a square of about 250 feet on each side. It is constructed on the semicircular plan, and has 8 divisions, appropriate yards and work-rooms, a separate hospital and chapel, and 64 cells, with 19 other apartments containing 46 beds. During the year 1843, the average number of prisoners was 103; the highest number was 152; the total number, inclusive of debtors, was 663; the number of recommitments was 60; and the total cost was £1,009 2s. 7d. “An extensive flat space was purposely levelled to receive the new gaol and the new court-house, on the western side of the hill and close to its brow; and the fronts of each building face towards a large open area common to both, the gaol standing in the most distant part, and the court-house on the left or western side, near the entrance. A strong iron pallisade separates this open space from the street, and on the other sides it is bounded by lofty walls.”

Poor-law Union.—The Roscommon Poor-law union ranks as the 72d; and was declared on Sept. 13, 1839. It lies partly within co. Galway, but chiefly within co. Roscommon; and it comprehends an area of 176,775 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 80,608. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Galway, Kilbegnet, 4,867; in cos. Galway and Roscommon, Donamon, 2,885; and in co. Roscommon, Kiltrustan, 4,918,—Elphin, 3,778,—Tulsk, 3,995,—Cloonigormican, 3,978,—Killukin, 3,122,—Cloonfinlough, 5,021,—Strokestown, 5,294,—Lisonuffy, 4,188,—Cloonuskert, 4,248,—Kilgofin, 4,778,—Kilbride, 4,199,—Roscommon, 9,316,—Kilkevan, 2,614,—Knockcroghery, 4,815,—Athleague, 4,001,—and Furry, 4,631. The number of ex-officio guardians is 7, and of elected guardians 23; and 3 of the latter are elected by the division of Roscommon, 2 each by the divisions of Kiltrustan, Cloonfinlough, and Strokestown, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Roscommon, Kiltewan, and Kilbride, lie in the barony of South Ballintobber; the divisions of Kilgofin, Cloonuskert, Cloonfinlough, and Killukin, lie in the baronies of South Ballintobber and Roscommon; the divisions of Kiltrustan, Elphin, Tulsk, Strokestown, and Lisonuffy, lie in the barony of Roscommon; the division of Cloonigormican lies in the barony of Ballymoe, co. Roscommon; the divisions of Knockcroghery, Athleague, and Furry, lie in the barony of Athlone; the division of Kilbegnet lies in the barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway; and the division of Donamon lies in the baronies of Athlone, Ballymoe-Roscommon, and Ballymoe-Galway. The number of valued tenements within the barony of Athlone districts is 2,807,—within the South Ballintobber districts, 4,124,—within the barony of Roscommon districts, 4,475,—within the Ballymoe-Roscommon districts, 720,—within the Ballymoe-Galway districts, 1,035,—in all, 13,161; and of this total, 9,993 were valued under £5,—1,912, under £10,—451, under £15,—135, under £20,—147, under £25,—72, under £30,—96, under £40,—64, under £50,—and 291, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is 186,661 16s. 2d.; the total number of persons rated is 13,161; and of these, 3,206 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—2,468, not exceeding £2,—2,240, not exceeding £3,—1,513, not exceeding £4,—and 1,028, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Oct. 3, 1840,—to be completed on Dec. 31, 1841,—to cost £7,500 for building and completion, and £1,488 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 7 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches, obtained for £12 of compensation to occupying tenant, and an annual rent of £48 12s. 7d.,—and to contain accommodation for 900 paupers. The total expenditure of the union up to Feb. 6, 1843,—at which date the workhouse continued to be unopened—was £698 4s. 5d. The Board of Guardians meet on every Tuesday. The medical charities within the union are the county infirmary at Roscommon, and dispensaries at Roscommon, Athleague, Ballaghleigue, Leckarrow, and Strokestown; and, in 1839-40, they received £305 12s. from subscription, £1,415 6s. 10d. from public grants, and £200 17s. 1½d. from other sources; and expended £551 15s. 3d. in salaries to medical officers, £319 4s. 10d. for medicines, and £974 10s. 11½d. for contingencies.

Trade.—The principal sorts of articles manufactured in Roscommon or its vicinity, and exposed to sale in its markets, are friezes, coarse woollen stuffs, coarse flannels, brogues, strong shoes, and coarse pottery-ware. Numerous shops line the principal street, and contain goods for the supply of all the ordinary wants of life. The general aspect of business is somewhat inferior to that of Boyle, and very much inferior to that of Athlone. Yet the ordinary markets have improved with the increase of the town, and are somewhat crowdedly attended; and the corn market, in consequence of the improvement of the roads, and the facility of conveyance from the Shannon by the Royal Canal, has very considerably increased, and now sends a large supply of cereal produce for shipment at Lanesborough. A weekly market is held on Saturday; and fairs are held on March 1, May 16, Aug. 1, and Dec. 5. The town has two inns, and a branch office of the National Bank of Ireland. The only public conveyance in 1838 appears to have been a car to Killashee, there to communicate with the canal boats to Dublin; but previously a car ran also to Athlone, there to communicate with the numerous public vehicles from Dublin along the great road to Connaught. Two newspapers have the word Roscommon in their title, the one being called the Roscommon Journal, and the other the Roscommon and Leitrim Gazette; but both are published at Boyle. The lower classes of the town of Roscommon have an unprepossessing appearance; and previous to the establishing of the poor-law arrangements, mendicity was fearfully prevalent, and received no public check in the form of any provision or public aid for paupers. Mr. Weld sees occasion to say respecting the noble proprietor of the town, "Whoever enters the town of Roscommon may learn from the first person he meets, that the whole of it belongs to the Earl of Essex, and the inference is naturally drawn, that the wretched hovels without chimneys or windows which he sees before him contribute their miserable pittance, and so in fact they do, to swell the income of an absentee landlord." Mr. Weld also states an appalling fact respecting the prevalence of vice, which is nearly or wholly without a parallel or resemblance in all the other second-rate towns of Ireland; and he adds a horrible circumstance respecting it, which we hope has disappeared from Roscommon, and which we believe to be paralleled nowhere else in the kingdom. A pleasing series of contrasted facts is, that the pious, amiable, and benevolent Mr. Carson, a gentleman long and most favourably known in the town, promoted various schemes for wiping away the disgraces, vices, and poverty of the town; and, in particular, established a charitable loan fund, built a row of neat slated cabins for the gratuitous use of the poor, greatly aided the support of two houses for widows, and assisted in various ways the spread of education, and the advancement of social moralization and well-being. In 1841, the Roscommon loan fund had a capital of £2,311, circulated £6,404 in 1,836 loans, and realized a net profit of £8 7s. 6d.

Municipal Affairs.—Roscommon was incorporated by charter of Edward I. but existed as a modern borough by charter of James I. The borough limits were reputed to extend about two Irish miles around the town, but were not defined by charter. The corporation was entitled "The Provost, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Roscommon;" and consisted of a provost or portreeve, 12 free burgesses, and a commonalty of all the inhabitants. Lord Mount-Sandford, however, was so entirely "the patron" of the borough as to do with it what he pleased; and he received the whole of the £15,000 of compensation for disfranchisement at the Legislative Union, and did not afterwards see occasion to keep up the form of a corporation. A manor court for the manor of Roscommon, which is of much greater extent than the quondam borough, was created by patent to Lord Viscount Ranelagh, in the 16th year of Charles II.; it was long defunct, but was revived in 1814 by Lord Essex, Lord Henry Fitzgerald, and Lady De Roos; and it is held once a-month, and proceeds by civil bill, or by attachment of the goods of the defendant, on an affidavit of the debt. The assizes for the county, a court of quarter-sessions for a district of the county, and a weekly court of petty-sessions every Monday, are held in the town. "Since the office of deputy-portreeve has been discontinued," says the report of the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations in 1833, "there has not been any resident magistrate or officer having municipal authority in the town, and the consequent inconvenience and mischief have been and continue to be considerable. The internal police of the town, particularly in the regulation of its markets, weights and measures, &c., has been entirely neglected; the county constabulary stationed in the town are without a properly-constituted authority to enable them to act with effect in cases of riot, which sometimes happen at the fairs and markets. The county purchased the new standard weights and measures at an expense of £230, which remain useless in the possession of the clerk of the peace, from there being no efficient person to take charge of them, and enforce their use. The town is not watched or lighted. There is a great scarcity of water. The inhabitants pay a small sum, from 1d. to 3d. per week, for a scanty supply from two wells in the town. Market juries were formerly appointed, but have latterly been unable to act, from the absence of an authorized municipal officer. The streets are repaired by county presentment. An attempt was made to introduce the provisions of 9 Geo. IV., cap. 82, for the purpose of lighting the town, but it was resisted by the majority of the inhabitants, and failed. The tolls are the property of the Earl of Essex, the proprietor of the town; they are the subjects of complaint and dissatisfaction on the part of the inhabitants, from their collection being, as they conceive, prejudicial to trade, without conferring any benefit on the town, no part of the income derived from them being expended on objects of public utility. The present lessee, however, stated, that he had on several articles reduced them to the one-half."

Statistics, &c.—Area of the town, 330 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,303; in 1841, 3,439. Houses 540. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 148; in manufactures and trade, 322; in other pursuits, 199. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 69; on the directing of labour, 339; on their own manual labour, 207; on means not specified, 54. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 830; who could read but not write, 103; who could neither read nor write, 444. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 561; who could read but not write, 317; who could neither read nor write, 735.—Roscommon gives the title of Earl to the noble family of Dillon. The reputed remote ancestor of the family was Logan Delune, or the valiant, a son of one of the O'Neills, kings of Ireland, a refugee to the continent of Europe in consequence of killing his father's nephew in single combat, and subsequently the husband of the heiress of Aquitaine, and the ancestor by her of the Dukes of Aquitaine. Sir Henry Delune, Delion, or Dillon, son of Thomas Duke of Aquitaine, accompanied John Earl of Morton, afterwards King John, to Ireland; and obtained a grant of extensive territories in the counties of Westmeath and Longford, long afterwards known as Dillon's country, and now partly identified with the barony of Kilkenny-West. In 1619, Sir James Dillon was created Baron Dillon and Kilkenny-West; and, in 1622, he was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Roscommon. In 1684, Wentworth, the fourth Earl of Roscommon, nephew of the great Earl of Strafford, and a distinguished poet, celebrated by both Pope and Dryden, died, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. In 1816, at the death of James the eleventh Earl, the earldom passed into abeyance; and, in 1828, it was revived by decision of the House of Lords, in the person of Michael James Robert Dillon, Esq., descendant of the Hon. Patrick Dillon of Rath, the seventh son of James the first Earl.

ROSCOMROE, a parish in the barony of Ballybrit, $\frac{6}{11}$ miles south-east by east of Birr, King's co., Leinster. Length, north-westward, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{2}{4}$; area, 5,965 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,287; in 1841, 1,387. Houses 225. All the eastern district is part of the Slievebloom mountains, and chiefly waste or pastoral; and even the western district contains but a small proportion of good arable land. One summit of the Slievebloom range on the eastern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 1,411 feet; and another at the south-eastern extremity has an altitude of 1,332 feet. A stream which descends from near the summit of the mountains, and traces the north-eastern boundary, has, when about midway down that boundary, an elevation above sea-level of 505 feet. The chief residence is Roscomroe-cottage; and the only hamlet is Boherephuca. The principal antiquities are ruins of a church and a court. The road from Roscrea to Frankford passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KINNITTY [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithe composition, £55 7s. 8½d.; glebe, £23 1s. 6½d. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £33 4s. 7½d., and are inappropriate in the representatives of Joseph Curtis, Esq. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 650; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Letterluna, Clonee, and Kinnitty. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 110, and the Roman Catholics to 1,237; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 96 boys and 65 girls.

ROSCON. See ROSCOM.

ROSCONNEL, a parish, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north by east of Ballyragget, and partly in the barony of Fassadinig, co. Kilkenny, partly in the baronies of Cullenagh and Clarmallagh, Queen's co., Leinster. Length of the Fassadinig section, south-south-westward, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 761 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches. Length of the Cullenagh section, south-westward, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 214 acres, 20 perches. Length of the Clarmallagh section, east-south-eastward, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 1,214 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 795; in 1841, 804. Houses 146. Pop., in 1841, of the Fassadinig section, 393; of the Cullenagh section, 23; of the Clarmallagh section, 478. Houses in these, respectively, 67, 3, and 76. The surface consists of land of second-rate quality; and is drained by a tributary of the Nore, and traversed by the road from Ballyragget to Ballinakill. Two old castles formerly stood in respectively the Fassadinig section and the Clarmallagh section. The highest ground occurs near the centre of the Fassadinig section, and has an altitude of 407 feet above sea-level.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ATTANAGH [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £143 1s. 6½d.; glebe, £123 15s. In 1834, the parishioners, with only one exception, were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 14 boys and 13 girls.

ROSCREA, a parish, partly in the barony of Ikerrin, co. Tipperary, Munster, and partly in the baronies of Ballybrit and Clonlisk, King's co., Leinster. The Ikerrin section contains the town of ROSCREA [see next article]; the Clonlisk section consists of two mutually detached districts, the most southerly part of the one situated 1 mile north-north-east of the most northerly part of the other; and the Ballybrit section, though contiguous with the Ikerrin section, lies $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east by north of the nearest part of the northern division of the Clonlisk section. Length of the Ikerrin section, south-westward, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{2}{4}$; area, 4,829 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches. Length of the Ballybrit section, south-south-westward, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{2}{4}$; area, 3,642 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches. Length of the northern district of the Clonlisk section, westward, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 1,076 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Length of the southern district of the Clonlisk section, west-north-westward, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 1,105 acres, 3 roods, 21 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 9,199, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 9,058; in 1841, 9,647. Houses 1,588. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ikerrin section, in 1831, 1,995; in 1841, 2,677. Houses 463. Pop. of the Ballybrit section, in 1831, 1,058; in 1841, 1,012. Houses 166. Pop. of the Clonlisk section, in 1831, 634; in 1841, 672. Houses 113. The surface of the Ikerrin section is, for the most part, low; consists, in general, of tolerably good land; and is diversified and adorned with the seats of Glengilbert-house, Millpark-house, Monte-Video-house, Streamstown-house, Mount-Dalley, Game-house, Ashbury-house, and Corville-house,—the last, the seat of the Hon. F. A. Prittee, Esq. This section is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Limerick; and its principal rural antiquity is the ruin of a castle. The Ballybrit section consists, to a main extent, of a portion of the Slievebloom mountains; has, respectively on its north-east boundary and near its south-eastern border, two summits of 1,332 and 757 feet of altitude above sea-level; is traversed by the road from Birr to Borris-in-Ossory; and contains, within its south-western district, the seats of Dungar-park, Dungar-house, and Killavilla-house. The northern division of the Clonlisk section consists, in general, of good land; is largely disposed in demesne ground; contains the seats of High-park, Hillsborough, and Mount-Heaton; and is traversed by the road from Roscrea to Portlanna. The southern division of the Clonlisk section consists, to a considerable extent, of waste ground; is almost everywhere bleak; has, at its southern extremity, the ruins of a church; and is traversed by the road from Roscrea to Barna.—Roscrea parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £484 12s. 3½d.; glebe, £5. The rectories of Roscrea and KYLE [see that article], constitute the benefice of Roscrea. Pop., in 1831, 10,868. Gross income, £201 9s. 1½d.; nett, £509 7s. 11½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in Roscrea; and was built in 1812, by means of a loan of £3,230 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 600; attendance, from 500 to 600. A schoolhouse at Kyle is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 50 to 60. The Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by from 30 to 100; the Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house, by from 30 to 150; and the Quakers' meeting-house, by from 15 to 40. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Roscrea and Kyle, have an attendance of respectively 6,000, and from 400 to 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 1,323 Churchmen, 38 Protestant dissenters, and 7,755 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,493 Churchmen, 42 Protestant dissenters, and 9,437 Roman Catholics; 2 classical schools and one other daily school in the parish made no return of their attendance; 7 other daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £18 a-year from local subscription, one with £27 18s. 10d. to the master, and the same sum to the mistress, from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and one with £15 and occasional gratuities from the London Hibernian Societies—had on their books 251 boys and 162 girls; and there were also 2 daily schools in Kyle. In 1843, one National school at Roscrea was salaried with £9 a-year, and had on its books 150 boys; and one at Airhill was salaried with £16, and had on its books 196 girls.

ROSCREA,

A post and market town in the parish of Roscrea, barony of Ikerrin, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands at the intersection of the mail-road from Dublin to Limerick, with the roads from Frankford to Templemore, and from Birr to Rathdowney. 4½ miles east by south of Shinnone, 5½ west of Borris-in-Ossory, 6½ north-east of Moneygall, 9 north of Templemore, 9½ south-south-east of Birr, 12 west-south-west of Mountrath, 14½ south-east by east of Portumna, 35 north-east of Limerick, and 59 south-west by west of Dublin.

General Description.—The site of the town is in the midst of a tract of very fertile country, interposed as a wide dingle or transverse valley between the south end of the Slievebloom range of mountains, and the north end of the Devil's-Bit range of mountains, spreading away eastward and westward to respectively the champaign country of Ossory and the brilliant plain of Ormond, and very thickly powdered over and beautified with villas, mansions, gardens, groves, and demesnes. A view of the town from a hill near Drumakeenan, on the road to Birr, is singularly picturesque, reveals old ruins and modern buildings in fine combination with one another and with surrounding objects, and suggests high promise of a feast to the eye of artistic, antiquarian, and general taste in the interior. A visitor, however, who sees and enjoys this view on occasion of his first approach to the town, may afterwards fully adopt the language of a description which appeared in a recent periodical,—“I own I was both disappointed and disgusted on entering the town, through a long and dirty lane, skirted on both sides with wretched and unseemly cabins, and having on the left hand a deep fosse, well-calculated to overturn the hapless traveller that might enter the town by night. From this lane I proceeded through a wide street leading towards the Market-house. The appearance of this street convinced me that individual industry and uncombined exertion, without the aid of general design, or the fostering hand of a landlord, had produced what I beheld. Although many of the houses were good, there was neither regularity nor order. Some of the edifices were high and well built—others low and homely. Here was a paved footway—there a ragged declivity ready to snatch the feet from the unwary. On this side lay rubbish and heaps of manure, and on that drays and logs of timber; while the highway in the centre was scarcely passable for innumerable large stones, ruts, and pigs. On inquiry I found that the town had the misfortune to belong to absentee landlords. I was told that it had been the property of the late Lady Caroline Damer, who devised it and her other County Tipperary estates to a nobleman residing abroad, who in a short time sold or mortgaged the whole to either London Jews or bankers, for a sum of £400,000. Several of the houses in the town being out of lease, the mortgagees cannot give encouragement for improvement, and the present ground landlord, if he had the mind, has not himself the power to do so. At present, Roscrea is inhabited by a most deserving and industrious race of people, worthy a benign and encouraging landlord.”

Public Buildings.—An abbey for regular canons is said to have been founded on the site of Roscrea, between the years 606 and 626, by St. Cronan, and to have served as the nucleus of the town, or of what Archdall calls “a celebrated city.” St. Cronan is called a native of the territory of Fly O'Carroll, within what now constitutes the county of Clare; and he is alleged in popular, but most unauthentic hagiology, to have been a thaumaturgist. “The present church,” says Archdall, “is dedicated to St. Cronan; the front of it is very old, and consists of a door and two flat niches on either side of Saxon architecture, with a mezzo-relievo of the patron saint, much defaced by time; at a little distance is a cross in a circle, with a crucifix on one side, adjoining to which is a stone carved in various figures, and at each end a mezzo-relievo of a saint; both are called, if we mistake not, the Shrine of St. Cronan.” The only part of the church now remaining is a curious gable end, pierced by an archway, serving as an entrance to the churchyard, and displaying over the archway a full-length figure of the patron saint, and at the sides several arched niches ornamented with chevrons. The modern parish-church stands adjacent. “Heretofore,” says the periodical writer already quoted, “a grave-stone used to be pointed out in the churchyard as the tomb of St. Cronan. However, when I saw it, it was broken, and there did not appear any thing to identify it as such; and I was also shown another monumental stone at the neighbouring monastery of Monaincha as commemorative of the same person, but when I came to examine it, the inscription in the Irish language and character was to the following effect, “Pray for Black Bran.” The latter, therefore, is certainly not the tomb of St. Cronan, but that of Bran MacColman, who was abbot of Roscrea, and died in 926.” See MONAINCHA. Most of the stone cross popularly called by the inhabitants of Roscrea “the Shrine of St. Cronan,” still stands in the churchyard; and part of it is also built into the churchyard wall.—A Franciscan friary was founded at Roscrea in 1490, either by Muirruary na Feasoige O'Carroll, or by his widow Bibiana, the daughter of O'Dempsey. “The cloister, however,” says Archdall, “could not have been built till after that time, as appears from an inscription which was formerly on this friary. This building was situated on the river, at the north-west part of the town; and the remains are in good preservation.” But the friary was really situated toward the Limerick end of the town; and its steeple still stands, and serves for a belfry to the present Roman Catholic chapel.—On the opposite side of the road to the remains of St. Cronan's abbey; and on the brink of a mill-pond, stands a fine and in some respects unique specimen of the ancient pillar-towers of Ireland. This tower has two steps round it at the bottom, and measures 80 feet in height, and 15 feet in diameter. At 15 feet from the ground is a window with a regular arch; and at an equal height is another window with a pointed arch. "If," says a criticism which crowds of topographers have copied—"if this latter is not a more recent addition, which it probably is not, it certainly reduces the date of this tower to the 12th century, which is rather earlier than the time generally allowed for the use of this arch." The tower terminates in a projecting, polygonal, umbrella-shaped roof, surmounted by a vane.—A large square castle was built at Roscrea, in the reign of Henry VIII., by the Ormond family; and it now serves as a store-house for the military, and stands in front of the barrack,—formerly the residence of Damer, ancestor to the late Earl of Dorchester. Another and much earlier castle was built at Roscrea, in the reign of King John, as a protection against the natives by the English, who, after some contests with Murtagh, king of North Munster, had taken possession of the town and the surrounding country; and this castle is of a circular form, stands also adjacent to the barrack, and on the street leading along the river, and has recently been repaired and roofed.—The only noticeable modern public buildings, additional to the places of worship, are a barrack, a court-house, a bridewell, a market-house, a fever hospital, and an union workhouse; and all these are very plain.

Poor-law Union.—The Roscrea Poor-law union ranks as the 38th, and was declared on May 8, 1839. It comprises parts of co. Tipperary, King's co., and Queen's co.; and comprehends an area of 155,374 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 64,374. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Tipperary, Roscrea, 10,435.—Borrisnafarney, 1,877.—Rathnaiveoge, 1,387.—Killea, 2,126.—Bourney, 4,061.—and Killevinoge, 3,000; in King's co., Rosemore, 2,345.—Aghacomb, 1,335.—Ettagh, 2,123.—Kilmurphy, 1,504.—Shinrone, 2,517.—Dunkerrin, 2,811.—Kilcommon, 1,769.—and Cullenwaine, 3,637; in Queen's co., Eirke, 2,582.—Rathdowney, 6,806.—Donamore, 3,906.—Borris-in-Ossory, 6,198.—and Kyle, 1,810. The number of ex-officio guardians is 9, and of elected guardians 28; and 5 of the latter are elected by the division of Roscrea, 3 each by the divisions of Rathdowney and Borris-in-Ossory, 2 by the division of Bourney, and 1 by each of the other divisions. All the co. Tipperary divisions lie in the barony of Ikerrin; the division of Rosemore lies in the barony of Ballybrit; the divisions of Abancon and Ettagh, lie partly in the barony of Ballybrit and partly in that of Clonlisk; the divisions of Kilmurphy, Shinrone, Dunkerrin, Kilcommon, and Cullenwaine, lie in the barony of Clonlisk; the divisions of Rathdowney, Borris-in-Ossory, Kyle, and Eirke, lie in the barony of Clandonagh; and the division of Donamore lies partly in the barony of Clandonagh and partly in that of Clarnallagh. The number of valued tenements in the Ikerrin districts is 3,539,—in the Ballybrit districts, 443,—in the Clonlisk districts, 1,937,—in the Clandonagh districts, 2,002,—in the Clarnallagh districts, 38,—in the entire union, 7,959; and of this total, 3,836 were valued under £5,—1,657, under £10,—842, under £15,—477, under £20,—272, under £25,—130, under £30,—193, under £40,—116, under £50,—and 367, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £102,517 4s. 6d.; the total number of persons rated is 8,200; and of these, 1,149 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,013, not exceeding £2,—735, not exceeding £3,—435, not exceeding £4,—and 514, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Aug. 3, 1840,—to be completed in June 1841,—to cost £6,700 for building and completion, and £1,296 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, obtained for £304 of purchase-money and £100 of compensation to occupying tenant,—and to contain accommodation for 700 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was May 7, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,103 10s. 2d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,596 9s. 9d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 288. The medical charities within the union are fever hospitals at Roscrea and Shinrone, and dispensaries at Borris-in-Ossory, Bourney, Clandonagh, Moneygall, Rathdowney, Roscrea, and Shinrone; and, in 1839, they received £374 3s. 3d. from subscription, £809 11s. 7d. from public grants, and £14 8s. 9d. from other sources, expended £624 in salaries to medical officers, £195 16s. 9d. for medicines, and £615 6s. 2d. for contingencies, and administered to 603 intern and 11,097 extern patients. The Roscrea fever hospital is a well-managed institution, admits patients gratis within a circle of 2 miles, and charges 10s. 6d. each for the admission of patients beyond that circle; and, in 1839, it expended £580 9s. 1d., and admitted 457 patients. The Roscrea dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 16,575; and, in 1839, it expended £64 17s. 0d., and administered to 4,101 patients.

Trade, &c.—The trade in corn is extensive; and the general retail trade supplies a large and important district of country. The manufacture of coarse woollen cloths is carried on to a small extent. Fairs are held on March 25, May 7 and 13, June 21, Aug. 8, Oct. 9, and Nov. 29. The principal fairs are Brown's and Smalluran's. The town is the headquarters of a constabulary district, and has two loan funds, a savings' bank, and offices of the National Bank of Ireland, and the Tipperary Joint-Stock Bank. In 1843, one of the loan funds had a capital of £1,520, circulated £7,594 in 2,875 loans, cleared a nett profit of £114 8s. 11d., expended for charitable purposes £127, and had 8 depositors or proprietors of its capital; and the other loan fund had a capital of £3,531, circulated £15,575 in 5,800 loans, cleared a nett profit of £103 18s. 5d., expended £315 16s. for charitable purposes, and had 45 depositors or proprietors of its capital. Courts of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions are held in the town,—the latter on every Monday. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a car to Clonmel, a car to Neagh, a mail-car to Thurles, a mail-car to Ballinasloe, a caravan to Dublin, a mail-car to Portlanna, and a coach and a mail-coach in transit between Limerick and Dublin. The nearest point of any projected line of railway occurs at the distance of 8 statute miles, in the main trunk from Dublin to Limerick, Cork, and Castletown-Berehaven.

Statistics.—Area of the town, 134 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,312; in 1841, 5,275. Houses 846. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 278; in manufactures and trade, 519; in other pursuits, 286. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 65; on the directing of labour, 558; on their own manual labour, 434; on means not specified, 26. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,035; who could read but not write, 438; who could neither read nor write, 638. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 763; who could read but not write, 718; who could neither read nor write, 1,028.

History.—Roscrea, according to the orthography of the name in a patent of the 29th year of Henry VIII., granting the town to the Ormond family, was formerly called Roskree; and this name is supposed to have been formed from the two words riase and cré signifying 'a marsh,' and 'the creed.' The author of the Life of St. Cronan calls it Stagnun-Crê, which signifies the same thing as Riase-Crê; Usher calls it Insula Roscreæ; and Burke calls it Fluminus Insulam Roscreensem. An early bishopric, probably of the Cullen kind, is said to have had its seat at Roscrea, and to have been united, about the end of the 12th century, to the bishopric of Killaloe. St. Canice, who was born in 516, and who died in 599, is currently said to have written at Roscrea a copy of the Four Gospels, called Glass-Kennic, or the Chain of Canice. Archbishop Usher says that this manuscript was preserved at Roscrea till his time. "There was also a copy of the gospels written by Dinna, a scribe, the son of Engus son of Carthin, which possibly is the manuscript in the possession of Sir William Betham, which latter certainly was preserved at Roscrea in a most curiously wrought and ornamented box. The reader may consult a paper by Henry Joseph M. Mason, Esq., published in the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, and in the Irish Antiquarian researches, by Sir William Betham, and a letter from Mr. Cooke to that author published in the Dublin Philosophical Journal, for much information relative to Roscrea, as well as on the subject of the copy of the gospels just mentioned, which found its way to Sir William Betham in the following manner. The late Philip Moagher, formerly parish priest of Birr, found it amongst the books of an uncle who had been a clergyman in Roscrea, and handed it to a Dr. Harrison of Nenagh, since dead, who sold it to Mr. Mason, librarian to the King's Inn's Society, and he parted with it to Sir William Betham." In the year 942, when a concentrated force of Danes from Limerick and Galway had approached Roscrea with the intention of surprising and plundering the natives, the Irish assembled at a celebrated annual fair in the town, arranged themselves in military order against the invaders, offered them battle, and inflicted on them a signal defeat. "On that occasion, all who resorted to the fair, although congregated from different parts of the county, and of course strangers to each other, did not wait to be attacked in the town, but sallied out, and after a sanguinary conflict which took place near Carrick-Hill, defeated the invaders, killing Olfin the Danish chieftain, and 4,000 of his men. The line by which the Danish plunderers retreated may be easily traced from the skeletons at the present day. They fled towards Moneygall, on the road to Limerick, and most of the townlands in the line of their flight appear to derive their names from the transaction. Thus numbers of human bones have been found in pits between Cloneganna and the high road, and more of them in the bog between Moneygall and Cullinawain. It is curious that the bones found have been principally wherever there was either a dry sandy soil or bog. The absorbing nature of the sand preserves them in the one case, and the antiseptic quality of the bog in the other; but wherever the bodies were interred in rich earth, they were sooner decomposed. The route they followed was by the stream called Owris, as if from the Irish oiris, 'a stop, delay, or hindrance,' because it interrupted the Danish flight, thence by Cloneganna, from Chuan, 'a retired place,' and geannam, 'a sword,' or geangyd, 'a mauling or beating,' by Chashagad, from glas, 'a field,' and godad, 'a wounding,' by Finglas, fion, 'troops,' and glas, 'green,' and by Loughawn (Locc,

III.

'a pool,' and un, 'evil') to Moneygall, where the battle is said to have ended."

ROSDAGH, a quondam parish on the right bank of the river Blackwater, 2½ miles south-east of Castletownroche, barony of Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster. It was a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne.

ROSDROIT, a parish in the barony of Bantry, 4 miles west-south-west of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 8,166 acres, 1 rood, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,976; in 1841, 2,258. Houses 370. The surface consists almost wholly of profitable land, worth from 18s. to 32s. per plantation acre per annum. The highest ground is in the north-west, and has an altitude of 616 feet above sea-level. The Boro river traces a considerable part of the southern boundary; and a principal affluent of it waters the interior. The chief seats are Ballyhighland-house and Ballynaclessy-house. The road from Enniscorthy to New Ross passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £590 15s. 4½d.; glebe, £21. Gross income, £611 15s. 4½d.; nett, £470 9s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1796, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £184 12s. 3½d. raised by subscription. Sittings 200; attendance 45. The Davidstown and Courtacuddy Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 760 and 520; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 144, and the Roman Catholics to 1,867; and 4 daily schools—one of which was aided with £1 10s. a year from subscription, and another with from £26 to £30 and other advantages from the Board of Erasmus Smith—were usually attended by about 149 children.

ROSDUFF, a tiny parish in the barony of Gualtier, 2½ miles north by west of Dummore, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, south by eastward, 7 furlongs; extreme breadth, 5 furlongs; area, 196 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 88; in 1841, 111. Houses 18. Two-thirds of the land are of good quality; and the remaining third is of indifferent quality.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLURE [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. Tithe composition, £10. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 80; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ROSENALLIS, a parish in the barony of Tinnehinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It contains the village of Rosenallis, and part of the town of MOUNTMELICK: which see. Length, south-west by southward, 6 miles; breadth, from 1 to 4½; area, 41,118 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 8,463; in 1841, 8,505. Houses 1,417. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,166; in 1841, 4,907. Houses 858. The river Barrow runs along the northern boundary; the Owenass rivulet flows along the southern boundary; the Murglash rivulet flows in the interior; and all the three streams pursue, while here, an easterly course. The range of mountain called the Ridge of Cappard stretches its summit-line along the western boundary, and lifts there its loftiest ground, Antonian mountain, to the altitude of 1,114 feet above sea-level. A considerable district in the south-west is morass. Quarries of soft stone, composed of siliceous white sand, and much used for coving, hearths, and chimney-pieces, exist in the vicinity of the village of Rosenallis. The principal seats are Cappard-house, Summergrove, Nut-grove, and Crabtree-farm. A worsted manufactory is situated on the eastern border. The road from Dublin to Birr traverses the interior; and the village of Rosenallis stands on this road, 3 miles west-north-west of Mountmellick. The village contains the present parish-church, the ruins of an old church, some vestiges of a pillar-tower, and a burying-ground belonging to Quakers; and in its southern vicinity stands a Roman Catholic chapel. The site of the church at the village has an altitude of 409 feet above sea-level. Parts of two round towers occur respectively on the hill over the village and on the lands of Rynn; but they are only the remains of modern windmills. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 101; in 1841, 239. Houses 45.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of OREGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. Vicarial tithes composition, £132 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £91 4s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £265 16s. 11½d., and are impropriate in General Dunn of Brittas. The church at the village of Rosenallis was built in 1797, at the cost of £923 1s. 6½d. provided by the parish; and received the addition of a tower and spire in 1816, by means of a loan of £230 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 250; attendance 250. A chapel-of-ease in the Rosenallis section of Mountmellick was built in 1828, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £184 12s. 3½d. raised by the sale of old materials. Sitings 370; attendance 350. Three Methodist meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 35, 40, and 250. The Quakers' meeting-house has an attendance of 140. Two Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,150 and 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, the former of these is united to the chapel of Castlebrack, and the latter has two officiates for itself. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,724 Churchmen, 193 Protestant dissenters, and 6,391 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 185 children; and 18 daily schools—5 of which were salaried with respectively £12, £12, £20, £20, and a sum not named, from subscription, and three with respectively £6, £10, and £10, from the National Board—had on their books 490 boys and 398 girls. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at Mountmellick, one at Rosenallis, and one at Derlamogue.

ROSERK, ROSSERK, or ROSSERICK, an old abbey in the parish of Balisakeery, barony of Tyrnawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the left bank of the river Moy, 3½ miles below Ballina, and occupies a romantic site, in a sequestered dell, among the waving grounds which extend for several miles along the river. It was founded by the family of Joyce, who, about the commencement of the 15th century, possessed high distinction; it belonged to a fraternity of the third order of Franciscans; and it acquired a comparatively large degree of monastic celebrity. "Here," says Archdall, "is a tower, built on the same plan with that of Moyne, but exactly on the middle of the gable end. It is remarkable, that in each of these monasteries there is a closet of hewn stone for two confessors to sit in, with a hole on each side for the persons who confess to speak through." "This monastery and church," says Dr. MacParlan, are one of the handsomest monuments of this species of antiquity. The church measures 99 feet long by 20 broad; in the eastern gable are the remains of a very fine window, looking over the river Moy, and some of the best lands of Tírénagh, in Sligo. Almost commensurate with the centre of the church is a grand arch of singularly exquisite workmanship and beauty; it is composed of two curved columns 6 feet asunder, and each 3 broad, both bending as they rise, into two arches 30 feet high, and connected at the top by two cross arches, and other very elegantly carved stone-work, over and upon which is erected a very fine steeple, about 60 feet high. On one side of this church are the ruins of a very fine and very extensive monastery; and out of the other side issues a small church, divided from the large one by very fine arches. Mr. Grose, in his Irish Antiquities, and in his description of this church, which he had taken from Cocking's views, for Col. Conyngham, places and depicts the steeple of this church in one of the gables, instead of its rising, as it really does, off the middle of the church, supported, as mentioned, by that noble arch, which makes part of the nave."

ROSETREVOR. See ROSTREVOR.

ROSSLASS, a small boat-harbour in the parish of Rathmullen, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on the east side of Dundrum bay, a little within St. John's Point. It has 9 feet of water at flood; but is dry at ebb. Mr. Nimmo, at the time of making his coast survey, reported Rosglass to have three snacks and several yawls, and recommended it as a suitable and desirable site for a small pier.

ROSGUIL, a wild and inhospitable peninsula in the parish of Mevaghy, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies between Sheephaven and the lower part of Mulroy bay; and extends from its isthmus at the village of Carrickart to the terminating headland of Pointahomash. Its length, from the isthmus northward, is 4 miles; and its extreme breadth is 2. A large part of its surface consists of accumulations of blowing sand; and its southern part in particular is identical with the sandy wilderness of ROSAFENNA; which see.

ROSHIN, a small headland in the parish of Ballymacward, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated on the north side of the upper or inner part of the estuary of the Guibarra, 5½ miles north by east of Ardara; and in its east-north-eastern vicinity are the church and glebe-house of Lettermacward, popularly called the church and glebe-house of Roshin.

ROSINAN. See ROSSINAN.

ROSKEEN, or RUSKEEN, a parish in the barony of Duhallow, 3½ miles south-east of Kanturk, co. Cork, Munster. It contains part of the village of GNEEVES; which see. Area, 1,675 acres. Pop., in 1831, 591; in 1841, 691. Houses 106. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 552. Houses 81. The surface lies on the north bank of the Blackwater; and is traversed by the road from Kanturk to Malin.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CLONMEEN [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial and rectorial tithes are each compounded for £43 15s. 3½d.; and the latter are impropriate in Robert Phair, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 607; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ROSKELTON, a hamlet in the parish of Clonagh and Clonagheen, 3 miles south-east of Mount-rath, barony of West Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. A chapel-of-ease is situated here, and was built in 1820, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d., and a loan of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £63 13s. 10½d. raised by parochial assessment. Sitings 200; attendance 120. The chaplain receives a salary of £90. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

ROSLARE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Forth, 4 miles north by east of Broadway, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, north by eastward, 5 miles; extreme breadth, 1¼; area, 2,532 acres, 8 perches. Pop., in 1831, 897; in 1841, 978. Houses 170. The northern half of the entire length is a low, sandy, meagre peninsula, of only a perch or two in medium breadth, extending north-north-eastward between Wexford Harbour and St. George's Channel, and terminating in Roslare Point, which screens the south side of the entrance of Wexford Harbour, and has an altitude above sea-level of only 37 feet. Even the southern and broader half of the parish is chiefly peninsular, and to a great extent sandy; and the parish as a whole presents a singularly bleak and sterile appearance. Yet it borrows a little warmth of aspect from the presence of Roslare-house, and of a number of recently erected bathing cottages. At Roslare Point are a coast-guard station, a boat-house, and the site of Roslare Fort; and on the shore, at the north end of the broader half of the parish, are a grave-yard, a ruined church, and St. Mary's Well.

—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TACUBHANE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £192 8s. 9½d.; glebe, £24 7s. 5½d. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilrane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 106, and the Roman Catholics to 831; and 2 daily schools—one of which was aided with subscriptions from the Roman Catholic clergyman and two other persons—were usually attended in summer by about 75 scholars.

ROSLER, or ROYSLER, a village in the parish of Clones, barony of Clonkelly, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands on the eastern border of the county, on the river Finn, and at the intersection of the road from Clones to Scotstown with that from Smithsborough to Lisnaskea, 3 miles west-north-west of Smithsborough, 4 north-north-east of Clones, 9½ east by north of Lisnaskea, and 17 east-south-east of Enniskillen. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel, a dispensary, and one or two school-houses. A fair is held on the 8th of every month. A Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Clogher, takes name from Roslea. The dispensary in the village is within the Clones Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £44 12s. 8d., and administered to 1,565 patients. Within about a mile of the village are the lakes of Inshinagh, Nart, Crawford, Black, Killyvilly, Lyons, Shankill, Cam, Annashanico, Drumbarrow, Inver, and Drunymarkin, and the residences of Spring-grove, Lakeview, and Lakefield. Area of the village, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 355; in 1841, 414. Houses 68. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 21; in manufactures and trade, 44; in other pursuits, 9. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 45; on their own manual labour, 22; on means not specified, 3.

ROSLEE, or ROSSEZ, a parish in the barony of Carra, 6½ miles south-south-east of Castlebar, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, south-south-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,700 acres, 2 roads, 7 perches,—of which 68 acres, 3 roads, 14 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 889; in 1841, 1,283. Houses 211. The surface is part of the district called the Plains of Mayo, consists of excellent land, and is traversed by the mail-road from Castlebar to Dublin. Lough Frank lies on the south-west boundary; and Lough Ballinfad lies on the north-east boundary; and a small fluviatile lake lies in the centre. Part of Ballinfad demesne is in the north.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALEA [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £80. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 947; and a pay daily school had on its books 33 boys and 18 girls.

ROSMINOGUE, a parish in the barony of Gorey, 3½ miles west by south of the town of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, southward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,549 acres, 1 road, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,211; in 1841, 1,425. Houses 239. The townland of Lower Clonamona was transferred by the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, from the barony of Scarewalsh to that of Gorey. Pop., in 1831, 78. A small district in the north is upland, and of comparatively little value; but the rest of the surface consists, for the most part, of good arable land. The rivulet Lask runs along the north-eastern boundary, and descends while there from an elevation of 390 feet to one of a little upwards of 200 feet; the river Banna flows along the south-eastern boundary, and has an elevation while there of between 175 and 152 feet; and a tributary of the Banna descends southward, within the interior, from an elevation of 344 feet. The principal hamlets are Big-Bawn and Cranford. The road from Gorey to Newtownbarr passes through the interior. The late Right Hon. George Ogle of Bellevue, well known for his odes and for the brilliancy of his wit, spent in Rosminogue some of his early years, under the tuition of the rector, the Rev. Mr. Miller, and wrote here his two popular songs, 'Shepherds, I have lost my love,' and 'Molly Ashtore.' —This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TOMB [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £165 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £10 10s. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Camolin, Ballyguntra, and Kilnebhue. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 88, and the Roman Catholics to 1,173; and 2 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 100 scholars.

ROSMERE, or ROSMIRE, a parish, partly in the barony of Upperthird, but chiefly in that of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. The Decies section contains part of the town of KILMACHTOMAS: which see. Length, south by westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 3. Area of the Upperthird section, 143 acres, 2 roads, 12 perches; of the Decies section, 8,017 acres, 5 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, according to the Census, 2,387, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 2,484; in 1841, 2,866. Houses 442. Pop. in 1841, of the Upperthird section, 31; of the rural districts of the Decies section, 2,302. Houses in these respectively, 6 and 341. Part of the surface, particularly in the north, is hilly and either pasture or waste; and the remainder consists of land of aggregately middle-rate quality. The two highest grounds occur in the north and the south, and have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 474 and 430 feet. The river Mahon flows along the south-west boundary. The chief hamlets are Newtown and Carrol's-Cross. The principal seat is Ballyvaddy-cottage. The mail-road from Waterford to Cork passes through the interior. —This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £200; nett, £188 15s. 6d. Patron, the Duke of Devonshire. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £300; and are inappropriate in the Duke of Devonshire. A curate receives a salary of £60. The church is situated about ¼ a mile east of KilmacThomas, and was built in 1826 by means of a loan of £750 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 35. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbarrymeaden. In 1834 the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 2,570; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 10 scholars; and 2 pay daily schools were patronized by the Roman Catholic clergyman, and had on their books 95 boys and 70 girls.

ROSMORE, a narrow glen, commanded by Castle-Clonagh, in the parish of Kilsoran, barony of Glenahiry, co. Waterford, Munster.

ROSMORE, or ROSSMORE-PARK, a demesne, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Monaghan, parish, barony, and county of Monaghan, Ulster. It is well-wooded; is impinged upon by the Ulster Canal; is connected with the villa-grounds of Camla and Ballyleek; and is the property and residence of the noble family of Westera, Barons Rossmore. In 1796, General Robert Cunningham was created Baron Rossmore of Rossmore-Park, with reversion to the heirs-male of two of the sisters of his lady, the daughter and co-heiress of John Murray, Esq.; and one of these sisters was the wife of Henry Westera, Esq., the descendant of Warner Westera, Esq., who immigrated to Ireland in the reign of Charles I.; and in 1801, at the death of the first Baron Rossmore, Warner William Westera, the son of that lady, succeeded as second Baron.

ROSMORE, or WOODFORD (THE), a rivulet in the parish of Ballinakill, barony of Leirrim, co. Galway, Connaught. It rises among the Slieve-Baugh-ta mountains in the vicinity of Knockaunacagh, and pursues an easterly course of about 7 or 8 miles past the village of Woodford, to the head of a small bay of Lough Derg about 6 miles below Portumna. Its lower course is very sinuous, and winds through low callows, and through bogs and meadow-lands; and the stream is there from 34 to 60 feet in width, and might easily be made navigable for canal-vessels. A very fine sandstone rock occurs on the top of the Ben mountain, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Woodford, and is of such compactness, such delicate colour, and such capacity of being cut into blocks, of any reasonable magnitude, that it might be found of great value for columns, fronts of public buildings, mansions, and other architectural purposes; and it could be conveyed down hill at small expense to the commencement of the navigable part of the Rosmore stream, and might therefore become a profitable article of commerce, and a useful subject of employment to the poor.

ROSNACKILL, a hamlet in the parish of Clondoyadcock, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the east shore of one of the interior ramifications of Mulroy bay, 6 miles north of Millford, and 8 north-west by north of Rathmullen. It contains the parish-church. Pop. not specially returned.

ROSNAREE, a hamlet in the parish of Knockcommoun, barony of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the river Boyne, and on the road from Slane to Duleek, 2 miles south-east of Slane. Within a mile of it are the seats of Cullen-house, Newtown-house, Knuwth-house, Newgrange-house, Jauville-cottage, and Mill-lodge. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Meath takes designation from Rosnaree, and has chapels here and at Donover. Pop. of the hamlet not specially returned.

ROSNOWLAGH, a quoad sacra parish, in the quoad civilia parish of Drumholm, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,463 acres, 2 rods, $21\frac{1}{2}$ perches. Pop. in 1831, 1,006. The average value of the land is 18s. per acre per annum.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Raphoe. Glebe, £8 8s. 9d. Gross income, £108 8s. 9d.; nett, £88 8s. 9d. Patron, the incumbent of Drumholm. The church was built in 1831, by means of a gift of £800 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 220; attendance, from 150 to 250. A school-house is also used as a parochial place of worship. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 356, and the Roman Catholics to 433; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 64 scholars; and 3 daily schools had on their books 92 boys and 67 girls. One of the daily schools was parochial; one was salaried with £11 1s. 6d. a-year from Robinson's Fund, and £4 from Col. Conolly; and one was aided with £4 a-year from Mr. Foster, and grants of books from the Kildare Place Society.

ROSS, co. Cork, and ROSS (DIOCESE OF). See ROSCARRERY.

ROSS, a beautiful piece of land, alternately a peninsula and an island, in the Lower lake of Killarney, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of the town of Killarney, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies nearly in the middle of the east side of the lake; and extends from the vicinity of Pigeon, Crow, and Coarse Islands on the south-east, to the vicinity of Lomisfallen on the north-west. Its upper or north-east end is much broader than its lower end; and its lower end is much broader than its middle. Its length is 1 mile; its extreme breadth is $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile; and its area is about 100 acres;—so that it is the largest island in the Killarney lakes. But a morass which separates its upper end from the mainland is dry in summer and overflowed in winter, so as to render the tract a peninsula in summer and an island only in winter; and this morass is traversed by a causeway and bridge, permanently connecting the tract, whether peninsula or island, with the mainland. The small sheet of water enclosed on three sides by respectively the mainland, the morass, and the island, is called Ross bay; and is partially closed across even its mouth or north-east end by Cherry-Island. The shores of Ross-Island are singularly interesting and beautiful; they possess a rich variety of commanding promontories, and deeply indenting bays; they exhibit bold limestone cliffs, and fantastically outlined protruding rocks; and they are, in several places, flanked by curious and picturesque groups of rocks, one of which bears the appropriately descriptive name of the Books. The island now forms part of Lord Kenmare's demesne; and, besides being extensively sheeted with the arbutus, the holly, the juniper, and other beautiful evergreens, it contains one of the principal nurseries for the supply of shrubs and trees. "Here the native arbutus may be seen in the greatest perfection, intermingled with the holly and yew in the wildest luxuriance, and covering even the most exposed cliffs of the far-projecting promontories, as well as the deep receding bays of the highly varied shores." Walks and drives have lately been formed both through the interior and along the shores; and they have been tastefully conducted over a series of the best vantage-grounds for commanding exquisite panoramic views of the scenery of the gorgeous lake and its majestic and sublime mountain screens. A most charming cottage on the island is the residence of the head forester of the demesne. A little wharf has been erected as a convenient landing-place for tourists; and immediately opposite this, is kept, in Lord Kenmare's boat-house, a number of boats for the public use, large, sheltered, well-preserved, and in excellent order. On the south-west corner of the island are abundant though now deserted lead and copper mines. These mines were worked at a very early period, and continued to be worked till a comparatively recent date; and they now lie in an abandoned and unproductive state, in consequence rather of want of sufficient capital in the proprietors, than of a deficiency of ore. Some of the rude implements used at an early period for breaking down the ore are still to be found on the island; they are large oval stones, quite smooth, and having round the centre a mark evidently caused by the fastening on of a convenient handle; and they are popularly called Dane hammers, the peasantry battering that they were used by communities of Danish invaders. Some high walls were built by the modern mining company, to protect the mines from the south-west storms; and as these considerably disfigured the natural scenery, Lord Kenmare a few years ago resolved to remove them, and to restore the natural features of their site.

Ross-castle, an artificial object of much historical interest and considerable scenic romance, stands upon a rock, on the shore and spot of the island nearest the mainland. It is a lofty quadrangular building with embattled parapets; and was formerly enclosed by a curtain-wall, with circular flankers at the corners, some ruins of which are still visible. Its interior contains several well-proportioned apartments; and its battlements command one of the best views anywhere to be obtained of Mangerton, Turk, Glenna, and all the other mountains and principal grounds within the periphery of the immediate basin of the lakes. A small building was a considerable number of years ago erected against one of the side-walls of the castle for the accommodation of a company of soldiers; but this has now become so stripped of its roof, and broken in its walls, as to harmonize with the general ruin. The castle was built by the family of O'Donoghue-Ross, who adopted the appellation of the island as a surname to distinguish them from the family of O'Donoghue-More; and, in connection with their claiming and wearing the title of kings, it may be regarded as having been a sort of royal residence. This castle is celebrated for having, in 1652, made an obstinate stand under Lord Muskerry, against the English under General Ludlow. "Upon the 26th of July in that year, at Knoeknialachy, in the county of Cork, a battle was fought between Lord Muskerry, at the head of the Irish, and the Lord Broghill, commander of the English forces, in which the former were defeated with great slaughter, and Colonel MacGillivuddy, a native of Kerry, and greatly beloved by the Irish, slain. Upon this defeat, Lord Muskerry withdrew to Ross-castle, whither he was followed by General Ludlow, with a body of 4,000 foot and 200 horse. This experienced officer and upright statesman thus describes the siege of Ross-castle:—"In this expedition I was accompanied by the Lord Broghill and Sir Hardress Waller, major-general of the foot. Being arrived at this place, I was informed that the enemy received continual supplies from those parts that lay on the other side, and were covered with woods and mountains; whereupon I sent a party of 2,000 foot to clear those woods, and to find out some convenient place for erecting a fort, if there should be occasion. These forces met with some opposition, but at last they routed the enemy, killing some and taking others prisoners; the rest saved themselves by their good footmanship. Whilst this was doing, I employed that part of the army which was with me in fortifying a neck of land where I designed to leave a party to keep in the Irish on this side, that I might be at liberty with the greatest part of the horse and foot, to look after the enemy abroad, and to receive and convey such boats and other things necessary, as the commissioners sent us by sea. When we had received our boats, each of which was capable of containing 120 men, I ordered one of them to be rowed about the water, in order to find out the most convenient place for landing upon the enemy, which they perceiving, thought fit, by a timely submission, to prevent the danger that threatened them, and, having expressed their desires to that purpose, commissioners were appointed on both parts to treat." The garrison of Ross-castle was greatly intimidated and urged to a surrender, by the appearance of an armed vessel floating on Lough Lein (the lower lake of Killarney); for there was a prophecy amongst the inhabitants, that the castle would not be taken until a vessel of war was seen to swim on the lake. The fact is, that nothing would have been more improbable than that a ship of war should ever have appeared upon the Lake of Killarney; and had it not been for the unerring energy of Ludlow, in the discharge of his trust, the long-boats, sent by the parliament to Castlemaize, had never been hauled up shallow streams, and carried over rugged tracts of land. The surrender of this castle terminated hostilities in Munster, and induced about 5,000 of the Irish to lay down their arms. The conditions of the treaty of Ross-castle were accurately fulfilled by parliament, by which Lord Broghill was granted £1,000 yearly out of the estates of Lord Muskerry."

ROSS, a bog in the barony of East Maryborough, 1½ mile west by north of the town of Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, north-westward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 3,607 acres. It is bounded, on the north and east, by ridges of high land which are separated by valleys carrying down streams from the bogs; and on the south and west, by gently rising grounds of little elevation, having outlets through which the water of a chief part of the bog passes to the Nore. The bog contains part of the summit-line between the basins of the Nore and the Barrow, extending from north-west to south-east; and it has a considerable declination to the Blackwater stream on the north-east, and to the Cloncoos rivulet on the south-west. "Ross bog," said Mr. Aber officially in 1814, "consists principally of very soft fibrous peat; and the summit, which is fluid peat or quagmire, is so thickly interspersed with small pools of water that they form a greater area than the tufts and soft matings of grasses, rushes, and heath, that are scattered over its surface, which render it almost impassable in dry weather. The southern and eastern edges have been long used as turbary, in consequence of which several acres have been cut away for a few feet in depth, leaving the underneath part from five to eight feet in depth. Where this new surface has been left undisturbed, and not torn up or broken by horses and cars passing to the turbary, it produces naturally a tolerably good growth of grass; and near Gurteen there are several acres of compact black bog, from seven to ten feet in depth, in as good a state of pasturage as any part of the adjacent upland." The highest and the lowest points on the surface of the bog have elevations of respectively 404 and 313 feet above sea-level; and the maximum and mean depths are respectively 32 and 20 feet. Estimated cost of reclamation, £3,473 7s. 4d.

ROSS, a barony in the north-west of the county of Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north and the east, by the county of Mayo; on the south, by the barony of Moycullen; and on the west, by the barony of Ballinabinech. Its length, west-north-westward, is 15½ miles; its greatest breadth is 10; and its area is 98,630 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches,—of which 21,610 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches are water. The surface is nearly identical with Joyce-Country, and forms the north-west portion of the largely-understood district of CUNENARA [which see]; and it comprises a considerable proportion of the most alpine and sublimely beautiful scenery of the highlands of Connaught. The limits include a portion of the upper part of Killery Harbour in the north-west, the whole of Lough Nafucoy in the centre, a large part of Lough Mask in the north-east, and a large part of Lough Corrib in the south-east; and by far the greater portion of the interior is drained by several rivulets to Lough Mask, and by the Beulnabrack river and its affluents to Lough Corrib. Some of the chief scenes of the barony will be found noticed under the words MAAM, LEENAKE, SALRUC, KILLERY, CORRIB, and MASK.—This barony contains the whole of the parish of Ross, and part of the parishes of Ballinculla, Ballinrobe, and Cong. The chief villages are Derry, Cloghbrack, and Leenake; but they are mere hamlets; and not one of them has twenty houses. Pop. of the barony, in 1831, 8,685; in 1841, 9,758. Houses 1,809. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,593; in manufactures and trade, 162; in other pursuits, 68. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 184; on their own manual labour, 1,612; on means not specified, 19. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 344; who could read but not write, 180; who could neither read nor write, 3,640. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 118; who could read but not write, 104; who could neither read nor write, 3,943.—The barony of Ross lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Ballinrobe. The total number of tenements valued is 1,694; and of these, 1,363 were valued under £5,—167, under £10,—25, under £15,—15, under £20,—10, under £25,—5, under £30,—2, under £40,—3, under £50,—and 5, at and above £50.

ROSS, a parish in the barony of Ross, 12½ miles north-west of Oughterard, co. Galway, Connought. Length, westward, 12½ miles; extreme breadth, 8; area, 59,651 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches, of which 5,430 acres, 20 perches are in Lough Mask, 226 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches are in Lough Corrib, 630 acres, 1 rood, 7 perches are in Lough Nafooe, and 106 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,361; in 1841, 4,804. Houses 895. About 1,000 acres on the east side of the parish are good land; but all other parts of the parish are prevalently mountainous, extensively waste and inaccessible, and very scantily available for the purposes of productive tillage. The Devil's-Mother mountain on the northern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 2,131 feet; a mountain on the north-west boundary has an altitude of 2,218 feet, and flings down an alpine waterfall; a mountain on the western boundary has an altitude of 1,536 feet; Letterbrickan, on the western boundary, has an altitude of 2,193 feet; a height on the western border has an altitude of 2,052 feet; two heights on the south-western boundary have altitudes of 2,307 and 2,128 feet; Bunnacummen, in the central district, has an altitude of 1,902 feet; two heights on the southern border have altitudes of 1,383 and 1,370 feet; and a height on the eastern border, overhanging Lough Mask, has an altitude of 1,290 feet. Lough Nafooe extends from west to east in the centre of the parish, and has a surface-elevation of only 96 feet above sea-level. The Strahulung rivulet flows along most of the northern boundary. The Glenlosh and the Joyce rivulets rise in the north-western district; the latter makes a large waterfall not far below its source; and the two combine near Maam Inn, to form the Beahabrack river, which thereforth constitutes the principal drain of the parish toward Lough Corrib. The western arm of Lough Mask extends up the north-eastern boundary; and the south-western arm extends wholly within the interior. The principal isles and islets of Lough Mask belonging to the parish are Lasteenbeg, Lasteenmore, Carrigeen, Imishowen, Scattered-Rock, Carrigeenawecallan, Carrigenagar, Rock-Island, Red-Island, Rig-Island, White-Island, Kilbride-Rock, Lussenmore-Rock, and Oyster-Rock. The chief of the numerous hamlets, or tiny clusters of miserable huts, are Toulgeee, West-Crumlin, East-Maam, Raigh, Curr, Griggin, Shanafaragh-aunbeg, Shanafaragh-aunmore, Drin, Finny, Fox-hillmore, Kilmore, East-Glenbeg, Shanadullaun, Coolin, Upper Killeg, Lower Cloghbrack, Upper Cloghbrack, America, Boocuan, Cahirgall, Benlevy, Cormoor, Fairhill, East-Rusheen, and West-Carrick. In the year 1431, a monastery was founded at Ross or Ross-Trilly, upon Lough Mask, in the county of Galway, for Conventual Franciscans; and, in 1470, it was reformed by the Observantines.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMOLARA [which see], in the dioc. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £430. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Fairhill and Finny, and a private house used as a Roman Catholic chapel at Maam, have an attendance of respectively from 800 to 1,000, from 500 to 600, and about 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Currana-mona, in the parish of Cong. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 38, and the Roman Catholics to 4,663; and 2 daily schools at Ballinonagh and Fairhill—the former of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the Tuam Diocesan Education Society—were usually attended by about 75 scholars. In 1843, a boys' school and a girls' school at Carrow-keel were salaried with £8 each from the National Board, and had on their books 107 boys and 64 girls. ROSS, barony of Clare, co. Galway. See ROSS-REILLY.

ROSS, a village in the parish of Kilballyowen, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It stands at the head of a creek or small bay of its own name, on the coast of the Atlantic, 1¼ mile north-north-east of Kilbaha, and 5½ miles west of Carrigaholt. In its vicinity are an ecclesiastical ruin called Templemanoeve, two burying-grounds, the ruins of Clogh-na-savaun-castle, a cave, Kiltrellif-lodge, and the hamlet of Fodry. Area of the village, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 184. Houses 26.

ROSS, a small harbour in the parish of Kilcom-mon, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connought. It is situated on the east side of Broadhaven, or rather consists of the mouth or lower part of Strawwaddacon bay, an eastward ramification of Broadhaven, 7½ miles north-east by east of Belmullet. Strawwaddacon bay penetrates the land 2½ miles south-eastward, with a mean breadth of about 3 furlongs; and receives at its head the rivulets Glenamoy and Muingnahoy. The bar at the mouth of the bay, usually called Ross bar, has never less than 3 feet of water in even the lowest tides; and the space immediately within it, usually called Ross harbour, affords a secure asylum to small vessels. A ferry, called Ross ferry, is stationed on the harbour to keep up the communication between Belmullet and Portacloy.

ROSS, a demesne in the parish of Killanin, barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connought. It extends along the north-east side of a lake of its own name, between Lough Corrib on the east, and the great road to central and northern Connemara on the west, and is situated 4½ miles south-east of Oughterard, and 9 north-west of Galway. It is a well kept and naturally romantic place; and, in combination with the waters and the rocky shores of Lough Corrib, and with the isolated position of its own large lake, it presents features as curious as they are beautiful. Its proprietor is James Martin, Esq. Ross lake is 2 miles in length, and 5 furlongs in extreme breadth; and it extends along the mutual border of the parishes of Killanin and Moycullen.

ROSS, a lake, partly in the parish of Donagh-moyne, barony of Farney, co. Monaghan, but chiefly in the parish of Creggan, barony of Upper Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. It lies 1½ mile west by north of Crossmaglen, and 3½ south-east of Castle-Blaney.

Its length is 7 furlongs; its breadth is $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile; and its surface-elevation above sea-level is 286 feet. Not far from its centre is an islet.

ROSS, or ROSSE, a hamlet in the parish of Tara, barony of Skreen, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dunshaughlin to Navan, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of the village of Tara, and $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north-north-west of Dunshaughlin. Either this place, or, as some say, the town of New Ross, gives the title of Earl in the peerage of Ireland to the noble family of Parsons. In 1020, Sir William Parsons, the first distinguished figurant of the family in Ireland, was created a baronet; in 1681, Sir Richard, great-grandson of the first baronet, was created Baron Oxmantown and Viscount Rosse; in 1718, the second Viscount, the son of the first, was advanced to the dignity of Earl Ross; and, in 1746, at the death of Richard, the second Earl, the titles became extinct. But Sir William Parsons, Bart. of Birr, the descendant of the brother of the first baronet of the elder branch of the Parsons family, and the possessor in his own right in his own descent of another baronetcy, inherited the family estates of the deceased Earls; and the descendants of this gentleman now enjoy the revived titles of the peerage. The present Earl, William Parsons, was born in 1800, and succeeded to the earldom in 1841; and he possesses a distinguished name in literature and science. The family seat is Birr-castle, adjacent to the town of Birr, in King's county.

ROSS (NEW), or ST. MARY'S OF NEW ROSS, a parish on the western border of the barony of Bantry, and of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It contains the town of New Ross, and the village of Maudlins. Length, south-eastward, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, 24; area, 4,922 acres, 1 rood, 27 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 7,901, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 7,523; in 1841, 9,131. Houses 1,395. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,719. Houses 283. Area of the village of Maudlins, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 289. Houses 48. The town of New Ross will form the subject of next article. The river Barrow flows in majestic and beautiful sinuities along most of the northern and the whole of the western boundaries, from a point $\frac{1}{2}$ mile above the influx of the Nore, to a point $\frac{1}{2}$ mile below the town of New Ross. The banks of the river are comparatively bold, and very picturesquely varied; and the whole parochial surface, in a general view, is finely diversified in surface, not a little beautiful in natural features, aggregately rich in soil, and profusely ornate in artificial dress and embellishment. Among the numerous rural residences are Maryville, Oaklands-house, Arnestown-house, Belleview-cottage, Newtown-house, Erin-vale, Ardross-cottage, Bawnmore-house, Shanballyroe-house, Castleview, Macmurrough-cottage, Macmurrough-house, Rosemount-lodge, Rosemount-house, and Talbot-hall,—the last the seat of the well-known J. H. Talbot, Esq. The principal antiquities within the rural districts are the ruins of Macmurrough-castle, Arnestown-castle, Mountgarret-castle, and a monastery.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Ferns. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £110 ls. 24d., and the rectorial for £220 5s. 5½d.; and the latter are impropriate in the corporation of Kilkenny. The vicarages of New Ross and Templeudigan, the impropriate curacy of BALLYBRAZIL, the appropriate curacy of KILSCANLAN, and the rectories of OLD

ROSS, BALLYANE, CLONLEIGH, CARNAGH, and TULLERAGHT [see these articles], constitute the benefice of New Ross. But within the benefice lies the perpetual curacy of Templeudigan; and the statistics of that curacy are, in consequence, not included in those of the benefice. Length of the union, 13 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 12,525. Gross income, £1,148 9s. 0½d.; nett, £1,030 8s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. One stipendiary curate for New Ross parish receives a salary of £75, and the surplice fees; and one for Old Ross receives £69 4s. 7½d. The church of New Ross was built in 1813 by means of a loan of £2,676 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £2,861 10s. 9½d. raised by subscription. Sittings 1,000; attendance, about 400. There is a church also in Old Ross. The Protestant dissenting meeting-house is attended by 130; the Quakers' meeting-house, by 18; the Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by 50; and the Primitive Methodist meeting-house, by 100. The New Ross parochial Roman Catholic chapel has 3 officiates, and an attendance of about 2,500. The Roman Catholic nunnery chapel is under the care of the parochial Roman Catholic clergyman, and has an attendance of about 90. The Roman Catholic friary chapel is under the care of 4 friars, and has an attendance of 1,500. The Cushenstown and Tullyrath Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively 1,000 and 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of New Ross parish consisted of 809 Churchmen, 73 Protestant dissenters, and 6,519 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,139 Churchmen, 76 Protestant dissenters, and 11,292 Roman Catholics; 3 daily schools in the parish—one of which was a ladies' boarding school, and another was conducted by the inmates of the nunnery, and salaried with £25 a-year from the National Board—were usually attended by about 240 scholars; 10 other daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £32 a-year and other advantages from bequest by Mr. Ivory, one with £15 from the National Board and local subscriptions and donations, and one with £10 from legacies by Mr. Hughes, £3 3s. from Mrs. Paul, and about £37 from subscription—had on their books 487 boys and 174 girls; and there were 4 other daily schools in the other parishes of the union.

ROSS (NEW).

A post, market, and sea-port town, and a parliamentary borough, in the parish of New Ross, barony of Bantry, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the left bank of the river Barrow, and at the intersection of the road from Waterford to Wexford, with that from Fethard and Arthurstown to Thomastown and Carlow, 83 south by east of Graigueanamanagh, 9 south-east of Innistigue, 91 north of Arthurstown, 91 south-west of Stone-Pound, 10 north-north-east of Waterford, 12 south-east of Thomastown, 15½ south-west by west of Enniscorthy, 16½ west by north of Wexford, 19 south-south-west of Newtownbarry, and 67 south-south-west of Dublin.

[Approaches and Environs.]—New Ross is so peculiarly situated as to have been, till quite recently, approached from Dublin by four different routes, all hilly and circuitous, and each encumbered with sufficient disadvantages to occasion a constant competition among the routes for eligibility. One was by way of Enniscorthy, 77½ miles in length, and offered, between that town and New Ross, no more striking feature of natural or artificial scenery than a profusion of small field enclosures, fenced by furze hedges; another was by way of Newtownbarry, 67

* The discrepancy appears to be produced by the Census including within St. Mary's of New Ross the parish of Tulleraght, which, besides being a distinct parish, really lies considerably detached from St. Mary's, and within the barony of Shelbourne.

miles in length, and ran so closely along the base of the Mount-Leinster and Blackstairs mountains as to command a prolonged series of interesting and powerful views; another was by way of Enlow and Borris, 68½ miles in length, and conducted, through a poor, bleak, and dreary tract of land between the sublimities of Mounts Leinster and Blackstairs, and the grandeur of Mount Brandon and the course of the Barrow; and the fourth was by way of Thomastown and Innistigue, 72 miles in length, and ran along the beautiful and highly varied valley of the Nore, down to the confluence of that river with the Barrow. Of these four routes, the last was, upon the whole, the most convenient; but a totally new line of road has just been formed from Tullow to New Ross, while the old line from New Ross to Waterford has been amended, and this will henceforth be the principal and most facile road from Dublin to both New Ross and Waterford. The immediate environs of New Ross, on both sides of the Barrow, are much diversified, and aggregately very beautiful. "There are in Ireland few towns more auspiciously situated than that of New Ross; the goodly Barrow is here a river of great width; the adjacent scenery is of exceeding beauty; the majestic river runs between the two rich counties of Wexford and Kilkenny; its banks are thickly planted; and its surface is almost literally covered, at low water, by cots of the salmon fishers."*

General Description.—The Barrow, while passing the town, flows in a south-south-westerly direction, and has a width of from nearly 200 to about 350 yards, the minimum width being at the bridge, and the maximum width at the lower extremity of the town. The immediate site of the town is partly a narrow belt of low ground along the margin of the river, partly the acclivitous face or rapid slope of a hilly ridge which extends parallel with the river, and partly a sort of tabular ground at the general elevation of the summit of the ridge. The strictly compact and the business districts occupy the belt of low ground; the more retired, but still strictly town districts, occupy the sloping ground; and the eastern and north-eastern outskirts and suburbs occupy the tabular ground. A suburb on the right bank of the Barrow consists principally of a single, straggling, and irregularly edified street, extending about 500 yards westward, or rather west-north-westward, from the end of the bridge; but this, though included within the borough limits, stands in a different county from New Ross, and bears the separate and distinctive name of Rosbegone, which see. New Ross proper consists principally of a terrace or one-sided street extending 500 yards along the river, south-south-westward from the end of the bridge; a street somewhat parallel with the terrace, and about the same length, at the mean distance of about 90 yards to the east; five or six streets and lanes running east-south-eastward, and parallel to one another, from the terrace to the preceding street; two principal and one or two subordinate streets climbing eastward, but somewhat curvingly, up the face of the hilly ridge; a street of about 450 yards in length, extending southward along nearly the highest ground, from the vicinity of the parish church; and a miserably edified suburb called Irishtown, extending about 700 yards east by northward from the vicinity of the church. One of the cross streets, east-south-eastward from the terrace, extends on a line with the bridge, and is spacious and a chief seat of business; and two of the streets parallel with it, and of course farther to the south, are also spacious. The lower parts of the town are of easy thoroughfare, and present three facile outlets toward respectively Goresbridge and Thomastown up the river, Ballyhack and Arturistown down the river, and Waterford and the baronies of Ida and Iverk across the river; but the higher or eastern parts possess very inconvenient approaches from Wexford, Ennisconry, and other places to the east; and the streets down the face of the declivity are not a little difficult for wheeled carriages, and far from agreeable even to pedestrians. Part of the former town was destroyed, and much of the remainder greatly damaged, during the rebellion of 1798; and many of its present and modern buildings have been very irregularly erected.

Public Buildings.—In 1333, a monastery was founded at New Ross, by Hannon or William Le Gras or Grace, for eremites following the rule of St. Augustine; and, at the dissolution, this establishment, together with its appurtenances, was granted in capite to Richard Butler; at the annual rent of 1s. 5d. Irish. Some vestiges of the building still exist. At some date now unknown, a crouched friary, or friary for conventual Franciscans, or quite as probably an ecclesiastical establishment of unrecorded character which a community of Franciscan friars were permitted to appropriate to their use, was built on the summit of the hilly ridge, at the north-east corner of the town, on the spot now occupied by the parish church; but in consequence either of one of the friars having killed one of the inhabitants, or of some other real or suspected immorality perpetrated by one or more of the monastic community, the town's people pulled down all the buildings of the monastery, and either unmercifully expelled the inmates. A reddish appearance on some stones in the vicinity is still pointed out by the common people as the friars' blood; but it is distinctly seen by a mineralogist to be the mineral called hematite. The monastery of St. Saviour, for conventual Franciscans, was built by Sir John Devereux, on the site of the destroyed crouched friary; and in consequence of the east end of its church having long been used as the parochial place of worship of the parish of St. Mary's of New Ross, this came to be called the Abbey of St. Mary. The monastery does not appear to have been richly endowed; and, at the general dissolution, it was granted to the Earl of Ormond. The church of the monastery was so well preserved as to serve for the parochial place of worship so late as the year 1811 or 1812; and then the west end was judiciously taken down to make room for the erection of the present church. The other parts of the abbey church are still standing; and though unroofed and much dilapidated, they present to the artist a not uninteresting specimen of the ecclesiastical pointed style of architecture of the period at which they were erected. A cemetery exists under the pile; and, with great absurdity, is popularly asserted to extend under the greater part of the town. "Yet certain it is," says a recent narrator of the popular whim, "that archways have been discovered stretching in the direction of the abbey, and persons are somewhat deterred entering the cemetery, from the story of a soldier who once entered 'the Black-Hole,' as the entrance is called, provided with a lantern, and accompanied by a dog. The dog returned, but his ill-fated master affords a lesson to the incautious antiquarian. Another story, equally believed, is told of some persons who attempted to take down the cross from the chancel wing, but whose brains were dashed out for their impious temerity. Underneath the cross are two slabs, of rude sculpture, supposed to represent these persons. Stone coffins have been found; but the most perfect monument, and the best specimen of bygone days, is the tomb of Rose Macroom, which is in the northern wing. Two other curious and interesting tombs in the same wing are a beautifully sculptured one of the date 1648, to the memory of Matthew Dorner, and an altar-tomb, sculptured in relief, abundant in devices, and with an ingeniously interlaced cross in relief, to the memory of Peter Butler, the descendant of the founder of Mountgarret castle. The modern parochial church, attached to the old abbey, is a neat edifice faced with cut stone, ornamented with a low square tower, and commanding a fine view over the town and the adjacent parts of the valley of the Barrow. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel is remarkable only for its spaciousness. The chapel of the modern friary is a handsome edifice, erected after spirited designs. The modern convent or nunnery is situated in the eastern outskirts of the town. The town was formerly surrounded with strong walls, which are traditionally asserted to have been built about the year 1310, and which were in military requisition during the civil wars of the 17th century, but which—greatly to the regret of the loyal population in 1798—were so far destroyed in the latter part of the 18th century, as to be rendered completely unserviceable. On the north side of the town, near the river, stood the North Gate; on the east side, were the Maiden Tower, the Market Gate, Bunion Gate, Weavers' Tower, and Broguesmakers' Tower; and on the south side, were the Three Bullet Gate, Mary's Tower, and the Priory or South Gate. The bridge across the Barrow, connecting New Ross with Rosbercon, is approached by a causeway of 150 feet in length, and is itself a wooden erection of 358 feet in length, having footpaths, a portcullis, and ornamented railings. The other public buildings are the dissenting meeting-houses, the school-houses, the union workhouse, the fever hospital, the sessions-house, the bridewell, the market-house, the corn-market, and the barrack.

* These cots are of a very primitive character, not unlike canoes; they are propelled by paddles, resembling the common spade; each boat contains two men. Their net is small and square; it is drawn up the instant the fisher feels a salmon strike against it. There are no fewer than 400 boats on the river, giving profitable employment to 800 men, principally small farmers, who thus occupy their time when the seed is in the ground.

Poor-law Union.—The New Ross Poor-law union ranks as the 100th, and was declared on March 23, 1840. It comprises parts of the counties of Wexford, Kilkenny, and Carlow, and comprehends an area of 186,596 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 67,944. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are, in co. Carlow, St. Mullins, 6,844; in co. Kilkenny, Graigue, 5,819,—the Rower, 2,725,—Innistigue, 1,807,—Dysertmoone, 3,845,—Rosbercon, 2,382,—and Woodstock, 3,498; and in co. Wexford, Fethard, 4,029,—Tintern, 4,976,—Dunbrody, 5,131,—Whitechurch, 3,055,—Carnagh, 1,680,—Old Ross, 1,724,—New Ross, 8,883,—Adamstown, 1,643,—Newbawn, 1,952,—Clongeen, 2,853,—Horetown, 2,047,—and Templedugan, 3,131. The number of ex-officio guardians is 10, and of elected guardians is 30; and 4 of the latter are elected by the division of New Ross, 3 by the division of St. Mullins, 2 each by the divisions of Fethard, Tintern, Dunbrody, Graigue, Dysertmoone, and Woodstock, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The division of St. Mullins is in the barony of Lower St. Mullins; the division of Rower is in the barony of Ida; the division of Woodstock lies in the baronies of Ida and Gowran; the divisions of Innistigue and Graigue lie in the barony of Gowran; the division of Dysertmoone lies in the baronies of Ida and Knocktopher; the rural part of the division of New Ross lies in the barony of Bantry; the division of New Ross, including the chief part of the borough of New Ross, lies in the barony of Bantry; the division of Rosbercon, including a small part of the borough of New Ross, lies in the barony of Ida; the divisions of Fethard, Tintern, and Dunbrody, lie in the barony of Shelburne; the divisions of Whitechurch, Carnagh, and Newbawn, lie in the baronies of Shelburne and Bantry; the divisions of Old Ross, Adamstown, and Templedugan, lie in the barony of Bantry; and the divisions of Clongeen and Horetown lie in the barony of Shelmalier. The number of valued tenements in the borough of New Ross is 1,275,—in the Bantry districts, exclusive of the borough of New Ross, 1,007,—in the Shelburne districts, 2,784,—in the Shelmalier districts, 725,—in the Gowran districts, 1,119,—in the Ida districts, exclusive of the borough of New Ross, 1,339,—in the Knocktopher district, 116,—in the Lower St. Mullins district, 910,—in the entire union, 9,825; and of this total, 3,945 were valued under £5,—2,208, under £10,—1,289, under £15,—809, under £20,—503, under £25,—268, under £30,—292, under 40,—109, under £50,—and 347, at and above £50. The total net annual value of the property rated is £410,187; the total number of persons rated is 9,899; and of these, 980 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—1,528, not exceeding £2,—784, not exceeding £3,—597, not exceeding £4,—and 493, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Nov. 10, 1840,—to be completed in Feb. 1842,—to cost £7,600 for building and completion, and £1,550 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 10 acres, 3 perches, obtained for £150 of compensation to occupying tenant and an annual rent of £43 6s. 3d.,—and to contain accommodation for 900 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was July 6, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,081 6s. 3d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,416 13s. 10d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 360. The medical charities within the union are fever hospitals at New Ross, Arthurstown, and Ida, and dispensaries at Arthurstown, Fethard, Newbawn, New Ross, Templedugan, Glanmore, Graigue-namunnagh, Ida, and Innistigue; and, in 1839-40, they received £361 5s. 0½d. from subscription, £801 12s. 3d. from public grants, and £640 13s. 8d. from other sources, and expended £773 10s. 10d. in salaries to medical officers, £279 10s. 11½d. for medicines, and £947 4s. 9d. for contingencies. The New Ross fever hospital serves also as an infirmary, contains 72 beds, and is a well-managed institution; and, in 1839-40, it received £863 5s. 11d., expended £652 18s. 11½d., and admitted 455 patients. The New Ross dispensary, in 1839-40, received £115 8s. 0½d., and expended £175 10s. 7½d., but made no returns of its dispensations of medicine.

Trade.—New Ross, even in spite of the comparatively near vicinity and the very powerful competition of Waterford, is most advantageously situated for almost every department of trade, and might easily be raised to a perfect equality with the best and most flourishing towns of Ireland, with the exception of Dublin and Belfast. It hitherto has prospered meagerly in proportion to its advantages; and for some time it even appeared quite stationary, and somewhat menaced with decay; but of late years, it has assumed some activity, and now it gives a little promise of smartly contesting general trade with Waterford. The quay extends 650 yards along the left bank of the Barrow, from the bridge downward; it is, at present, blocked up at both ends with houses, which seem to forbid extension of the scene of trade, but of course it could easily be increased at the expense of their demolition; and it admits vessels of 200 tons at the lowest stage of the lowest tide, and vessels of 600 tons at high spring tides. Vessels of smaller tonnage can also proceed above the town by the Nore to Innistigue, and by the Barrow to St. Mullins; and barges even ascend to Athy, there to communicate, through the ramifications of the Grand Canal, with the city of Dublin and the river Shannon. The port of New Ross was formerly a dependency of Waterford; but in 1840 it was made an independent shipping port. In 1835, the tonnage sailing from the port did not exceed 500 tons. In 1843, it possessed 3 small sailing vessels of aggregately 94 tons burden, 9 larger sailing vessels of aggregately 2,025 tons, and 1 steam vessel of 63 tons. In the same year, 377 sailing vessels, of aggregately 30,110 tons, entered the port coastwise; 119 sailing vessels, of aggregately 6,860 tons, departed coastwise; 8 sailing vessels, of aggregately 2,508 tons, entered from the colonies; 9 sailing vessels, of aggregately 3,119 tons, departed for the colonies; and 1 sailing vessel of 85 tons, entered from a foreign port. The import duties paid at New Ross, in 1835, were £3,906; in 1839, £14,998; and in 1844, £22,708. The principal exports are grain, flour, wool, butter, and bacon. Two steamers ply regularly to Waterford. Weekly markets are held on Wednesday and Saturday; and fairs are held on Jan. 10, Feb. 10, March 17, Easter Monday (or on April 10, if Easter Monday occur in March), May 3, Whit-Monday (or on June 10, if Whit-Monday occur in May), July 10, Aug. 10, Sept. 10, Oct. 18, Nov. 10, and Dec. 8. The town has 3 loan funds, and branch-offices of the Bank of Ireland, the Provincial Bank of Ireland, and the National Bank of Ireland. The principal manufactures in the town are breweries, distilleries, and a tan-yard. The public conveyances are the mail-coach in transit between Waterford and Wexford, and mail or stage cars to Waterford, Wexford, Kilkenny, Thomastown, Innistigue, Fethard, Arthurstown, Duncannon-Fort, Enniscorthy, and Carlow.—Railways are projected for connecting this thriving town with Carlow on the one hand, and Kilkenny on the other. One of these lines will commence at the town of New Ross, and passing through or near Graigue, Borris, and Bagnalstown, will terminate at Carlow, where it will form a junction with the South Western railway and other lines, giving a direct communication with Dublin. The other line will pass from New Ross, through or near Innistigue and Thomastown, and will terminate at the city of Kilkenny.

Municipal Affairs.—Numerous early and public documents—some of which, however, concern only certain commercial privileges which were, for a long period, in contest between the inhabitants of New Ross and the citizens of Waterford—make mention of the town, the port, and the borough or burghesses of New Ross. The principal of the general class of these, are documents of 14 and 51 Henry III., 3 and 5 Edward I., 11 Edward II., 14 Edward III., 1 Richard II., 28 Henry VI., and 2 and 8 Philip and Mary; and the principal of those which possess the character of charters or letters-patent, are documents of Roger Bigot, Earl of Norfolk and Marshal of England, 49 Edward III., 1, 13, 15; and 18 Richard II., 1, 4, 9, and 10 Henry IV., 1 Henry V., 20 Henry VI., 9 Edward IV., 1 Richard III., 1 Henry VIII., 2 Edward VI., 1 and 18 James I., and 3 James II.. New Ross is one of the boroughs named in the New Rules of 25 Charles II.; so that its corporate officers required to be approved by the Lord-Lieutenant and the Privy Council of Ireland. The old borough limits extended one mile beyond the town walls, within the city of Wexford, excepting in one place where the Mountgarret property nearly adjoins the walls, and they are distinctly delineated in the Down Survey, and are there exhibited as including 58 acres within the walls, and 3,799 acres within the liberties. The land within and around the present suburb of Rosbercon, appears to have been the site of an ancient borough of the name of Rosbercon or Rosbargon; and this borough is mentioned in a charter of 28 Edward II., in which Gilbert De Clare, Earl of Gloucester and Hertford, granted to his burghesses of Rosbargon all such liberties and free customs as his grandfather had granted to his burghesses of Kilkenny. The boundaries of the present parliamentary borough of New Ross materially differ from those of the ancient borough; and they extend a little beyond the walls on the east, and include the suburb of Rosbercon and some adjacent ground on the west. The corporation, according to charter, was called "The Sovereign and Free Burghesses of New Ross;" consisted of a sovereign, and an indefinite number of free burghesses and freemen; and had, for its officers, a sovereign, a deputy-sovereign, a coroner, a capital burghess, a recorder, a bailiff, a town-clerk, a water-bailiff, and several inferior officers. A court of record was formerly held, and exercised unlimited jurisdiction; but, about 45 years ago, it was discontinued. No criminal courts were held under the authority of the corporation. The courts now held are merely quarter-sessions and petty-sessions, the latter every alternate Wednesday. At a meeting held on Oct. 18, 1840, the lighting, cleansing, and watching of the streets were vested in 21 Commissioners. The number of houses valued from £5 to £10, and rated at 3d. in the pound, for the purposes of these Commissioners, was 276; the number valued from £10 to £20, and rated at 4d. in the pound, was 174; and the number valued at £20 and upwards, and rated at 6d. in the pound, was 79. New Ross proper, or the town on the Wexford side of the Barrow, is the head-quarters of a constabulary district, which includes the stations of New Ross, Adamstown, Ballinabolla, Ballylane, Ballywilliam, Berkeley, Clonroche, and Killane; and Rosbercon is the head-quarters of a constabulary district in co. Kilkenny, which includes the 6 stations of Rosbercon, Glanmore, Innistigue, Listerlin, Rower, and Slieverue. The only charitable institution under the control of the corporation of the borough is Trinity Hospital, founded in the 30th year of Queen Elizabeth, by Thomas Gregory. "We find on record," report the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations, "the Queen's letter for a grant to the master, brethren, and sisters of the Hospital of the Holy Trinity of Rosse, in the county of Wexford, founded by the ancestors of Sir Patrick Welsh, but incorporated anew by the Queen, of St. Saviour's chapel and St. Michael's chapel in Rosse, as also eleven messuages and five gardens in the same town, commonly called St. Saviour's Lands, to which the corporation of Rosse had a claim, but which they relinquished in favour of the hospital. It possesses a revenue of more than £200 a-year, which seems to be fairly managed, and equally divided among the inmates, consisting of 14 widows. It is unnecessary to enlarge on this object, as a particular return of its revenues, &c., has been ordered by the House of Commons, and was in progress at the time of the inquiry. However, it must be observed that the inmates have been selected exclusively from Protestants, there not being a single instance of a Catholic being admitted. There is a sum of 10s. a-year, and a barrel of wheat, claimed as a rent out of the land of Maudlins, and which, although paid, as far as we could learn, for upwards of a century, is now disputed." The landed property belonging to the corporation, was at one time very extensive, but is now reduced, nobody knows how, to less than 400 acres. The rental of the existing property amounts to £181 9s. 7d.; and is not likely to experience any considerable rise, as most of the property is let for lives renewable for ever. The borough formerly sent two members to the Irish parliament, and it now sends one to the imperial parliament. Constituency in 1841, 277,—of whom 7 were freemen, and 270 were £10 householders.

Statistics.—The following statistics of the town, excepting those of tenements valued for poor-rate, are all exclusive of the suburb of Rosbercon. Area, 373 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,001; in 1841, 7,133. Houses 1,064. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 318; in manufactures and trade, 800; in other pursuits, 461. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 38; on the directing of labour, 783; on their own manual labour, 654; on means not specified, 84. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,409; who could read but not write, 419; who could neither read nor write, 914. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 688; who could read but not write, 794; who could neither read nor write, 1,574. Number of valued tenements within the Wexford district of the borough, or New Ross proper, 1,245; of which 868 were valued under £5,—121, under £10,—77, under £15,—43, under £20,—75, under £25,—7, under £30,—20, under £40,—19, under £50,—and 15, at and above £50. Number of valued tenements within the Kilkenny or Rosbercon district of the borough, 30; of which 5 were valued under £5,—8, under £10,—5, under £15,—4, under £20,—2, under £25,—1, under £40,—1, under £50,—and 4, at and above £50.

History.—Tradition ascribes the founding of New Ross to a lady of the name of Rose, daughter of Crume, king of Denmark; and the surrounding of it with walls to another lady of the name of Rose, sister of Earl Strongbow. A curious poem, commemorative of the building of the walls and fortifications, was written in Norman-French, about the year 1309, by a friar named Michael of Kildare; the manuscript of it, consisting of 64 leaves of vellum, and written in a good style of penmanship, is preserved among the Harleian manuscripts in the British Museum; and a copy of it, along with a translation by Miss Landon, is given by Crofton Croker, in his Popular Songs of Ireland. "The object of the writer was to give a detailed narrative of the erection of the fortifications and walls of Ross, occasioned by the dread felt by the inhabitants, lest the unprotected and open situation of the place might cause them, to suffer from a feud, then raging with violence between two powerful barons, Maurice Fitz-Maurice, the chief of the Geraldines, and Walter de Burgo, Earl of Ulster, whose deadly wars in the year 1204, wrought bloodshed and trouble throughout the realm of Ireland. The poet proceeds to relate that the burgesses established a bye-law, such as was never heard of in England or France, 'that on Monday, the vintners, mercers, merchants, and drapers should go and work at the fosse, from the hour of prime till noon; on Tuesday, their places were to be taken by the tailors, &c.; on Wednesday, by the butchers, &c.; on Thursday, by the fishermen, &c.; on Friday, by others; and on Saturday, by the masons, &c. Lastly, on the Sunday, assembled in procession the ladies of the town! Know, verily, that they were excellent labourers, but their numbers I cannot certainly tell; but they all went forth to cast stones and carry them from the fosse. Whoever had been there to look at them, might have seen many a beautiful woman—many a mantle of scarlet, green, and russet—many a fair folded cloak, and many a gay-coloured garment. In all the countries I ever visited, never saw I so many fair ladies. He should have been born in a fortunate hour, who might make his choice among them.

The ladies also carried banners, in imitation of the other parties; and when they were tired of the duty assigned to them, they walked round the fosse, singing sweetly to encourage the workmen. When the work shall be completed,' adds the poet, 'they may sleep securely and will not require a guard; for if forty thousand men were to attack the town, they would never be able to enter it, for they have sufficient means of defence; many a white hauberk and haubergeon—many a doublet and coat of mail, and a savage garcon—many a good cross-bowman and good archers.' This singular account of the building of the walls of New Ross is not more curious than the account given by Stonihurst:—"There repaired one of the Irish to this towne on horseback, and espieing a peece of cloth on a merchant's stall, tooke hold thereof and bet the cloth to the lowest price he could. As the merchant and he stood doding one with the other in cheaping the ware, the horseman considering that he was well-mounted, and the merchant and he had growne to a price, made wise as though he would have drawne out his purse to have defraid the monie. The cloth in the meane while being tucked up and placed before him, he gave the spur to his horse, and ran away with the cloth, being not imbarred from his posting pase, by reason the towne was not perclosed either with ditch or wall. The townesmen being pinched at the heart that one rascal in such scornful wise should give them the shamaine, not so much weieing the slenderness of the loss, as the shamefulness of the foile, they put their heads together, consulting how to prevent the sudden rushing or the post-hast fleeing of anie such adventurous rakehell hereafter." The building of the walls and gates accordingly took place; the project being suggested by "a chaste widow, a politike dame, a bountifull gentlewoman, called Rose," who "withal opened her coffers liberallie to have it farthered."

The town of New Ross does not figure in any prominent or important event previous to the year 1642, when it underwent a siege from the Marquis of Ormond. The Lords-justices of Ireland tardily ordered the raising of an army for the reduction of this town and Wexford; and when Ormond, much against their secret inclinations, placed himself at the head of that army, they withheld the complement of provisions requisite for its success. "The Marquis drove the enemy from several posts, and, relying on the arrival of stores, which the Justices had engaged to send by sea to Duncannon, he formed the siege of Ross. Repulsed in an assault on the town, into which the enemy had thrown 2,000 men, and having only three days' provisions, as he had been totally disappointed by the Justices, he was necessitated to raise the siege; but his situation at the distance of about 70 miles from Dublin would have been totally desperate, if General Preston, who occupied a defile with a much superior army of 6,000 foot and 650 horse, and was thus enabled to prevent his escape, had maintained his position. Preston, in full confidence of an easy victory over an enemy enfeebled by scantiness of food, and the cold of winter, rushed from his strong post into the plain. Ormond availed himself of this opportunity by a skilful disposition and spirited attack. The Irish troops thrown into confusion, and vigorously pressed without being allowed time to rally, were defeated with the loss of 500 of their number, and all their ammunition and baggage. The defeated army was saved from destruction by the behaviour of the English cavalry, who, under Lord Lisle, abandoned the foot as soon as the victory was gained, leaving Ormond to his shifts, who might have been again attacked by Preston, if the latter had not prevented his own return across the Barrow, by demolishing the bridge on that river in his flight.

In the disastrous year 1798, New Ross sustained a very severe attack from a large body of rebels, nominally under the command of Beauchamp Bagenal Harvey; and witnessed the most sanguinary battle, and some of the most fruent and disgusting scenes which occurred during the whole period of the rebellion. On the 4th of June, the chief division of the rebel forces changed its position from Carrickburn mountains, distant 6 miles from Ross, to Corbet-hill, a mile from that town, which was the object of attack for the next morning. On Carrickburn, these forces had been reviewed and organized under the inspection of Beauchamp Bagenal Harvey, whom they had liberated from the gaol of Wexford, and chosen for their generalissimo. The seizure of Ross, when it might have been effected without opposition, on the 20th of the preceding month, had been vehemently urged by a chief named Hay, and a great number had agreed to accompany him for that purpose, but the scheme was postponed, on the arrival, already related, of Coleclough and Fitzgerald. Harvey, neither deficient in courage nor intellect, possessed not that calm intrepidity which is necessary in the composition of a military leader, nor those rare talents by which an undisciplined multitude may be directed and controlled. He formed a plan of an attack on three separate parts of the town at once, which in all probability would have succeeded if it had been put in execution. Acting as if engaged in regular warfare, Harvey sent a summons, with a flag of truce, to the commander of the garrison, requiring a surrender for the prevention of bloodshed; but the bearer, named Furlong, was shot by the troops. Whilst this general of the rebel army was arranging his men in three columns for the triple assault, they complained that they were galled by a fire from the outposts of the garrison, and demanded the removal of this annoyance. To dislodge the outposts, 500 men were assigned to a brave young man named Kelly, who quickly performed this service, but was utterly unable to restrain his irregular band. These followed, by a multitude in defiance of orders, fierce, and ungovernable, many of them intoxicated, rushed headlong forward, forced back the cavalry with slaughter on the foot, seized the artillery, and drove the troops posted in that quarter to the bridge, and the opposite side of the river. From a full persuasion of a decided victory in favour of the assailants, some officers fled, without stopping, twelve miles to Waterford with this alarming intelligence. But as if plunder were their only object, these victorious rebels pursued no further their advantage, while the royal troops posted in other parts, maintained their stations unassailed by the columns destined to attack their quarters. These columns had not been completely formed, when a premature onset was made by the third; and by the premature flight of some of their leaders afterwards, with unaccountable timidity, they were totally deranged and ineffective. While in Waterford, the fugitives of the royal army announced the undoubted conquest of Ross by the rebels; in Wexford, the fugitives of the latter asserted, before it happened, the total defeat of their forces by the garrison. The advantage offered was with ardour seized by General Johnson, who, to rally the discomfited troops, made the utmost exertions, aided with equal ardour by two townsmen of Ross, Devereux, a Catholic, and MacCormick, a Protestant, who had formerly been in military service. The latter rushing from post to post, conspicuous with a brazen helmet and lofty stature, might strike with the semblance of the Grecian Ajax, a man of classic reading. Led back from the bridge, the troops of Johnson assailed and drove back the confused rabble from the town, the outskirts of which were now in flames. Tumultuous destruction prevailed in the rebel host, regardless of commands or plans, and exertions arose only from individual spirit, which prompted men to volunteer for the fight, and to stimulate others by exhortation. By a column thus formed, the combat was renewed, and the royal troops twice driven from the ground; but the latter were a third time rallied; and the insurgents, dispirited by the mishap of Kelly, who was disabled by a wound, left to their opponents by a final retreat and indubitable victory. In this irregularly fought battle, which ended at two o'clock in the afternoon, and had, with the intervention of long pauses, a duration of ten hours, the loss of the garrison, whose number was 1,200, has been supposed by some to have been greater than it appeared in the official account, where it was stated at 230 in killed, wounded, and missing, of whom 90 were found dead on the scene of action. To ascertain the loss of the adverse party, is impossible. Their force on Corbet-hill is supposed to have consisted of 20,000 men, mostly unprovided with instruments of war, even serviceable pikes. Of these not more than one-half, or perhaps a fourth, descended to the combat. Doubtless the slaughter was prodigious, as they repeatedly withstood, with undaunted resolution, the discharges of musketry and cannon; and probably not less than 1,000, perhaps 1,500 fell; but I fear, as is asserted, that not a few inhabitants of the town, and refugees from the country, neither engaged in battle nor bearing arms, were numbered with the dead; since the soldiers treated as enemies alike all whom they found without military uniform. From a foresight of this, all the Protestant loyalists, unfurnished with military dress, had been commanded to surrender their arms and quit the town. Those who, by disobedience to this order, avoided the danger of being massacred by the rebels abroad, took post in some houses, and poured such a fire on the insurgents, that one of the lanes was almost filled with dead bodies. As hy cowards on both sides had false reports been propagated of a total defeat sustained by their own party; so men of this description on both sides were eager to massacre defenceless people in cold blood. The guard-house in Ross had been filled with prisoners, among whom were many loyalist refugees confined through mistake and malice. The whole would have been massacred by the runaway soldiers, if they had not been prevented by the undaunted spirit and dignified reproof of one Culliner, a quaker. Unfortunately the runaway rebels had more leisure than the soldiery of this description to perpetrate a deed of horror. In the dwelling-house and barn of Mr. King of Seullabogue, at the foot of Carrickburn mountain, a number of loyalists of both sexes, among whom were at least seven Catholics, were confined, collected from the neighbouring country as hostages for the safety of such rebels as should become prisoners to the royalists. Urging that the bearer of their flag of truce had been shot, that the prisoners of their party had been massacred at Dunlavin and Carnew, by the royal troops, and that a similar scene was now acted in Ross, a body of fugitives from the battle forced the guard, shot thirty-seven confined in the dwelling-house, and setting fire to the barn, caused all who were within it to perish in the flames. The number of the burned, stated by some at 184, is reduced by others to 80. The prime actor in this tragedy is said to have hitherto remained unaccused and unsuspected, while some have been hanged for the deed, who were at too great a distance to take any part in its instigation or execution. Struck with horror at such atrocity, and disgusted by the insolent insubordination of his troops, Harvey resigned his command, and retired to Wexford." ROSS (OLD), or ST. MARY'S OF OLD ROSS, a parish in the barony of Bantry, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of New Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 6 miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{4}$; area, 10,653 acres, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,402; in 1841, 2,571. Houses 402. The surface descends in one place to the Barrow; exhibits a diversified and beautiful outline; consists of land of a good quality for tillage, pasturage, and meadows; and is traversed by the roads from New Ross to Enniscorthy and Wexford. Lackin-hill, on the north-western border, has an altitude above sea-level of 629 feet; the site of the church has an altitude of 253 feet; and a water-level on the north-eastern border has an elevation of 249 feet. The principal hamlets are Old Ross, Mylerspart, and Moor's-cross-roads; the principal residences are Palace-house, Ballylane-house, Ballylane-cottage, Creakan-house, Erinvale, Castle-quarter, Heath-park, Springpark-house, Bushpark-house, and Robinstown-house; and the principal antiquities are Old Ross mount, the site of Old Ross castle, the site of Palace-castle, and the ruins of Goldentown-house.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of New Ross, in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £522 16s. 11d. A curate for Old Ross receives a salary of £60 4s. 7½d. The church is of unknown cost and date; and was re-roofed and repaired in 1800, by means of parochial assessment. Sitings 150; attendance 100. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated at Cushinstown, and has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tullyrath. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 276 Churchmen, 3 Protestant dissenters, and 2,171 Roman Catholics; a pay daily school at Cushinstown was usually attended by about 60 scholars; and a parochial daily school was salaried with £2 a-year from the rector, £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £5 from Lord Carey, and had on its books 10 boys and 3 girls. In 1843, a National school at Cricken was salaried with £8 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 82 boys and 48 girls.

ROSSES (THE), a wild maritime district in the north of the barony of Boyleagh, and not far from being identical with the parish of Templecrone, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by the Guindore river; it extends southward to the village of Dunglo and the little bay of Maghera; it includes the island of Rutland, and the numerous other small islands of the adjacent archipelago; and it comprises a total area of about thirty square miles.

"The district called the Rosses," says Mr. Fraser, "consists in the interior of bog and lake in almost constant alternations. The bleak surface is covered with peat, and intersected in every direction by streams issuing from the little boughs which fill every hollow. Annagerry hill, 388 feet high, near the head of the Gweedore estuary, is the principal elevation. The coast of this district, which extends from the little bay of Maghera northward to the estuary of the Gweedore, is, following generally the sinuosities, at least twenty miles in length; and, from the nature of the shores, vast accumulations of sand have been formed along the greater part of the line; and as in similar situations exposed to the fury of the Atlantic sea, the sands are continually drifting and advancing inland. The whole presents an extraordinary appearance from the numerous islets of rock and sand, smooth beaches, bays, and coves, into which the permeable surface has been formed by the ceaseless action of the heavy Atlantic waves." The district is the property of the Marquis of Conyngham; and, in spite of its singularly desolate aspect, it possesses a considerable sprinkling of population, and has begun to attract some notice from tourists.

ROSSES (UPPER AND LOWER), two mutually adjacent hamlets, in the parish of Drumecliffe, barony of Carberry, co. Sligo, Connaught. They are situated between the Pool of Sligo and the bay of Drumecliffe, 5 miles north-west by west of the town of Sligo. At Bownmore, in the vicinity, subscription races are occasionally held. Area of the hamlets, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 170; in 1841, 155. Houses 31.

ROSSINAN, a parish in the baronies of Ida and Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It lies 5½ miles north-north-west of Waterford; and is traversed by the road thence to Kilkenny. Length, south-west by southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Ida section, 1,705 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches; of the Knocktopher section, 2,628 acres, 39 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,130; in 1841, 1,183. Houses 176. Pop. of the Knocktopher section, in 1841, 811. Houses 121. A large proportion of the surface is rocky and boggy ground; and the remainder is arable and pasture land. The rivulet Blackwater flows along the western boundary. The principal residence is Ballyquin-house; and the chief hamlets are Rossinan, Rahewd, Carrickanane, Farnogue, Ballintine, and Ballyquin. The ruin of the old church stands at the hamlet of Rossinan.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILBEACON (which see), in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £60, and the rectorial for £138; and the latter are inappropriate in the vicars choral of St. Canice cathedral. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 1,145; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

ROSSINVER, a parish, 9 miles north-north-west of Manor-Hamilton, and partly in the barony of Carberry, co. Sligo, but chiefly in the barony of Rosclogher, co. Sligo, Connaught. The Leitrim section contains the village of KINLOUGH; which see. Length of the Leitrim section, west-north-westward, 13 miles; extreme breadth, 6½; area, 48,843 acres, 21 perches,—of which 4,460 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches are in Lough Melvin, and 71 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches are in small lakes. Length of the Sligo section, south by westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 3½; area, 7,932 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 13,370; in 1841, 14,841. Houses 2,555. Pop. of the Sligo section, in 1831, 1,215; in 1841, 1,275. Houses 207. Pop. of the rural districts of the Leitrim section, in 1841, 13,289. Houses 2,306. Lough Melvin lies partly on the north-east boundary, but chiefly within the north-east border of the Leitrim section; and it constitutes a principal feature to all that side of the parish. See MELVIN (LOUGH). All the portion of sea-board belonging to the county of Leitrim lies within Rossinver. See LEITRIM (COUNTY OF). Belts of good land lie along Lough Melvin and the sea, and the western and south-eastern margins of the Leitrim section of the parish; but nearly all the other vast districts of that section consist of moorish and mountainous land of a very bad and unprofitable description. Dartree mountain on the lower screen of Lough Melvin has an altitude above sea-level of 1,712 feet; a height on the southern boundary of the Leitrim section has an altitude of 1,375 feet; and a height on the western boundary of that section has an altitude of 2,007 feet. Loughs Glénade and Cloonty lie on respectively the southern and the western boundaries of the Leitrim section; the Kilcoo rivulet flows along the south-western boundary of that section to Lough Melvin; the rivulets Glénaniff, Hattoo, and Ballagh, water the south-eastern interior districts of that section within the catchment basin of Lough Melvin; the Drowes river flows partly in the north-eastern interior, but chiefly along the north-eastern boundary, from Lough Melvin to the sea; and the Duff river flows on the mutual boundary between the Leitrim and the Sligo sections. The principal hamlets in the Leitrim section are Tullaghan, Carrickmore, Carricknautiagh, West Cubacreeny, East Cubacreeny, New-Island, Forgetown, Fortview, Cloontygarry, Carrickduff, Unshinagh, Lisnagall, Derrreenavoggy, Balloor, Woodville, Lisacall, Drumnagran, Crockmahoyge, Timycullen, Drummacreehy, Ballinwillin, Drumnarevagh, Ballinlig, Cloontybane, Bolebaun, Ballygan, and Eagle. The principal seats are Wardhouse, Castle-cottage, Tint-lodge, Star-lodge, Duncarby-castle, Woodville, Garrygowly, Brookhill, Cottage-grove, and Mount-Prospect. The islands of Lough Melvin belonging to the parish are Inisheher, Inishmeen, Inishtemple, and Bushkeen. The Sligo section, to even a larger proportional extent than the Leitrim section, consists of wild, lofty, and unprofitable upland; and it has, upon its southern and its south-eastern boundaries, two summits which rise to altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,905 and 2,113 feet. The Ballaghantirrellick rivulet rises on the southern border, and runs northward through the interior to the Duff river. The only seat in the Sligo section is Hollyfield-house. The new or northern road from Sligo to Manor-Hamilton passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Vicarial tithe composition, £170; glebe, £170. Gross income, £340; nett, £290 17s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Donard in union with the curacy of Cryhelp, in the dio. of Dublin; but is resident in Rossinver. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £280; and one moiety of them is appropriated to the see of Kilmore, and the other moiety is inappropriate in Owen Wynne, Esq. of Hazlewood. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church in use at the date of the Report of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenues and Patronage, contained 450 sittings, and was of unknown date of erection. The present church contains only 280 sittings; and was quite recently built by means of contributions of £807 14s. 6d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £50 from private sources. Attendance, from 90 to 300; the fluctuation being occasioned by the summer influx of families for the purpose of sea-bathing. The Roman Catholic chapel at Lecklesher has one officiate and an attendance of 800; and the Roman Catholic chapels at Kinlough and Ballyhamreen, have jointly two officiates, and a respective attendance of 2,000 and 1,700. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 1,044, and the Roman Catholics to 13,044; a Sunday school at Kinlough was usually attended by about 38 scholars; and 17 daily schools at Ballintrellick, Rossinver, Glénaniff, Ballochameehan, Tullaghan, Gortnasella, Tully, Boylan, Kinlough, Cordiver, Corraduff, Sessmore, Wardhouse, Dubbully, Buckode, Derryduff, and Cornagee, had on their books 760 boys and 359 girls. The school at Ballintrellick was salaried with £25 and other advantages from Sir Robert Gore Booth; that at Rossinver, with £6 from the rector; that at Kinlough, with £10 from subscription, and books from the Kildare Place Society; that at Corraduff, with £2 and other advantages from Mr. Latouche; and that at Cornagee, with £3 from subscription. In 1843, one National school at Loughmarren had on its books 83 boys and 97 girls; one at Cordiver had 63 boys and 30 girls; one at Buckode had 49 boys 30 girls; and one at Tullaghan had 39 boys and 67 girls.

ROSSORY, a parish, partly in the barony of Glenawley, but chiefly in that of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The Magheraboy section contains part of the town of ENNISKILLEN: which see. Length of the parish, north-north-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Glenawley section, 2,302 acres, 34 perches,—of which 180 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches are in the river Erne and in small lakes. Area of the Magheraboy section, 5,331 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches,—of which 163 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches are in the river Erne and in small lakes, and 150 acres, 4 perches are a small district called Lurgandarragh-Beg, lying isolated within the parish of Rossory, but belonging to that of Cleeenish. Pop. of the whole parish of Rossory, in 1831, 4,338; in 1841, 3,846. Houses 650. Pop. of the Glenawley section, in 1831, 1,065; in 1841, 902. Houses 147. Pop. of the rural districts of the Magheraboy section, in 1831, 2,485; in 1841, 2,197. Houses 375. The surface extends along the left bank of the river Erne; it presents a low, flat, and meadow-like appearance; and it consists, in the aggregate, of very good land. The river Sillies runs eastward to the Erne, partly through the interior of the Glenawley section, and partly on the mutual boundary of the two sections. Lough Laragh lies on the southern boundary; Lough Rossole lies on the eastern border of the Magheraboy section; Lough Lankill lies on the mutual boundary of the two sections; and Lough Ballaghmore lies east of the centre of the Magheraboy section. The principal hamlets are Lomaghan and Clonbunniagh; and the chief rural residences are Killyhowen-cottage, Oldcastle, and Lisgoul-abbey,—the last the seat of M. Jones, Esq. The principal antiquity is the ruin of Lisgoul-abbey. An ecclesiastical establishment, most probably Culdean, was founded here in the early ages of Christianity, and is alleged to have been presided over by a St. Aid or Hugh, who was designated of Lisgovel or Lisgoul; this establishment was succeeded, in the 12th century, by an Augustinian monastery, founded by MacNoellus Mackenlef, king of Ulster, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and this second edifice having gone to decay, a third began to be erected, in a most agreeable situation, by the toparch Maguire, but, before being completed, was overwhelmed at the general dissolution of monasteries, and given to Sir John Davis. The parish of Rossory is traversed by the various roads from Enniskillen to Connaught.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £240; glebe, £136 10s. Gross income, £376 10s.; nett, £327 3s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church in use a few years ago was of unknown date, and had only 250 sittings. The present and recently-erected church was built by means of contributions of £1,460 1s. 10d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £350 from private sources. Sittings 600; attendance 200. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,232 Churchmen, 31 Presbyterians, and 1,833 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was usually attended by about 80 scholars; and 7 daily schools had on their books 245 boys and 94 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board; one, with £4 from subscription; and one was a royal endowed school, supported by a very large sum from endowments, and by fees of from £1 1s. to £8 18s. per quarter from the pupils, and producing £500 a-year, a house, and 33 acres of land to the head-master; £250 to the first assistant, £100 to the second assistant, and £400 for distribution into 10 scholarships. In 1843, the National Board had schools at Laragh and Ashwoods.

ROSS-REILLY, or ROSSERELLY, an old abbey in the parish of Killursa, barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the right bank of the Black river, and on the verge of the county, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-west by west of Headford. It was founded in the year 1498, by Lord Granard, for Franciscans of the strict observance; and was repaired by the Roman Catholics in the year 1604. "This place," says an old monasticon quoted by Dutton, "is very lonesome, encompassed on all sides with water, and is only one way accessible, and was not many years since preserved entire by the interest of the Earls of Clanricarde." The Rev. Caesar Otway, who visited the abbey in 1839, says, "It certainly is the most entire of the Irish abbeys—the walls are all standing, not a breach in any one of them. One chapel even has its flagged roof still remaining. The whole covers, I am sure, an acre and a half of ground—and every accommodation that any monastery ever had seems here to be provided. It is a great burying-place; but, luckily for it, the choir, nave, and transepts, comprising the different side chapels, are, I suppose, only considered as holy ground, and are therefore used only for sepulture, and consequently they are the only places that are dilapidated and purposely dismantled—their ornaments, as usual, all torn away. * * * The whole of this cemetery forms one immense rabbit burrow; I think I have seldom seen a warren that exhibited so many holes. In this uncouth habitation for conies, bones, skulls, and coffins lay around, that the creatures had tossed about, and by their thus rooting up, they seemed desirous to anticipate the usual short time allowed for bodies to lie entombed; and, therefore, besides the common quantity of these remains tossing all about, there was an immense heap lying outside the church, and as these bones seemed to have accumulated for ages, and as the place from the vicinity was very damp, this immense ossuorum, if I may so name it, was covered with all sorts of verdure, mosses, lichens, sedums, saxifrages, and wild strawberries just showing their fruit between jaw-bones. It was curious to see skulls like wren's nests, and thigh bones as green as cabbage-stocks; the dry bones had, as it were, assumed a new mode of existence, and again served as the bases of a new life. It really was a scene on which a person might ponder and phrenologise; and I confess no collection of human bones I ever saw interested me more—no, not even that far-famed congeries which, at Cologne, assumes to be the remains of St. Ursula's eleven thousand virgins.—The cloisters of Ross are quite perfect, as perfect as those at Muckross or Quin; but they have not the picturesque accompaniment, like those at Killarney, of a magnificent yew-tree in the centre. The dormitories, the chapter-house, the cellars and kitchens, are all, as far as walls go, perfect. There the friars, living in a low and damp situation, had need of fires, and they took care to have them. I never saw such huge fire-places. The kitchen hearth would not disgrace the largest at Oxford or Cambridge. In one of the corners of a huge apartment, which seemed to be a scullery, there is a circular excavation, cased with cut stone, too large for a well—in all likelihood a place for holding live fish, which, taken out of the adjoining river, no doubt were kept here for ready use. Altogether, this abbey seemed to have formed a little town in itself; having no entrance but the one, and its walls high and thick, it was a sort of stronghold, and, no doubt, in the lawless times before the Reformation, afforded an asylum for the weak and persecuted, as well as a sanctuary for the criminal. If any one wishes to see an Irish monastery in perfection, with all its menage, they will, before passing on to Cong, and before visiting the western high lands of Ireland, take a view of Ross-Reilly."

ROSTELLAN, a parish in the barony of Imokilly, $\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west by west of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 2,258 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,163; in 1841, 1,110. Houses 175. The surface lies on the east side of Cork Harbour, includes a beautiful little peninsula south-east of the south-eastern extremity of Great Island, and largely partakes of the magnificence of landscape, for which the general sea-board of Cork Harbour is so eminently distinguished. Rostellan-castle, the seat of the Marquis of Thomond, is delightfully situated on the peninsular part of the parish, and presents a striking object to vessels entering Cork Harbour. The ancient castle, from which the seat acquires its designation, was a residence of the Fitzgeralds, built by Robert Fitzstephen de Marisco; and, during the wars of the year 1645, it was twice assailed and captured. The present mansion was built on the site of the ancient pile, and has been considerably enlarged and improved by at least two of its most recent noble proprietors. The demesne which surrounds it is exquisite in situation, and commands an unequalled view of the animated, picturesque, and grand harbour. The grounds are well planted, display a profusion of luxuriant evergreens, and present many delightful indications of the mildness of the climate, and the fertility of the soil. An elevated terrace extends along the vicinity of the water's edge, and discloses inspiring and peculiarly attractive views of the harbour, and its shipping, its fortifications, and its brilliant and superb shores. "On this terrace," remarks Mr. Crofton Croker, "is a statue of Lord Hawke, chiefly remarkable from its position, the admiral's face being turned away from the element on which he had acquired his fame. Sir Richard Hoare, in his Irish tour, relates the following anecdote as the cause: 'Upon the defeat of the French fleet commanded by Comdars, in the year 1759, the city of Cork ordered a statue to be cast of the English Admiral Hawke, but, in its completion, some objection was made by the citizens, upon which the noble Inchiquin said that he would pay for it, which he did, and, as a rebuke, placed the admiral's figure on a pedestal with his back turned towards the ungrateful city.'" In April 1768, one of the former Earls of Inchiquin received from Queen Anne, along with many privileges, to the manor of Rostellan, a grant of a considerable portion of adjoining land which his lordship had banked from the tide. Some notice of the ancestral history of the Marquis of Thomond will be given under the word THOMOND; which see. Fairs are held at Rostellan on Feb. 2, March 25, Aug. 15, Nov. 7, and Dec. 23.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition and gross income, £288 7s. 3d.; nett, £273 1s. 5d. Patron, the Crown. Previous to the passing of the Church Temporalities Act, Rostellan rectory formed part of the benefice of Aghada. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Aghada and Gurrane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 75, and the Roman Catholics to 1,134; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the Bishop of Cloyne, and £10 from the Marquis of Thomond—had on their books 58 boys and 31 girls.

ROSTREVR, or ROSESTREVR, a small seaport and post town, and a most beautiful watering-place, in the parish of Kilbroney, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the south base of the Mourne mountains, on the north shore of the upper part of Lough Carlingford, and on the road from Newry to Kilkeel, 2 miles east of Warrenpoint, $\frac{3}{4}$ by water north of Carlingford, 7 south-east by south of Newry, $\frac{7}{8}$ west-north-west of Kilkeel, $1\frac{1}{4}$ north-east of Dundalk, and $5\frac{1}{4}$ north of Dublin. The town is delightfully situated on a gentle acclivity, which rises from a little cove of Lough Carlingford, and commands thrilling views of the woods, mountains, and waters of the lough's basin. "Behind, picturesque and broken hills screen it from the east and north; and fine oak woods fill their ravines, and climb almost to their summits; the little cove is in front of the village, opening out into the wide circular bay, with its elevated, dark, and abrupt mountain boundaries; while on either side, the village is flanked by the happiest combination of wood and lawn, copse and garden, villa and cottage." Mr. Inglis, from whom we have made this quotation, declares Rostrevor to be "one of the most beautiful spots in Ireland," and concludes his notice of it with the remark, that "nature has certainly done much for it, and art enough." Slieve-Bane, which rises immediately east of the town, has an expressive and powerful contour, attains an altitude of 1,505 feet above sea-level, is overhung on the north-east and north-north-east by far loftier and more imposing summits of the alpine mountain group of Mourne, commands a singularly extensive, varied, and magnificent expanse of landscape, and often bears the names of Rostrevor mountain and Cloghmore mountain, the former in consequence of its close adjacency to the town, and the latter from the circumstance of its bearing upon a shoulder about half-way up the ascent a huge, detached, and most singularly situated stone. See CLOGHMORE. All the immediate environs of the town are surpassingly beautiful; glens, hills, and tumulated grounds are marked by intricacy and power of feature, and by opulence and taste of sylvan and verdant dress; villas and cottages ornées, displaying every kind of rustic architecture, crown almost every lower and secondary eminence; and roads run around the mountain, and penetrate the secluded glens. The Lodge, the seat of David Ross, Esq., the proprietor of the town and the circumjacent lands, is situated on the south-eastern out-kirt of the town, and is distinguished from the smaller rural residences by the extent of its grounds and the superior munificence of its plantations. "Three miles to the east of Warrenpoint," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "is beautiful Rostrevor. There are few places in Great Britain that offer stronger temptations to visitors—who love the picturesque, enjoy the magnificence of nature, or desire tranquil and healthful retirement. Although completely open to the sea, it is approached only by mild southern breezes; the adjacent hills protect it completely on the north and east; and a promontory, covered with luxuriantly grown trees, juts between it and the west; villas, mansions, and cottages ornées surround it on all sides, wherever the mountains have left small nooks of verdure, and streamlets innumerable are rippling down into the valley from the hill sides. Under the fostering care of its owner, David Ross, Esq., the village has, within the last few years, grown to the magnitude and importance of a town; its natural beauties have been appreciated—it seems the very temple of health—and persons from all the northern and midland counties of Ireland have made it their place of residence—at least for a season. Consequently, neat, clean, and well-built cottages have sprung up along the banks of the bay, which are furnished for and let to lodgers. It is difficult to conceive a spot that looks more happy and prospering than this—so beautifully situated, nestling at the foot of a mighty mountain, and bordering upon the ocean, into which its gardens absolutely run." A delightful walk, completely covered over by trees, conducts from the quay for nearly a mile along the margin of the bay, giving to view at almost every step some prospect which had not previously challenged the stranger's attention. Nearly in the centre of the town stands the present parish-church of Kilbroney; a little way up the hill are a neat schoolhouse, and the Roman Catholic chapel,—the latter commanding a charming view of the town; and about a mile to the north-north-east, on the roads to Castlewellsan and Rathfriland, are a large bleaching-mill and the ruins of the old church of Kilbroney. About $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile south-west of the town, on the point of a small peninsula or promontory, stands a handsome and very conspicuous obelisk, to the memory of the late General Ross. It is situated in the midst of a field, which is enclosed by a deep fosse and embankment; it consists of cut stone, and rests on a base, which forms a number of steps composed of the same material; and it bears on its four sides, the record of the various engagements in which the General acted a distinguished part, and particularly of that in which he lost his life. In the vicinity are the ruins of an old ivy-mantled castle, said to have been built by one of the lords of Iveagh, but at so remote a period, or in such circumstances of comparative obscurity, that the very personal name of its founder has become lost to history. The town—or rather, in the first instance, the castle, which originally bore the appellation of Castle-Rory—is said to have acquired its name in honour of the marriage of the heiress of Sir Marmaduke Whitchurch to Viscount Dungannon, the lady's own name being Rose, and the patronymic of her husband being Trevor; and the castle was, at one time, the seat of the Viscounts Dungannon, and continued, till its demolition, to bear the name of Rose-Trevor. The town carries on no trade, beyond the supply of its own immediate neighbourhood; yet a few fishing-boats seek shelter at the small quay, and an occasional sloop comes up with coals. Fairs are held in the months of Feb., April, June, Aug., Sept., Nov., and Dec.; but the days for holding them vary every year. The principal rural residences within a mile of the town are Arnos-Vale, Richmond, Rosetta, Scapoint-cottage, Carpenham, Corregbawn, Green-park, the Vicarage-house, Fairy-Hill, Craigfield, and the Lodge. Area of the town, 58 acres. Pop., in 1831, 990; in 1841, 683. Houses 118. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 24; in manufactures and trade, 74; in other pursuits, 54. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 16; on the directing of labour, 74; on their own manual labour, 53; on means not specified, 9.

ROSTRUNK, a small island in the parish and barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies in Clew bay, 2 or 3 perches from the north shore of that bay, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Newport-Pratt. It measures about 3 furlongs in length, contains a coast-guard station, and has on its north-east side a well-sheltered harbour.

ROUGHAN, a lake in the southern district of the parish of Donagherry, 2 miles south-west by south of Stewartstown, barony of Dunganannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It measures about half-a-mile in length, and has, on its south-west side, the demesne of Roughan-castle.

ROUGHFORT, a village in the parish of Templepatrick, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands a little south of the road from Belfast to Antrim. Fairs are held on May 31 and Nov. 29. Pop., in 1831, 195. Houses 29.

ROUGHTY (THE), a rivulet of the county of Kerry, Munster. It has its whole course within the barony of Glanerought; and, in consequence of tracking a glen somewhat centrally through that district, gave occasion for the name of Glanerought. It rises on the eastern verge of the barony, 6 miles west by north of Inchigeelagh, and runs $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles northward, 2 north-westward, and 7 west-south-westward, to the head of the Kenmare estuary, a little above the town of Kenmare. One side of the glen or vale traversed by the stream has a fine limestone soil, is the best land in the barony, and presents a well-planted and beautifully improved appearance.

ROUNDFORT, a hamlet in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of Kilmairno, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of Hollymount, on the road thence to Tuam. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel; and in its vicinity are the residences of Roundfort-cottage, Mount-Jennings, Bushfield, Mountview, Cloucockmick, and Carravilla. Pop. not specially returned.

ROUNDHILL, a village in the parish of Ballymodan, south-western vicinity of the town of Bandon, barony of Kinnalea, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 25 acres. Pop., in 1841, 254. Houses 40.

ROUNDSTONE, a bay or natural harbour in the parish of Moyrus, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It is properly the western wing or branch of BIRTERHUY BAY [which see]; and consists of the channel which commences at the island of Innislacken, and extends 3 miles northward, with a maximum breadth of 1 mile, between the island of Innisnee and the mainland. The entrance is sheltered from the south-west storms by Innislacken; the interior is well sheltered by circumjacent grounds from most winds which blow; the harbour has a stretch of nearly 3 miles of clear, good ground, with from 2 to 5 fathoms of water; and the upper end of the sound, or that which connects with the other ramifications of Birterhuy bay, is fordable at low water, but rocky. The east side of Innislacken offers better access to the harbour than the west side.

ROUNDSTONE, a sea-port village in the parish of Moyrus, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the west shore of Roundstone bay, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Innislacken, 8 miles south-east of Clifden, 25 miles west of Oughterard, and

144 miles west of Dublin. The road to it from Galway—or, in fact, from nearly all the world except from Clifden—deflects from the Galway and Clifden road about 8 miles west of the Halfway-house, and goes past Mr. Martin's fine mountain demesne of Ballinahinch-castle. The mountain Urrisbeg, whose summit has an altitude of 987 feet above sea-level, immediately overhangs the west or landward side of the village, and possesses great interest both in the rareness of its flora, and in the singularity of its panoramic prospect. "I ascended Urrisbeg," says Mr. Inglis, "the evening after my arrival in Roundstone. There is a mountain-path about half-way up; and the remainder of the ascent is through heathy slopes and over rocks, with scarcely any bog-land intervening. Cunnemara is remarkable for the variety of flowers and plants which grow wild upon its mountains. I gathered on Urrisbeg many very beautiful, and some of them rare, wild flowers: amongst others, the Irish heath, or bell-heather; the beautifully pink-streaked water pimpernel; the eye-bright, with its little yellow eye; the bright tinted tormentilla; gentiana; the red bear-berry; London-pride, though not then in flower; innumerable heaths,—amongst others, the erica limeria, adiantum, capillus, Veneris, or maiden hair; the bilberry, dwarf juniper; the silver leaf, &c. The Mediterranean heath (erica Mediteranea), is also found on these mountains; as well as the Menziesia polifolia. The view from the summit of Urrisbeg is more singular than beautiful. Here, Cunnemara is perceived to be truly that which its name denotes,—'bays of the sea.' The whole western coast of Cunnemara is laid open with its innumerable bays and inlets; but the most striking and singular part of the view is that to the north, over the districts called Urrisbeg and Urrismore. These are wide level districts spotted by an almost uncountable number of lakes; and mostly entirely uncultivated and uninhabited. I endeavoured, from my elevated position, to reckon the number of lakes; and succeeded in counting upwards of 160. Shoulders of the mountain, however, shut out from the view some of the nearer parts of the plains; and other parts were too distant to allow any very accurate observation; so that I have no doubt there may be 300 lakes, great and small, in this wild and very singular district. Several of the lakes have islands upon them; and by the aid of a good telescope, which I carried with me, I perceived that many of these islands were wooded." The author of the 'Angler in Ireland' speaks, in the following enthusiastic terms, of the scenery of the village and its vicinity:—"The white cottages of Roundstone, clustering round the base of the hill of the same name, the broken rocky shores that on all sides encircle the bay, the gigantic arms that it extends deep into the land, the fishing-boats idly rocking in the little port, with the many others skimming across the blue water in every direction, and, beyond and above all, the lofty chain of the Twelve Pins piercing far into the azure vault of heaven, unstained by a single cloud,—these several objects of beauty alternately engaged my eye and charmed my mind, as our tiny frigate shot across the bosom of this fine harbour."—"The village of Roundstone is as yet only about 20 years old; and it was built by the late Alexander Nimmo, on lands which he had leased from the proprietor, Mr. Martin of Ballinahinch. But though hitherto prosperous, and ranking as the seat of population in the great district of Cunnemara, next in bulk to Clifden and Oughterard, it has been pronounced by many intelligent persons to be built so ineligibly as to site that it will never, in any probability, rise to any great importance. It contains a temporary place of worship in connection with the Established church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a monastery, a National school, and a small court-house. The pier at the town was begun to be built by day-labour in 1822, and was, in that season, raised to spring-tide level, in rough granite; and being situated within Slyne Head, at a convenient place for some of the districts of Connemara to communicate with Galway, it immediately became the scene of some business in curing herrings, and shipping turf and kelp. The quay is now a wharf along the side of a bight of 150 feet, with a jetty of 60 feet long, at the head of which there is 5 feet of water; and about 8 or 10 years ago, it was frequented by 30 sailing boats, averaging 10 tons, and by 40 rowing boats, of each 4 tons. The principal trade consists in the exporting of turf, sea-weed, and corn to Galway and the ports of Clare. Fairs are held on June 29 and Oct. 20. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Thursday of every month. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 396. Houses 63. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 26; in manufactures and trade, 39; in other pursuits, 8. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 4; on the directing of labour, 38; on their own manual labour, 28; on means not specified, 3.

ROUNDTOWN, a large, beautiful, and pleasantly situated village, in the parish of Rathfarnham, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Rathfarnham, 2 or 3 furlongs north of the river Dodder, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile north of Rathfarnham, and $\frac{1}{4}$ miles south of Dublin-castle. It acquires its name from having been originally built in the form of a circle. It is a remarkably neat place in itself; and it rejoices in singularly opulent and ornate environs. Within a mile of it are the seats of Bessborough, Piermont, St. John's, Spireview, Tranquilla, Melrose - villa, Ashfield, Garville, Glenpool, Elmville, Mount-Jaromet, Mount-Tullant, Mount-Arjos, Springfield, Crumlin-house, Crumlin-cottage, Brookland, Kimmage-house, Terenure-house, Cypress-grove, Beaufort, Fonthill-abbey, Barton-lodge, Rathfarnham-castle, Newtown-house, Newtown-cottage, Westbourne, Mountainview, Rathgar-house, Woodpark, Dartry, Fortfield, Rathmines - castle, and Milltown-park. Area, 41 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,048. Houses 172. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 86; in manufactures and trade, 58; in other pursuits, 56. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 11; on the directing of labour, 80; on their own manual labour, 83; on means not specified, 16.

ROUNDWOOD, or TOGHER, a village in the parish of Derralossory, barony of north Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Glendalough, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Annamoe, 5 south-west by west of Newtown-Mount-Kennedy, 5 north-east by north of Glendalough, 8 south by west of Enniskerry, and 18 south of Dublin. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel, a police station, and two inns; and within a mile of it are the parochial church of Derralossory, and the seats of Roundwood-lodge, Roundwood-park, Diamond-hill-house, Oldtown, Fairview, and Lakeview. The inns of the village are the usual halting-place and temporary home of visitors to Glendalough; and they afford excellent accommodation, and supply tourists with either car, post-chaise, or horse. The situation is a good key-post both for tourists and for anglers. The immediate environs are part of an extensive table-land, lying at about 600 feet of altitude above the level of the sea; two heights rise up a little to the west, the one attaining an altitude of 1,581 feet above sea-level, and both screening the east side of Lough Dan; the Sugarloaf mountain is seen away to the north, but appears deprived of half its altitude in consequence of the comparative loftiness of the place whence it is beheld; and the vale of the Vartry river, which passes near the eastern skirt of the village, is seen extending away to the south-east till it is lost in the distance. The Vartry is here an excellent trouting stream; and within $\frac{1}{4}$ mile are the two lakes, Dan and Tay. Fairs are held in the village on Jan. 3, March 14, April 12, May 25, June 21, July 26, Aug. 23, Sept. 19, and Nov. 8. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 127. Houses 18.

ROUTE, the seat of a presbytery in the north-west of the county of Autrim. The presbytery belongs to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Ireland, exercises inspection over 17 congregations, and meets on the second Tuesday of May and Oct., and on the last Tuesday of Jan. and July. Its congregations are three in Ballymonee, two in Kilraughts, and twelve in respectively Ramoon, Roseyards, Ardmoey, Garryduff, Billy, Toberkeigh, Dervock, Ballycastle, Croaghmore, Drumreagh, Ballyweany, and Dunloy.

ROWER, or ROAR, or THE ROWER, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Ida, $\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-east of Innistogue, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, southward, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 10,758 acres, 20 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,589; in 1841, 3,776. Houses 522. The parish lies on the eastern border of the county, and is peninsulated between the river Barrow on the east and south-east, the rivulet Clodiagh on the west, and the river Nore on the west and south-west; and it, of course, descends to the confluence of the Barrow and the Nore, a little above New Ross. Part of the Mount Brandon group of mountains occupies the extreme north-west, to the extent of $\frac{1}{2}$ mile by $\frac{1}{4}$; and it lifts one summit on the northern boundary to the altitude of 1,304 feet above sea-level, and another in the interior to the altitude of 1,008 feet. The rest of the surface is free from bog, and consists of good land, fit for the purposes of tillage, pasture, and planting. The principal seats are Ringwood-house, Russeltown-house, Rathnagaddon-house, and Coolnamuck-house. The road from Dublin to New Ross, by way of Carlow, Borris, and Graignamanagh, passes southward through the interior; and the hamlet of Rower stands on this road $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north of New Ross, and contains a National school, a Roman Catholic chapel, and the parish-church,—the last upon a site of 384 feet of altitude above sea-level. The chief of the other hamlets are Ballylogue, Tintine, Corranroe, Cullentragh, Ballinvarry, and Cullaun. Two towers stand on the banks of the Barrow, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-east of the village of Rower, and closely adjacent to the junction-point of the counties of Kilkenny, Carlow, and Wexford, on sites of respectively 201 and 254 feet of altitude above sea-level. The principal antiquities are the site of a church, the site of Clogaralt-castle, and the ruins of Coolhill-castle. The river Barrow is tidal over all its contact with the parish, but ceases to be tidal a few yards above.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition and gross income, £560; nett, £506 13s. 4jd. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Inchiholohan in the dio. of Ossory, and is resident in that benefice. A curate for Rower receives a salary of £90. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 200; attendance 52. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Innistigue. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 84, and the Roman Catholics to 3,503; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 26 children; and 3 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from the National Board, and one was in connection with the Kildare Place Society, and was salaried with £12 a-year from the rector—had on their books 115 boys and 70 girls.

ROY, an island half-a-mile long in Mulroy bay, 1 mile north of Carrickart, parish of Menagh, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster.

ROYAL CANAL (THE), an inland navigation through the counties of Dublin, Meath, Kildare, Westmeath, and Longford, Leinster. It connects the river Liffey at the city of Dublin, with the river Shannon at Richmond Harbour or Tarmonbarry; measures 72 miles in length; proceeds in the general direction of west by north; and, at 4½ miles from its western terminus, sends off a branch of nearly 4 miles in length to the town of Longford. It commences in the middle of the North Wall, ¼ a mile west of the lighthouse; and proceeds half a statute mile northward, 650 yards north-westward, and 1 mile west-north-westward to a junction with a branch of ¾ of a mile in length, which comes up northward from the City Basin, in the vicinity of King's Inns, the Linen-hall, and the Richmond Penitentiary; and it then leaves the outskirts of Dublin, and proceeds to the Shannon, touching or nearly approaching, in its progress, the villages and towns of Blanchardstown, Castleknock, Leixlip, Maynooth, Killock, Courtown, Knocknatulla, Clooncurry, Enfield, Johnstown-bridge, Cadamstown, Ballynadrummy, Longwood, Clonard, Rathwire, Killucan, Mullingar, Ballymacarraig, Abbeyshrule, Taghshinny, Ballymahon, Barrykeenagh, Corlea, Killashee, and Cloondara. The summit-level of the canal is 322 feet above the level of the eastern terminus in the Liffey, and 191 feet above the level of the western terminus in the Shannon; and its rate of lockage is, therefore, 7½ feet per mile. The number of locks are a tide-lock at the Liffey, 11 double ascending-locks, 14 single ascending-locks, and 21 descending-locks. The total cost of constructing it was £1,421,954 13s. 1d.; and the cost per mile, £19,749 7s. 6d. But a distance of 25 miles, from Coolnahoy to the Shannon, was executed wholly at the public expense; and the sum actually applied to the execution of the works was, in total, £776,213 1s. 11d., or per mile £10,780. The original company failed, and were authoritatively superseded by another and a public body; and the real items of the total cost of the navigation were as follow:—

The original stock of the late Royal Canal Company amounted nominally to £300,000, for which they issued stock debentures,—net proceeds of which received in cash,	177,264	10	0
Parliamentary grants at different periods from 1791 to 1798,	91,123	13	3
Grant from the funds at the disposal of the Directors, General in 1801, under an agreement with them,	96,868	7	10
Cost of executing the canal from Coolnahoy to Richmond Harbour, wholly at the public expense,	200,000	0	0
Amount of debt created by the late company, and which forms the stock of the new Royal Canal company, as directed by parliament,	962,000	0	0
	£1,421,254	13	1

The Royal Canal is a monstrous, practical blunder; it began in absurdity; and, till the dissolution of the late company, its affairs were conducted in error. "At 35 miles' distance from Dublin—after having overcome 322 feet of lockage,* and other works of great difficulty, such as the excavation through the quarries of Carpenterstown, the embankment and aqueduct across the Rye river, the cutting through the bog of Cappagh, &c., it is but 8 miles at right angles to it, distant from the Grand Canal; and at many places not more than 4 miles, so that these two great canals, for more than half the length of each westward of the metropolis, are performing little more than the work of one, and hence the unproductiveness of both. Had the western branch of the Grand Canal entered the Shannon at Athlone, it would have commanded the trade of the Middle, Upper, and Lower Shannon; two-thirds of the gross income of the Royal Canal would, in that case, have fallen into the receipts of the Grand Canal company; as the cost of management and maintenance of one of the parallel lines would have been avoided; a choice of departure, at any required point of elevation, for a line of divergence northward, would be had; and the monies expended by the Royal Canal company in attaining to such height, without any comparatively beneficial object; and the sums subsequently expended on the completion of this very unproductive work, would, under skilful management, have been sufficient to open lines of communication, by inland navigation, between the main trunk of the Grand Canal, and the ports of Ballyshannon, Derry, Coleraine, Belfast, Newry, Dundalk, and Drogheda; connecting these ports and the principal towns in the interior on one side; whilst the country south of the supposed trunk would lie open to the enterprise of the Grand Canal company, whose means would, had such an arrangement been made, enabled them to extend the benefits of water conveyance to districts far south of their present establishments." The stages on the canal, together with the distance of each in statute miles from Dublin, are Clonsilla, 8; Rye Aqueduct, 11; Maynooth, 13; Killock, 19; Ferns, 22; Newcastle, 27; Moyvally, 31; Boyne Aqueduct, 33; Hill of Down, 36; Thomastown, 42; Down's-bridge, 47; Mullingar, 52; Coolnahoy, 59; Ballinacraggy, 64; Abbeyshrule, 76; Toome-bridge, 74; Ballymahon, 75; Tarlickeen, 78; Keenagh, 81; Junction, 85; and Longford, 90. The total receipts of the canal for passengers amounted, in 1834, to £6,209 11s. 10d.; in 1835, to £6,898 18s. 1d.; and, in 1836, to £7,468 8s. 3½d. The total receipts for carriage of parcels amounted, in 1834, to £403 7s. 1½d.; in 1835, to £448 13s. 8½d.; and, in 1836, to £518 15s. 4d. The total receipts from all sources amounted, in 1834, to £24,000 0s. 11d.; in 1835, to £24,082 9s. 1d.; and, in 1836, to £25,148 19s. 7d. The total expenditure amounted, in 1834, to £11,376 10s.; in 1835, to £10,740 16s. 9d.; and, in 1836, to £11,912 2s. 10d.

ROYAL OAK, a village in the parish of Killinane, barony of West Idrone, co. Carlow, Leinster. It stands on the right bank of the river Barrow, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Kilkenny, 1 mile west of Bagnalstown, and 2 miles south of Leighlin-bridge. Adjacent to it on the east is Malcomville, the seat of Capt. Mulholland; and in its north-western vicinity is Clorusk Moat, 226 feet in altitude. Area of the village, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 428; in 1841, 233. Houses 51.

ROYSLEA. See ROSLEA.

RUSCAR, a chapelry in the parish of Innismac-saint, 2½ miles east by south of Belleek, barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The church is situated at the efflux of the river Erne from Lower

* Every 10 feet of lockage costs about £2,300, under common circumstances.

Lough Erne, and on the road from Enniskillen to Ballyshannon; and adjacent to it on the north is the mansion of Ruscarr.

RUSH, a shoal, off the coast of the barony of Bal-laghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. It commences in the vicinity of Glasarrick Point, and extends 3½ miles to the south.

RUSH, a small sea-port and market town, in the parish of Lusk, barony of East Balthorey, co. Dublin, Leinster. It is situated on the coast, 1½ mile north-north-east of the entrance of Rogerstown or Portrane estuary, 1½ east of the transit of the Dublin and Drogheda railway, 2½ north-west of Lambay Island, 2½ east of the village of Lusk, 3½ south of Skerries, 6 north-east of Swords, and 13 north-north-east of Dublin. The surrounding country, though light and sandy in soil, is fertile, and produces no inconsiderable quantity of the early potatoes sent to the market of Dublin. The coast to the east and south-east, or on the two sides facing the Irish sea, is bluff and rocky; but on the south-east, or side facing the entrance of Rogerstown estuary, is low, sandy, and alternately broad beach and tidal water. A martello-tower surmounts the south-eastern extremity, toward Lambay Island, on a site of 133 feet above sea-level; and another martello-tower stands 1½ mile to the north, on a site of 56 feet in altitude. One coast-guard station adjoins the north side of the southern martello-tower; and another is situated on the north shore of Rogerstown estuary. Two seats are in the vicinity, Kenure-Park, and Rush-house; the former, the residence of Sir W. Palmer, Bart., and the latter, a handsome mansion, and the property of the Palmer family, proprietors of the town. The church of St. Meehin stands also in the vicinity; and contains a large tomb, adorned with a coat of armour, and bearing an inscription to the memory of George, the fourth Baron of Strabane. From the time of Edward I. till the year 1641, the fee of the manor of Rush was vested in the house of Ormond; subsequently to that date, the manor belonged to the family of Echlin; and about the middle of last century, it was sold by Sir Robert Echlin, Bart., to Roger Palmer, Esq., of Palmerstown in the county of Mayo. Luke Ryan, who acquired so great notoriety during the American war, as commander of the Black Prince privateer under the French government, who unlawfully acquired and unlawfully lost a fortune of £70,000, who was four times condemned as a pirate and ordered for execution at the Old Bailey, and as often obtained a reprieve, and who eventually died in the King's Bench prison, where he lay incarcerated for a debt of £200, was a native of Rush. The town consists principally of a main street, about a mile in length, extending westward or inland from the coast; and of a subordinate or suburban and very partially edificed street, extending southward from the western part of the former to the vicinity of the Rogerstown estuary. It contains a temporary place of worship belonging to the Established church, a Roman Catholic chapel, some schools, and a constabulary barrack. Fairs are held on May 1, and Sept. 29. The town was at one time famed for the curing of ling, and the extensive prosecution of general fisheries; but, in consequence of the partial choking up of Rush harbour, and of the superior activity of the fishermen of Skerries, the fisheries of Rush have almost ceased. The small harbour of Rush possesses some shelter from northerly winds, behind one of the ledges of rock which abound upon the coast; but it is a dry harbour; and wharves cannot get round the pier-head until half-flood; and should the wind blow hard from the east, they are liable to be wrecked, and are obliged to haul up close to the ground, and in consequence frequently get scraped. The protecting ledge of rock has been heightened by a slight breakwater, built by the fishermen, but not sufficiently to keep off the sea at high-water of spring tides. The pier was erected by the late Sir Robert Echlin; and admits only small craft. About 10 years ago, 18 good wherries belonged to the harbour, and paid each £3 3s. a-year toward supporting the pier. Coal vessels pay 1d. per ton. Area of the town, 162 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,144; in 1841, 1,603. Houses 327. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 152; in manufactures and trade, 146; in other pursuits, 53. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 87; on their own manual labour, 219; on means not specified, 36.

RUSH-HALL, a bog in the parish of Offelane, barony of Upperwoods, 2 miles south-west of Mount-rath, Queen's co., Leinster. Length, west-south-westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 5 furlongs; area, 623 acres. It lies from 20 perches to 3 furlongs south of the river Nore; and is divided by a tiny vale tolerably firm at each side, and traversed by a small affluent of the Nore. It has a mean elevation of 50 feet above the nearest parts of the Nore, and a maximum and minimum elevation of respectively 373½ and 345½ feet above the level of the sea. Its greatest depth is 31 feet; and its average depth is 21 feet. The bill of Rush screens its south side, and is composed principally of limestone rock. Estimated cost of reclaiming the bog, £653 15s. 4d.

RUSSAGH, co. Meath. See CLONABRENT.

RUSSAGH, a parish in the barony of Moygoish, 2½ miles north-west of Ballinalack, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 1; area, 2,568 acres, 2 roads, 19 perches,—of which 118 acres, 1 road, 32 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 779; in 1841, 665. Houses 101. A considerable part of the surface is bog; and the remainder is good land. The river Imy describes the south-eastern boundary; the rivulet Kiffey flows along the north-eastern boundary; and Lough Garr lies in the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithes composition, £33 15s.; glebe, £21 14s. Gross income, £55 9s.; nett, £51 18s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiarycuracy of the adjoining parish of Street. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £52 10s.; and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Westmeath. A private house is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 770; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Rathaspeck. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 74, and the Roman Catholics to 711; a Roman Catholic Sunday School was usually attended by about 70 scholars; and a pay daily school had on its books 63 boys and 22 girls.

RUSSBOROUGH, the superb demesne of the Earl of Milltown, in the parish of Burgage, barony of Lower Talbotstown, 2½ miles south-west of Blessington, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The mansion is wholly built of cut stone, after designs by the celebrated architect, Mr. Cassels; and it is regarded as one of the most noble residences, and one of the best specimens of Grecian architecture, in the rural districts of the kingdom. The front is singularly magnificent and imposing; and, inclusive of the entrance to the offices, forms a facade of about 700 feet in length. The building "consists of a centre, connected with wings by colonnades of the Ionic order, behind which, in twelve niches, rest statues of heathen deities. On the left are Jupiter, Ceres, Hercules, Bacchus, Venus, and Saturn; and on the right, Diana, a dancing Faun, Tragedy, Comedy, Mercury, and Apollo. Upon the balustrade, on each side of the steps in front, are large lions supporting heraldic shields; and on the upper pedestals are superb Grecian urns." The collection of paintings which adorn the rooms is rich and tasteful, and includes, among other choice specimens, several fine landscapes by Salvator Rosa, two portraits by Vandyke, and three peculiarly excellent caricatures by Sir Joshua Reynolds. The immediate site of the mansion is a large artificial platform; the grounds immediately above are a series of artificial terraces, formed with enormous labour; and the view from the grand entrance embraces a large, symmetrically composed, and brilliantly tinted natural picture,—the fore-ground rich, the middle-ground varied, and the perspective curved off in an imposing mountain sky-line.

RUTLAND, a hamlet in the parish of Urglin, barony of Carlow, 3 miles east by north of the town of Carlow, co. Carlow, Leinster. It contains Urglin church; and closely adjacent to it are Rutland-house and Rutland-ledge. Pop. not specially returned.

RUTLAND-ISLAND, or INNISMACADURN, an island in the parish of Templecrone, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies 3 furlongs west of the nearest part of the mainland, 5 furlongs east of North Arran, and 3½ miles north-west of Dunglo. Its length, south-south-eastward, is about 1 mile; and its breadth is about 5 furlongs. It is, to a considerable extent, unproductive and covered with blowing sand; it is too small to produce sufficient food for its inhabitants; and it is so comparatively inaccessible by land that it could never become the site of a market for the supply of the adjacent country; yet it possesses much interest as the projected and unsuccessfully attempted site of a fishing-town and a very large fishing establishment. About the year 1790, when herrings had for a succession of seasons appeared in very abundant shoals off the Rosses, a large sum of money, public as well as private, was expended, partly in making quays, yards, and other works connected with shipping, and chiefly in building better houses than then existed for accommodating families who were employed in the herring fishery. Of the houses at that time built, there existed, a few years ago, an excellent but unoccupied and partly dilapidated inn, a custom-house, a surveyor's house, 6 or 7 other good houses in good order in one street, two large and well-preserved stores and 16 good and occupied dwelling-houses in another street, and a few other structures of various character, and adapted to various uses. The quay on the east side of the island was then getting out of repair, but was capable of being restored for about £100. The harbour consists of the narrow channel between the quay of Rutland and the islands of Inniscree and Eddernish, and has a depth of 6 or 7 fathoms, and abrupt and rocky shores.

RYE (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Meath and Kildare, Leinster. It rises on the western border of the barony of Upper Deece, and flows about 10 miles east-south-eastward, partly within Meath, partly within Kildare, and partly on the mutual boundary of these counties, to the Liffey, at Leixlip. A very long and somewhat stupendous aqueduct carries the Royal Canal across the valley of the Rye.

RYECOURT, a demesne in the barony of East Muskerry, 7 miles south-east by east of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated on the river Bride, and has long been the residence of the family of Rye, from whom it has its name. Dr. Smith, writing three-fourths of a century ago, says, "Ryecourt is an handsome house, and improvement of the late ingenious Col. George Rye, and now inhabited by his son. Besides good gardens and orchards, Col. Rye raised and planted many thousands of oaks and other forest trees, within a few years, and was a great improver in several branches of agriculture. In the gardens, are some arbutus trees which bear fruit."

RYNAGH. See REYNAGH.

RYNN (LOUGH), a lake in the parishes of Mohill and Cloone, from 1½ to 3½ miles south of the town of Mohill, barony of Mohill, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It extends 2½ miles south by eastward, measures 3½ furlongs in extreme breadth, and has a superficial elevation above sea-level of 137 feet. It is one of the largest and least tame of the multitudinous little lakes which dapple the surface of the southern half of the county; and its shores rise, in some places, to a considerable elevation, and are beautified with the demesnes of Rynn-castle, the Earl of Leitrim,—Clooncahir, Sir M. G. Crofton, Bart.,—Lakefield, Duke Crofton, Esq.,—and Drumard, T. B. Jones, Esq.

SADDLE-HEAD, a cape, at the north-west extremity of the island of Achill, 3½ miles north-east of Achill-Head, barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It has an altitude of 512 feet above sea-level; and it terminates a series of lofty and picturesque headlands. The walk hence, along the coast to Achill-Head, commands a succession of very romantic and sublime scenes.

SAGGARD, or TASSAGGARD, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of New-castle, 3 miles south-south-west of Clondalkin, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length of the main body, south by westward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 1½. Length of a detached district, lying ¼ mile south-west of the main body, ¼ of a mile; breadth, ¼. Area of the whole, 4,453 acres, 12 perches; of the detached districts, 452 acres, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,673; in 1841, 1,646. Houses 267. The southern district is a picturesque portion of the Dublin mountains, ploughed by a picturesque defile, called the Glen of Saggard. A hill which is partly within the main body of the parish, but which lifts its summit within the district of Rathcroole, which separates the main body from the detached section, bears the name of Saggard Hill, and has an altitude of 1,308 feet above sea-level; and another hill on the western boundary of the main body, has an altitude of 1,008 feet. The rivulet Slade enters the parish at an elevation of about 800 feet above sea-level, and, after careering rapidly down the Glen of Saggard, waters the rich and champaign northern district of the parish, in the direction of Clondalkin. The principal seat is Saggard-house; and the principal antiquities are the ruins of a church and a castle. The road from Dublin to Blessington passes up the Glen of Saggard, and commands there a view of some romantic close scenery. The village of Saggard stands on this road, 1 mile east of Rathcoole, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Dublin; and it contains a Roman Catholic chapel, a National school, a fair-green, two grave-yards, the ruins of a castle, and the site of a church, which is alleged to have been founded in the 7th century by St. Moscare. Fairs are held on the Thursday after Trinity-Sunday, Oct. 10, and Nov. 8. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 266; in 1841, 260. Houses 44.—This parish is a wholly appropriate and sinecure rectory, in the dio. of Dublin. One part of the tithes, not separately reported on, belongs to the dean of St. Patrick's cathedral; and another part, compounded for £163, belongs to the prebendary of Saggard or Tassaggard. Those of the parishioners who belong to the Establishment attend the church of Rathcoole. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Newcastle. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 29 Churchmen, 7 Presbyterians, 6 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,631 Roman Catholics; and a daily school was partly supported by collections, and was attended by about 60 scholars in winter, and about 100 in summer.

SAINT-BOODIN'S, the seat of an ancient ecclesiastical establishment, in the parish of Boystown, barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It occurs in a deep mountain-glen, on the road from Blessington to Glendalough; and it still possesses St. Boodin's Well, and the ruins of St. Boodin's church,—the latter called Temple-Boodin.

SAINT-BRAUGH'S, a quondam chapelry in the parish of Rosslare, barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. The grave-yard and the ruins of the chapel still exist on the south shore of Wexford Harbour, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles by water south-south-west of the town of Wexford.

SAINT-BRENDAN'S, an island in the parish of Ballinacourty, barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. It is situated at the head of Galway bay, in the immediate vicinity of Ardry-Point, and 3 miles south-south-east of the town of Galway. It is a rocky pendicle of land, nearly a mile in length, but of very inconsiderable breadth, and extending from east to west, to a termination in a culminating point called Earl's Rock.

SAINT-BRENDAN'S, a quondam chapelry, and the seat of some monastic buildings, in the island of Inishglora, due west of Binghamstown, parish of Kilmore-Eriss, barony of Eriss, co. Mayo, Connaught. "Inishglora," says Mr. Fraser, "contains a celebrated burial-place, and the remnants of St. Brendan's chapel, which contains a rude statue of the saint, the nursery of Templenanian, the monastery of Templenanter, a holy well, &c. All these, which are said to have been built by St. Brendan, who flourished at a very remote period, must originally have been poor, small, rude structures."

SAINTFIELD, or TULLAGHANOEVE, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Upper Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. Length, south-south-eastward, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 13,333 acres, 2 roods, 26 perches,—of which 166 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,154; in 1841, 7,156. Houses 1,307. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 6,101; in 1841, 6,247. Houses 1,141. The whole of the surface, excepting about a twentieth part, consists of arable land; and its average annual value per acre is about 20s. The state of agriculture has been much improved, and is now tolerably fair. Loughs Long, Derry, Creery, Boagh, and Mun, lie upon the parochial boundaries. The principal mansion is Saintfield-house, the handsome seat of N. Price, Esq., the proprietor of the greater part of the parish, situated in a beautiful demesne, about a mile north of the town. The interior is traversed by the road from Belfast to Downpatrick, by that from Lisburn to Killyleagh, and by that from Ballinabinech to Newtown-Ardes.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Vicarial tithe composition, £280 16s. 2d.; glebe, £25 6s. 3d. Gross income, £306 2s. 5d.; nett, £289 1s. 8d. Patron, alternately Viscount Bangor and the Earl of Carrick. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £331 15s. 11d.; and about two-thirds of them are impropriate in the Earl of Bangor, while the remainder are impropriate in N. Price, Esq.; but these tithes arise from little more than one-half of the parish, the rectorial tithes of the remainder of the parish not being leviable. The church is of unknown date and cost. Sittings 250; attendance, from 60 to 120. A meeting-house of Scotch Seceders has an attendance of from 380 to 400. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, the one formerly Secessional, and the other formerly of the Synod of Ulster, have an attendance of respectively from 350 to 450, and from 650 to 750. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 250. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 597 Churchmen, 5,621 Presbyterians, and 1,091 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools at Saintfield, and 8 at Lessons, Doran's-Rocks, Ballyknockan, Donaghmore, Lisdolan, Dromalig, Drumnacconnell, and Tullywest, were usually attended by about 762 scholars; and 18 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £10 a-year from a local committee, one with £12 from the National Board, one with £1 3s. from the London Hibernian Society, one with £20 from subscription, one with £5 from the London Hibernian Society, one with £10 from the National Board, and one with £6 10s. from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 656 boys and 458 girls. In 1843, the National Board had 6 daily schools at respectively Carrickmanon, Tonaghmore, Laggygowan, Saintfield, Tullywest, and Lessons.

SAINTFIELD, or TULLAGHANOEVE, a small market and post town in the parish of Saintfield, barony of Upper Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the mutual intersection of the three principal roads of the parish, 4 miles north-north-east of Ballinahinch, $4\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Crossgar, $7\frac{1}{2}$ east-south-east of Lisburn, $7\frac{1}{2}$ north-west by west of Killyleagh, $8\frac{1}{2}$ east of Dromore, 9 south-south-east of Belfast, and $78\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Dublin. It contains the church, two Presbyterian meeting-houses, several schools, and a good inn; and a little east of it stands the Roman Catholic chapel. The church is a handsome edifice; and the meeting-houses are commodious. The town has been much improved; and it has well-attended markets, and conducts a comparatively large trade in the manufacture of linens, calicoes, corduroys, and other fabrics. Fairs are held on Jan. 26, Feb. 23, March 23, April 27, May 27, June 26, July 30, Aug. 26, Sept. 21, Oct. 26, Nov. 26, and Dec. 28. A court of petty-sessions is usually held on two Tuesdays of every month. Tullaghanoe is the original or Irish name of the town, and means the Hill of the Saint, or Sainthill,—a name rather freely translated into Saintfield. "It was, not many years ago," says the chorographer of Down, who published in 1774, "made a town by the care and industry of the late General Price, who began to improve here, opened and made the roads passable from Belfast to Down through it, encouraged linen manufacturers and other tradesmen to settle here, had a barrack fixed for a troop of horse, and promoted the repair of a ruinous, now decent, parish-church, to which he gave plate and other ornaments." Saintfield was the scene of an atrocity and a skirmish on respectively the 8th and the 9th of June, 1798. "A number of insurgents," says Gordon, "assembled near Saintfield, in the county of Down, on the 8th of June, under a leader named Jackson, and with furious resentment set fire to the house of one Mackee, an informer, where eleven persons are said to have perished in the flames. This was the only act of atrocity, except in battle, committed by the armed malecontents in Ulster. Electing for their general Henry Munroe, a shop-keeper of Lisburn, they placed themselves on the 9th in ambuscade, awaiting the approach of Colonel Stapleton, with a body of York fencibles and yeomen cavalry. Here the royal troops would have been totally routed, if the infantry, on whom the cavalry were driven back with slaughter, had not, with a cool intrepidity, extremely uncommon, if not altogether singular, at this time in Ireland, rallied and dislodged the foe. Stapleton, having remained master of the ground, retreated to Belfast, having lost about sixty men, including three officers, beside Mr. Mortimer, a clergyman, vicar of Portaferry, who had volunteered on this occasion." Area of the town, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,053; in 1841, 909. Houses 166. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 30; in manufactures and trade, 113; in other pursuits, 21. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 10; on the directing of labour, 103; on their own manual labour, 58; on means not specified, 2.

SAINT-FINBAR'S. See CORK and GOGANE-BARRA.

SAINT-FINNAN'S, a bay in the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. It opens between Puffin Island on the north-west, and Bolus-Head on the south-east; it is situated midway between South Valentia Harbour and Ballinaskelligs bay; it measures $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles across the entrance, and penetrates the land north-eastward to the extent of 3 miles; and it lies completely exposed to the tremendous surges of the Atlantic, and is screened or rather overhung by lofty and stupendous rocky shores. The hills of Latteev and Knockagalisky soar up from respectively its north-west and its south-east sides; and the latter pushes forward a summit of 1,351 feet of altitude to near the extremity of Bolus Head.

SAINT-VALORIE, the picturesque and exquisitely ately situated residence of the Hon. Judge Cramp-ton, in the parish of Bray, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the Bray river, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of the town of Bray; and commands a thrilling and superb view of the meeting of the glens of Enniskerry and the Dargle, and of the beautifully wooded hills which overhang the confluence of the stream of the Bray river, backed by the more distant and soaring summits of the mutual border of Wicklow and Dublin.

SAINT-VOGUE'S, a quondam chapelry in the parish of Carn, and in the immediate vicinity of Carnsore Point, barony of Forth, co. Wexford, Leinster. St. Vogue's Well and chapel still exist.

SAINT-WERBURGH'S. See DUBLIN.

SALEEN, a hamlet in the barony of Imokilly, on a creek of the eastern sea-board of Cork Harbour, and in the vicinity of Castle-Mary, co. Cork, Munster. It lies nearly embosomed in wood, and is a very pretty rural retreat.

SALEEN, a lake in the parish of Aghish, and in the southern environs of Castlebar, barony of Carraigh, co. Mayo, Connaught. It measures only about 3 furlongs in length.

SALLAGH-BRAES, a brief series of precipitously faced hills, in the parish of Cairncastle, barony of Upper Glenarm, 3 miles north-west of Larne, co. Antrim, Ulster. They sweep round in a precipitous escarpment, in the form of the segment of a circle; and they command, in a charming walk along their summit, a superb view of the east coast of Antrim, the North channel, and the distant coast of Scotland. The little church of Cairncastle stands at their base.

SALLINS, a village in the parishes of Naas and Bodenstown, barony of North Naas, co. Kildare, Leinster. It stands on the Grand Canal, and on the road from Naas to Clone, 2 miles north of Naas, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ south by east of Clone. It contains a constabulary barrack; and adjacent to it is the residence of Sallins-lodge; and upon the banks of the Canal are a large inn and extensive stores erected by the Canal Company. Area of the Naas section of the village, 7 acres; of the Bodenstown section, 7 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 419; in 1841, 392. Houses 59. Pop. of the Naas section, in 1831, 285; in 1841, 238. Houses 34.

SALLRACK, or SALLROCK. See SALRUC.

SALLYBROOK, a village in the parish of Rathcooney, barony and county of Cork, Munster. Area, 20 acres. Pop., in 1841, 450. Houses 74. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 56; in manufactures and trade, 17; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labouring, 18; on their own manual labour, 58; on means not specified, 5.

SALLYGAP, an alpine defile at the junction point of the baronies of Upper Talbotstown and North Ballinacor, and of the parishes of Blessington, Derralossory, and Calary, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It lies at the elevation of 1,631 feet above sea-level, commands a view of the heads of Glenavon, and the Glen of Kippure, is traversed by the military road, contains the summit-level or highest altitude of that road, and formerly was one of only three defiles through which the interior mountain-fastnesses of Wicklow were accessible.

SALLYMOUNT, a demesne in the parish of Braunuckstown, barony of South Naas, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east by south of Kilcullen-bridge, co. Kildare, Leinster. It is situated on the left bank of the river Liffey, opposite to the demesne of Harristown. The mansion was built after a design by the architect Mr.

Sandys; and the demesne is beautiful in both site and disposition. It is the property and residence of M. C. C. Roberts, Esq., the representative of the ancient family of Cramer or Von Cramer, who originally came from Germany, and who settled in Ireland in the reign of James I. In a marl pit, on this demesne, about the year 1778, there was dug up the entire skeleton of the species of ancient deer termed moose, and supposed to be antediluvian. "Not a bone of the skeleton was wanting; and, when joined together, the size and form of the animal stood conspicuous. The withers were much higher than the haunches; being full fourteen hands high. The neck was so short as to prevent the animal from grazing; nor was the head large in proportion to the body, but the horns were enormous, being ten feet from tip to tip, and the palms broad. The figure was standing upright, and the extremity of the horns not above two feet beneath the surface."

SALMON-LEAP. See LEIXLIP, COLERAINE, and BALLYSHANNON.

SALRUC, or SALLRUCK, a stupendous and most magnificent defile in the parish of Ballinakill, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. It is situated at the head of the Little Killery, on the road from Renvyle to Leenane, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Renvyle, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ west of the head of the Great Killery. Both the summit-ground of the defile itself, and the summit of the hill of Salruc which overhangs it, command one of the most picturesque and grandly romantic views in Cumemara,—the waters of the bay far beneath, extending away as in a vista between the stern and lofty overhanging mountains, and terminating in the bright green waters of the Atlantic, studded with some picturesquely outlined islands. The defile is narrow, short, and precipitous; and it derives its name from a Saint Rock or Ruc, who is said to have resided in a cell at the base of the mountain. "The Pass of Salruc," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "is reported to have been formed by the saint and the devil during a struggle for mastery. The sanctity of the saint having grievously annoyed the tempter, he threw a chain over him while asleep; unable to bear the sight of his glance or the mark of the cross, he leaped to the opposite side of the mount, but still held fast the saint by the chain—the friction produced by the struggle forming this pass, and the victorious saint having in the morning the felicity of seeing a way for travellers by a much shorter route than any that had previously existed. It is exceedingly steep and perilous, yet fishermen bring loaded horses up it, and it has been the favourite route of the peasantry for ages. Rude heaps of stones, similar to those already described in the vicinity of Cong, are ranged along its sides; a burial-place, thickly planted with trees, being at the base of the mountain, on the site of the saint's cell."

SALT (LOUGH), a lake and a mountain, on the mutual boundary of the parishes of Kilmacrennan and Mevagh, barony of Kilmacrennan, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Millford, co. Donegal, Ulster. The lake lies within a sort of large crater, rather more than half-way up the mountain; it measures $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile in length, and about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile in breadth; it has a depth of 204 feet, and a surface-elevation above sea-level of 815 feet; and it possesses a character of singular loneliness, wildness, and scenic power. The mountain attains an altitude of 1,541 feet above the level of the sea, or 726 feet above the level of the lake; and it commands a very extensive, varied, and opulent view of the country, sea-loughs, coasts, mountains, seas, and islands of northern Donegal, and of the grand perspective of the hundred summits of the vast and distant congeries of Donegal, Derry, and Tyrone mountains. The late Rev. Caesar Otway's account of his ascent of Lough Salt mountain is so graphic that we are certain to be thanked by every reader for quoting it: "The day invited; so we set out on quiet, sure-footed ponies. A broad road led up the hill, which my friend informed me was, until lately, the only pass that led from Dublin, or from Derry, to Ardes, Duifanaghy, and the whole north-western coast of Donegal. The mountain rose like a wall before us, yet up that wall the road valiantly climbed; the ponies toiled up it panting and perspiring; it must be a pretty experiment for a carriage to venture on; and, to mend the matter, the road is constructed as a hard causeway, every stone composing it as large as a quarter loaf. But we took our time; the ponies were nothing loath to stop as well as ourselves; and as we looked back on the country beneath us, the whole valley lay smiling under our feet, with its lake, and rivers, and tillage, and meadows and corn-fields, and my friend's comfortable glebe-house, surrounded by his cherished and thriving plantations: farther still in the circle extended a panorama of encircling hills; and farther still, in the blue distance of the extreme horizon, lay, mingling with the clouds, the mountains of Innishowen, Derry, and Tyrone, all forming a picture fit for a painter to sketch and for me to remember. Thus, now and then talking of the prospect, and again caught in our recollections of old college times—times, alas! too much misspent, too much misapplied—we at length reached the top of the mountain ridge; and, suddenly turning the point of a cliff that jutted out and checked the road, we came abruptly into a hollow something like a crater of an extinct volcano, which was filled almost entirely by a lovely lake, on the right hand side of which rose the highest peak of the mountain, composed of compact quartz rock, so bare, so white, so serrated, so tempest-worn, so vexed with all the storms of the Atlantic, that if mere matter could suffer, we might suppose that this lofty and precipitous peak presented the portrait of material endurance; and still though white was the prevailing colour, yet not one tint or shadowing that decks and paints a mountain's brow was wanting. Here the brown heath, the grey lichen, the green fern, the red crane's bill; and straight down the cliff, from its topmost peak to the water's edge, was branded in a dark and blasted line, the downward track of a meteoric stone that had fallen from the atmosphere, and, shattering itself against the mountain's crest, rolled down in fiery and smoking fragments into the adjacent lake. Last year, amidst the crash of a thunder-storm, this phenomenon occurred; and the well-defined line of its burning progress is and will be for years apparent. On the other side of the lake a fair verdant bank presented itself, courting the traveller to sit down and take his rest after wending his toilsome way up the long ascent into this peaceful and unexpected retreat; gentle and grassy knolls were here and there interspersed, on which sheep of most picturesque leanness, some black and some white, with primitive crumpled horns, were grazing. But the lake—not a breath was abroad on its expanse; it smiled as it reflected the grey mountain and the azure face of heaven; it seemed as if on this day the spirit of the Atlantic had fallen asleep, and air, earth, and ocean, were celebrating the festival of repose: the waters of the lake, of the colour and clearness of the sky, were

You could look down 100 fathoms deep, and still no bottom; speckled trouts floating at great depths, seemed as if they soared in ether; then the stillness of the whole scene—you seemed lifted, as it were, out of the turmoil of the world into some planetary paradise, into some such place as the apostle in the Apocalypse was invited to when the voice said 'Come up hither.' You might have supposed that sound had no existence here, were it not that now and then a hawk shrieked while cowering over the mountain top, or a lamb bleated beneath as it ran to its mother. I could have gone to sleep here, and dreamed of heaven purchased for sinners by a Saviour's blood. I did at any rate praise the God of nature and of grace, grateful for all his blessings and all his wonders of creating and redeeming love. But the day was advancing, we had farther to go and much to do, and my friend drew me away from my abstraction and repose that had settled and softened into prayer. So we mounted our ponies, and rode about a quarter of a mile along a level road, as smooth as a gravel-walk, that coasted the lake until we came to a steep bank, where we let our horses graze along the water's edge, and ascending a ridge or rim, as I may call it, of the cup or crater in which we were embosomed, all of a sudden a magnificent prospect presented itself—the whole range of the northern coast of Donegal. Seemingly beneath your feet, but really some miles off, lay the expanse of the Atlantic ocean, over which fancy flew, and almost impelled you to strain your eyes to catch a glimpse of America. Some leagues out at sea, but owing to the peculiar state of the atmosphere and our great elevation, apparently very near, lay Tory Island, rising out of the deep like a castellated and fortified city; lofty towers, church spires, battlements, bastions, batteries, presented themselves,—so strangely varied and so fantastically deceptive were its cliffs. Jutting out far into the ocean, lay the promontory of Horn-Head, so called from a cliff at its extreme point, where it fronts the Atlantic, having the form of a horn; a place which, in Pagan times, might have been consecrated to the worship of the horned Ammonick Jupiter. * * But directly under us was a most curious picture to be seen; the mountain on which we stood, as it descended to the west, presented sundry shelves or valleys, in each of which lay a round and sparkling lake. These tarns looked like mirrors set in the mountain's side to reflect the upright sun; and five or six of such sheets of silver presented themselves, until, at the very root of the mountain, a large expanse of water, a mile or two over, studded with islands, sufficiently wooded to be ornamental, finished the whole picture, and formed the last beauty and curiosity I shall record of this surpassingly interesting hill.*

SALT (NORTH), a barony at the north-east extremity of the county of Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Meath; on the east, by the county of Dublin; on the south-east and south, by the barony of South Salt; and, on the west, by the barony of Icknethy and Oughterany. Its length, north-eastward, is 8 miles; its extreme breadth is 4½; and its area is 21,930 acres, 1 perch,—of which 120 acres, 2 roods, 5 perches are water. The river Liffey describes all the southern and the south-eastern and part of the eastern boundaries, down to the town of Leixlip; the rivulet Rye runs across the north-eastern wing to the Liffey at Leixlip; and the Royal Canal traverses the whole of the northern border or district. The surface of the barony consists entirely of land either in tillage or quite capable of it; it comprises a large proportion of demesne ground; and, in spite of being comparatively flat and without much natural feature, it presents a large amount of pleasing and very luscious landscape.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Donaghumper and Leixlip, and the whole of the parishes of Confeigh, Donaghmore, Kildrough, Killa-doon, Kilmacredock, Larahbryan, Straffan, and Tagh-adoc. The towns and chief villages are Maynooth, Leixlip, and part of Celbridge. Pop., in 1831, 8,025; in 1841, 7,717. Houses 1,089. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 450; in manufactures and trade, 258; in other pursuits, 713. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 68; on the directing of labour, 450; on their own manual labour, 800; on means not specified, 43. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,889; who could read but not write, 682; who could neither read nor write, 1,064. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,071; who could read but not write, 935; who could neither read nor write, 1,246.—North Salt lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Celbridge. The total number of tenements valued is 972; and of these, 326 were valued under £5,—193, under £10,—108, under £15,—71, under £20,—40, under £25,—16, under £30,—39, under £40, 25, under £50,—and 154, at and above £50.

SALT (SOUTH), a barony on the eastern border of co. Kildare, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by the barony of North Salt; on the east, by the county of Dublin; and on the south and the west, by the barony of North Naas. Its length, north-north-eastward, is 8½ miles; its breadth is from 1 to 5 miles; and its area is 16,685 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches,—of which 70 acres, 2 roods, 18 perches are water. Cupidstown-hill, in the extreme south-east, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,248 feet; and a height near the middle of the eastern boundary, has an altitude of 608 feet; but nearly all the remainder of the surface is low, and without much natural feature. Excepting a small district around Cupidstown-hill, very nearly all the land is arable. The river Liffey traces the boundary with North Salt.—The barony of South Salt contains part of the parish of Kill, and the whole of the parishes of Castle-Dillon, Clonoghlin, Donaghcrumper, Forenaughts, Haynestown, Kiltel, Lyons, Oughterard, and Stacumney. The towns and chief villages are Killeel, Kill, Templeplace, and part of Celbridge. Pop., in 1831, 4,154; in 1841, 4,252. Houses 661. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 537; in manufactures and trade, 111; in other pursuits, 80. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 15; on the directing of labour, 261; on their own manual labour, 439; on means not specified, 13. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 861; who could read but not write, 425; who could neither read nor write, 642. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 538; who could read but not write, 492; who could neither read nor write, 785.—South Salt lies partly within the Poor-law union of Celbridge, and partly within that of Naas. The total number of tenements valued is 555; and of these, 243 were valued under £5,—64, under £10,—48, under £15,—26, under £20,—19, under £25,—15, under £30,—19, under £40,—16, under £50,—and 105, at and above £50.

SALTEE ISLANDS, two small islands and a group of rocks, in the parish of Kilmore, barony of Bargie, co. Wexford, Leinster. The Little Saltee Island lies 1½ mile south of Crossfarnogue-point, and extends 5 furlongs in the direction of south by west. The Great Saltee Island lies 1 mile south-south-west of the south end of the Little Saltee Island, and 10½ miles east by south of Hook Head; and it extends 1 mile in the direction of south-south-west. The Goose Rock lies off the south-west corner of the Little Saltee Island; the rocks called Sobber-bridge, Makeson, Seven Heads, Panstown, Molly-boy, and the Ring, as well as several others, form nearly a cordon round the Great Saltee Island; and two tiny groups of rocks, called Cotingmore and Cotingbeg, lie respectively 1 mile south, and nearly 2 miles south by west of the southern extremity of the Great Saltee. The entire area of the islands is 309 acres, 32 perches. They are the property of H. K. G. Morgan, Esq.; and they comprise about 100 acres of remarkably rich pasturage. A light-ship, showing a fixed double light, is stationed 3½ miles south by west of the Great Saltee, and serves to prevent a repetition of numerous and appalling shipwrecks which formerly gave the Saltee Islands a lugubrious fame, and rendered them a terror to every mariner who navigated St. George's Channel. The Great Saltee was not long ago a coast-guard station; and "it derives a melancholy interest from the fact, that here were arrested on the 26th June, 1788, Beauchamp Bagnal Harvey, and John Colclough, Esqrs., the former the general of the rebel forces of Wexford county, and the latter one of their distinguished leaders. They were both gentlemen of wealth and station, and of irreproachable integrity in private life. The former was a Protestant. After the massacre at Scullatogue, he resigned the command in disgust and fled to the Saltees, with the view to an ultimate escape to France. The lady of Mr. Colclough accompanied her husband to the island; they took with them a large store of provisions; but information of their retreat having reached the authorities, a company of the 2d Royals was despatched in a cutter to apprehend them. A minute search, without effect, was instituted through the island, and the troops were about to retire, when a soldier perceived smoke issuing from a crevice of a rock. It was found to proceed from a cave of considerable depth, where the unhappy gentlemen were sheltered. The approach was difficult and dangerous, the officer in command, therefore, called to the inmates to surrender, threatening, if there were no answer, he would direct his party to fire into the cave. Mr. Colclough, apprehensive of danger to his wife, at once came forward, elevating a white handkerchief on his stick. He and Mr. Harvey were conveyed prisoners to Wexford, were tried on the 27th, and executed on the 28th."

SALTER-BRIDGE, a demesne in the parish of Lismore and Macollop, barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Louth, Leinster. It is situated on the road from Waterford to Cork, and on the left bank of the river Blackwater, 1½ mile west of Cappoquin. Its plantations are extensive, and contain some remarkably fine evergreen oaks; and its grounds are richly diversified in surface, and contain several picturesque heights and some deep and naturally-wooded dells, and partake to profusion in the opulent and powerful scenery which characterizes the valley and hill screens of the Blackwater from Lismore to Youghal. The proprietor of Salter-bridge is Richard Chearnley, Esq.

SALTERSTOWN, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ferrard, 3½ miles south-east of Castle-Bellingham, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,047 acres, 3 roods, 17 perches. Pop., in 1831, 354; in 1841, 380. Houses 64. The surface lies along the south shore of Dundalk bay, at the mean distance of 2½ miles within Dunany Point; and the greater part of it consists of excellent land. A landing-place between rocks occurs on the shore, and is frequented by row-boats engaged in the fishery. The hamlets are Salterstown, in the interior, and Salterstown-bridge, on the shore.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DUNANY [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. But the parish, though called a vicarage, is really tithe-free. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

SALTHILL, a suburb of the town of Galway, in the parish of Rahoon, barony and county of Galway, Connaught. It extends far and stragglingly along the shore of the bay and along the road to Barna; it contains a bath-house and numerous bathing-lodges; it has a cleanly, cheerful, and respectable appearance, thoroughly in contrast to the other suburbs of the dingy and dirty metropolis of the west; and it is well-frequented in summer, for purposes of sea-bathing, by families not only from the town, but from many and far inland parts of the county. See GALWAY and RAHOON.

SALTMILLS, a village in the parish of Tintern, barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the west shore of Bannow bay, a few perches south of Tintern abbey, 3 miles north of Fethard, and 5 east-south-east of Ballyhack. It is beautifully situated, presents a pretty appearance, and is inhabited principally by fishermen. Small vessels, laden with coals, sail up to the village. The principal objects of interest within the village are a church, a National school, and Tintern-bridge; and the principal within a mile of it are the ruins of Tintern-abbey, the ruins of St. Kieran's-church, and the ruins of Dunough-castle, and the seats and lodges of Seaview, St. Kieran's-house, and Tintern-abbey,—the last the seat of Mrs. Colclough. The quondam village of Tintern was taken down since 1810, and the present village of Saltmills, which may be said to represent it, was built on the townland of Saltmills. Area, 23 acres. Pop., in 1831, 203; in 1841, 171. Houses 27.

SAMORE, a hill on the eastern border of the parish of Calry, and of the barony of Carbery, 4 miles east-north-east of Sligo, co. Sligo, Connaught. Its altitude above sea-level is 1,430 feet.

SANCROFT, a Roman Catholic parish in the county of Kildare, and in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin, Leinster. Its post-town is Kildare; and its only chapel is at Sahanroft.

SANDFIELD, a hamlet in the parish of Killenoy, barony of Athlone, 4½ miles south-east of Roscommon, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Adjacent to it is Sandfield-house.

SANDFORD, a chapelry in the parish of St. Mary-Donnybrook, barony and county of Dublin, Leinster. The village of Cullenwood or Sandfordville, the seat of the chapelry, is situated on the western verge of the parish, half-a-mile west of Donnybrook, and 1½ mile south-south-east of Dublin-castle; and the chapelry derives its name from the circumstance of having been founded and endowed by the large and disinterested liberality of Lord Mount-Sandford. See CULLENWOOD. The chaplain receives a salary of about £300 a-year from the pew-rents of the chapel, and of £46 3s. 1d. from an endowment by the noble founder; and he is appointed by a body of five trustees, who have power to fill up vacancies in their number occasioned by either resignation or death. An assistant chaplain receives a salary of £100.

SANDYCOVE, a cove and a fishing hamlet in the parish of Ringrone, barony of Courcys, co. Cork, Munster. The cove is separated by a small peninsula from the lower part of Kinsale Harbour; and it penetrates the land northward, to the extent of only about 5 furlongs. The hamlet is situated near the head of the cove, 1½ mile south of Kinsale; and it is a coast-guard station.

SANDYCOVE, a village in the parish of Monkstown, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands at the head of Scotch bay, adjacent to the west end of the village of Bullock, and about a mile south-east by east of the centre of Kingstown; but it is popularly regarded as actually forming a part of Kingstown; and its distinctive name is used chiefly in connection with Sandycove-terrace and Sandycove-house. The village, or rather its little harbour, has a commodious landing-place in 12 feet of water. Pop. not specially returned.

SANDYFORD, a village in the parishes of Tully and Taney, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dundrum to Enniskerry, 1½ mile south-south-east of Dundrum, and 5½ miles south-south-east of Dublin-castle. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel; and within a mile of it are the seats of Burton-hall, Rockland, Leopards-town, Murphys-town, Coolmine, Elmfield, Lakefield, Lilliput, Kilgobbin-cottage, Kilgobbin-house, Farnhill-house, Kingstown-house, Ballinteer, Poyer-house, Hilltown, Taney-lodge, Ludford-park, Bellewly-park, Baldally, Moreen, Farnley, Runnemed, Rockmount, Edenpark, Annmount, Kilmacud-house, Lakelated, St. Margaret's, Clammore, and Watersland. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Dublin takes designation from Sandyford, and has chapels here and at Glancullen. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

SANDYMOUNT, a village in the parish of St. Mary-Donnybrook, barony and county of Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the shore of the estuary of the Liffey, 5 furlongs east-north-east of Ball's-Bridge, ¼ of a mile south-south-east of Ringsend, and 2¼ miles east-south-east of Dublin-castle. It was at one time a poor place; but it became much improved, acquired many good houses, and boasted the presence in summer of numerous sea-bathing families from a distance; yet, while still possessed of much elegance, and in all respects very superior as a village to its miserable and revolting neighbours, Irishtown, Ringsend, Ball's-Bridge, and Donnybrook, it is far from being unqualifiedly respectable or pleasant. On its southern outskirts are Beechgrove, Belvidere, Lakelands, and other agreeable residences. Area of the village, 243 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,142. Houses 160. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 25; in manufactures and trade, 65; in other pursuits, 104. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 39; on the directing of labour, 102; on their own manual labour, 23; on means not specified, 30.

SANTRY, or SANTRETT, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, eastward, 4 miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,728 acres, 1 perch. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census 1,159, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities 1,149; in 1841, 1,117. Houses 180. The whole of the surface is profitable, and consists of prime land. The road from Dublin to Swords passes through the interior; and the village of Santry stands on that road, in the south-eastern district of the parish. The village contains the church, the parsonage, a schoolhouse, and a dispensary; it principally consists of neat, pleasant, picturesque cottages, inhabited by labourers and tradesmen; and it both forms an agreeable appendage to the baronial residence of the proprietor, and displays most creditable effects of his liberal feeling and judicious patronage. The church is a plain but well-preserved structure of the year 1609, and has afforded a place of sepulture to many members of the families of Donville and Barry. The dispensary is within the North Dublin Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 2,956; and, in 1839, it expended £120 3s., and administered to 8,213 patients. In Nov. 1841, at the discovery of the insurrectionary plot ascribed to Lord Macguire, the village of Santry was burned by the republican troops stationed at Dublin. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 125; in 1841, 110. Houses 23. The principal residences in the parish are Balcarris-house, Mitchellmount, Dubber-house, Meeksmount-house, Poppingtree-house, Huntstown-house, Collinstown-house, Coultry-house, Edendale, Belcamp-house, Belcamp-park, Woodlands, Furry-park, Woodford, Primrose-castle, Woodlawn, White-house, and Santry-house. The last of these is situated on the north-west side of the village, and is the seat of the proprietor of the manor of Santry, Sir Compton Donville, Bart. The mansion is a spacious square structure, composed of brick, with finishings of stone; and the demesne is adorned with a profusion of well-grown wood, and encompassed with a very lofty stone wall of several miles in circuit. Mr. Brewer, writing about 20 years ago, says, respecting the manor and proprietors of Santry, "In the year 1173, Hugh de Lacy, Earl Palatine of Meath, made a grant of this manor to Adam de Feipo, one of his knights; from whose family Santry, Skryne, and other lordships, passed to the house of De Mareward, titular baron of Skryne. William Nugent, 2d son of Richard, 8th baron of Delvin, having married Janet, daughter and heir of Walter Mareward, baron of Skryne, inherited with that lady the manor of Santry and other possessions. James Nugent, his son, marshal of the confederate (Catholic) army, and governor of Finagh, forfeited the estate; which was, in consequence, entirely lost to his descendants. The family of Barry afterwards became possessed of this manor, and Sir James (eldest son of Richard Barry, merchant and alderman of Dublin), who was eminent in the profession of the law, and attained the dignity of chief-justice of the King's bench, was created Baron of Santry in the year 1600. Henry the fourth Lord Santry, who acceded to the title in 1734, forfeited his station in society by the calamity of killing one of his servants, a footman. He was indicted for the offence in the year 1738-9, and was convicted, on a trial by his peers, but received the grant of a miserable life from the clemency of the Crown. The family of Donville succeeded in possession of the lordship of Santry, in the person of Sir Compton Donville, uncle to the above unfortunate nobleman. The estate has lately passed to the Scottish family of Pocklington. The present possessor, Sir Compton Pocklington Donville, was created a baronet in 1815, his father having, by royal permission, assumed the name and arms of his maternal uncle."—Santry parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dublin. Vicarial tithe composition, £243 14s. 10d.; glebe, £5. Gross income, £531 10s.; nett, £407 18s. 8d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Loughrea, in the dio. of Clonfert, but is resident in Santry. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £218 15s.; and are inappropriate in the Crown. The church, as already stated, is an old building. Sittings 300; attendance, from 200 to 300. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to three chapels in the benefice of Clontarf, Coolock, and Clonturk. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 208, and the Roman Catholics to 893; and 3 daily schools had on their books 58 boys and 24 girls. One of the schools is a parochial free school for girls, and is supported chiefly by subscription, and partly by a bequest of £4 a-year from Dean Jackson; one was a charter school for educating, maintaining, clothing, and apprenticing boys, and was supported from the funds of the Incorporated Society; and one was a mixed daily school, aided with £12 a-year from subscription.

SAUL, a parish in the barony of Lecale, 1½ mile north-east of Downpatrick, co. Down, Ulster. It consists of a main body and a detached district; the latter lying 1½ mile south-east of the nearest part of the former, and 4½ miles east of Downpatrick. Length of the main body, north-eastward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2. Length of the detached district, south-south-eastward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, 1½. Area of the whole, 5,272 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches,—of which 20 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,410; in 1841, 2,159. Houses 394. The main body extends along the right bank of the Quoile river and estuary, and athwart nearly two-thirds of the foot of the chief expanse of Lough Strangford; and it includes several islands in both the estuary and the lough, and ascends southward to the vicinity of the hill, called Slievenaghriddle,—the principal height which diversifies or boldly relieves the general landscape. The parochial surface consists, in some places, of good arable land, and in other places, of light and rocky ground. The principal islands belonging to Saul are Castle-Island, Gore's-Island, Salt-Island, Long Launce's-Island, Little Launce's-Island, Shone's-Island, Shark-Island, Jackdaw-Island, and Green-Island. The chief hamlet in the detached district is Ballywoodan; and the chief hamlets in the main body are Scaddin, Quoile-Quay, Walshestown, and part of Raholp. See RAHOLP and QUOILE. The principal antiquities are the ruins of Saul abbey and of two castles. The monastic ruins are still of considerable extent, though not of much artistic interest; and about a century ago, they made so prominent a figure as to provoke the following comparatively ample notice from the author of the brief Chorographical Description of Down:—"The abbey of Saul is called in Latin Saballum, in Irish Sgibol-Phadraig, that is, Patrick's-Barn, (Sgibol signifying a barn in that language,) the Barn of Dichu, lord of the soil, being the site on which St. Patrick founded this monastery for canons regular, as several of the writers of that saint's life say; though some hold that the name of the place was Samall, which signifies to save, for the cry was, 'Come and be saved.' The old church of this monastery appears now to stand in the usual form of other churches, that is, east and west; though some writers relate, that it anciently stood north and south, which perhaps it might have done in its original state. Thus, Jocelyn tells us, 'that at the request of Dichu, who granted the soil, St. Patrick built a church, and extended it ab aquilonari parte versus meridianam plagam, from north to south.' This was perhaps one of the first founded monasteries in the kingdom, being erected by St. Patrick in the year 432. But we must not conceive it to have been then built of stone, in the stately manner it has since appeared; for that task was performed by Malachy O'Morgair, bishop of Down. Large ruins remain of this abbey, and there are here two small vaulted rooms of stone yet entire, about 7 feet high, 6 feet long, and 2½ feet broad, with a small window placed in one side. Perhaps these small chambers were confessionals, or places for private devotion. One of them is now closed up and used by some families for a tomb, the churchyard being a great burial-place of the natives. At some distance from the church, on the south-west side, stands a battlemented castle and two small towers, but no stone stairs in the castle leading up to the top of it, as is usual in such fabrics. It is probable that there were stairs of timber in the body of the building, by which people might ascend from story to story; in the west angle of each of which stories are neat finished arches within the wall, rising in various sections to the top, where they terminate in a circle."—Saul parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £386 6s. 0d.; glebe, £28 5s. 6d. Gross income, £414 11s. 6jd.; nett, £322 12s. 11jd. Parson, the Crown. A curate receives a salary of £69 4s. 7jd. The parish was formerly a perpetual curacy; its tithes were appropriated to the deanery of Down; and its extent quoad sacra was considerably different from what it is at present. "But by order in Council of 31st October, 1834, the rectory of Saul was disunited from the deanery, and said rectory, with the perpetual cure thereof, was made a distinct parish or benefice, disuniting from the said parish the three detached townlands of Whitehill, Ballinarry, and Ballinagarrick, and uniting same, with the tithe composition therefrom arising, to the adjoining parish of Ballyculter; but providing that the cure of souls therein be annexed to the adjoining parish of Kilclief.—Ballywoodan detached townland was by said order also disunited from Saul parish, and united, with the tithe composition therefrom arising, and the cure of souls therein, to the aforesaid parish of Kilclief. And, in lieu of such severance, the townland of Ballystokes, with the tithe composition therefrom arising, and the cure of souls therein, was severed from Ballee parish, and united to that of Saul, to which latter parish was also annexed the tithe composition arising from the townlands of Raholpe and Ballintleave, in Ballyculter parish; providing, however, that the cure of souls within the two townlands last mentioned shall continue to belong to the rector of Ballyculter parish."

The church was built about the year 1770. Sittings 250; attendance 70. The Saul and the Laraculin Roman Catholic chapels have an attendance of respectively from 500 to 1,000, and from 300 to 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of the districts of the quondam perpetual curacy of Saul, which still belong to the present benefice of Saul, consisted of 354 Churchmen, 97 Presbyterians, and 1,386 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the district of Ballee united to the present benefice of Saul, consisted of 137 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the district of the quondam perpetual curacy of Saul, now united to the benefice of Kilclief, consisted of 61 Churchmen, 8 Presbyterians, and 322 Roman Catholics. In the same year 3 Sunday schools within the limits of the present benefice of Saul, were usually attended in summer by about 350 scholars; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided with £8 a-year from Lady H. Forde, and one with £2 Irish from Dean Plunkett—had on their books 196 boys and 103 girls. In 1843, two National schools at Slievebogan and Ballintougher, were salaried with respectively £8 and £12 a-year, and had jointly on their books 115 boys and 68 girls.

SAUNDERS-COURT, the demesne of the Earl of Arran, in the parish of Kilpatrick, barony of East Sheltamier, 2½ miles north-north-west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. It extends about ¼ mile along the north shore of the estuary of the Slaney; it exhibits a surface of much diversity and great beauty, broken by several dells and mimic glens, and watered by mirthful rivulets and rills; and though formerly abandoned as a residence, and strip of its noble oak-woods and hedge-row trees, it still retains a beautiful old marsh oak, one of the finest cypresses in the kingdom, and a number of very remarkable cedars of Lebanon, and displays a comparative profusion of pretty coppices and of healthy young plantations. The old mansion is unoccupied; but a new one is about to be built.

SAUNDERS-GROVE, a demesne in the parish of Rathbran, barony of Upper Talbotstown, ¼ mile south-south-west of Stratford-upon-Slaney, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is beautifully situated; and, though it has undergone many changes, it still retains enough of fine old wood to display its original disposition and character. Its proprietor is Mr. Saunders.

SAUNDERS-VILLE, a hamlet in the parish of Rathbran, barony of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Wexford, ¼ mile south-south-west of Stratford-upon-Slaney, and ¼ north-north-east of Balinglass. It is a constabulary station.

SAWEL, a mountain on the mutual boundary of the parish of Banagher, barony of Tyrkeeran, co. Londonderry, and the parish of Upper Bodoney, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It has an altitude of 2,236 feet above sea-level; and is the culminating point of the great mountain-range which extends along the mutual border of the counties of Londonderry and Tyrone, from an altitude of about 800 feet, in the vicinity of Garvagh, to an altitude of about 1,000 feet in the vicinity of Strabane, and which may be regarded as the backbone of the vast congeries of mountains in the upland region of north-western Ulster.

SCALMARTIN, or SKULLMARTIN, two rocks in the parish of Ballywalter, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. The Greater Scalmartin lies about 7 furlongs east of the nearest part of the mainland, and nearly 3 miles south-south-east of Ballyferis Point. It is overflowed by every tide; and, were it not flat and smooth, it might prove very eminently dangerous. The Lesser Scalmartin lies 5 furlongs south-west of the Greater, and proportionally near the shore.

SCALP, an extraordinary natural cut through a mountain, 793 feet in height, on the mutual boundary of the parish of Rathnichol, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, and the parish of Powerscourt, barony of Rathdown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It occurs nearly 2 miles north by west of Enniskerry; and is traversed by the road thence to Dublin. "Here," says the author of the Guide to Wicklow, "the opposite hills appear to have been rent asunder by some tremendous convulsive shock, and, being composed of granite strata, the internal structure, when exposed to view, presents the secret recesses of nature in an awful and appalling point of view. Enormous masses of granite, many tons in weight, are tossed about in the most irregular manner; and so imperfect and unfinished was the effort of nature in creating this gulf, that the opposite sides of the pass are distant only the breadth of a narrow road from each other; in some places enormous masses actually interrupt the continued regularity of the limit of the road. As road-makers in latter days appear so adverse to anything like a consideration of the picturesque, so in this instance they have destroyed the effect produced in passing through this sublime pass, by what they call an improvement. Formerly the road passed in the exact point in which the opposite sides, if continued downwards, might be supposed to meet, and so on each side rose those confused and chaotic masses of rock, apparently possessing so slight a dependence upon each other, that you do not feel quite secure that their motion may commence again; but the short road lately made through part of the defile runs along the side of one of the hills, amongst the rude masses themselves, so that the height of both sides is apparently much diminished; and the conquest here effected by art over nature lessens our idea of her wonderful works, though we admit it may have saved some broken necks, after profuse libations at the Dargle, &c. This improvement, and its continuation to Enniskerry, was by Mr. Duncan. To the east of the Scalp, a lead mine was opened some years since, by a company of persons in Dublin, and worked for some time with varying success. Here mica is found in great abundance with a sort of greyish white splintery quartz with mica flakes interwoven, an approximation to quartz rock, of which Shankill Peak, in the neighbouring district, is totally composed."

SCALP, a mountain in the parish of Upper Fahan, 3½ miles west-north-west of Muff, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. The altitude of its summit above sea-level is 1,589 feet.

SCALP, a chief summit of the Slieve-Baughta mountains, 4½ miles south-west of Woodford, and on the margin of the parish of Ballinakill, the barony of Leitrim, the county of Galway, and the province of Connaught. The altitude of its summit above sea-level is 1,074 feet.

SCALP, a hamlet in the parish of Ardahan, barony of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands 5½ miles north-east by north of Gort, on the road thence to Loughrea.

SCAR, a mountain in the parish of Derralossory, barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated 3 miles north of Laragh, and forms a large and prominent part of the eastern screen of Glennacassess. The altitude of its summit above sea-level is 2,105 feet.

SCAR, a small and shallow marine inlet in the barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It consists of the upper part of the bay of Bannow; and it washes the shore around Clonmines.

SCARA, an island in the barony of Dunkerron, co. Kerry, Munster. It lies directly in front of Ballinskelligs bay, 2½ miles south by west of Hogg Head, and 3½ south-south-east of Bolus Head. It measures about 7 furlongs in length; is rocky, bold, and lofty; and forms a picturesque feature in the fine marine view from the vantage-grounds of Derrynane-abbey.

SCAREWALSH, a barony in the north-west of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Wicklow; on the east, by the barony of Gorey; on the south-east, by the barony of Ballaghkeen; on the south, by the barony of Bantry; and, on the west, by the barony of Bantry and the county of Carlow. Its length, east by southward, is 14 miles; its extreme breadth is 13½; and its area is 106,659 acres, 16 perches,—of which 8 acres, 1 rood are tideway of the river Slaney, and 229 acres, 2 roods, 16 perches are water in the Slaney. The Mount-Leinster and the Blackstairs mountains extend their summit-line along the whole of the boundary with co. Carlow; and have here three summits of respectively 939, 1,971, and 2,610 feet of altitude above sea-level. Slieveboy, the chief of several hills which diversify the north-eastern district on the border toward Wicklow, has an altitude of 1,381 feet above sea-level; two heights considerably west of the centre of the barony have altitudes of respectively 713 and 695 feet; and two heights on respectively the eastern and the south-eastern border have altitudes, the former of 769, and the latter of 454 feet. The rest of the surface, though nowhere strictly hill, is almost everywhere diversified, and in many places picturesque; and the valley of the Slaney intersects the barony almost right through the centre, from Newtownbarry to Enniscorthy. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred three townlands of the parish of Kilmehue, and one townland of the parish of Rossmannogue, from Scarewalsh to Gorey,—pop., in 1841, 284; and one townland of the parish of Ferns from Gorey to Scarewalsh,—pop. 105.—The barony of Scarewalsh, as at present constituted, contains part of the parishes of Carnew, Ferns, Moyacomb, Templeshamon, and Toome, and the whole of the parishes of Ballycarney, Clone, Kilbride, Kilcomin, Kilrush, Monart, St. Mary's of Enniscorthy, St. Mary's of Newtownbarry and Templeshambo. The towns and chief villages are Ferns, Newtownbarry, Clohamon, Watch-house, Camolin, and the principal part of Enniscorthy. Pop., in 1831, 31,229; in 1841, 34,184. Houses 5,714. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,306; in manufactures and trade, 1,371; in other pursuits, 537. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 157; on the directing of labour, 2,314; on their own manual labour, 3,591; on means not specified, 152. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,307; who could read but not write, 2,856; who could neither read nor write, 5,414. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,828; who could read but not write, 4,984; who could neither read nor write, 6,703.—Scarewalsh lies within the Poor-law unions of Enniscorthy and Gorey. The total number of tenements valued is 6,143; and of these, 3,107 were valued under £5,—1,019, under £10,—658, under £15,—375, under £20,—230, under £25,—209, under £30,—215, under £40,—117, under £50,—and 213, at and above £50.

SCAREWALSH-BRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Ballycarney, barony of Scarewalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the river Slaney, and at the forking of the road from Enniscorthy towards respectively Ferns and Newtownbarry, 3 miles north by east of Enniscorthy; and it has its name from a bridge which here carries the high road across the Slaney. Within a mile of it are three graveyards, the site of an old castle, the site of an old church, and the residences of Killabeg and Ballinahallin. Pop. not specially returned.

SCARIFF (THE), a rivulet of the north-western district of the county of Clare, Munster. It issues from Lough Teroig, on the mutual boundary of Clare and Galway; runs 3½ miles south-west to Lough Graney; is lost, for 2 miles southward, in that lake; runs 4 miles south-south-eastward thence to Lough O'Grady; and, after reissuing from that lake, proceeds 3½ miles eastward, past the villages of Scariff and Tomgraney, to the head of Scariff bay, in Lough Derg. It usually bears the name of the Graney river above Lough O'Grady; and its principal affluents are the Loughrea rivulet at the foot of Lough Graney, and the Cloghaun rivulet into the head or west end of Lough O'Grady. The Commissioners for improving the navigation of the river Shannon proposed to effect changes upon the navigable capacities of the Scariff, which were estimated to cost £4,133 11s. 6d.; and they say, in reference to these:—"The river is at present navigable during those portions of the year when the water is nearly as high as the banks, for barks of 50 tons burthen; but in summer, owing to a rocky shoal extending to about half-a-mile below Reddin's-quay, together with a few shoals of mud and gravel lower down the river, and the bar at its mouth, composed chiefly of marl, the navigation is impracticable; as also in winter, during the high floods, at which time the banks being covered with water, the course of the river cannot be discerned. As the towns referred to have a great tract of rich agricultural land in their neighbourhood, including the valley of the Feacie, and as the design for regulating the height of the water in Lough Derg embraces the lowering of the waters to the summer level, it is proposed to cut away the shoals in this portion of the river to the level of 6 inches below the upper sill of Killaloe lock, to straighten and improve the river's course, to construct a harbour (suitable to the present wants of the towns of Tomgraney and Scariff) at Reddin's-quay, from which a short road may be formed to connect the harbour with these towns; and also to erect two beacons at the mouth of the river to mark its entrance."

SCARIFF, a bay of Lough Derg, partly in the parish of Inniscaltra, barony of Leitrim, co. Galway, Connought, but chiefly in the parishes of Inniscaltra, Moyne, Tomgraney, and O'Gonnelloe, baronies of Upper Tulla and Lower Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It enters between Aughinish Point on the south, and the small headland immediately east of Mount-Shannon on the north; and it measures 2 miles across the entrance, and penetrates the land $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles westward to the embouchure of the Scariff river. It is fine and open, and has, within a small distance of the shore on each side, a sufficiency of water at all times for navigation. The chief of various isles and islets within it are Holy Island, Young's Island, Bushy Island, Oib Island, Middle Island, Cahir Island, Lushag Rocks, Red Island, Rabbit Island, and Cormorant Islands.

SCARIFF, a small market and post town in the parish of Tomgraney, barony of Upper Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the river Scariff, and at the intersection of the road from Mount-Shannon to Ennis, with that from Killaloe to Galway, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north-north-east of the village of Tomgraney, 4 miles west-south-west of Mount-Shannon, $7\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Killaloe, 12 south-south-west of Woodford, 21 south-west of Portunna, and $94\frac{1}{2}$ west-south-west of Dublin. The immediately surrounding country is interesting and highly picturesque; and within a mile of the town are the seats of Moyne-house, Sir J. Reid,—Drewsborough, Mr. Drew,—Raheen-house, the Rev. B. Brady,—and Ballyvannon-house. The town itself, however, is very poor, and contains scarcely one good house. A Roman Catholic chapel stands at its north end; and a Poor-law workhouse stands between it and Tomgraney. Fairs are held on Jan. 5, Feb. 1 and 27, March 4, April 3, May 1, June 3, July 5, Aug. 3 and 27, Sept. 6, Oct. 4, Nov. 4, and Dec. 9. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month. Area of the town, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 761; in 1841, 656. Houses 99. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 38; in manufactures and trade, 71; in other pursuits, 10. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 73; on their own manual labour, 39; on means not specified, 2.

The Scariff Poor-law union ranks as the 58th, and was declared on July 25, 1839. It lies partly in co. Galway, but chiefly in co. Clare; and comprehends an area of 108,976 acres; which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 47,894. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are in co. Galway, Woodford, 4,000,—and Clonrush, 3,084; in co. Galway and co. Clare, Mount-Shannon, 2,198; and in co. Clare, Scariff, 6,836,—Ogonelloe, 2,966,—Killaloe, 6,296,—Killuran, 2,942,—Kilnoe, 3,314,—Tulla, 7,514, and Feacle, 8,744. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians 26; and 4 of the latter are elected by each of the divisions of Scariff, Tulla, and Feacle, 3 by the division of Killaloe, 2 by each of the divisions of Ogonelloe, Killuran, Kilnoe, Woodford, and Clonrush, and 1 by the division of Mount-Shannon. The divisions of Clonrush and Woodford are in the barony of Leitrim; the division of Mount-Shannon is in the baronies of Leitrim and Upper Tulla; the divisions of Killaloe, Killuran, and Ogonelloe are in the barony of Lower Tulla; and the divisions of Scariff, Kilnoe, Tulla, and Feacle are in the barony of Upper Tulla. The number of valued tenements within the Leitrim districts is 925,—within the Lower Tulla districts, 1,640,— within the Upper Tulla districts, 2,612,—within the entire union, 5,177; and of this total, 3,020 were valued under £5,—945, under £10,—447, under £15,—252, under £20,—160, under £25,—89, under £30,—93, under £40,—65, under £50,—and 106, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £44,609 12s. 8d.; the total number of persons rated is 5,176; and of these, 1,380 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—632, not exceeding £2,—339, not exceeding £4,—and 298, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on April 30, 1840,—to be completed in Sept. 1841,—to cost £6,400 for building and completion, and £1,050 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, purchased for £350,—and to contain accommodation for 600 pauper. The date of the first admission of paupers was May 11, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,642 11s. 7d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,107 9s. 2d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 53. The only medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Scariff, Killaloe, and Tulla. The Scariff dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 15,432; and, in 1839-40, it expended £79, and administered to 2,642 patients.

SCARIFF, co. Kerry. See SCABA.

SCARIFF-BRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish of Killaconnican, barony of Lunc, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the river Boyne, and on the road from Ballivor to Summerhill, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Ballivor. It has its name from a bridge across the Boyne.

SCARTAGLIN, a village in the parish of Castle-Island, barony of Trughenackny, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands on the road from King William's Town to Castlemain, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of the town of Castle-Island. It contains a Roman Catholic chapel. Fairs are held on Jan. 17, May 17, Aug. 18, Oct. 10, and Dec. 16. The Brown Flesk rivulet flows in the vicinity, and is there spanned by a neat stone-bridge. Area of the village 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 313; in 1841, 330. Houses 49.

SCARVAGH, a village in the parish of Aghaderg, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the Newry Canal, and therefore, on the western verge of co. Down, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Poyntz-Pass, $2\frac{1}{2}$ south of Guildford, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ west-north-west of Loughbrickland. It contains a Presbyterian meeting-house, which formerly belonged to the Secession Synod; and, within a mile of it, in co. Down, are the sheet of water called Lough Shark, the ruins of Glenfesk-castle, erected by Col. Monck, the unique antiquity called the Danes' Cast, the fort of Lisnagade, and the seats of Scarvagh, J. L. Reilly, Esq., Rockvale, Lisnagade, E. H. Trevor, Esq., Union-lodge, W. Fivey, Esq., Hill-Head, and Diamond-lodge. The Danes' Cast consists principally of earth, and resembles the Roman wall in Scotland, and Offa's Dyke, in Wales; it commences on a stream on the boundary of the townland of Lisnagade; it extends southward, past the fort of Lisnagade, and through the demesnes of Scarvagh and Union-lodge; and it consists, within the latter of these demesnes, of a single rampart and fosse. "Lisnagade fort," says a writer quoted anonymously in Fraser's Hand-Book, "is one of the most extensive and best preserved of its kind—it consists of triple ramparts and intrenchments; the entrance is from the east, leading into an extensive circular enclosure, whence are obtained prospects of the entire country for many miles around; and a great number of forts or raths are seen, from which circumstance it is supposed this fort took its name, being the chief or centre of 100 forts." Fairs are held in the village on March 21, June 19, and Sept. 5. Area of the village 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 220; in 1841, 262. Houses 44.

SCATRICK, an islet in the parish of Killinshy, barony of Dufferin, co. Down, Ulster. It lies near the east shore of Lough Strangford, 2 miles north-east of the village of Killinshy. It anciently had a castle, and was a post of military defence for the adjacent country.

SCATTERY. See INNISCATTERY.

SCAUGH, a hamlet in the barony of Lower Connello, 2½ miles north-north-west of Rathkeale, co. Limerick, Munster. A dispensary here is within the Rathkeale Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it expended £151 10s., and administered to 1,300 patients.

SCA WR-HILL, a mistaken name of SCAB: which see.

SCHEMES, two islets in the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. They lie on the east side of the lower part of Roaring-Water bay, 2½ miles north-west by west of the town of Baltimore.

SCILLIES. See SILLIKES.

SCILLY, a fishing village in the parish of Ringcurran, barony of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. It is a suburb of the town of Kinsale, being separated from it only by the local or town harbour; and it lies within the municipal borough of Kinsale. The inhabitants are said to be the descendants of a colony of Englishmen, who settled here in the reign of Elizabeth. Area of the village, 90 acres. Pop., in 1831, 814; in 1841, 776. Houses 117. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 25; in manufactures and trade, 108; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 20; on their own manual labour, 123; on means not specified, 14.

SCOTLAND-HILL, a hill in the parish of Tullomoy, barony of Stradbally, 5 miles south of the town of Stradbally, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands detached from all the upland groups and ranges of the county; and, in consequence, is a very conspicuous feature in an extensive landscape. The altitude of its summit above sea-level is 1,079 feet.

SCOTSHOUSE, a village in the parish of Curran, barony of Darry, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It stands on the road from Clones to Redhills, 3½ miles south by west of Clones, and 4½ south-west of Newbliss. It contains a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, two school-houses, and a constabulary barrack. Worm Ditch, the remains of an ancient embankment, can still be traced in the immediate vicinity of the village, and has been followed hence for several miles. Adjacent to the village on the north is the well-wooded and beautifully contoured demesne of Hilltown, the property and residence of Col. Madden. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

SCOTSTOWN, a village in the parish of Tedavnet, barony and co. of Monaghan, Ulster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Tedavnet to Clones with that from Monaghan to Brookborough, 2½ miles south-west of Tedavnet, and 4 west-north-west of Monaghan. It contains a dispensary and a constabulary barrack; and within a mile of it are a Roman Catholic chapel, and the seats of Sackgrove, Gola, and Carrachor. The dispensary is within the Monaghan Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 36,000 acres, with a pop. of 15,352; and, in 1839, it expended £80, and administered to 1,406 patients. Fairs are held on the 17th of every month. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 210. Houses 35.

SCOURLOUGHSTOWN. See SCURLOGSTOWN.

SCRABBY, or BALLYMACALENNY, a parish, containing a post-village of the same name, in the barony of Tullaghonoho, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, southward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 6,661 acres, 14 perches,—of which 1,182 acres, 11 perches are in Lough Gounagh, and 195 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 2,668; in 1841, 2,836. Houses 498. The surface constitutes the chief part of the frontier toward co. Longford, and is greatly diversified in outline and character, but consists for the most part of poor land. The characteristic scenery is almost strictly identical with that of Lough Gounagh, and is noticed in the article GOUNAGH: which see. The principal seats are Cloone-house, Lakeview, and Hollyvale-house. The road from Ballinagh to Longford, and that from Carrigallen to Killeshandra pass through the interior. The hamlet of Scrabby-Bridge stands on the latter of these roads, immediately before it passes into co. Longford. The village of Scrabby stands at the intersection of the two roads, and between Swan-lake and Lough Gounagh, 3½ miles south-south-east of Arvagh, and 6 south-west of Ballinagh. Fairs are held on Ascension Thursday and Dec. 11. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 183; in 1841, 170. Houses 33.—Scrabby parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of GRANARD [which see], in the dio. of Ardagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £87 13s. 10d., and the rectorial for £70 3s. 1d.; and the proprietorship of the latter is a matter of dispute. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church was quite recently rebuilt, by means of a contribution of £723 4s. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Sittings 158; attendance 70. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 301, and the Roman Catholics to 2,370; and 4 daily schools—one of which was aided with £14 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and advantages worth about £5 a-year from Mr. Fleming—had on their books 207 boys and 140 girls.

SCRABO, a hill on the mutual boundary of the parishes of Newtown-Ardes and Comber, 1½ mile south-south-west of the town of Newtown-Ardes, barony of Lower Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. Its summit has an altitude of 534 feet above sea-level, and commands an extensive and very beautiful prospect. The hill has a fertile soil, and is arable to the summit.

SCRAGGS, a mountain in the parish of Inniskeel, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. Its summit overhangs Lough Finn, forming a twin summit with the loftier Aghla; and it has an altitude above sea-level of 1,406 feet.

SCREEB, a hamlet in the parish of Kilcummin, barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands at the head of the most inland branch of Killkerran bay, 10 miles west-south-west of Oughterard. Pop. not specially returned.

SCREEN. See SKREEN.

SCRONTHEA, a small suburb of Clonmel, in the parish of St. Mary of Clonmel, barony of Upperthird, co. Waterford, Munster. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 244. Houses 46.

SCULLABOGUE, a small demesne, and the scene of a most horrible tragedy during the rebellion of 1798, in the parish of Newbawn, barony of West Shelmalier, 5 miles north-west by west of Taghmon, and 6½ east-south-east of New Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Carrickburn-hill, in the immediate vicinity, was the site of the rebel camp at the time when the resolution was adopted to march upon New Ross; and when that resolution was acted upon, a large number of loyal persons, chiefly but not exclusively Protestants, were left under guard at Scullabogue. The mansion then belonged to Captain King; and had, a few days before, been abandoned by his family. A barn belonging to it was made the prison of most of the loyalist captives; and the kitchen of the mansion itself was the prison of the remainder. On the evening of the rebels' defeat at New Ross, some of their fugitive or retreating army, exasperated to madness by defeat, revenge, and drink, gave a message to the commander at Scullabogue, that all his prisoners should be destroyed. Accordingly, those in the kitchen, amounting in number to 37, were brought out one by one and shot on the steps of the hall door; and those in the barn, variously stated to amount to from 80 to 184, were burned alive on the spot, by the ignition and conflagration of the building. The incidents of the massacre are too horrible to admit of minute narration; and the circumstances which occasioned them, though generally pronounced to have been unpremeditated, have never been clearly explained. "Part of the walls of the barn," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "are still standing. It would be a work of generosity and charity to pass the plough over the foundations. It sickened us to look upon the yet blackened walls, and to hear the gardener state that he seldom trenched the adjacent ground without delving up some reminder of the horrible scene. One man was introduced to us who was hidden for two days and nights in the cupboard of an attic of Scullabogue-house; he described to us with a shudder and look of deep horror, his sensations when he heard the shots fired; and afterwards the fearful shrieks of the wretched inmates of the barn. His agony was increased by the fact that several persons remained nearly the whole of the time of his confinement in the room where he was concealed, and spoke to each other repeatedly of the events going on below, upon which they were coolly looking from the window."

SCULLOGE, a wild and alpine defile, partly in the parish of Templeshambo, barony of Scarewalsh, co. Wexford, and partly in the parish of Kiltannel, barony of East Idrome, co. Carlow, Leinster. It is a gap or natural cut between the Mount Leinster range of mountains on the north, and the Blackstairs range on the south; and it is traversed by the road from Enniscorthy to Borris, or rather from the whole of the centre of co. Wexford to the whole of the south of co. Carlow.

SCULLOGESTOWN. See BALLYSCULLOGE. SCURLOGESTOWN, or SCURLOCHTOWN, a parish in the barony of Lower Deece, 2½ miles east-south-east of Trim, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, north-westward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 2,569 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches,—of which 14 acres, 3 roods, 8 perches are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 328; in 1841, 389. Houses 58. The whole of the surface is arable land. The river Boyne traces the western boundary; and the rivulet Hoycetown runs along the southern border. A castle was erected here, about the year 1180, by William De Scurlog, on lands granted to him by Sir Hugh De Lacy. The ruins of this structure still exist; and they exhibit the remains of a spacious square keep, with circular towers at the corners. The apertures which serve as windows are few; and the whole pile is stern, inornate, and repulsive. The church of the parish appears to have been nearly as old in date as the castle; and was granted by its founder to the abbey of St. Thomas in Dublin, and confirmed to that establishment in 1200, by Walter De Lacy, under the name of the Church of William Scurlage's-Town. Two rude circular arches and some mural fragments of the church are still standing.—This church is a curacy, and part of the benefice of TRIM [which see], in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £24. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £135 0s.

4½d.; and are inappropriate in Joseph Ashe, Esq. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 332; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

SCURLOGESTOWN, a village in the parish of Burry, barony of Upper Kells, 2½ miles south-west of the town of Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 181. Houses 31.

SEACOURT, the demesne of the Earl of Bantry, in the parish of Kilmacconogue, barony of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated adjacent to the town of Bantry, on the south-east shore of the bay of Bantry; and it combines the advantages of local shelter with the command of noble views of Bantry bay and the woods of Glengariff. A small but prettily situated park which surrounds the mansion, reaches to the edge of the water, and contains in its more sheltered places the ruins of an abbey and some handsome trees. Mr. White, the ancestor of the present noble proprietor, acted a very distinguished and patriotic part during the attempt at the French invasion in 1796; and he was successively made Baron of Bantry in 1797, Viscount Bantry in 1800, and Earl of Bantry and Viscount Berehaven in 1816.

SEAFIELD, a fishing hamlet in the parish of Kilmurry, barony of Ubrickane, co. Clare, Munster. It is situated on the coast of Malbay, opposite Mutton Island, and 4½ miles south-west of Milltown-Malbay. It stands on the property of the Marquis of Conyngham. A fishery pier was built here by means of a grant of £817 16s. from government, and £115 7s. from the Dublin Committee; but it can be approached by even a vessel of 12 tons only at spring tides. This pier is 330 feet in length, and is in good repair. Yet, with ludicrous absurdity, the pier was erected without any care being used to open a channel to it; and it confronts a sea-ground too obstructed with rocks to be possibly navigable. The consequence was that, a few years ago, no sea-craft or fishing-boats belonged to it except wicker-boms covered with tarred canvass; and yet the obstructing rocks on the way to it were capable of being easily removed without blasting; and the harbour, but for their being in the way, was capable of affording shelter at all times of the year, and of creating a large trade in local fisheries, and a considerable trade in corn with Galway. A coast-guard station exists at Seafield; and the fishing craft within its district in 1836, consisted of 80 row-boats, and were worked by 240 men. In the immediate vicinity are the hamlet of Kilmurry, the seats of Tromra-lodge and Seafield-house, and the ruins of a church and a castle.

SEAFORDE, anciently NEACHEN, a village in the parish of Loughinisland, barony of Kinnelarty, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the road from Clough to Ballinahinch, 1 mile north of Clough, and 6 miles south-south-east of Ballinahinch. It contains the church of Loughinisland, and a Presbyterian meeting-house,—the latter formerly belonging to the Secession Synod. Immediately north of it is Seaforde-house, the fine residence of Lady Harriet Forde. A court of petty-sessions is held in the village on the second Tuesday of every month. Fairs are held on March 7, June 9, Sept. 4, and Dec. 5. In 1843, a loan fund, which has since ceased to work, had a capital of £343, and circulated £2,822 in 553 loans. A dispensary in the village is within the Poor-law union of Downpatrick, and serves for a district of 14,277 acres, with a pop. of 6,936; and, in 1839, it expended £126 5s. 6d., and administered to 2,440 patients. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1841, 394. Houses 67. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 24; in manufactures and trade, 41; in other pursuits, 8. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 3; on the directing of labour, 36; on their own manual labour, 32; on means not specified, 2.

SEAGOE, or SGOGE, a parish in the barony of East O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. It contains a small part of the town of PORTADOWN: which see. Length, northward, 6½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 10,982 acres, 39 perches,—of which 1,236 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches are in Lough Neagh, and 49 acres, 2 roods, 20 perches are in the river Bann. Pop., in 1831, 9,736; in 1841, 11,094. Houses 1,915. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 10,911. Houses 1,887. It extends from the point at which the river Bann enters co. Armagh, to a point in Lough Neagh 4 of a mile north of Bird Island; and it is divided into the three manorial districts of Carrowbrack, Kerdnan, and Derry, the first containing 16 ballyboes or townlands, the second 20, and the third 11. The river Bann traces the western boundary over a distance of about 4½ miles; and is there navigated by vessels of 60 tons, passing between Lough Neagh and the Newry Canal. The parochial surface is gently undulating ground, free from hilly elevations, and nearly allied in character to a sheer plain. A rising ground, called Drumclogher or the Stoney-Back, and serving as the alarm-post of the local yeomanry, commands a full view of nearly the whole parish. The land is generally fertile, and in some parts of decidedly prime quality. A considerable tract of turbary in the north-west adjoins the great turbary of the adjacent parish of Montiaha; and some patches of turf occur in other districts. A damp exhalation which arises in winter from the marshy and flooded grounds on the banks of the Bann, is highly prejudicial in cases of pulmonary disease, and has made many of the parishioners its victims. A limestone quarry occurs in the townland of Balteagh and Kilfergan; a hard blue building stone, of facile preparation for the mason, and of superior character for ordinary edifices, is raised in the townland of Killycomain; and a gravel of excellent quality for walks and roads, speedily binding and without any mixture of clay, is found in the rising ground of Drumlin in the southern parochial border. Carriek-house, situated in the south, is an old and large edifice, presenting many of the fantastic features which belonged to the ornamental domestic architecture of the 17th century. Silverwood-house, situated in the north-eastern border, is a neat brick edifice. The Ulster railway, and the road from Armagh to Belfast, pass through the interior. "Some years ago, when the north of Ireland was disturbed by those deluded wretches called Hearts of Oak, and Hearts of Steel, this parish came in for its share of the contagion. These meetings took place at a cross road, called, from a large rock on the spot, the Blue-stone. A dreadful murder was committed near this spot in the year 1781, and the perpetrators being brought here for execution, their bodies were thrown into a hole by the side of the rock, which was heaved upon the top of them; some days afterwards, their friends having shown a disposition to take up the bodies, a spirited magistrate repaired to the spot, where they had actually commenced operations; he then had the remains dug out, and having burned them, swept the ashes into the hole, burying the rock with them below the surface of the road, where it has lain undisturbed to this day." A dispensary in the parish is within the Poor-law union of Lurgan, and serves for a district of 6,500 acres, with a pop. of 6,492; and, in 1839, it expended £61 8s., and administered to 614 patients.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of the archdeaconry of Dromore, in the dio. of Dromore. Tithe composition, £330; glebe, £632 7s. 7d. Gross income, £982 7s. 7d.; nett, £900 9s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates receive salaries of respectively £75 and £50. The church is situated about a mile north-north-east of Portadown, and was built in 1812, partly by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings, 1,000; attendance, from 120 to 300. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by upwards of 100; and the Methodist meeting-house, by upwards of 200. The Roman Catholic chapels of Aughaccommon and the Lyle have an attendance of respectively 800 and 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 6,200 Churchmen, 724 Presbyterians, 97 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,023 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 431 boys and 302 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £7 a-year from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £6 1s. 10d. from Col. Blacker; one, with £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £18 from Lord Mandeville; one, from £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, and £2 from Archdeacon Saurin; one, with a sum not reported from the Association for Discountenancing Vice; and one with £25 from Lord Mandeville. In 1843, a National school at Aughaccommon was salaried with £12 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 102 boys and 71 girls.

SEAL ISLAND, an islet off the south side of the entrance of Strabreaga bay, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster.

SEAPARK, a demesne in the parish of Malahide, barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. It is situated ½ of a mile south-east of the village of Malahide, and slopes pleasantly to Malahide bay. The mansion is a large, square edifice, with a flat roof, and an encircling parapet. The mansion of Seapark was built, and the portion of the ancient manor of Malahide, now attached to Seapark, was obtained by Nicholas Morris, Esq., second son of Sir John Morris, Bart., of Knockagh-castle in co. Tipperary, on his marriage with the eldest daughter of Richard Talbot, Esq. of Malahide-castle; but the property afterwards reverted to the Talbot family; and the mansion has, of comparatively late years, been occupied by successively Sir Robert Leeson, Capt. Mends, and Mr. Sweeney.

SEAPATRICK, a parish in the baronies of Lower Iveagh and Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. The Upper Iveagh section contains the town of BANBRIDGE: which see. Two detached districts of the Lower Iveagh section lie mutually 3 furlongs asunder, and respectively 3 furlongs north and 5 north-north-west of the main body of the parish; and they measure respectively 1½ mile by 1, and 1 mile by ½. Length of the main body, north-westward, 4½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½. Area of the Lower Iveagh section, 3,140 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches,—of which 5 acres, 2 roods, 3 perches are water. Area of the Upper Iveagh section, 4,441 acres, 2 roods, 32 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,585; in 1841, 9,528. Houses 1,696. Pop. of the Lower Iveagh section, in 1831, 2,485; in 1841, 3,026. Houses 521. Pop. of the rural districts of the Upper Iveagh section, in 1831, 2,631; in 1841, 3,178. Houses 602. The surface is a series of beautiful undulations, tumuli and hillocks, picturesquely ploughed from end to end by the rich and charming vale of the river Bann. The land is everywhere arable, quite unencumbered by bog, and possessing only enough of wood, in hedge-rows and small clumps, to be free from bleakness and baldness. A large establishment for weaving union-cloth by machinery stands at Seapatrik; two factories for spinning thread stand below Banbridge; and the villas and works of linen-bleachers beautify the greater part of the vale of the Bann. The principal rural residences are Daisy-hill, Bannview, Chequer-hill, Ballymoney-lodge, Brookfield, Ballevy-house, Chinawley, Parknowen, Whitehill, Greenhill-house, Seapattrick, Millmount, Milltown, Bann-villa, and Huntly-Glen. The road from Belfast to Dublin passes through the interior. —This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Dromore. Vicarial tithe composition, £119 11s. 9d.; glebe, £155 5s. Gross income, £274 16s. 9d.; nett, £220 13s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £271 4s. 7d., and are appropriated to the deanery of Dromore. The old church stood at Seapattrick, was of unknown date, and contained 350 sittings. The present church is situated near Banbridge, and it was quite recently built by means of a gift of £1,500 from the late Board of First Fruits, a donation of £600 from the Marquis of Downshire, and the sum of £790 2s. 6d. raised by private subscription. The site of the church was also a free gift from the Marquis of Downshire. Attendance 300. A Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly belonging to the Synod of Ulster, is attended by 200; a Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly belonging to the Secession Synod, by from 150 to 200; a meeting-house, belonging to the Remonstrant Synod, by 200; a Wesleyan meeting-house, by 200; and a Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house, by 100. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,427 Churchmen, 4,777 Presbyterians, 120 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,424 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools had on their books 367 boys and 343 girls. One of the schools was salaried with £6 a-year from subscription, £8 from the Association for Discourteuing Vice, and £2 from the vicar; one, with £10 from the National Board, and £13 from interest on a legacy; one, with £20 from Mrs. Walshe and other subscribers; and each of two with £25 from subscription. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at Ballydoon, two at respectively Banbridge and Mulligans, and one in Banbridge workhouse.

SEEFIN, the loftiest of the Castle-Oliver hills, on the southern border of the barony of Cosmah, and of the county of Limerick, Munster. It is situated 6 miles south of Kilmallock, and it lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,706 feet above sea-level.

SEEFINGAN, a mountain on the north margin of the parish of Kilbride, of the barony of Lower Talbotstown, and of the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated 2 miles west-north-west of Kippure mountain, and 5½ north-east by east of Blessington; and it lifts its summit to the altitude of 2,364 feet above sea-level.

SEGOE. See SEAGE.

SEIRKYRAN, SEIRKIERAN, or ST. KIERAN, a parish in the barony of Ballybrit, 4½ miles east-south-east of Birr, King's co., Leinster. Length, south by westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from ¾ to 2½; area, 5,825 acres, 38 perches,—of which 648 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches lie slightly detached. Pop., in 1831, 1,484; in 1841, 1,637. Houses 274. The surface is comparatively low and level; and consists, for the most part, of second-rate land. The Little Brosna river flows along the northern boundary. A large aggregate of land, particularly in the west, is disposed in demesne and villa grounds. A curious tree, called the Three Sisters, stands in the south. The principal seats are Oakley-house, Mossfield-house, Grange-house, Kilmain-house, Grouse-lodge, and Seirbrook. The chief antiquities are the ecclesiastical ruins of Seirkyran, the ruins of Ballynooney-castle, and the site of Carroll's-castle. The hamlets of Clareen and Longford stand in respectively the centre and the extreme east; and the former pretty nearly represents the ancient Seirkyran. This place was anciently an ecclesiastical locality of great note, and the site of a monastery and a bishopric, alleged to have been founded at an early date, and to have had as their founder the St. Kieran, whom hagiology sometimes designates the Father of Irish Saints. The monastery of Seirkyran is said to have been frequently plundered by the Danes and by other freebooters. The annals of Innisfallen say that, in 1144, Conor O'Connor, king of Meath, was slain at Seirkyran, by O'Douley, king of Fearcal. Ecclesiastical historians relate that the see of Seirkyran was removed in 1052 to Aghaboe, whence it was translated, in the latter part of the 12th century, to Kilkenny; and they state also, that, in 1284, Geoffrey de St. Leger, bishop of Ossory, recovered, by trial of single combat, the manor of Seirkyran as part of the see-lands of his diocese. Seirkyran was originally called Sargor; and it stood within the ancient district or toparchy of Ely O'Carroll. "At present," says the writer of a notice of it in the Dublin Penny Journal, "there is little remaining to indicate the former greatness of this place—a few mouldering walls, built with pudding-stone, and a stunted stone-roofed tower, partly covered with ivy, about 15 feet in diameter externally, and 20 feet high, being the only remnants of antiquity appearing above the level of the soil. The vestiges of the numerous deep ditches and high ramparts, which nearly surround the place, and encompass about 10 Irish plantation acres, indicate that it was formerly of importance; and the crumbling ruin of a sod fort, about 70 feet square, is a convincing proof that the occupants in distant ages had an eye to personal security as well as to the worship of the Deity. These ramparts are in some places double, and seem to have been of that description which Cambracensis alluded to when writing 'Civitates fossatis et muris optime cinctant.' St. Kieran, who is said to have been born at Cape Clear, or, as Harris has it, at Clear Island, in the ancient district of Corcamluighe, in Munster, in the 5th century, was the founder of this house for regular canons of St. Augustine. His father's name was Lugneus, a noble of Ossory, and his mother, Liadian of Corcamluighe, or Carbery, in South Munster. It is said that he met St. Patrick in Italy, who desired him to proceed before him to Ireland, and at a fountain called Fuaran, about the centre of the kingdom, to build a monastery where St. Patrick would afterwards visit him. I shall not stop now to inquire whether such a conversation ever took place, but content myself with merely observing that the ruin I describe in this article, is actually adjoining the small stream called Fuaran, which purls away on the east side of it; and there is also, a little to the south of the church, a holy well, neatly faced with stone embankments of a quadrilateral form, and shaded with thorns, well hung with torn scraps of calico dedicated to the tutelary saint. There is yet to be seen in the middle of the churchyard of Seirkyran, a very ancient freestone slab, having a cross and a few Irish letters visible upon it. From the letters legible, only a few being so, I am induced to suppose it the tomb of Caomb Oran, or gentle Oran, who, as he was abbot of Aghaboe, and died in 1066, was probably bishop of Ossory, and having removed from Saiger, 1052, at the transfer of the see, his corpse was, in all likelihood, interred in the latter place. By far the most curious thing at Seirkyran is the round tower, and to which I have never seen a similar one. It is only about 20 feet high, with a conical stone-roof, and was evidently erected subsequent to the fabric that once stood beside it, and against the south-east angle of which it was built. It contains a great many loop-holes around it. These are three or four inches square on the outside, but are bevelled off so as to adjoin each other on the inside. Some of the holes are not on a level with the others. * * * There is a beautiful demesne called Oakley, in this parish; it belongs to George Stoney, Esq., who has expended large sums of money, adorning, with all the diversities of water and landscape, his mansion here, and in doing that which, in a public point of view, is still more creditable, namely, giving employment to the labouring classes. In a fort in this demesne was found, a few years ago, the haft of a penknife of brass, having upon it, in Roman characters, 'Success to the King of Prussia—I say, for ever, huzza!' It was probably brought here by some of the Germans in the year 1798. It is now in the collection of Mr. Cooke, of Parsonstown. The Roman Catholic chapel in this parish is a tolerable edifice; and the present parish-church is not only a plain, but damp and uncomfortable old building. The only thing remarkable about it is its having, projecting from the western gable end, an ancient freestone bust of St. Kyrán, which probably ornamented the more ancient fabric. The eastern gable is ornamented with an old freestone window-frame, at some distance from which there also projects from the wall a grotesque figure, in freestone, about a foot and a-half long."—Seirkyran parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £78 7s. 9d.; glebe, £22 3s. 1d. Gross income, £161 9s. 5½d.; nett, £128 14s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £84 9s. 8d.; and are inappropriate in George Bennet, Esq., Mr. Cassidy, and the representatives of Mr. Curtis. The former church was old and dilapidated. Sittings 300; attendance, from 30 to 40. A new church, to contain 158 sittings, was recently built, by means of contributions of £540 11s. 9d. from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and £68 from private sources. The Roman Catholic chapels at Clareen and Tancraft have an attendance of respectively from 500 to 600, and about 200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 180, and the Roman Catholics to 1,341; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 81 boys and 33 girls.

SELSKER-ABBEY. See WEXFORD.

SESKINAN, a parish in the barony of Decies-without-Druin, 6 miles north-east of Cappoquin, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, south-south-westward, 6½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 5½; area, 16,876 acres, 2 roads, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,732; in 1841, 3,210. Houses 451. By far the greater part of the surface is mountainous; much is of small value or totally waste; a district in the east and near the centre is one of the wildest portions of the Cummeragh mountains; and the best land in even the arable districts is worth not more than 20s. per acre per annum. Two tiny lakes, possessing a surface-elevation of upwards of 1,200 feet above sea-level, lie on the north-eastern boundary. The river Nier issues from these lakes, and careers along the northern boundary, till it has an elevation above sea-level of less than 403 feet. Two head-streams of the Callilagh rivulet rise near the centre of the parish, at altitudes of respectively 874 and 927 feet. The Phinisk river runs southward across the western district; and waters there the lowest and best ground in the parish. One height in the extreme west has an altitude above sea-level of 1,417 feet; one in the extreme north has an altitude of 867 feet; one in the extreme east has an altitude of 2,340 feet; and one a little north of the centre has an altitude of 1,321 feet. The principal hamlets are Knockaunbrannan, in the north border; Ballinamult, in the vale of the Phinisk; Tooraneena and Cloorcogaile, 1 and 1¼ mile south-south-east of Ballinamult; and Knockboy and Beantasour, in the south-east border. A barrack stands at Ballinamult. The principal seats are Lackindarra, Cahirnaleague-lodge, Doon-lodge, and Corradoon-house. The chief antiquities are the sites of two churches, the fort of the three stones, and a cromlech.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £111 15s. 1d.; nett, £106 3s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. But the benefice has been suspended under the provisions of the Church Temporalities Act; and the incumbent of the adjoining benefice discharges the occasional duties for a salary of £35. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £184 12s. 3½d.; and are appropriated to the prebend of Seskinan in Lismore cathedral. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapels at Tooraneena and Knockaunbrannan have attendances of respectively 2,500 and 250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 2,874; and 5 pay daily schools had on their books 218 boys and 124 girls.

SESKINORE, a village in the parish of Clogherney, barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands 2½ miles north-east by east of Fintona, on the road thence to Six-mile-Cross. It contains a meeting-house and a schoolhouse; and within a mile of it are Seskinore-lodge, Perrymount-house, Mullaghmore-house, Riverland-house, and Greenmount-house. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 134. Houses 28.

SESSIAGH, a small lake in the parish of Clondorbory, 1½ mile east-south-east of Dunfanaghy, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is beautiful though small; and is backed by a lofty range of hills which rise boldly from the water's edge. The seat of Marble Hill is situated on its east shore, toward the coast of Sheephaven.

SEVEN ARCHES, a series of interesting and curious sea-caverns, on the Lough Swilly coast of the parish of Clondeavaddock, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. "They are all connected, and some of them are 300 feet in length, maintaining an average breadth of 15 feet, and are 30 feet high at the entrance, diminishing inwards. At ebb-tides they are easy of access, and have generally a smooth sandy floor."

SEVEN CHURCHES, various celebrated and popularly-venerated groups of ecclesiastical ruins. See GLENDALOUGH, CLONMACNOISE, INNISCALTRA, INNISCATTERTY, &c.

SEVEN CHURCHES, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ardagh, Leinster. It is situated on the western border of King's county; it has chapels at Clonmacnoise and Shamoin Harbour; and its post-town is Ferbane.

SEVEN HEADS, a cape in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. It terminates the comparatively large and spreading peninsula which separates Courtmacsherry on the east from the bay of Clonakilty on the west.

SEVEN HOGS. See HOG ISLANDS.

SHALLEE. See SHELLEE.

SHALLON, a village in the parish of Kilsharvan, barony of Lower Duleek, co. Meath, 3 miles south by east of Drogheda, Leinster. In its vicinity are Dardestown-castle, Kilsharvan-house, Cooper-bill, Annagor-house, and Beaumont. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 169. Houses 28.

SHANAGOLDEN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the northern part of the barony of Shanid, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 14; area, 4,233 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,213; in 1841, 2,716. Houses 451. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,366; in 1841, 2,168. Houses 347. The surface consists of tolerably good land; and is traversed by the road from Limerick to Tarbert. The village of Shanagolden stands about a mile south of that road, 1½ mile south of Foynes Island in the Shannon, 4 west by south of Askeaton, and 7¼ north-west of Rathkeale. Fairs are held on Wednesday after Trinity Sunday and Sept. 4. A dispensary in the village is within the Rathkeale Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 10,366; and, in 1839-40, it expended £153 5s., and administered to 1,400 patients. The Shannon line of proposed railway will not be available for Shanagolden at a nearer distance than 5 statute miles. Area of the village, 40 acres. Pop., in 1831, 847; in 1841, 548. Houses 94. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 31; in manufactures and trade, 46; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 7; on the directing of labour, 60; on their own manual labour, 33; on means not specified, 7. About a mile south-south-east of the village, in an isolated position near the edge of the great mountainous tract of Limerick and Kerry, is the prominent, double-peaked, steep, grassy, and considerably high hill of Shanid, crowned with a Cyclopean fort and with the ruins of Shanid-castle. It gives name to the barony, and is itself called Shanid,—quasi Shanait, 'the old place.' "It terminates in a double peak, evidently artificial, each forming a truncated cone, fashioned in ages remote, for purposes of defence. That to the north is surmounted by a castle, the area of which, 180 feet in circumference, covers the whole extent of platform. In height this structure is something between 30 and 40 feet. The walls are ten feet in thickness. Its form is polygonal without, circular within. It contains neither vault nor staircase. An external wall about 20 feet in height, and but little in advance from it, surrounds the structure. Lower down, a deep fosse 600 feet in circumference, flanked by an earthen rampart, forms a girdle round the hill. Previously to the seventeenth century, this castle was held by the Earls of Desmond; and the cry of 'Shanid aboo,' that is 'Shanid victorious,' or 'hurra for Shanid,' forms the motto of the knights of Glin, a still subsisting branch of the Geraldines, as 'Croom-aboo,' from the place called Croom, in the same county, has been adopted as the motto of another branch of the same spreading family,—that of the Duke of Leinster. The southern peak is crowned by one of the ancient raths; a hill-fort formed of earth, and surrounded with deep fosses or ramparts. The area of this is extensive, and it possesses a feature peculiar to it, that of being subdivided into four equal portions by the intersection of a rather deep cut through the centre; with what object it is hard to determine. This structure is, of course, of greater antiquity than the adjacent castle. The utmost date that can be assigned to the latter, is the commencement of the 12th century, whilst that of the rath may be lost in the clouds and mist of remote ages."—Shanagolden parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition, £66 13s. 4d.; glebe, £45. Gross income, £148 13s. 4d.; nett, £131 16s. 10d. Patron, the precentor of Limerick cathedral. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £133 6s. 8d.; and are appropriated to the precentor of Limerick cathedral. The church was built upwards of 200 years ago; and was repaired and enlarged in 1815, by means of a loan of £443 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance, about 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 1,800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Kilmoylan and Robertstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 41, and the Roman Catholics to 3,306; and 6 pay daily schools had on their books 133 boys and 48 girls. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at Foynes, and one at Shanagolden.

SHANBALLY, the demesne of Viscount Lisamore, in the parish of Shanrahan, 2 miles north-east of Clogheen, barony of West Iffa and Offa, co. Tipperary, Munster. It is beautifully situated on low ground, in the centre of the valley between the Galtee mountains on the north and the Knockmeledown mountains on the south; and it commands the most magnificent views of the slopes, escarpments, summits, and groupings of both of these alpine ranges. Its own plantations are extensive; and besides being a fine feature in themselves, they give a warmth of tinting to the prevailing coldness of the circumjacent landscape. The mansion is a fine modern castellated edifice, built after designs by Mr. Nash; and it occupies a site of 281 feet of altitude above the level of the sea, and about 80 feet above the level of the adjacent brook. In the vicinity are the wonderful caves of MITCHELLTOWN: which see.

SHANBALLY, a hamlet in the parish of Shanrahan, barony of West Iffa and Offa, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands in the vicinity of the demesne noticed in the preceding article. A little north of it are the hamlet of Burncourt, and the interesting ruins of Burncourt mansion,—the latter originally built by one of the Barons of Ikerrin, and besieged and captured by a part of the army of Cromwell.

SHANBALLYMORE, a village in the parish of Templeoran, barony of Fermoy, 3½ miles east of Doneraile, co. Cork, Munster. Fairs are held in Feb., May, Sept., and Dec. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 415; in 1841, 471. Houses 85. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 46; in manufactures and trade, 33; in other pursuits, 9. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 2; on the directing of labour, 32; on their own manual labour, 52.

SHANBOUGH, a parish in the barony of Ida, 1½ mile south-west of Rosbercon, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 14; area, 1,802 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 429; in 1841, 401. Houses 84. The surface consists of medium-rate land; and is traversed by the road from New Ross to Waterford. The river Barrow traces the whole of the eastern boundary. The only seat is Annagh-house; and the antiquities are the ruins of Annagh-castle and Shanbough-church.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ROSBERCON [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £27 13s.; glebe, £5. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £66 4s. 6d.; and are inappropriate in the corporation of the city of Waterford. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 434; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

SHANCOUGH, a parish in the barony of Tiragh-rill, 8½ miles south-east of Collooney, co. Sligo, Connaught. Length, south-westward, 4½ miles; breadth, from 4 to 2; area, 5,441 acres, 1 rood, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,208; in 1841, 1,389. Houses 292. The greater part of the surface is upland; and a considerable portion is waste. A height on the northern boundary has an altitude of 999 feet above sea-level, and is surmounted by O'Connor's monument. A height on the southern boundary, yet more within Kilmacroney than within Shancough, has an altitude of 1,346 feet above sea-level. Some of the sources of the Arigna river are on the eastern border. The road from Sligo to Keadue passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KILMACTRAWEY [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £16 12s. 4d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Col. Percival. In 1834, all the parishioners were Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

SHANDANGAN, a hamlet in the barony of East Muskerry, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. Adjacent to it is the mansion of Shandangan. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Wednesday of every month.

SHANDON, a small demesne in the parish of Dungarvan, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile north of the town of Dungarvan, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. Here, in a limestone rock, is a cavern of considerable extent.

SHANDON, co. Cork. See CORK (COUNTY OF THE CITY OF).

SHANDRUM, a parish in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, 5 miles west-south-west of Charleville, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of NEWTOWN and DROMINA: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2; area, 13,451 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,627; in 1841, 5,161. Houses 764. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,711. Houses 688. The land is of good quality for both tillage and pasturage. Much of the surface is comparatively high, and contains improved pasture-farms. Among the residences is Shandrum-house. Fairs are held on May 25 and Aug. 20. The road from Charleville to Newmarket passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £804 19s. 10d.; glebe, £12 13s. 4d. Gross income, £817 13s. 2d.; nett, £684 4s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is in a ruinous condition; and a schoolhouse, licensed by the diocesan for the purpose, is used as the parochial place of worship. Sittings 100; attendance 35. The Roman Catholic chapels at Shandrum and Cooliline have each an attendance of 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1814, the Protestants amounted to 60, and the Roman Catholics to 4,760; a daily school supported by the rector, was usually attended by about 9 children; and 7 pay daily schools had on their books 275 boys and 149 girls.

SHANE, or SHEAN, a demesne in the parish of Straboe, barony of East Maryborough, 3 miles north-east of the town of Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. Its proprietor is Thomas Kemmis, Esq. In 1397, the manor of Shane was instituted by Sir Robert Preston, in right of his wife Margaret; and afterward it was dependent on Dunamase, and shared in the various revolutions of that important military strength. Shane-castle, the ruins of which still exist within the demesne, was built soon after the erection of the military works of Dunamase; and though not of very great size, it was of much importance, considerable strength, and very easy defence. The ruins crown a very steep conical hill, all whose sides fall rapidly off from the summit. The original name of the manor and the castle was Sion or Sheehan. The castle, though sharing the political fates of Dunamase, escaped demolition; and after continuing for centuries in a neglected yet well-preserved state, it was at great expense, and in the latter part of the last century, restored, embellished, and converted into a delightful residence by Dean Coote.

SHANE'S CASTLE, the demesne of Earl O'Neill, in the parish of Drummaul, barony of Upper Toome, 2½ miles north-west of Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. It extends 2 miles along the foot or north end of Lough Neagh, and 2 miles from Lough Neagh northward to Randalstown; and it is bisected from north to south by the river Main. It is freely accessible to strangers; and, in its great extent of both old and young plantations, its views of the great monarch-lake of the three kingdoms, its rich and well-kept gardens, its noble esplanade and fine conservatory, the ruins of its picturesque castellated mansion, and its profuse historical associations with the name of O'Neill, it presents an absolute museum of interest to at once the artist, the antiquary, and the lover of rural scenery. The princely pile of Shane's-castle, which had for centuries been the residence of the noble house of O'Neill, rose proudly from the shore of Lough Neagh, and was in fine keeping with the demesne, as one of the most magnificent in Ireland, but was burnt in the year 1816 by an accidental fire. A very large party were on a visit to the noble proprietor at the time when the fire broke out; but all their exertions and all those of the stated residents and of the neighbouring tenantry were unavailing to arrest the progress of the flames. A superb addition to the original pile was in course of erection; and this, as well as the inhabited building, was irretrievably destroyed. A large fortified esplanade, furnished with cannon, and a grand modern conservatory of rare and foreign plants, alone escaped without injury. An extensive library and many valuable paintings were wholly consumed. "From the ruins which remain," says a writer in an excellent but short-lived Dublin periodical, "it is evident that the castle was a fine spacious building. The vaults, which are still entire, and extend to the very verge of the lake, merit the particular notice of the curious traveller, both from their spaciousness and rather extraordinary construction. Several turrets and towers are still standing, and from their tops a fine view of the interesting scenery, amid which the ruins lie, may be obtained. A number of cannons are still mounted on the fort, which is boldly situated. Some of the buildings which formed a part of the out-offices, have been fitted up by the noble proprietor as a temporary residence. We have heard with pleasure, that it is his lordship's intention to erect a castle, if not on the ruins of the old one, on some spot in the immediate vicinity. * * The family of O'Neill are of Gothic descent, having sprung from Belus, a Gothic king of the Orkneys. They came into Ireland in the latter part of the ninth century, and were then called Nial O'Nial, or Hy Nial, which signifies a chief or prince. Having married into the family of some Irish prince, they soon became paramount chiefs of Ulster, and the most powerful opposers of the invaders of the country. In 1165, they defeated the Danes, and for several centuries they bravely opposed the ambitious encroachments of the English, with various success, and were never completely subjected to that power, till the latter part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, at which period the celebrated Shane O'Nial flourished. This chieftain was a man of singular character. Proud of his hereditary descent, and tenacious of his chieftain in Ulster, he not only deemed himself the genuine sovereign of the country, but vaunted that the Maggenia, the Mac-Guire, O'Reilly, O'Hanlan, O'Cahan, Mac-Brien, O'Hagan, O'Quin, Mac-Kenna, Mac-Carton, and all the Mac-Donnells, whom he styled Gallow-glasses, were his subjects and vassals. O'Nial was subtle in mind, alert in action, quick in expedient, haughty, vindictive, and unrelenting in disposition. He was munificent, social, and hospitable, but frequently intemperate at table, * * and if his enemies may be credited, a persevering votary of Bacthus. His cellar is said to have usually contained at least 200 tons of wine, of which, as well as of usquebaugh, he was in the habit of drinking to excess. When by copious libations to the jolly god he became intoxicated, his attendants placed him chin-deep in a pit, and then cast earth around him. In this clay bath he remained, inhumed as it were alive, until the velocity of his blood had abated, and his body had attained a cooler temperament. O'Nial's tenantry or vassals were habituated to the use of arms. Six hundred soldiers constituted his body-guard; and he was master of an army of four thousand foot and one thousand horse. His father Con O'Nial, had surrendered his territories to Henry VIII. and renounced the name of O'Nial. On this submission he had been appointed Earl of Tyrone, with remainder over to his reputed son Matthew, who was then created Baron of Dungannon. Subsequently, however, Shane asserted his independence, and at the head of a considerable force, burst into the English Pale, invading also the territories of the Irish chieftains. To check these proceedings, the Lord-deputy Sussex marched against him; and as further reinforcements were expected by the Deputy, O'Nial was advised to make his submission to the Queen in person. This, after various delays, he consented to do, and proceeded to London, where he appeared rather in the style of an independent prince, than of a vassal of the English Crown. The citizens of the British capital beheld with lively emotion the Ulster chieftain, accompanied by a splendid train of Irishmen, arrayed in the costume of their country, on whom they gazed with surprise, as on the natives of another hemisphere. A body-guard of Gallow-glasses, armed with battle axes, marched with O'Nial. Long curled hair descended from their uncovered heads; their linen vests were dyed with crocus, long sleeves, short tunics, and shaggy cloaks, rendered the whole dress more singularly conspicuous. Regardless of the law which prohibited the use of the national Hibernian costume, O'Nial appeared at the head of his guards as if he came in a genuine spirit of conscious independence, to treat on equal terms with the sovereign of the British empire, in her own capital. Having been greatly distinguished by royal favour, O'Nial returned triumphantly to Ireland, and for a short time acted with apparent zeal for the Queen, as he deemed himself her chosen champion. "The present peer," observe Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "is likely to be the last of the ancient and heroic race; and with him probably the O'Neill will cease to exist; a circumstance already contemplated as a calamity in his immediate neighbourhood—and not there alone. Few are more respected and beloved than the present descendant of a line of kings; he has succeeded in adding to the devotion and veneration of those who render him homage for his name's sake, the esteem and regard of the Sassenach—given by the latter far less because of his blood than his personal character, for he is surrounded by merchants, who have been the architects of their own fortunes."—A cemetery or vault of a branch of the O'Neill family is situated in a small burying-ground in the vicinity of the castle; and it displays on a stone in its gable, the following inscription, rudely engraved, "This vault was built by Shane MacBrien MacPhelim MacShane MacBrien MacPhelim O'Neill, Esquire, in the year 1722, for a burial-place to himself and family of Clanboy."

SHANE'S CASTLE, a quondam village in the parish of Drummaul, barony of Upper Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. It was a neat place, and stood closely adjoining the demesne noticed in the preceding article; but it was so completely removed by the present Earl O'Neill and his predecessor—who, however, accommodated the expelled inhabitants with houses on other parts of the estate—that not a vestige of it remains. The ancient name of both the village and the demesne was Edenduff-Carrick.

SHANGAN, a hamlet in the parish of Kilmahon, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It stands near Ballycotton bay, 4½ miles south-east of Cloyne. Pop. not specially returned.

SHANGANAGH, the splendid mansion and demesne of General Cockburn, in the parish of Rath-michael, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. The mansion is situated on the coast, 14 mile north of Bray; and is a tasteful modern castellated edifice, designed, as to its present exterior, by the architect Morrison. The original structure belonged to the family of Walsh of Old Connaught, and was of comparatively limited dimensions; and it was enlarged and improved into the present spacious and baronial mansion, under the direction of General Cockburn. "With his accustomed taste and skill, the architect has confined to the outward portion of the building all allusions to the gorgeous but rude manner of times long past. The interior, both as regards disposal and decoration, is well-adapted to the habits of refined life,—to the customs of society intent on intellectual pleasure, as well as hospitable entertainment. The classical acquirements and correct taste of General Cockburn have been displayed to the literary world in several estimable productions; and he has at this place a large and valuable library." The principal apartments contain many paintings of merit, several antique bronzes, some tables of Mosaic and Egyptian granite, numerous slabs of Greek and Roman marble, some volcanic specimens from Vesuvius and Etna, and various other collections in the fine arts and natural history; the hall contains a marble sarcophagus; the library has a copy of Guido's Aurora in its ceiling, and commands gorgeous views of the Dublin and Wicklow mountains, and the adjacent coast and sea; and the space immediately in front of the mansion is ornamented with a pillar of Grecian marble in commemoration of the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832.

SHANGOLDEN. See SHANAGOLDEN.

SHANID, a barony in the extreme north-west of the county of Limerick, Munster. It is bounded, on the north, by the estuary of the Shannon; on the east, by the barony of Lower Connello; on the south, by the barony of Glenquinn; and on the west, by the county of Kerry. Its area is 92,504 acres,—of which 8,158 acres are tide-way. The barony is of quite recent erection, and formerly constituted the western part of the barony of Lower Connello. Its surface includes part of the rich low ground along the Shannon, but principally consists of a portion of the great upland region of Limerick and Kerry; and as to the character of its soil, it will be found noticed under the word CONNELLO; which see. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred one townland of the parish of Nantinan from the barony of Lower Connello to that of Shanid,—pop., in 1841, 359; one townland of the parish of Ardagh, from the barony of Shanid to that of Glenquinn,—pop. 300; and two townlands of the parish of Kilbradran, from the barony of Shanid to that of Lower Connello,—pop. 11. The castle and the bill of Shanid, whence Shanid barony has its name, are noticed in the article on SHANAGOLDEN: which see.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ardagh, Kilbradran, Nantinan, and Newcastle, and the whole of the parishes of Dumnoylan, Killeoleen, Killeergus, Kilmoylan, Loughill, Rathronan, Robertstown, and Shanagolden. The towns and chief villages are Glin, Shanagolden, Ardagh, Ballyhabill, Athen, and Loughill. Pop., in 1841, 24,340. Houses 3,767.

Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,032; in manufactures and trade, 538; in other pursuits, 550. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 81; on the directing of labour, 1,064; on their own manual labour, 2,891; on means not specified, 84. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,325; who could read but not write, 1,162; who could neither read nor write, 5,014. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,251; who could read but not write, 1,266; who could neither read nor write, 7,194. —Shanid lies partly within the Poor-law union of Newcastle, and partly within that of Rathkale. The total number of valued tenements is 2,416; and of these, 944 were valued under £5,—337, under £10,—251, under £15,—151, under £20,—144, under £25,—95, under £30,—186, under £40,—83, under £50,—and 225, at and above £50.

SHANKILL, or SHANKHILL, the old name of the parish of Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. See BELFAST. The name Shankill signifies the old church or cell. The original parish-church stood adjacent to the old road to Antrim, about a mile west-north-west of Belfast; but every vestige of its walls long ago disappeared. "The only relic which now remains of its existence," says the History of Belfast, published in 1833, "is a weighty stone sunk in the earth of the grave-yard, out of which is cut a large circular cavity. This is said by tradition to have been the font; and as it is generally filled with water, the power of healing trifling diseases is superstitiously attributed to it by some old people." The church was attached, before the Reformation, to the priory of Down, and, after the Reformation, to the deanery of Clarendon. Ecclesiastical dreamers ascribe the founding of the original pile to St. Patrick; and old legendary history calls it the Church of St. Patrick at the White Ford. "This appellation of the White Ford," says the authority already quoted, "is partly explained by the circumstance, that a small stream runs beside the place where the church formerly stood. There is now a bridge over this river, which, when a ford, either flowed near a white limestone bottom, or it has received the title from some other of those trifling, but now forgotten causes, from which the names of places generally originate."

SHANKILL, a parish, partly in the barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, but chiefly in the barony of East O'Neilland, co. Armagh, Ulster. The Armagh section contains the town of LURGAN: which see. Length of the Down section, west-north-westward, 3 miles; extreme breadth, 1½; area, 1,652 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches,—of which 138 acres, 23 perches are in Lough Neagh. Length of the Armagh section, northward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2½; area, 4,931 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches,—of which 59 acres, 36 perches are in the lakes of Lurgan, and 223 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches are in Lough Neagh. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 7,758; in 1841, 9,350. Houses 1,458. Pop. of the Down section, in 1831, 819; in 1841, 917. Houses 160. Pop. of the rural districts of the Armagh section, in 1831, 4,007; in 1841, 3,756. Houses 628. The Down section comprises only one townland. The parochial surface is low and flat, but consists for the most part of good land. The population is in many places so thickly segregated as to occasion the appearance of continuous hamlets furlongs in length; and they are numerous employed in the linen manufacture, and are in possession of comparative freedom from the biting poverty which so generally prevails in other districts of Ireland. The principal mansions are Lurgan-castle, Annesborough-house, and Mile-house; and the first of these, the seat of Lord Lurgan, is noticed in the article on the town of Lurgan. The Down section is traversed by the Lagan Canal; and the Armagh section by the Ulster railway and the road from Armagh to Belfast.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £256 16s.; glebe, £425. Gross income, £681 16s.; nett, £517 14s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Cloudford in the dio. of Down, and is non-resident in Shankill. A curate receives a salary, and other advantages jointly worth £100 a-year, besides the use of the glebe-house. The church is situated at Lurgan, and was built in 1725, and enlarged in 1832; and its enlargement was effected at the cost of £1,000.—of which £700 was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits, and the remainder was raised by subscription and parochial assessment. Sittings 1,000; attendance, from 313 to 500. The Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by upwards of 400; the Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by 300; the Primitive Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house, by from 65 to 150; the Quakers' meeting-house, by 25; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by 739. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,296 Churchmen, 1,708 Presbyterians, 243 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,618 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 190 scholars; and 12 daily schools had on their books 411 boys and 299 girls, and were attended by about 25 other children. Two of the daily schools were salaried with £12 each from the London Hibernian Society; two, with respectively £20 and £14 from the Board of Erasmus Smith; and one, with £8 from the National Board. In 1843, the National Board had schools at Kilmore and Taunaghmore.

SHANKILL, or ST. KILL, a parish in the barony of Gowran, 3½ miles north by west of Goresbridge, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains part of the village of PAULSTOWN: which see. Length, south-eastward, 5½ miles; breadth, from a few perches to 2½ miles; area, 6,489 acres, 26 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,313; in 1841, 2,586. Houses 403. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,500. Houses 390. The surface declines to the south-east; and, though partly billy, is all profitable, and principally arable. The rivulet Monefelin runs along the south-west border and boundary, and the highest ground is on the west border, and has an altitude of 678 feet above sea-level. The northern district lies within the Leinster coal-field, and contains several coal-pits. The chief rural residence is Shankill-castle, the handsome seat of J. K. Aylward, Esq. The hamlets are Shankill, Cranroe, and Boherboy. One constabulary station occurs at Paulstown; and another at the coal-pits. The chief antiquities are the site of an abbey, and the ruins of two churches. The road from Kilkenny to Dublin traverses the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £434; nett, £402 10s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan once, and the Crown twice in every three turns. The rector holds also the deanery of Leighlin Cathedral, and is non-resident in Shankill. A curate receives a salary of £83 1s. 6d. The church was built in 1812, by means of a gift of 4738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 23. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,450. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 2,345; and 3 daily schools—one of which was aided from subscription, and one by the National Board—had on their books 145 boys and 161 girls. In 1843, the National Board had schools at Paulstown and Bornafea.

SHANKILL, a parish in the barony of Roscommon, 1½ mile west of Elphin, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length, east-south-eastward, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 8,610 acres, 2 roods, 33 perches,—of which 37 acres, 36 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,669; in 1841, 2,626. Houses 444. The surface is low and comparatively level; and it consists, in the aggregate, of good land. The water area is comprised in the lakes of O'Maram and Ballyoughter, and part of the lake of Cloonullaun. The seats are Elmpark, Yambo-house, Ballyoughter-house, Battyfield, Cherryfield, and Mantua,—the last the residence of O. J. D. Grace, Esq. The roads from Elphin to Tusk and Castlereagh traverse the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDCLEARE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £46 3s. 1d.; and the latter are appropriated to the prebendary of Elphin cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel is situated 2 miles west of Elphin. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 2,815; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 88 boys and 53 girls. In 1843, two daily schools at Mantua were salaried with respectively £12 and £10 from the National Board, and had on their books 147 boys and 145 girls.

SHANKILL, a hill, a hamlet, and several residences, in the parish of Rathmichael, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. The hill terminates the range of summits which extends eastward from the Three-Rocks mountain; and it lifts a little conical summit to the altitude of 912 feet above sea-level. The lead-mines, smelting furnaces, and shot tower of Ballycorus, are picturesquely situated on the skirt and at the base of the hill. The hamlet of Shankill stands $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Ballycorus, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-east of Bray. The residences which bear the name of Shankill are Shankill-castle, Shankill-house, and Shankill-lodge, and are situated within $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile of the hamlet.

SHANNON (THE), the largest river of Ireland, and probably the largest in any equal extent of insular ground in the world. Its name appears to us to be an abbreviation of Shean-abhin or Shanavon, 'the old river,' and not unfitly designates the pre-eminence which the river must, from the earliest period, have maintained in popular opinion. The lower third of its course is tidal or estuarial; and the other two-thirds are, in a comparative sense, so straight, so deep, so free from current, and so much aided by lacustrine expansions, that the river can be navigated by barges, and made an aqueous highway for commerce, to within a few miles of its source. Were all its facilities to trade and communication as fully recognised and used as those of the rivers of England, it could not fail to relieve and enrich the condition of a very large proportion of the Irish population, and would be burdened with a much greater annual aggregate of freightage than any other river of equal length in the world; yet, in spite of its voluminousness, its highly navigable capacities, and its intimate connection with many of the most populous inland and central districts of Ireland, it was, till a few years ago, very little cared for, and continues to the present day to be comparatively little known. It effects, from Lough Allen near its source, to the sea at the level of low-water, an aggregate descent of 159 feet in summer, or 163 feet in winter; or, to speak popularly, and with reference merely to high-water level, it makes an aggregate descent of 147 feet; but it achieves no less than 97 feet of the 147 in the brief distance between Killaloe and Limerick; and it also effects, within its entire course, no fewer than 17 different falls or rapids; so that, in its entire current, except at these few particular localities, it is necessarily sluggish and silent almost to stagnation. Much of its strictly fluviatile extent consists of very large and long lacustrine expanses; much also consists of dull, dead reaches of river, stagnating amid callows, meadows, bogs, and morasses, rankly overgrown upon the sides by aquatic vegetation, and periodically spreading out in cold and shallow floods; and surprisingly little consists of the merry and brilliant combinations of limpid and rippling current with clean well-defined and picturesque banks which so generally constitutes the river-scenery of Scotland.

The Shannon is popularly regarded as issuing from Lough Allen, between the counties of Leitrim and Roscommon, at a point $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of the junction-point of these counties with the county of Sligo; and it thence flows between the counties of Roscommon, Galway, and Clare on the right, and the counties of Leitrim, Longford, Westmeath, King's, Tipperary, Limerick, and Kerry on the left. But its earlier head-streams flow in the interior of co. Leitrim; and its head-stream par excellence, or that which is popularly regarded as the infant Shannon, rises within the county of Cavan; so that the river has connection with all the four provinces of Ireland,—least, but originating, with Ulster, considerably with Leinster, and very largely with Connaught and Munster. Its prevailing direction to Banagher in King's co., is southward; thence to a point 3 or 4 miles above the city of Limerick, is south-south-westward; and thence to the Atlantic, is west by southward. Its source is in the townland of Derryhaghan, northern extremity of the parish of Templeport, barony of Tullaghagh, co. Cavan, 3 miles south by east of the shore of Upper Lough Macnean at the village of Red Lion, and within a still smaller distance of other waters which belong to the basin of the Erne. "It rises at the head of a wild district called Glangavellan, and in the valley between Cuilcagh and Langanacallagh mountains, close to the base of the former. The source or spring is of a circular form, about 50 feet in diameter, called the Shannon Pot, or more generally Leigmonshena. It boils up in the centre, and a continued stream flows from it, about 8 feet wide and 2 feet deep, in the driest season, and runs about 4 miles per hour. In rainy weather, the flow of the water is so much increased that its banks and low grounds in its immediate vicinity are overflowed. There are numerous caverns and clefts on the top and sides of Cuilcagh mountain, which receive the rain-water; and, from the circumstance of no streams descending the mountain, it is concluded that the drainage of this mountain, combined with its subterranean springs, here find an outlet, and give birth to this river." The Owenmore rivulet, which rises on the south side of Cuilcagh, and has a run of about 5 miles westward, falls into the Shannon about 2 miles below the latter's source; the Dowbally rivulet, and other small streams, pour in at an early period their tributary waters; and both the Owenmore and the Dowbally, on account of descending from much higher ground and making a considerably longer run than the true Shannon, might urge a superior claim to it to be considered the parent stream. The infant Shannon makes an entire run of about 6 miles south-westward, within co. Cavan, and about 2 miles southward within co. Leitrim; and, after having wended its way along the mountain valley, it falls into the head of Lough Allen with a depth of from 5 to 10 feet, and a width of from 50 to 60 yards. The elevation of the source or "pot" of the Shannon above the level of Lough Allen is 115 feet, and above the low-water level of the sea 274 feet.

The Shannon is lost for $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles in Lough Allen, or may be regarded as expanding itself into that great navigable lake. See ALLEN (LOUGH). Appliances and artificial facilities have, for a considerable period, been in existence, for surmounting all the obstructions to navigation which naturally occurred between Lough Allen and the sea; and many of these were proposed to be improved, and not a few others to be created, by the parliamentarily appointed Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the River Shannon; but, for the sake of clearness, we shall first describe the river and its navigation as they existed immediately before the date of the Commissioners' appointment, and shall afterwards give a separate and detailed view of the changes and additional facilities which the Commissioners proposed to effect.

An arm or bay of Lough Allen projects beyond the exit of the Shannon a mile southward to the village of Drumshambo; and a canal commences at the extremity of this bay, and takes down the navigation, within the Leitrim side of the river, to the vicinity of Battle-bridge. See DRUMSHAMBO. The Shannon, on issuing from Lough Allen, seems small in proportion to the magnitude of the lake's reservoir; yet, but for rapids which speedily occur, and which rendered the canal between Drumshambo and Battle-bridge necessary, it possesses ample volume for the purposes of navigation. The shores of its exit are flat and marshy, but interspersed with some insulated and bush-tufted rocks. The first bridge across the stream, called the bridge of Ballintra or Ballintrave, occurs immediately below the lake, and is remarkable for the passage across it, in 1798, of the French forces under General Humbert, in their march from Connaught towards their total and final defeat on the confines of the county of Longford. The banks of the river from Lough Allen to Battle-bridge, a distance along the channel of the stream of 7½ miles, consist partly of low alluvial ground, liable to floods, and abounding with beds of gravel, and partly of patches and sheets of bog, intersected with fertile hills and ridges of limestone gravel. Between Lough Allen and Battle-bridge, an unimportant rivulet joins the Shannon on the left, and two considerable streams fall into it on the right,—the Arigna, a swift stream, charged with dark mud, careering from the valley between the coal mountains of Arigna, and joining the Shannon within sight of Ballintra-bridge,—and the Fiorish, bringing down the superfluous waters of Loughs Skeen and Meelagh in the barony of Boyle. From Battle-bridge to the commencement of another or second canal cut in the vicinity of Jamestown, the Shannon achieves a distance of 10½ miles, and is everywhere naturally navigable for boats of considerable burden. The Boyle river, which joins it from the west, about 3 miles below Battle-bridge, adds largely to its volume, and makes a very marked change upon its aspect. The shores of the Shannon, around the mouth of the Boyle, are low, and so exceedingly overgrown with long rushes that the hulls of passing boats are concealed from view; but, lower down, they consist of a winding and hill-screened valley which, as seen particularly from the higher parts of the town of Carrick-upon-Shannon, 1½ mile below the influx of the Boyle, may be pronounced of scenically pleasing character. The country south of Carrick, at least on the Roscommon side of the river, consists of fertile, gently-swelling limestone-gravel hills, skirted and intersected with bogs, which occasionally spread tamely and repulsively down to the margin of the stream. Immediately below Carrick, the river is smooth, majestic, and overhung by high gravel cliffs; but, a mile or two farther down, it expands into a little fluviatile lake called Lough Corry, forms many little bays and inlets, encircles several isles and islets, and becomes so winding and intricate in its navigable channel that two boats pursuing the same course occasionally appear as if moving in opposite directions.

The canal which commences a little above Jamestown extends 1½ mile east-south-eastward, through the parish of Kilmore in co. Roscommon; and, besides continuing the navigation, cuts off a large circuitous sweep of the river. The distance, along the river's channel, from the commencement of this canal to the village of Drumsna, is 2½ miles; the distance from Drumsna to the end of the canal is 1½ mile; and the distance from the end of the canal to Rooskey is 6½ miles. The aggregate fall of the Shannon from Lough Allen to Battle-bridge is 21 feet; from the canal above Jamestown to Drumsna, 6 feet, and at Rooskey, 3½ feet. From the commencement of the canal to Drumsna, the river makes a horse-shoe sweep, with the convexity facing the north-east; and the whole of the peninsula which it forms is occupied by the very beautiful demesne of Sir G. King, Bart. A spectator, who looks down the channel from the bridge of Jamestown, sees the majestic stream gliding at the base of a series of wooded hills till it becomes gradually lost among the trees. Soon after passing the bridge of Drumsna, the river begins to flow in circling eddies, and in a deep and even current; but from the end of two miles till within about a mile of Rooskey, it expands into a series of fluviatile lakes, called Loughs Tor, Boderig, and Boffin. These lakes, though nowhere exceeding ¾ of a mile in width, have very diversified and intricate coasts, a profusion of deep bays and inlets, and, in some places, sprinklings of little islets. Part of their shores are flat and boggy; part consist of pleasant rising grounds, with favourable sites for country seats; and part present bold ascents from the water's edge, and a considerable diversity and strength of scenic feature. A large affluent of the Shannon enters Lough Boderig from beneath Carnadoe bridge, and brings hither the superfluous waters of a chain of lakes, the lowest and largest of which is about 3 miles in length. From Lough Boffin to Rooskey, the Shannon becomes again narrow, shallow, and unnavigable; and to surmount the obstructions, a canal of about ¾ of a mile in length, and within the Roscommon shore, is carried past the falls. The distance from Rooskey to Tarmonbarry, along the channel, is 8 miles; and the fall at Tarmonbarry is 3½ feet. The river, after passing Rooskey, again becomes sluggish and dull, and begins to be often impeded by immense quantities of reeds and bulrushes; and about 4 miles below Rooskey, it commences the expansion called Lough Forbes. The sandstone mountain of Slievebawn, and the hills in continuation of it, appear on the Roscommon side at the distance of 4 or 5 miles from the river; and a flat and dreary chaos of bog expands from their base toward the Shannon, descending sheer to the edge of Lough Forbes; and separated from the river above only by a narrow ridge of sound land. This level and sterile assemblage of bogs, marshes, reeds, and rushes, is unattractably repulsive, and renders all the banks of the river from Rooskey to Tarmonbarry most monotonous; yet it is considerably foiled and relieved, by the extensive woods of the demesne of Castle-Forbes, stretching along the Longford shore of Lough Forbes. In the vicinity of Tarmonbarry, but on the Leinster side of the river, extends the low, flat, and comparatively large island of Cloon dragh; and round the ends of that island enter the two important tributary streams of the Camlin river, the lower one serving, at the same time, as the western terminus of the Royal Canal; see CLOON-DRAGH, RICHMOND HARBOUR, and TARMONBARRY.

The Shannon passes under the bridge of Tarmonbarry with much impetuosity; and it there appears capable of affording an immense and perennial water-power. The navigation, in order to avoid the rapids, makes a detour along the two branches of the Camlin river, circling round Cloondragh island, and is assisted at the lower end by a short canal. From Tarmonbarry to Lanesborough, the distance along the channel of the Shannon, is 6 miles; and the aggregate fall about two feet. The river, in achieving this distance, pursues a winding course, passes partly under banks of firm land, but chiefly through a wilderness of bog, and in common with the bogs, is overlooked at the distance of 3 or 4 miles to the west, by the majestic sandstone ridge of Slievebawn. Some shoals occur at Lanesborough, but are avoided by means of a short canal.

Lough Ree commences a little below the bridge of Lanesborough, and terminates about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above the bridge of Athlone; and it receives from the east the large and navigable tribute of the river Inny. But this great lough is separately described. See REE (LOUGH). The distance from Lough Ree to the influx of the Suck, measured along the channel of the Shannon, is $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and the aggregate fall over that distance is 10 feet,— $7\frac{1}{2}$ of which occur between Lough Ree and the foot of the town of Athlone, but chiefly in the vicinity of Athlone bridge. The Shannon, on leaving Lough Ree, is a broad and regular stream, with a smooth but rather swift current; and, in consequence of the deposition of all silt in the deep and large reservoir of the lough, it is here clearer than in any other part of its course above Killaloe. The current increases in rapidity as it approaches Athlone, but except during floods, when it acquires rather serious velocity, it can, without difficulty, be stemmed by the oar, and is usually traversed by light boats even in the near vicinity of the bridge. A canal, somewhat upwards of a mile in length, carried along the Roscommon side of the river, at an extreme distance from it of about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile, conducted past the outskirts, or on the outside of the town, and forming a chord to the bend of the river's channel, serves the double purpose of surmounting the local obstructions to the navigation, and making a considerable addition to the strength of the place as a military position. The stream of the Shannon, from the end of the Athlone Canal to the influx of the Suck, is sluggish, almost stagnant, repeatedly choked with low flat islands, and very generally and broadly invaded by rank masses of reeds and rushes. The immediate banks of the river over this stretch, are partly bold limestone gravel eskers, partly hillocks and swells of limestone gravel, partly ridges of alluvial land, partly wet and marshy meadows, and partly flat and dismal bogs; and they, almost everywhere, glide away toward the horizon in dark and doleful expanses either of sheer brown bog, or of bleak and featureless low country, tamely relieved by ridges of eskers. See CLONNACNOISE. "The low lands, called callows, afford the most luxuriant growth of coarse grasses, which, during favourable seasons, yield ample returns to the proprietors; but when floods take place during the hay harvest, the difficulties of saving it become great, and, after considerable pains and anxiety, the crop, owing to the injuries it has sustained from water, sometimes but ill repays the labour which has been expended in collecting it." A very brief canal-cut obviates a fall of about a foot in the current at Shannon-bridge.

The river Suck enters the Shannon at a point where the surface-elevation of both streams is $11\frac{1}{2}$ feet above sea-level; and it brings down so large a volume in so deep and stagnant a fashion, as to wear the appearance of quite a successful rival in both navigableness and magnitude. See SUCK. The confluence of the two rivers, however, is effected on the face of such a dead level of morassy country, and with such a perplexing intricacy of apparent channels, and amid such a wilderness of rushes, sedges, and other rank and tall aquatic plants, that a stranger passing down the Shannon in a steamer, and looking carefully out for the confluence, might fail to observe it. The distance from the mouth of the Suck to the head of Lough Derg along the channel of the Shannon, is about 17 miles; the aggregate fall is 9 feet; and the principal appliances for surmounting the obstructions to the navigation are a brief canal within the county of Galway, at Banagher, and a canal, of about 2 miles in length, called the Cloonaheenogue Canal, within King's county, immediately above the Little Brosna, and terminating at the mouth of that river, on the boundary with co. Tipperary. The Grand Canal enters from King's co., at the mouth of the Brosna river, about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles below the influx of the Suck; and the navigation of it is conducted across the Shannon, by means of a wooden towing bridge, to the commencement of the Ballinasloe Canal at Shannon Harbour. The country on both sides of the Shannon, from the influx of the Suck to the transit of the Grand Canal, is, for the most part, a flat, brown, chaotic bog, unutterably dreary, and almost without a feature [see BLACKWATER and CLONFERT]; and even the country from the transit of the Grand Canal to the head of Lough Derg, though exhibiting much good land and the predominance of cultivation, is so low and flat as to be extensively subject to inundation, and most deplorably destitute of picturesque, and even of tolerable pleasantness of character. See BANAGHER, REYNAGH, LUSMAGH, and LORRHA. But at the very commencement of Lough Derg, a magnificent change comes over the face of the country; and the scenery of the Shannon thenceforth to the ocean is an almost continuous gallery of superb, beautiful, brilliant, and diversified landscape. Lough Derg is separately described. See DERG (LOUGH); and see also PORTUMNA. The principal of the tributary streams which enter Lough Derg are the Ballyshruel, the Woodford, and the Scariff rivers from the west, and the Nenagh river from the east. The Shannon, soon after leaving Lough Derg, and gliding past Killaloe, forms the magnificent cataract of DOONAS [which see]; and from Killaloe to Limerick it luxuriates among warmly-tinted, mirthful, and most beauteous scenery [see CASTLE-CONNEL], and is at once so sinuous in its course, and so aggregately rapid in its current as to have occasioned the construction of extensive lines of canal for connecting the navigation of Lough Derg with that of the estuary: see LIMERICK. The chief tributaries during this stretch, are the Blackwater rivulet from the west, and the Mulken and Groody rivers from the east.

The estuary of the Shannon, though for a considerable distance very narrow, and in no place very broad, and though of surpassingly great length in proportion to its breadth, may be said to commence at the city of Limerick. Its scenery is everywhere delightful and noble; and may be summarily described as profuse in the attractions of fertility, culture, and artificial decorations, from Limerick to Ringmoyle Point,—rich in charming islands, intricate shores, and a general labyrinth of land and water, all over the junction with it of the estuary of the Fergus,—powerful in the diversities of cliff and meadow, gentleness and boldness, sterility and opulence, luxuriant expanses and moorish hills, from the estuary of the Fergus to Tarbert rock,—and imposingly grand in yawning cliffs, curious caves, beetling headlands, and a majestic march into the Atlantic, from Tarbert Rock to Loop and Kerry Heads. The stretch from Limerick to Ringmoylan Point measures 12½ miles in length, and from mere fluvial width to 2½ miles in breadth; it receives the rivers Maig and Washpool on the left, and the river Ougarne on the right; it contains the isles and islets of Whelps, Gregg, Grass, Key, Rinchilky, and Illannanave; and it is diversified by the headlands of Muckinish, Rinchilky, and Durrenish, and the bays or estuarial sweeps of the Maig and the Ougarne. The stretch from Ringmoylan Point to Foynes Island measures 8 miles in length, and is identified over the whole of its extent with the influx or junction of the estuary of the Fergus; and it possesses on the south or Limerick side, the influx of the Deel river, the headland of Aginish, and the islands and islets of Beeve, Tramore, Greenishmore, Aginish, and Foynes. The stretch from Foynes Island to Tarbert Rock measures 9 miles in length, and from ¾ to 1½ in breadth; it receives the Oran river on the south; it is boldly diversified, on the north, by the peninsula of Clonderalaw, and the bays of Labasheda and Clonderalaw; and it possesses the isles and islets of Cappa, Ferry, White-Horse, and Bowline, and the headlands of Pollatollon, Kinablen, and Ballydonahoe. The stretch from Tarbert Rock to Kilkadran Point—the former on the south shore and the latter on the north—measures 10½ miles in length, and from 1½ to 3½ in breadth; it is diversified, along the south, by Ardmore Point, Crockeen Point, Carrigafuyle island, the Ballylongford estuary, and Beal Point; and it possesses, along the north side, Kilkerran Point, Money Point, Hog Island, Inniscattery, Rinana Point, Kilrush bay, Barnaharna Point, Poolnasherry harbour, Innishpitle, Corless Point, and Carrigaholt bay. The stretch from Kilkadran Point to the ocean, measures 8½ miles to Loop Head on the north, and 13 to Kerry Head on the south; it has at first a breadth of only 2½ miles, but it soon and suddenly makes a great and permanent expansion, so as to terminate with a breadth of 9 miles; and it is diversified, along the south, by Kilcouny Point, the Cashen estuary, and a series of superb and romantic cliffs,—and along the north, by Reenvella bay, Kilclogher Head, Kibaha bay, and Dunmore Head. The coast lights which direct the navigation of the estuary are three in number, and are situated on Loop Head, Kilkadran Point, and Tarbert Rock; and the buoys, beacons, and landmarks, are too numerous and minute to be indicated in a general description.

Mr. Rhodes the engineer, who was officially employed to report upon the navigation of the Shannon, said in 1832, "Taking a view of this majestic river, its lakes and lateral branches, which receive the drainage of a considerable portion of Ireland, they also appear as if formed and designed by nature as the great arteries of the kingdom for facilitating its agricultural and commercial purposes, by marking out a splendid line of intercourse for an expeditious and cheap mode of conveyance (through a populous country), superior to any in the empire, and only requires a little assistance from art to render it beneficially useful to an unlimited extent; but her grand designs have hitherto been in a great measure frustrated, and may not improperly be compared to a sealed book." Yet to adopt the words of a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, in 1836, "The general wants of the navigation of the Shannon, are simple in their nature and easily effected;—the deepening of the channel in some places, the placing of beacons and buoys, so essential in a river liable to great floods, and consequently of such variable width and depth; the erection of piers and landing-places—the formation of a complete system of roads to the banks, from the surrounding country and the neighbouring towns and villages. But above all, and without which all else is useless or impracticable, the entire navigation should be placed under the control of an efficient and active body, responsible for its maintenance in a perfect and available condition—who should be guided in their management, not by their desire of profit, but solely with the view of rendering the river as useful and accessible as possible to the public. The navigation is at present subject to various jurisdictions; and those to whose care it has been intrusted, have, in most cases, neglected their duties and squandered their funds. The Corporation of Limerick have charge of the Shannon below that city. The tolls levied by them in 1830, amounted to £1,150, of which the paltry sum of £75 was expended on the river. The portion from Limerick to Killaloe was vested by parliament in the hands of the Limerick Navigation Company, in 1829. They receive £300 for their superintendence, and the remainder of the tolls is expended on the navigation. About £18,000 have been laid out by them on this part of the river, and in building Balls' Bridge at Limerick. In 1806, the Grand Canal Company took charge of the navigation from Portumna to Athlone; and received above £54,000 for the purpose of completing the works, and on condition that they should be maintained in efficient repair. It is needless to say that these conditions have not been complied with; and though it appears that the company have expended on the river £30,000 above the sum advanced by Government, the works are very incomplete, and have never been brought into available and useful order. Lough Derg, and the river from Athlone to its source, are under the Government, who have neglected their charge equally with the rest of the trustees. All these separate jurisdictions should be consolidated under a Board, consisting of a few experienced and able individuals. The House of Commons Committee have recommended that the commodities conveyed on the Shannon should be necessary to maintain the works in repair. The funds required for the general execution of these works, and the general completion of the navigation, they suggest, should be raised partly by a rate levied on the counties bordering on the Shannon, and partly by a grant from the treasury. All who are acquainted with the subject agree, that the improvement of this river should not be considered as of merely local interest, but that it should be treated as a question of national importance, attended, as it must be, by universal advantage to the whole country."

The Commissioners for improving the navigation of the river Shannon, were appointed by Acts 5 and 6 William IV., and 2 Victoria; and they presented their first report to parliament in 1836. Their first, third, and fifth reports are small; but their second and fourth reports are accompanied with such a vast body of plans and details, as to constitute three very thick folio volumes. They commenced their survey at the mouth of the Shannon, ended it at the head of Lough Allen, and divided the whole river into five sections,—first, from the ocean to Limerick,—second, from Limerick to Killaloe,—third, from Killaloe to Tarmounbarry,—fourth, from Tarmounbarry to Leitrim,—and fifth, from Leitrim to the head of Lough Allen. The first section being all tideway and an estuary, they reported to need little improvement, except the putting down of beacons, and the constructing of piers and landing-places. The second section, from Limerick to Killaloe, is by far the most difficult stretch in the whole course of the river, and, even in spite of the works previously constructed to facilitate it, was found so comparatively impracticable that the Commissioners suggested the necessity of a further survey, with the view of ascertaining whether the cutting of a new canal parallel with the river over the whole distance, might not be preferable to the adopting and improving of the navigation as they found it. The third section, from Killaloe to Tarmunbarry, the Commissioners considered greatly the most important. It embraces a coast of upwards of 200 miles in extent, comprises the two great lakes, Derg and Ree, communicates by the Grand and Royal Canals with Dublin, has on or very near its banks many rising towns and villages, passes through a rich and variously productive country, and, in general, appears to present the prospect of a highly remunerating return to judicious efforts for completely opening the navigation to the workings of enterprise and capital. The fourth section, from Tarmunbarry to Leitrim, is reported to require in some places the improvement of the side canals, and in others the formation of new cuts. The fifth section, from Leitrim to the head of Lough Allen, is reported to need little except the deepening of the channel in a few places, and the general repair and improvement requisite for most parts of even the lower sections of the river.

The following abstract of the estimates for the works proposed between the mouth of the Shannon and Tarmunbarry, is taken from the Second Report of the Commissioners, presented to Parliament in 1838. 1. FIRST DIVISION or the Lower Shannon.—Kilrush pier £8,600, Carrigaholt pier £5,600, Tarebert £8,600, Querin creek £1,160, Ballylongford £1,839, Glynn £5,879, Foynes island £8,500, Kiltteery £1,836, Cahercon (Kildysert) £1,980, Clare £4,400, Deel or Askeaton river £900, Maigue river £2,770, total £52,070, to be supplied by the public proprietors and adjacent districts. 2. SECOND DIVISION or the Limerick navigation.—Arthursferry or Illanarone £7,600, the Shannon river at Plassy £3,000, Castle-Connell £7,600, O'Brien's Bridge, Parteen rapid, and other shoals, between Erina and Cusane locks, £4,000, total £22,000, to be supplied by the public, and the adjacent counties and baronies. 3. THIRD DIVISION.—1. From Killaloe to Meelick, including Killaloe, £27,000, Lough Derg £300, Derry island £400, White's ford £550, total £28,310; 2. Meelick to Athlone, works at Meelick £40,000, Shamnon-grove or Counsellor's ford £1,277, works at Banagher £25,000, Shamnon-Harbour bridge £300, Leabinch £550, Derryholms £2,200, Bishop's island £2,200, Garrymore £950, cut or canal below Shamnon bridge £100, improvement in that quarter £7,000, Clerhaun £170, Ballynatave £350, Tullymore ford £2,050, Calf island £400, Long island £550, Rann island £850, total £84,147; 3. Athlone to Tarmunbarry, viz. works at Athlone £60,000, Lough Ree £500, Curreen point £550, Lanesborough £10,500, Kilnacurragh £1,350, Erragh ford £550, Lodge cut £2,600, total £192,507; also to be supplied by the public, and adjacent counties and baronies, to which is to be added the sum to be procured from the same sources, for steam-engine, vessels, and machinery for dredging; general total £266,777.

The works connected with the first division, or Lower Shannon, being distinct operations, and in a great measure depending on voluntary contributions, cannot be considered certain; and the estimate for the third division includes new bridges at Banagher and Athlone, the moiety of which to be provided for distinctly by assessment on the adjacent counties. The Commissioners suggested that the works below Limerick should be undertaken solely on the voluntary co-operation of the proprietors with the public; and supposing that the works of the second and third divisions above that city will cost £200,000, according to the acts 5 and 6 William IV., the public defray £100,000,—and of the other half, two parts to be assessed from the baronies of Upper and Lower Ormond, county of Tipperary; one part from the barony of Garrycastle, King's county; one part from the barony of Tullagh, county of Clare; two parts from the baronies of Leitrim and Longford, county of Galway; two parts from the baronies of Moycarne, Athlone, and Roscommon, county of Roscommon; two parts from the baronies of Brawney and Kilkenny West, county of Westmeath; and one part from the baronies of Ratheline, Moydow, and Longford, county of Longford. In a pamphlet published in 1746, it is stated that Dr. Bolton, archbishop of Cashel, frequently declared that he could remove all the difficulties in the navigation between Lough Allen and Killaloe, for vessels of 30 tons, at the expense of £3,000; and Mr. Gilbert estimated that the river might be made navigable between Killaloe and Limerick for £21,000. The Commissioners, in reference to these two statements, justly refer to these as striking proofs of the deceptive estimates which may be formed on cursory observations, and of the difficulties of obtaining given results.

The Fourth Report of the Commissioners presented to Parliament, refers to the Upper Shannon, viz., that part of the river from Tarmunbarry to Leitrim, the latter town situated below Lough Allen. This is a distance of 30 miles, and the general appearance of the river is broad and deep, occasionally expanding into small lakes, which bear the names of Lough Forbes, 3 miles long, and $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile in mean breadth; Lough Boffin, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, and $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile in medium breadth; Lough Scenell, 2 miles long, and $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile in mean breadth; Lough Boderig, 2 miles long, and $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile in mean breadth; the small expansions of Lough Tap and Lough Nanogue; and Lough Corry, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile long, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile in mean breadth. The object of the proposed works in this part of the course of the Shannon, is to remove shoals, eel-weirs, mill-dams, projecting points; to improve or replace the latter cuts and locks by substantial works; to construct dams at the head of the falls, which are to have a summer level of six feet on the lock-sills; and securing such bridges as may be affected by the operations, enlarging their water-way where necessary, and applying swivel or bascule bridges where the navigation requires a passage through them. The locks are to be 130 feet long, and 30 feet wide, and the side canals 80 feet of surface water. It is expected that a small class of steamers will be amply sufficient for the present and prospective wants of the country, from Tarmunbarry upwards. In conducting the trade among the works of this division, are the side-cuts or canals at Cloondragh and Jamestown to connect the navigation of the Middle with the Upper Shannon on a scale suitable for steamers of considerable size; but it is supposed that the side-cuts may be found unnecessary after careful examination, by removing the shoals in the bed of the river, and adhering to the channel, by which the expense will be much lessened, though the length of the navigation be increased. A small landing-quay is recommended to be formed about 400 yards above the town of Leitrim, which is to be the terminus of the steam navigation of the Upper Shannon, to which point there will be an uninterrupted steam navigation on the river from Killaloe, a distance of 115 miles. From Leitrim to Lough Allen the course of the Shannon is $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is greatly impeded by shoals, rapids, and other obstacles. The present canal will require to be reconstructed when the Arigna ironworks and the adjacent coalfields are opened and in extensive operation. As the course of the river between Leitrim Harbour and the commencement of Lough Allen canal is remarkably tortuous, and impracticable for steamers unless by incurring great expense, a towing-path can be easily constructed by means of which barges may be tracked by horses. At the entrance of the canal into Lough Allen, a small harbour or landing-place is recommended, to serve for the general traffic of Lough Allen, and the improving market of Drumshanbo, half-a-mile distant. From the site of this harbour, to Reilly island, there are few shoals; and beyond this the lake is very extensive and deep, with a gradually improving district around. The estimated expense of the works on the Fourth Division of the Shannon, from Tarmounbarry to Leitrim, is £161,843 14s. 8d.; that of the Fifth division, from Leitrim to Lough Allen canal, is £18,554 5s., exclusive of £2,000 for steam dredging vessels, barges, workshops, machinery, and contingencies; general total amount for the Shannon, £531,028 2s. 5½d.; for the Scariff river, £4,133 11s. 6d.; for improving the navigation of the tributaries between Killaloe and Tarmounbarry, £5,000; for the Carnadoe water, £13,815 13s. 1d.; for the Boyle water, £30,828 10s.; grand total for the Shannon and its tributaries £584,805 17s. 9½d., including £40,000 for bridges on the river. Of this large sum the public are to defray £290,716 1s. 4d., the adjoining counties and baronies £260,334 6s. 2½d., the proprietors and districts £27,755 10s. 3½d.

The Fifth and final Report of the Commissioners, also presented to Parliament in 1839, is short, and chiefly relates to the valuations of the divisions of the river between Tarmounbarry and Lough Allen. The Commissioners had before them ninety-three cases, and awarded compensation to the extent of £9,702. They farther state that the callows or flooded lands on the Shannon, from Limerick to Lough Allen, had been surveyed, and comprised 32,500 acres. In 1838, W. T. Mulvany, Esq., civil engineer, was instructed to examine the country, with a view to the formation of a canal to connect the Shannon near Leitrim or Drumsna, with the Erne at Belturbet, or the point near Wattle-Bridge, where the Ulster Canal is to open into the Erne. Mr. Mulvany perambulated the district through the co. of Leitrim into that of Longford. He designates the lines formed as the Ballinamore line, the Mohill line, and the Ballinamuck line, and his estimated expense is as follows:—For 28½ miles of canal, including locks, bridges, &c., at £5,000 per mile (the full cost per mile of the Ulster Canal), £142,500; lock regulating weir at Belturbet, and other works, £10,000; shoal between Belturbet and terminus of Ulster Canal, £500; total, £153,000: probable cost of removing shoals, altering bridges, and improving navigation for steam-vessels from Belturbet, by the Erne and Lough Oughter to Killeeshandra, £14,000;—in all £167,000, or in round numbers, £170,000." Full details of each of the multitudinous improvements, small as well as great, which were proposed by the Commissioners for improving the navigation of the Shannon, will be found in our articles on the several localities.

"In 1826," says the Second Report of the Railway Commissioners, published in 1838, "Mr. Grantham, an engineer, who had been for some time employed by government in surveying the river, made the first attempt to establish steam-boats on the Shannon—he failed. A Joint Stock Company followed; to these succeeded the Inland Navigation Company, under the able management of a most enterprising individual, Mr. C. W. Williams. There are now nine steamers belonging to this company on the Shannon; six above Limerick, and three below.

Though this number is small when we consider the capabilities of this magnificent stream, and its wide expanding lakes; it is important as a successful commencement, for the value of this navigation is only now beginning to be understood. Before the application of steam to vessels as a propelling power, the means of developing these capabilities did not in fact exist. The boat or barge adapted to the stream was little suited to traverse the lake, and the construction of towing paths along the shores of the latter would have been impracticable. The introduction of steam-vessels not only surmounts this difficulty, arising from the expansion of the stream at intervals along its course, but, as the Shannon Commissioners have justly remarked, converts what was previously a formidable obstacle to the navigation of this noble river, into one of its great advantages. The improvements of the navigation of this river, now in contemplation, will, when executed, greatly increase the traffic by facilitating the means of communicating with the adjacent country on either bank. A regular, active, and most beneficial trading intercourse has been established between Limerick and Liverpool; below Limerick steam-vessels now ply to Clare, 3 miles below Ennis, the county town of Clare, and to Kilrush, and TARBERT, thriving places near the mouth of the river. The number of passengers between Limerick, TARBERT, Kilrush, and Clare, in 1836, amounted to 23,851. The nature and rapid growth of the Shannon are exemplified by the following returns:—

Return of tonnage carried by the boats of the Inland Navigation Company, on the Shannon, during a period of 11 years—

1827	6,304
1828	8,456
1829	8,850	Tonnage by boats purchased
1830	11,270	from other Carriers,	Total.
1831	17,569	550 tons,	18,115
1832	24,567	2,200	26,767
1833	24,119	2,200	26,319
1834	30,438	4,125	34,563
1835	33,983	7,050	40,783
1836	40,230	7,050	47,280

Return of Goods carried from Limerick, and shipped at Dublin for Liverpool—

In 1833	187 tons of wheat,	520 tons of flour,
1834	1,218	1,750
1835	402	5,269
1836	290	7,158
In 1833	543 tons of oatmeal,	40,988 firkins of butter,
1834	1,192	10,007
1835	543	10,771
1836	1,136	12,795

The gross freight from Limerick to Dublin for corn, flour, or malt, is 15s. per ton; the toll 5s., or if intended for export 3s.;—from Galway to Dublin, 21s.; the toll 5s. 11d. The gross freight from Dublin to Limerick for merchandise, from 20s. to 30s.; toll, 5s.;—from Galway to Dublin, 38s. 6d.; toll, 9s. 1d."

A topic of very great importance, recently discussed with much ability by Dr. Kane, and strongly challenging attention from the public economists of the empire, as well as from large manufacturing capitalists, is the vast available water-power of the Shannon. "This great river," says Dr. Kane, in his work on the Industrial Resources of Ireland, published in 1844,— "This great river delivers into the sea the rain collected from an area, which, according to Mr. Mulvany's estimate, embraces 3,613 square miles of country, north of Killaloe. In the geographical character of its basin, we find all the conditions for great evaporation fulfilled. The country whose waters it receives is flat, its streams sluggish, the soil upon its banks either deep and retentive clays, or extensive bog. Expanding into numerous lakes of considerable size, often overflowing the lowlands on its banks, it may be considered as almost in the condition of presenting a true water evaporating surface. Still the quantity of water it carries to the sea is of extraordinary power. It has been observed that, in wet weather, the level of the water in Lough Derg often rises two or three inches in twenty-four hours; and has been known to rise twelve inches. As the area of the Lough is 30,000 statute acres; this extent of water weighs 3,000,000 tons for each inch, and hence, so much as 36,000,000 of tons have accumulated in a single day and night.

"The average difference between summer and winter level of the Shannon at Killaloe, where, narrowing from Lough Derg, it reassumes the river form, is about six feet, but the total of the rises of the water during the year, are found from a discussion of the observations of three years, to be eleven feet. The rising of the waters occupied in average 77 days: in falling to the summer level they occupied 107 days. The quantity of water thus accumulated in the great natural reservoir of the Lough was 532,554,096 cubic yards, or 403,416,600 tons, which is discharged in 107 days at the rate of 155,926 tons per hour. By this, a force continuous day and night of 177 horse-power per foot of fall, may be produced. An equal force is of course available whilst the river is rising, and thus through 184 days, or six months of the year, this enormous power is in action, independent of the ordinary discharge which goes on when the waters are at the lowest. When the river is high, the motive force available is far greater than that just now mentioned. An example furnished to me by Mr. Mulvany will show this sufficiently. 'On the 2d of December, 1836, when the water was 13 feet on the upper sill of Killaloe lock, the observed discharge was 882,450 cubic feet per minute, and on the 10th of that month, the height was 14 feet 1 inch, on the 18th, 14 feet 4 inches, at which height it continued until the 25th, with of course a greatly increased discharge, on the latter day it began to descend gradually. During the period mentioned, the whole lake rose four inches between the 3d and 4th, and five inches in two days, between the 5th and 7th, and two inches in other days. These grand rises, at that height of water extended over the flooded lands as well as the lake, that is, over a surface of from 36,000 to 38,000 statute acres.' Now the discharge for the month of December 1836, may certainly, from the description above given, be taken at one million cubic feet per minute, that is, one and two-third million of tons of water per hour, capable of producing 1,885 horse-power per foot of fall. The minimum discharge of the Shannon at Killaloe has been estimated by Mr. Mulvany, in the driest summer, so low as 100,000 cubic feet of water per minute. This is equal to a force of 188 horse-power per foot of fall. At this minimum, however, the flow is kept but for a very short time, certainly not more than a month in the year, which is also the duration that may be allotted to the maximum elevation of the waters.

"Although it is not possible to deduce from these returns the actual average force exerted by the waters of this river, yet I consider from all the facts I have been able to collect, regarding its discharge at various seasons, that the mean cannot fall below 350 horse-power per foot of fall. For as the summer level of the river for which the minimum discharge is taken, does not last more than two months, and that during the six months of the rising and the falling of the waters, the force is at least 188 + 177 horse-power per foot of fall, and finally, that the maximum delivery at winter level, lasts at least a month, there are nine months of which the force per foot of fall are

6 months at 365,	2,190

which give an average of 495 horse-power. The other three months are certainly not below the six months of rising and falling; but in order that the final results may not be possibly liable to any suspicion of exaggeration, I shall take the average force of water available per foot of fall, at 350 horse-power, which gives for the ninety-seven feet of fall between Killaloe and Limerick, a total of 33,950 horse-power in continuous action, day and night, throughout the year.

"This, however, is by no means the whole power of the river, for although in the upper portion of its course it flows through a district unusually level, there is yet between Lough Derg and Lough Allen a total available fall of forty-six feet six inches. We may consider, that at the several points on the river, the supply of water will bear the same proportion to that at Killaloe, as exists between the respective areas of their catchment basins; and this is shown to be a very legitimate assumption, since at Carrick, where the area of basin is about 350 square miles, the minimum quantity of water passing in summer through the bridge has been determined by Mr. Mulvany to be 10,000 cubic feet per minute. This is just a tenth of the minimum at Killaloe, the basin at which is ten times the area of the surface drained at Carrick. The distribution of the falls on the upper and middle Shannon, will be, when the improvements now in progress are completed, as follows:—The area of catchment basin of the river, at each fall, and the average resulting horse-power continuous, is given in the accompanying column of the table.

	Area of Basin,	Height of Fall,	Total Horse-power,
Mouth of Lough Allen,	146 square miles	13 feet	189
Jamestown,	400	6	252
Roskeel,	650	34	229
Tarmonbarry,	780	8	656
Athlone,	1,221	8	1,109
Meelick,	2,657	8	2,232

The total continuous power is, therefore, 4,717 horse, which, added to that of the river from Killaloe 33,950, gives a force existing between Limerick and Lough Allen of 38,667 horse-power, supposed in constant action."

The Shannon gives the title of Earl, in the peerage of Ireland, to a branch of the noble family of Boyle, whose elder branch possesses the united earldoms of Cork and Orrery. In 1756, Henry Boyle, Esq. of Castle-Martyr, grandson of Lord Broghill, first Earl of Orrery, son of the Hon. Henry Boyle, and quondam occupant of the situations of Speaker of the House of Commons, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Lord-justice of Ireland, was created Earl of Shannon, Viscount Boyle, and Baron of Castle-Martyr, in the peerage of Ireland; and, in 1786, his son Richard, second Earl, was made Baron Carleton, in the peerage of Great Britain. The family-seat is at Castle-Martyr, in co. Cork. See CASTLE-MARTYR.

SHANNON-AND-ERNE-CANAL, a proposed navigation, in co. Leitrim, Connought, and co. Cavan, Ulster. Its object is to connect the river Shannon with the river Erne, and to form a junction between the improved navigation of the Shannon, and the recently completed navigation of the Ulster Canal. Mr. Mulvany, civil engineer, was appointed to survey the country with a view to the formation of the canal; he made his official report in March 1839; and he exhibits three lines by respectively Ballinamore, Mobill, and Ballinacuck, but shows the first and the second of these each under two phases, so as really to exhibit five lines. The direct Ballinamore line has a total length of 29½ statute miles, of which 28½ are canal, and 1 is river; the height of its summit-level above the sea is 220 feet; its total rise and fall is 150 feet; the deepest cutting at its summit is 23 feet; its rate of lockage per statute mile is 5 feet; and the area of the catchment basin for the supply of its summit-level is 10,320 acres, of which 670 are lakes. The Ballinamore line by Killeshandra is 38½ statute miles in length, of which 24½ are canal, and 14 are river and lake; the height of its summit-level above the sea is 220 feet; its total rise and fall is 150 feet; the deepest cutting at its summit is 23 feet; its rate of lockage per statute mile is 5.75; and the area of the catchment basin for the supply of its summit-level is 10,320 acres, of which 670 are lakes. The Mohill line, as examined by the Ulster Canal company, is 30 statute miles in length; the height of its summit-level above the sea is 239 feet; its total rise and fall is 196 feet; the deepest cutting at its summit is 31½ feet; its rate of lockage per statute mile is 6.53 feet; and the area of the catchment basin for the supply of its summit-level is 970 acres, of which 48 are lakes. The Mohill line, as altered at the summit in order to obtain the whole supply of the district, is 32 statute miles in length; the height of its summit-level above the sea is 230 feet; its total rise and fall is 178 feet; the deepest cutting at its summit is 43 or 60 feet; its rate of lockage per statute mile is 5.60 feet; and the area of the catchment basin for the supply of its summit-level is 4,400 acres, of which 260 are lakes. The Ballinamuck line is 37½ statute miles in length, of which 23½ are canal, and 14 are river and lake; the height of its summit-level above the sea is 191 feet; its total rise and fall is 103 feet; the deepest cutting at its summit is 32½ feet; its rate of lockage per statute mile is 4 feet; and the area of the catchment basin for the supply of its summit-level has not been ascertained, but is believed to be insufficient. Mr. Mulvany gives such decided preference to the Ballinamore line, as to recommend that any further investigations or inquiry which might be made should be directed chiefly to it; and he adds, "I beg leave to remark, that though this line be not the most direct, as regards a connection between the western terminus of the Grand and Royal Canal on the one hand, and the terminus of the Ulster Canal on the other; that it is, nevertheless, the best, as being that upon which an ample supply of water for the summit-level can be obtained, that which unites most directly the north and west of Ireland, and as combining the greatest number of advantages in a local point of view. With respect to the additional length which, by the adoption of this line, will be given to the navigation between the points referred to, it is but of little importance, inasmuch as the navigation through the additional portion will be effected by steam-power upon the completion of the proposed improvements in the Shannon." A brief notice of the route and termini of the line thus preferred, is given in the article BALLINAMORE: which see.

SHANNON-BRIDGE, a village, and a fortified military station, the former in the parish of Clonmacnoise, barony of Garrysteale, King's co., Leinster, and the latter in the parish of Moore, barony of Moycarne, co. Roscommon, Connaught. The village stands on the left bank of the river Shannon, and on the road from Ballinasloe to most parts of King's co., 6½ miles south-east by east of Ballinasloe, 8½ west of Ferbane, and 6½ west of Dublin. The bridge which gives name to the place is, with the exception of the splendid new ones recently erected at Limerick, Banagher, and Athlone, one of the finest upon the Shannon; it commands a full view of the flat, boggy country around, and of the huge and sinuous bog-ditch formed by the snaky convolutions of the river Suck; it measures 420 feet in length, and has 16 arches across the river, and two across the brief line of adjacent canal; and its carriage-way is perfectly level, ample in breadth, and considerably elevated above the water. One of the two arches across the canal admits the transit of boats; and the other, which is small, spans the track-path of the horses. The brief line of canal obviates a fall of about a foot in the current of the river, in the immediate vicinity of the bridge. The Commissioners for improving the navigation of the river Shannon, proposed some changes here—particularly the deepening of the canal cut, the removal of the lock, and the construction of a swivel-bridge across the arch—estimated to cost £7,000. "The Roscommon end of the bridge is occupied by a military work, which forms a tête de pont capable of accommodating a small garrison. The public road wends between the barracks and fort, passing through a strong gate; and the place, besides being defended by the guns of the fort, is protected on the Connaught side by an advanced redoubt on a rising ground to the north of the highway." The fortifications are closely similar to those at Banagher; but the barracks are larger, and the battery is more conspicuous. Shannon-bridge is one of the three fortified passes still maintained upon the Shannon, the other two being Banagher and Athlone. The village is of recent origin, or at least of recent restoration; but, apart from the adjoining garrison, it is a place of very small importance or note. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, April 28, June 24, and Sept. 12. On the Roscommon side is a constabulary station; within a mile of the village, on King's co. side, is the seat of Templeduff; and 3½ miles up the river are the ecclesiastical ruins, and the quondam episcopal town of CLONMACNOISE: which see. The environs of Shannon-bridge, in a general view, are exceedingly dreary. Area of the village, exclusive of every thing on the Roscommon side, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 559; in 1841, 398. Houses 67. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 25; in manufactures and trade, 23; in other pursuits, 35. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 13; on the directing of labour, 33; on their own manual labour, 35; on means not specified, 2.

SHANNON-GROVE, a hamlet and a demesne in the parish of Ardcanmy, 1 mile north of Pallas-Kerry, barony of Kenry, co. Limerick, Munster. The demesne is the property of the Earl of Charleville; and occupies part of a rich, flat tract of country, upon the margin of the estuary of the Shannon, immediately below the influx of the Maig.

SHANNON-HARBOUR, a village in the parish of Gallon, barony of Garrysteale, King's co., Leinster. It stands on the Grand Canal, and on the road from Shannon-bridge to Banagher, half-a-mile east of the Shannon, 2½ miles north-north-east of Banagher, 2½ west of Cloughan, and 5½ south-south-east of Shannon-bridge. It acquired its name from being the western harbour or terminus of the Grand Canal previous to the cutting of the continuation to Ballinasloe; and it contains the large inn and stores originally constructed by the Canal Company, but now partially used as a constabulary barracks and for other purposes, and presenting a half-forsaken, a cold, and an unprosperous appearance. Within a mile of the village, on the Leinster side of the Shannon, are the seats of Moystown and Huntstown, and the ruins of Lisconey-castle. The transit of the Grand Canal across the Shannon also popularly bears the name of Shannon Harbour; and is effected by means of a wooden bridge, and connecting causeways. A marble quarry is worked in the vicinity of the village, and produces a very fine Irish and Sienna dove marble, which is exported in its rough state. Most of the surrounding country is low, flat, boggy, and irksome. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 199; in 1841, 244. Houses 38.

SHANNON-PARK, a quondam noble demesne in the parish of Carrigaline, barony of Kericcurihy, co. Cork, Munster. The mansion was neat; the park was beautiful; and the whole place was one of the most pleasant residences in Munster. But, about a century ago, the entire demesne went to ruin. Its proprietor was Francis, Viscount Shannon.

SHANNON-RAILWAY, a long and important line of proposed railway, partly in co. Tipperary and co. Kerry, but chiefly in co. Limerick, Munster. It is a principal member of the system of railways, surveyed and recommended by the Public Commissioners; and, though only one in the name assigned to it by the Commissioners, it consists of two great parts,—the first connecting the Grand-Trunk railway from Dublin with the city of Limerick, and the second connecting the city of Limerick with the various towns and harbours along the southern seaboard of the Shannon down to Tarbert. The line, viewed as one, defects from the Main-Trunk, or makes its own distinctive commencement half-a-mile south of Holycross in the valley of the Suir, traverses the opulent region called the Golden-Vale to Limerick, and proceeds thence along the rich low grounds which immediately overlook the Shannon. Its direction, over the first $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, is south-south-westward; over the next 7 miles, is west-south-westward; over the remaining distance to Limerick, is west-north-westward; and, from Limerick to Tarbert, is west by southward. The estimated cost of constructing it from Holycross to Donaghill, is £18,581, or per statute mile, £1,429; from Donaghill to Limerick, £57,404, or per statute mile, £2,523; from Limerick to Tarbert, £73,483, or per statute mile, £2,193; and over the whole distance, £149,468, or per statute mile, £2,158. The distance of the line from Holycross to Donaghill is 13 statute miles; from Donaghill to Limerick, 22 $\frac{1}{2}$; from Limerick to Tarbert, 33 $\frac{1}{2}$; from Holycross to Tarbert, 69 $\frac{1}{2}$. The following is an abstract of the report on it, by Mr. Vignoles, civil engineer, presented to the Public Commissioners:—"From the separation at Holycross, the railway will descend rather quickly for more than 2 miles to the river Clodagh, a branch of the Suir. The level of the rails is here 274 feet above the datum. From the Clodagh, near Milltown-castle, a nearly uniform ascent for 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles, carries the railway by the old castle of Ballagh, and the woods of Dundrum, to a summit at the Miltreen river, 324 feet above high water. From hence the descent to Limerick commences, first falling to the level of 309 feet at the village of Donaghill about 5 miles north of Tipperary. It is at this point, which is 103 miles from Dublin, and about 23 miles south-east of Limerick, that another line is taken, south-eastwardly, which passes by Golden, towards Clonmel, being a portion of the transverse line of railway from Limerick to Waterford. From Donaghill to Lynfield in the county of Limerick, at a point of the Dead river between Cappaghmore and Pallasgreen, a uniform inclination of 16 feet per mile can be obtained on further examination in detail. From Lynfield, for 6 or 7 miles, the line falls with a very easy inclination, and over very favourable ground, for the first 2 or 3 miles, occupying nearly the site of the original line of railway from Limerick to Waterford, laid out by the late Mr. Nimmo, about 12 or 13 years since. The railway reaches Limerick at the Lunatic Asylum, on the Cork road, on a level 41 feet above high water, and at a distance of 125 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Dublin. A natural hollow immediately south of the main portion of the city of Limerick, affords a convenient passage for the railway, which descends gradually to Ballinacurra bridge, where it crosses the Tarbert road, and then continues nearly parallel thereto, at a greater or less distance, but avoiding its bends for the whole way down the banks of the Shannon. A slight rise occurs between Ballinacurra bridge and the navigable river Maig, which is crossed about midway between the mid-town of Adare and its confluence with the Shannon. After passing horizontally across the marshes, another ridge between Pallaskenry and Askeaton compels a rise of 12 feet per mile for 4 miles, and a deep cutting at the summit reduces the level of the rails to 60 feet above high water, being the most elevated point between Limerick and Tarbert. A gentle fall of 8 feet per mile conducts the line across the river below the town of Askeaton, and on to the marshes of Fannamore. From Fannamore to Tarbert, the line, after crossing the marshes, keeps close under Poultallan Point, opposite the new harbour at Foynes Island, and below the cliffs at the demesne of Mount Trenchard, and thence along the coast and across the small bays and inlets of the south bank of the Shannon, passing in front of Loughill and Glin, to terminate at whatever point of Tarbert bay may be considered advisable. The last 15 miles of the line are horizontal,—the total distance from Dublin to Tarbert bay being 159 miles, and from Limerick to Tarbert about 33 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; the whole of which latter length may be said to be peculiarly favourable, both in inclinations and facilities for construction, and will, besides, present a coast-line of considerable attractions. Some little interference with the ports of Loughill and Glin will necessarily ensue; but, in both instances, this may be remedied by altering and improving the present landing-places and shelter. At Askeaton, to dispense with a swivel-bridge, it will be better to construct new quays below the line of railway, providing access to them by arches, and otherwise restoring the accommodation for the trade of that town. The passage of the river Maig will, however, involve a choice of difficulties. Should a permanent stone or iron bridge be constructed, the transit of vessels with masts to the town of Adare, 5 miles above, will be stopped; but if a navigable channel must be kept open for masted craft, the railway will be deformed by that most awkward impediment—a swivel-bridge. If quite unavoidable, this will be a great blemish on what would be otherwise a remarkably eligible line of railway; besides, the chance of accidents from a swivel-bridge being left open, has been proved by experience to be far from inconsiderable. Should the importance of the commerce of the town of Adare compel the adoption of a swivel-bridge, a proper regard for the safety and accommodation of the public requires that it should only be opened to admit the passage of vessels at times when no railway train shall be in sight."

SHANRAHAN, a parish in the barony of West Iffa and Offa, co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the village of BURNACOURT and the town of CLOGREEN; see these articles. Length, southward, 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 24,922 acres, 3 roods, 19 perches. Pop., in 1831, 7,001; in 1841, 7,398. Houses 1,201. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 5,154. Houses 849. The surface consists of part of the Galtee mountains, part of the Knockmeleadow mountains, and part of the intervening valley; and it extends from the summit-line of the Galtees southward to the upper and middle parts of the highland vale of Arraglin. The portion of the valley belonging to the parish, and lying between the mountain ranges, is traversed by the mail-road from Dublin to Cork by way of Clonmel; is extensively beautified by the large demesne and plantations of Viscount Lismore [see SHANBALLY]; possesses, in the aggregate, a good and even prime soil; boasts the presence of the surpassingly grand stalactitic caves of Mitchellstown [see MITCHELLSTOWN]; and both exhibits and commands a large amount of picturesque and romantic scenery. Three summits of the Galtee mountains on the northern boundary have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 2,588, 2,636, and 2,378 feet; a summit of the Galtees in the interior has an altitude of 1,591 feet; and Knockanard, Farbreaga, and Knockshanahullion, within the southern district, and belonging to the Knockmeledown range, have altitudes of respectively 1,337, 1,703, and 2,150 feet. Three indigenous rivulets of the northern or Galtee district spring up at elevations above sea-level of respectively 863, 1,036, and 761 feet; another rivulet of the Galtees traces part of the eastern boundary downward from an elevation of 1,702 feet; the Duag river runs eastward along the valley, from an elevation of 233 feet at the western boundary to one of 162 at Clogheen; and the Arraglin rivulet runs downward along the south-eastern and the southern boundaries from an elevation of 1,469 to one of about 320 feet. The only country residence of any note, additional to Shanbally, is Glenfield-house. The principal antiquities are ruins of a church and three castles.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Lismore. Vicarial tithe composition, £250. The rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Templetenny, are compounded for £820, and are inappropriate in Viscount Lismore and Caesar Sutton, Esq. The vicarages of Shanrahan and TEMPLETENNY [see that article], constitute the benefice of Shanrahan. Length, 9½ miles; breadth, 6½. Pop., in 1831, 10,788. Gross income, £441 9s. 9½d.; nett, £568 2s. 3½d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefices which constitute the corps of the treasurership of Lismore cathedral; but is resident in Shanrahan. Two curates—one for each parish—have each a salary of £75. The church of Shanrahan is situated about a mile west of Clogheen, and was built in 1812, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, about 80. But a new church was recently resolved to be built, principally by means of aid from the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. There is a church also in Templetenny. The Roman Catholic chapel at Clogheen has an attendance of 2,000; that at Burncourt has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, these two chapels are mutually united. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Templetenny. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish of Shanrahan consisted of 200 Churchmen, 49 Protestant dissenters, and 7,121 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 215 Churchmen, 49 Protestant dissenters, and 11,090 Roman Catholics; and 6 pay daily schools in the parish and union—there being none in Templetenny—had on their books 185 boys and 77 girls. In 1843, the National Board had a school in Clogheen workhouse.

SHANTAVNY, a mountain in the parish of Errigal-Keerogue, barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It is situated 3 miles north-west by north of Ballygawley, immediately east of the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry. It is the principal summit of a large section of the sandstone uplands of the county, and has an altitude of 1,035 feet above the level of the sea. A great tract of country around it is dreary moorland, thinly interspersed with spots of tillage and verdure.

SHARK (LOUGH), a small lake on the mutual boundary of the counties of Down and Armagh, Ulster. It lies in the course of the Newry Canal, partly within the parish of Aghaderg and barony of Upper Iveagh, and partly in the parish of Ballymore and barony of Lower Orier. Its length is scarcely ½ a mile; and its surface elevation above sea-level is 80 feet. On its east shore is Union-lodge, the seat of W. Fivey, Esq.; and on its west shore are the village of Acton and the seats of Acton and Drummargal,—the former the residence of C. R. Dobbs, Esq.

SHANAH. See AWBEG.

SHAW'S LOUGH, a small lake in the parish of Loughgilly, barony of Lower Fews, co. Armagh, Ulster. It lies closely adjacent to the demesne of Glen-Anne, and ½ mile south-west by west of Mount-Norris. The small stream which issues from it drives several weaving and spinning mills.

SHEAN. See SHANE.

SHEAN (NORTH), a mountain in the parish of Innishnacaint, barony of Magheraboy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It overhangs the shore of Lower Lough Erne, at a point 2½ miles west-north-west of Church-Hill; and it lifts its summit to an altitude of 1,135 feet above sea-level.

SHEANUA, or SHEEANAMORE, a village in the parish of Ballykine, barony of South Ballinacore, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands in one of a series of secluded glens, away from the transit of any public thoroughfare, 2½ miles north-north-west of Aughrim, and 5½ miles south-west of Rathdrum. Here is a charter school. Pop., in 1831, 95. Houses 15.

SHEDIN-PORT, a creek in the parish of Clonmany, and in the vicinity of Dunaff-Head, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. Excepting Limane, it is the only place of safety for either fishing-boats or sailing-craft in the vicinity of Dunaff Head; but it is so much exposed to the westerly winds as to be unsafe for large vessels in heavy gales.

SHEE (LOUGH), a turlough in the parish of Ballinrobe, 1 mile south-east of the town of Ballinrobe, barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. On the edge of it stands an ecclesiastical ruin called the church of Killashee.

SHEANAMORE. See SHEANUA.

SHEEFRY, a mineral district in the parish of Aughaval, barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It occurs in the midst of a wildly mountainous and sublimely romantic district, and closely adjacent to the road from Westport to Leenane and Chifden, 6½ miles north-east of Bundurra, and 9 south-west of Westport. Lead mines exist here; and silver has been found.

SHEEHY. See SHEVY.

SHEELIN (LOUGH), a lake, partly in the parish of Foyran, barony of Demifore, co. Westmeath, Leinster, and partly in the parish of Killeagh, barony of Demifore, co. Meath, Leinster, but chiefly in the parishes of Kilbride, Ballymachugh, and Drumlumman, barony of Clonmahon, co. Cavan, Ulster. Its length, south-westward, is 4 miles; and its extreme breadth is 2 miles. Its area comprises 803 acres, 2 roods, 28 perches in the parish of Foyran, 1,161 acres, 26 perches in the parish of Killeagh, 546 acres, 31 perches in the parish of Kilbride, 1,809 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches in the parish of Ballymachugh, and 541 acres, 1 rood, 9 perches in the parish of Drumlumman. Its superficial elevation above sea-level is 210 feet. Its only islands are Derry-Sheridan and Church-Island, both mere spots, but the latter possessing some prostrate ecclesiastical ruins. The lake, though partly bounded by bog, and everywhere set in a low and slightly featured frame-work, possesses considerable attractions, and, in many districts would be pronounced beautiful. Its northern shores were much improved and greatly adorned by the late Lord Farnham. Arley-cottage, which was his occasional residence, and the planted grounds connected with it, stretch along the shores of the lake, and present a good specimen of this style of demesne; and the improved condition of the people and farms around afford a proof of the virtues and patriotism which actuated his lordship. Adjoining Arley, are Crover, Fortland, Tara, Kilnabard, and Summerville cottages. On the southern shores of the lake is Ross; and near it a remarkably fine limestone quarry, which afforded the beautiful cut stone for Loughcrew-house. Lough Sheel in abundance in attractions for the angler. The river Inny carries off the superfluous waters of the lake, creeps through the dull flat swampy grounds which form the south-east shores, and speedily expands into the tame aqueous sheet of Lough Kinnail.

SHEEPBRIDGE, a hamlet in the parish and lordship of Newry, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of the town of Newry, co. Down, Ulster. Fairs are held on the first Friday of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov. In the vicinity is Sheepbridge-house.

SHEEPIHAVEN, a bay or sea-lough between the parishes of Meevagh and Clondelhorky, barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It enters between Horn Head peninsula on the west, and Rosaguil peninsula on the east; and is separated by the latter from the prolonged and ramified bay of Mulroy. It penetrates the land, first $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-eastward, with a minimum breadth of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, and next $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-westward, with a mean breadth of about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile; it sends off from the south-west side of its first stretch the two creeks or interior bays of Dunfanaghy and Ardes; and it forks, toward the head of its second stretch, into two arms, past Doe Castle, and in the direction of the village of Creeslough. The wondrous scenery on the west side of its entrance is noticed in the articles on HORN-HEAD and MACSWINE'S-GUN; the dismal wilderness of sand along its east shore is noticed in the articles on ROSAGUIL and ROSAFENNA; the beautiful and thoroughly wooded little peninsula between its first and its second stretches is noticed in the article on ARDES; and its principal capacities and value for the purposes of commerce are noticed in the article on DUNFANAGHY. The various creeks of Sheephaven afford natural shelter for fishing-boats; but a quay and a pier are much required. Sheephaven is a coast-guard station; and, in 1836, its district had engaged in the fisheries 28 row-boats.

SHEEP-HEAD, a cape in the parish of Kilerothane, western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It terminates the narrow but grandly upland peninsula between Dunmanus bay and Bantry bay.

SHEEP-ISLAND, an islet in the parish of Ballintoy, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. It lies opposite the village of Ballintoy, $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile north of the nearest part of the mainland, and 7 furlongs north-west of Carrick-a-Rede.

SHEEP-LAND, a boat harbour, or small creek in the parish of Dunfort, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Ardglass, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It has very deep water close to the mouth, and though the bottom is foul, the chief ledge of rock could be cleared out and transmuted into a kind of quay for a cost of about £100. The harbour had engaged in the fisheries, a number of years ago, two smacks and four yaws.

SHEFFIN, a parish in the baronies of Cranagh and Galmoy, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-west of Freshford, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, south-south-eastward, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Area of the Cranagh section, 787 acres, 4 perches; of the Galmoy section, 1,701 acres, 14 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 798; in 1841, 822. Houses 121. Pop. of the Galmoy section, in 1841, 555. Houses 87. The northern district is upland; and the southern district impinges upon the rich and beautiful vale of Freshford. A height on the northern boundary—which is also the northern boundary of the county—has an altitude of 1,000 feet above sea-level. The chief seat is Lodgepark-house; and the other chief objects of interest are an old castle and Sheffin burying-ground. The road from Ballyragget, to Urlingford passes through the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Aghour [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £44 17s. 3d., and the rectorial for £89 14s. 6d.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Canice cathedral. A Roman Catholic chapel is situated a little south of the centre of the parish. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 805; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 74 boys and 26 girls.

SHEHY, or SHEEHY, a range of mountains on the mutual border of the baronies of West Muskerry and East Carbery, and slightly extending also into the barony of Bantry, co. Cork, Munster. They separate the upper part of the valley of the Lee from the head of the valley of the Bandon; and they contribute the whole of their northern declivities to the noble mountain-scenery of the lakes of Allua. Their principal summit is situated $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Inchegeelagh, and has an altitude above sea-level of 1,796 feet.

SHELBURNE, a barony in the south-west of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Bantry; on the east, by the barony of East Shelmalier; on the south, by the Atlantic ocean; and on the west, by Wexford Harbour and the river Barrow, which separate it from the counties of Waterford and Kilkenny. Its greatest length, southward, is $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth is $7\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 53,102 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches,—of which 1,008 acres, 3 roods, 36 perches are tideway of the river Barrow. The highest grounds are eminences of respectively 214, 276, 256, 257, 388, and 460 feet of altitude above sea-level. The district south of Duncannon and the middle of Bannow bay is 6 miles in length, and nowhere more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ in breadth; and the southern half of it consists wholly of the narrow peninsula of the Hook; which see. The soil of the greater part of the barony is either a clayey or a gravelly loam; and, when properly under-drained and limed or marled, it produces excellent crops. Turf is abundant. Lime is obtained from the counties of Kilkenny and Carlow; a rich marl is found in the adjacent parts of the bed of the Suir; and abundance of calcareous or shell sand occurs near Duncannon-Fort.—This barony contains part of the parish of Whitechurch, and the whole of the parishes of Ballybrasil, Clonmines, Fethard, Hook, Killesk, Kilmokea, Owenduff, Rathroe, St. James and Dunbrody, Tellarought, Templetown, and Tintern. The towns and chief villages are Fethard, Churchtown, Slade, Arthurstown, Ballyhack, Duncannon, Ramnagrange, and Saltmills. Pop. in 1831, 17,687; in 1841, 18,712. Houses 3,007. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,320; in manufactures and trade, 570; in other pursuits, 309. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 100; on the directing of labour, 1,114; on their own manual labour, 1,856; on means not specified, 129. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,223; who could read but not write, 1,757; who could neither read nor write, 2,761. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,579; who could read but not write, 3,212; who could neither read nor write, 8,946.—Shelburne barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of New Ross. The total number of tenements valued is 2,734; and of these, 1,108 were valued under £5,—586, under £10,—356, under £15,—230, under £20,—143, under £25,—70, under £30,—82, under £40,—37, under £50, and 122, at and above £5. Shelburne gives the title of Earl to the Marquis of Lansdown. A former earldom of Shelburne was held by the family of Petty, and became extinct in 1751. The Hon. John Fitzmaurice, second son of the first Earl of Kerry, and maternal nephew of Henry, Earl of Shelburne, inherited the Petty estates at the extinction of the Shelburne earldom, and assumed the surname and arms of Petty; and, in 1751, he was created Baron Dunkerrin and Viscount Fitzmaurice,—in 1753, he was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Shelburne,—and in 1760, he was made Baron Wycombe in the peerage of Great Britain. William, the eldest son of this nobleman, and the second Earl of Shelburne upon the new patent, was a celebrated statesman in the reign of George III., and filled successively the offices of Foreign Secretary of State and first Lord of the Treasury; and in 1784—two years after he had succeeded the Marquis of Rockingham as prime minister—he was advanced to the British dignities of Earl of Wycombe and Marquis of Lansdowne.

SHELLEE, or SHALEK, a village in the parish of Killoccully, barony of Ownay and Arra, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the road from Nenagh to Newport-Tip., 2 miles west of Silvermines, and 5 south-west of Nenagh. The surrounding country is mountainous and rich in minerals; and the immediately eastern vicinity contains lead mines. In the southern vicinity are the seats of Shellee-house and Lower Shellee-house. Pop., in 1831, 138. Houses 26.

SHELMALIER (EAST), a maritime barony of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Ballaghkeen; on the east, by St. George's Channel; on the south, by Wexford Harbour, which separates it from the barony of Forth; and on the south-west and west, by the river Slaney, which separates it from the barony of West Shelmaliar. Its greatest length, eastward, is 6½ miles; its greatest breadth is 4; and its area is 16,746 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches,—of which 382 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches are tideway of the Slaney. The highest ground has an altitude of 205 feet. The general surface is low, level, and rich; and is identified with the northern sea-board of Wexford Harbour. The large and well-wooded demesne of Saunders' Court is a conspicuous feature in the south-west.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballinacorney, St. Margaret's, and Skreen, and the whole of the parishes of Ardeavon, Ardeolm, Artramon, Kilpatrick, and Tikellin. The only considerable village is Castle-Bridge. Pop., in 1841, 6,041. Houses 1,036. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 820; in manufactures and trade, 200; in other pursuits, 93. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 26; on the directing of labour, 347; on their own manual labour, 719; on means not specified, 23. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,097; who could read but not write, 497; who could neither read nor write, 983. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 679; who could read but not write, 829; who could neither read nor write, 1,250.—Both the Census of 1831 and the Statistic returns under the Poor-law Acts treat East Shelmaliar and West Shelmaliar as one barony. Pop., in 1831, 20,392. Houses 3,473. The district is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Ennisceortly, New Ross, and Wexford. The total number of tenements valued is 3,079; and of these, 1,563 were valued under £5,—570, under £10,—206, under £15,—179, under £20,—105, under £25,—101, under £30,—100, under £40,—59, under £50,—and 136, at and above £50.

SHELMALIER (WEST), an inland barony of the county of Wexford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west and north, by Bantry; on the east, by Ballaghkeen and East Shelmaliar; on the south-east, by Forth; on the south, by Bargie; and on the south-west and west, by Shelburne. Its greatest length, eastward, is 12½ miles; its greatest breadth is 8; and its area is 50,769 acres, 2 roods, 13 perches,—of which 469 acres, 3 roods, 31 perches are tideway of the river Slaney. Part of the Forth mountains is within the south-east boundary; and two or three other hills diversify the interior; but most of the surface is decidedly champaign, and not a little fertile and softly beautiful. Two summits of the Forth mountains have altitudes of respectively 687 and 776 feet above sea-level; a height midway between these mountains and Taghmon has an altitude of 428 feet; and Camorous-hill, on the northern border, has an altitude of 508 feet.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ballyhoge, Clonmore, Newbawn, Taghmon, and Whitechurch-Glynn, and the whole of the parishes of Ardeandrick, Ballyngley, Ballylaman, Ballymitty, Carrick, Clongeen, Coolstuff, Horetown, Inch, Kilbride-Glynn, Kilgarvan, and Killurin. The towns and chief villages are Taghmon, Clongeen, and Foulke's-Mill. Pop., in 1841, 15,050. Houses 2,630. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,080; in manufactures and trade, 454; in other pursuits, 197. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 58; on the directing of labour, 1,158; on their own manual labour, 1,463; on means not specified, 52. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,845; who could read but not write, 2,250; who could neither read nor write, 3,190. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,450; who could read but not write, 2,250; who could neither read nor write, 3,190.

SHELTON-ABBEY, the splendid demesne of the Earl of Wicklow, in the parish of Kilbride, barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is situated on the left bank of the Ovoca, 2 miles north-west of the town of Arklow; and is traversed by a new line of public road up the vale of the Ovoca. The mansion was designed by the artists, R. and W. Morrison, and was intended to represent an ecclesiastical structure of the 14th century, transmuted into a baronial residence; and it has been pronounced a peculiarly successful effort. A large portion of the demesne is covered with a dense forest of oak, and has too much gloom, closeness, and monotony, to harmonize with the general character of the valley of the Ovoca; but the portions immediately around the mansion are ornate and tasteful, and blend with adjacent stretches of scenery, particularly with the woods and grounds of Ballyarthur, to compose a general landscape of exquisite beauty and uncommon opulence.

SHENICK'S ISLAND, an islet in the parish of Holmpatrick, barony of East Bairothry, co. Dublin, Leinster. It lies in the Irish sea, ¼ of a mile east of the nearest part of the mainland, and 5 furlongs south-east of the town of Skerries. It measures half-a-mile in length, inclusive of comparatively broad rocky shores; but though small, it is verdant and beautiful. A martello tower stands upon the island.

SHENLIS, or SHANLIS, a parish in the barony of Ardee, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of the town of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, eastward, $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{4}$; area, 2,038 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches,—of which 217 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches lie detached in Mullaghcloe townland. Pop., in 1831, 501; in 1841, 530. Houses 87. The surface consists, for the most part, of good land; and is traversed by the road from Ardee to Kells. The seats are Ballygowan-house, Shenlis-house, Oberstown-house, and Blakestown-house.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of AURER (which see), in the dio. of Armagh. But though called a vicarage, the whole of its tithes, compounded for £82 10s., are impropriate in Viscount Ferrard. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 335; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

SHERCOCK, or KILLAN, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Clonke, co. Cavan, Ulster. It contains the village of Shercock, and is traversed by the road from Dublin to Clones. Length of the parish, northward, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $3\frac{1}{4}$; area, 8,221 acres, 4 perches,—of which 456 acres, 21 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,855; in 1841, 5,544. Houses 964. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,497; in 1841, 5,033. Houses 877. The surface lies comparatively high, and is, for the most part, bleak; yet, with the exception of about 300 acres, it consists wholly of profitable land. About one-half of the picturesque and somewhat extensive Lough Sillan, the source of the river Annalee, lies within the northern boundary; and, among other lakes and ponds in the interior or upon the boundaries, are Loughs Milltown, Annagherin, Shinan, and Corraghy. The principal country-residence is Shinan, the seat of Mr. Wilson, surrounded by a cordon of little lakes.—The village of Shercock stands on the road from Dublin to Clones, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Baileborough, 6 north-north-west of Kingscourt, and $7\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Cootehill. Fairs are held on the second Wednesday of every month. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Thursday of every month. A dispensary in the village is within the Baileborough Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 15,601 acres, with a pop. of 9,029; and, in 1839-40, it expended £82 17s. 9d., and made 2,352 dispensations of medicine to 784 patients. Area of the village, 18 acres. Pop., in 1831, 348; in 1841, 511. Houses 87. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 27; in manufactures and trade, 58; in other pursuits, 15. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 58; on their own manual labour, 27; on means not specified, 9.—Shercock parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £193 17s.; glebe, £406 8s. Gross income, £600; nett, £544 17s. 3d.; Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated at the village, and was built about 68 years ago. Sitzings 550; attendance 200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,050. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 615 Churchmen, 367 Presbyterians, and 3,739 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were usually attended by about 115 children; and 5 daily schools—one of which was aided with £6 a-year from subscription—had on their books 271 boys and 122 girls. In 1843, the National Board had at the village of Shercock one school for boys and one for girls.

SHERKIN. See INISHSHARKIN.

SHERLOCKSTOWN, a parish in the barony of North Nass, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Clane, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, southward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 917 acres, 2 roods, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 52; in 1841, 57. Houses 9. The surface is wholly profitable. The Grand Canal traces much of the western and the southern boundaries. The principal residence is Sherlockstown-house, the seat of Mr. Sherlock.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and part of the benefice of BODENSTOWN (which see), in the dio. of Kildare. The tithes are compounded for £35, and belong to the incumbent. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 38; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

SHEVIN. See SHIVEN.

SHILLELAGH, a barony in the extreme south-west of the county of Wicklow, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Carlow, and the barony of South Ballinacor; on the east and south, by the county of Wexford; and on the west, by the county of Carlow. Its greatest length, south-eastward, is 10 miles; its breadth is from $2\frac{1}{4}$ to 7; and its area is 44,348 acres, 3 roods, 5 perches. The surface, though much diversified, and possessing a large aggregate of pleasant and even powerful scenery, is so much inferior in landscape to the northern, eastern, and central districts of the county, as to be very seldom included within the route of either fashionable or literary tourists through Wicklow. One height on the northern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 1,312 feet; four heights in the interior of the central district have altitudes of respectively 1,057, 1,128, 1,171, and 1,381 feet; a height on the southern boundary has an altitude of 637 feet; two heights on the eastern border have altitudes of respectively 823 and 1,068 feet; and a height in the interior of the eastern district has an altitude of 765 feet. Most of the barony was anciently covered with wood, held in high esteem for its durability, and for its superior adaptation to the purposes of walking-sticks and cudgels; and, in consequence of having furnished many thousand most approved sticks to brawling and riotous faction-fighters, it eventually gave its name to every sort of cudgel, bludgeon, and heavy walking-staff used by the Irish peasantry. Shillelagh oak possesses celebrity also as the material of the beautiful oaken-ceiling of Westminster Hall. The whole of Shillelagh barony is the property of Earl Fitzwilliam; and says Mr. Fraser, "It is in this portion of the estate, the barony of Shillelagh, that many of those great improvements have taken place which have tended so much to exalt the noble house of Fitz-William as landlords, and at the same time to raise the character of this district. These improvements are simply what every one can readily understand—the location and encouragement of a respectable class of practical farmers; and nowhere have the beneficial effects resulting from such a practice been more fully evinced, than in the country around Coolattin. The comfortable farm-houses, with their accompanying trees which are scattered around, give this upland tract of country all the cheerfulness of some of the more favourite English localities."—This barony contains part of the parishes of Ardoyne, Carnew, Cryerim, Crosspatrick, and Moyacomb, and the whole of the parishes of Aghold, Liscoleman, and Mullinacuff. The only town is Carnew; and the chief village is Shillelagh. Pop., in 1831, 14,204; in 1841, 14,057. Houses 2,155. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,730; in manufactures and trade, 394; in other pursuits, 147. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 57; on the directing of labour, 754; on their own manual labour, 1,419; on means not specified, 41. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,844; who could read but not write, 1,248; who could neither read nor write, 2,148. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,761; who could read but not write, 1,916; who could neither read nor write, 2,554.—Shillelagh barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Shillelagh. The total number of tenements valued is 1,894, and of these 779 were rated under £5,—378, under £10,—220, under £15,—121, under £20,—77, under £25,—63, under £30,—83, under £40,—49, under £50,—and 124, at and above £50.

SHILLELAGH, a village in the parish of Carnew, barony of Shillelagh, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on a headstream of the Derry rivulet, here called the Shillelagh river, and at the intersection of the road from Carnew to Tullow, with that from Tinehly to Clonegall, 3½ miles north-north-west of Carnew, 3½ south-west of Tinehly, and 7½ east-south-east of Tullow. The surrounding country is beautiful and romantic; but excepting the old oaks in Coolattin Park, and in some of the adjoining woods, it retains very few of the coppices which formerly gave celebrity to the whole district. Within 1½ mile of the village are Lord Fitzwilliam's farm, and the seats of Black-house, Laurel-hill, Coolattin-park, Ballykelly-house, Ballyraheen-house, Cromalea-house, and Ballard-house. The village contains a handsome church, a schoolhouse, flour mills, and some good private houses: The church is a chapel-of-ease to the parish of Carnew, and was built in 1829, by means of a donation of £1,600 from Earl Fitzwilliam, and a grant of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Area of the village, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 91; in 1841, 186. Houses 22.

The Poor-law union of Shillelagh ranks as the 54th, and was declared on July 12, 1839. It lies in the counties of Wicklow and Carlow, and comprehends an area of 58,577 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 31,596. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop. in 1831, are in co. Carlow, Hacketstown, 3,719.—Clonegall, 2,389,—and Clonegall, 2,777; in co. Carlow and co. Wicklow, Rath, 1,340; and in co. Wicklow, Tinehly, 2,700.—Carnew, 2,507; Ballingate, 1,171.—Munny, 828.—Killmore, 1,456.—Aghold, 1,448.—Cromalea, 956.—Shillelagh, 1,039.—Coolattin, 1,228.—Coolboy, 1,360.—Ballybeg, 1,161.—Ballyglen, 1,253.—Kilballyowen, 907.—Kilpipe, 2,006.—and Coolballintaggart, 1,350. The number of ex-officio guardians is 8, and of elected guardians is 24; and of the latter, 2 are elected by each of the divisions of Tinehly, Carnew, Hacketstown, Clonegall, and Clonegall, and one by each of the other divisions. The divisions of Hacketstown and Clonegall lie in the barony of Rathvilly; the division of Clonegall lies in the barony of Upper St. Mullins; the division of Rath lies partly in the barony of Rathvilly, and partly in the barony of Shillelagh; the divisions of Shillelagh, Coolattin, Coolboy, Cromalea, Aghold, Killmore, Munny, Ballingate, and Carnew, lie in the barony of Shillelagh; the division of Tinehly lies partly in the barony of Shillelagh, and partly in the barony of South Ballinacor; and the divisions of Coolballintaggart, Ballybeg, Ballinglen, Kilballyowen, and Kilpipe, lie in the barony of South Ballinacor. The number of valued tenements in the Rathvilly districts is 859,—in the Upper St. Mullins district, 477,—in the South Ballinacor districts, 1,254,—in the Shillelagh districts, 1,894,—in the entire union, 4,484; and of this total, 1,775 were valued under £5,—947, under £10,—548, under £15,—322, under £20,—102, under £25,—118, under £30,—182, under £40,—108, under £50,—and 212, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £67,681 15s. 5d.; the total number of persons rated is 4,512; and of these, 486 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—424, not exceeding £2,—357, not exceeding £3,—236, not exceeding £4,—and 223, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on June 20, 1840,—to be completed in Sept. 1841,—to cost £5,300 for building and completion, and £1,000 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches, obtained for an annual rent of £8,—and to contain accommodation for 400 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Feb. 18, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,779 1s. 11½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £607 3s. 5d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 283. The only medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Shillelagh, Carnew, Hacketstown, and Tinehly; and, in 1839-40, they received £212 10s. 11d. from subscription, £222 11s. 8d. from public grants, and £1 3s. 6d. from other sources, expended £289 15s. 9d. in salaries to medical officers, £87 3s. 8½d. for medicines, and £50 14s. 7½d. for contingencies, and administered to 6,965 patients. The Shillelagh dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 6,935; and, in 1839-40, it expended £111 16s. 7½d., and made 3,133 dispensations of medicine to 1,601 patients.

SHILLELOGHER, a barony in the western district of the county of Kilkenny, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Cranagh and the Liberties of Kilkenny; on the east, by the barony of Gowran; on the south, by the baronies of Knocktopher, Kells, and Callan; and on the west, by the county of Tipperary. Its length, eastward, is 10 miles; its breadth varies from a few perches to 7 miles; and its area is 36,684 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches,—of which 87 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches are in the river Nore. The surface is part of the rich and beautiful central plain of the county; and lies at so slight a mean elevation above the level of the sea, that the only eminences marked on the Ordnance map as of any moment, are three of respectively 490, 236, and 272 feet of altitude. The river Nore traces the eastern boundary. The Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 108 and 109, transferred the townland of Ballymalina, part of Archerstreet lot, part of Casbel, the whole of Dukesmeadows, part of Maidenhill, part of Mernelismeadows, and part of Robert's-Hill, in the parish of St. Canice, the townlands of Archer's Grove, Archer's Leas, Ardsraddaun, Bawureagh, Birefield, Castle-Blunden, Clonmoran, Coxfields, Danville, Donaghmore, Lower Drakeland, Middle Drakeland, Upper Drakeland, Dicksborough, part of Dukesmeadows, Gallow's Hill, Holden's Rath, Joiners' Folly, Kilcreen, Kylebeg, Loughboy, Margaret's Fields, Mortgage Fields, Palmerstown, Poulgour, Raggot's Land, Review Fields, Shellun's Rath, North Smithsland, South Smithsland, Springhill, Warington, and Wetland, in the parish of St. Patrick, and part of the townland of Dukesmeadows, in the parish of St. John, from the quondam county of the city of Kilkenny to the barony of Shillelogher, and these townlands contained, in 1841, a pop. of 1,296. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townlands of South Ballyredding and part of North Ballyredding, in the parish of Treadings-town, from Shillelogher to Gowran,—pop., in 1841, 1,107; and the uninhabited townland of Gortnaragh, in the parish of Killaloe, from Shillelogher to Callan.—The barony of Shillelogher, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Ennisang, Kells, Killaloe, Stoneycarthy, St. Canice, St. John, St. Patrick, Treadings-town, and Tullaghanbrogue, and the whole of the parishes of Ballyburt, Burselchurch, Castle-Inch, Donesfort, Earlstown, Grange, Grange-Kilrea, Kilferagh, Outrath, and Tullamaine. The only considerable village is part of Bennet's Bridge.

Pop., in 1831, 10,934; in 1841, 9,673. Houses 1,344. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,360; in manufactures and trade, 148; in other pursuits, 113. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 31; on the directing of labour, 732; on their own manual labour, 789; on means not specified, 49. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,960; who could read but not write, 737; who could neither read nor write, 1,667. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 888; who could read but not write, 1,160; who could neither read nor write, 2,268. — Shillelogher, understood however in its old form or previous to the recent territorial changes, lies within the Poor-law unions of Callan and Kilkenny, and contains 1,790 valued tenements; and of these tenements, 776 were valued under £3,—271, under £10,—126, under £15,—94, under £20,—64, under £25,—72, under £30,—91, under £40,—47, under £50,—and 164, at and above £50.

SHILVODAN, a grange in the barony of Upper Toome, 3½ miles north-east of Randalstown, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 3,546 acres, 2 roods, 1 perch. Pop., in 1841, 1,366. Houses 238. The interior is traversed by the road from Randalstown to Kells, and by that from Antrim to Ballymena.—This district lies in the dio. of Connor, but is not separately noticed in any of the Ecclesiastical Reports.

SHIMNA (THE), a beautiful and romantic rivulet of the barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It rises among the Mourne mountains, 1 mile north-north-east of the source of the river Bann; and it runs 2½ miles north-eastward, and 4 miles eastward, to the head of Dundrum bay, at the picturesque village of Newcastle. Its course is impetuous, down a rocky channel, and through the Earl of Roden's superb demesne of Tullymore-Park.

SHINDELLA, a lake in the parish of Kilcummin, barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It extends from east to west, to within about 3 furlongs of Flynn's-Inn or Halfway-house, and it measures 1½ mile in length, and has a surface-elevation of 130 feet above the level of the sea. The road from Galway to Clifden skirts the whole of its south shore; and the road from Galway to Maam defects from its east end, called the Cross of Shindella.

SHINNY (LOUGH), a village, and a small harbour, in the parish of Lusk, 1½ mile north of Rush, barony of East Balrothery, co. Dublin, Leinster. The village is noticed under the word LOUGH-SHINNY [which see]; and the harbour was officially reported, between 8 or 9 years ago, by Mr. Nimmo, as follows:—"This inlet is about ¼ of a mile square, and affords perhaps the very best natural situation for a harbour along the whole coast of Leinster. Though it seems to have been known to the Danish invaders, as there are remains of an intrenchment across the peninsula on the south, it has been comparatively neglected in latter times. There is no village of any consequence upon it, and only three or four yaws. In 1771, the then proprietor, Mr. Dempsey, petitioned parliament for aid to extend a pier he had begun here at his own expense, and of which he had completed eleven perches, with a return of five perches. Although a favourable report was made thereon, the work was not prosecuted, and it is now a total ruin. To complete the shelter at Lough Shimmy, it would be necessary to form a breakwater on the ledge of rock where the old pier was begun, so as to raise the same above high water to within 20 perches of the point near the Martello Tower; there is plenty of materials of the best description on the spot. Jetties may then be run out in any convenient part of the bay, either from the shore or the breakwater, for landing or shipping places; the harbour will have 15 feet into it at low water, and a firm clean bottom of sand, over an area of 40 English acres. Such a breakwater might be made for about £20 per running yard. Estimated expense of the works, £12,000. But even if this should not be undertaken, I am still of opinion this bay would afford the best place of protection for the Rush fishermen, by running out a pier from about the middle of the south side, in a direction north by compass for at least 15 perches, which would be done for about £1,200 to £2,000. The water is considerably shallower at the site of the old pier; but, in other respects, that would be also a useful work if restored. The chief advantage of Lough Shinny is the excellent roadstead afforded by the bay in all but east winds."

SHINRONE, a parish, containing a post-town of the same name, in the barony of Clonlisk, King's co., Leinster. Length, east-south-eastward, 4 miles; breadth, from 1½ to 2; area, 4,868 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches,—of which 1 acre, 2 roods, 22 perches are in Lough Nahinch. Pop., in 1831, 2,517; in 1841, 2,563. Houses 467. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,230; in 1841, 1,509. Houses 260. The surface possesses a very large aggregate of wood and of villa and demesne ground; yet, in spite of its profusion of embellishment, it is not remarkable for either fertility of soil or beauty of natural feature. The low lands are, to a considerable extent, flat, boggy, and subject to inundation; and the higher grounds have in general a shallow, gravelly, and churlish soil. The highest ground is in the north-west, and has an altitude of 454 feet above sea-level. Lough Nahinch lies on the north-west boundary. The principal seats are Kilballyskeagh, Woodbrook, Keeloge-cottage, Milltown, Mount-Lucas, Rockview, Cangort-lodge, Cangort-house, and Cangort-park,—the last a well-kept demesne, embellished with some fine old trees, and belonging to W. Trench, Esq. The roads from Roscrea to Borris-o'-kane, and from Birr to Moneygall, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £193 16s. 11½d.; glebe, £42. The rectories of Shinrone, KILCOMIN, and KILMURRY-ELY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Shinrone. Pop., in 1831, 5,378. Gross income, £737 10s. 9½d.; nett, £661 14s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is situated in the town of Shinrone, and was built in 1823, by means of a loan of £2,123 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and the sum of £424 12s. 3½d. raised by the sale of pews. Sittings 600; attendance 450. Two Wesleyan Methodist meeting-houses at Shinrone have an attendance of respectively 50 and 25. The Roman Catholic chapels at Shinrone and Kilmurry-Ely have an attendance of respectively 600 and 300; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish of Shinrone amounted to 820, and the Roman Catholics to 1,838; the Protestants of the union to 1,382, and the Roman Catholics to 4,248; a Protestant Sunday school in the parish was usually attended by about 57 scholars; and 9 daily schools in the union—7 of which were in the parish—had on their books 236 boys and 186 girls. One of the daily schools in the parish was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board, and £25 from W. Trench, Esq.; one, with £12 from the London Hibernian Society and the ladies of the parish; one, with £5 from the London Hibernian Society and the ladies of the parish; and one, with £8 from the As-association for Discourteuing Vice, and £6 and other advantages from the rector. In 1843, the National Board had two schools—the one for boys and the other for girls—at Cangort-park.

SHIRONE, a small post and market town in the parish of Shirone, barony of Clonlisk, King's co., Leinster. It stands at the intersection of the road from Roscrea to Borris-o'-kane, with that from Birr to Moneygall, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Roscrea, 6 north of Moneygall, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south of Birr, 8 east-south-east of Borris-o'-kane, and 64 south-west by west of Dublin. "At Shirone," said Sir Charles Coote in 1801, "are vestiges of some places of considerable strength, with the ruins of a watch-tower, and an artificial eminence at some distance, but I cannot learn any historical tradition of it; and in the neighbourhood are also strong circular buildings, all situate on gravelly hills, which are rapidly undermining; they were converted into cock-pits long since, but all are now in ruins. The old castle of Cangor was noted for standing a long and obstinate siege to the Irish army; but the brave garrison was basely betrayed, and, with the castle, burnt by the barbarians." The only noticeable public buildings now in the town are the places of worship. Fairs are held on July 9, and Nov. 21. A court of petty-sessions is held on every Wednesday. The town is a constabulary station. The Shirone fever hospital and dispensary are within the Roscrea Poor-law union, and serve for a district containing a pop. of 9,770; and, in 1839, the fever hospital expended £106 7s. 9d., and admitted 146 patients, while the dispensary expended £134 10s., and administered to 2,720 patients. Area of the town, 58 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,287; in 1841, 1,054. Houses 207. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 110; in manufactures and trade, 53; in other pursuits, 56. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 27; on the directing of labour, 83; on their own manual labour, 109.

SHIRCOCK. See SHERCOCK.

SHIVON, or SHEVEN (THE), a rivulet of the north-eastern district of the county of Galway, Connaught. It rises among the Slieveve hills, on the northern border of the barony of Tyquin, and runs 13 miles south-eastward and eastward, principally within the baronies of Tyquin and Killian, to the river Suck, at a point $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Mount-Talbot. "This stream," says Mr. Griffiths, in his official report to the Commissioners on Bogs, "runs in a narrow valley bounded either by bog, or steep hills of limestone rock, or limestone gravel. It has its source a little to the north of Mount Bellew; at that village it is joined by several other streams, and forms a considerable river as far as the eel-weir at Longford; the fall is sufficiently rapid to discharge the flood-water; its free passage is at present interrupted by shallow channels between the numerous islands; between Longford weir and Crosshill weir the river is dead, and particularly where it passes between the bogs of Elanmore and Kilasolan, in fact the eel-weir at Crosshill throws back water as far as Clonferries; this back-water will not prevent the drainage of the above-mentioned bogs, as there is sufficient fall from their surface at the highest flood water; but the land on either side might be rendered much more valuable than it is at present, if the water were under command; this might be effected by erecting proper sluices at Crosshilleel-weir, by the raising or falling of which, the lands might be flooded or laid dry at pleasure; if this plan were adopted, the same water which now materially injures the land by remaining on it too long, might, by proper management, be rendered very beneficial. Between Crosshill and the junction of the river Shiven with the Suck at Muckanagh, there are but three falls, viz., at Clonabricka mill, Ballinamore, and Ballinlass mill; in the lower part particularly, from Ballinlass mill to the junction with the Suck, there is but three feet of fall; the river is in this place both wide and deep, but the current is too frequently interrupted by islands, so that slight rains are sufficient to flood the land on either side."

SHONAGARRY, a lead mine in the barony of Glanerought, co. Kerry, Munster. It is situated in the valley of the Roughy, a little east of the village of Kenmare. The proprietorship of the land in which it occurs was recently in dispute.

SHRAGH, an old and ruined castle in the parish of Kilbride, barony of Ballycowan, King's co., Leinster. It stands on the north bank of the Grand Canal, half-a-mile west of Tullamore. See TULLAMORE.

SHRAHEEN, a hill in the parish of Ballinahaglish, barony of Trawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It screens the east side of Lough Cullen.

SHRONELL, or SHRONEHILL, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, 24 miles west of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, westward, 24 miles; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,805 acres, 3 roads, 12 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,006; in 1841, 1,114. Houses 135. The surface consists, in general, of very good land, and is traversed by the road from Tipperary to Emly. A height on the northern boundary has an altitude above sea-level of 373 feet. The seats are Ballinard-house, Dameville, and Shronell-house.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £124 12s. 4d.; glebe, £15. Gross income, £139 12s. 4d.; nett, £120 11s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also, in union with the benefice of Shronell, the chapelry of Kilmore. The church was originally built at the private cost of the Damer family; and was enlarged in 1818, by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 80; attendance 35. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 1,018; and a pay daily school had on its books 60 boys and 30 girls.

SHROWLE, a barony. See ABBEYSRUDEL.

SHRUFEL, or SHRUTLE, a parish in the barony of Rathcline, co. Longford, Leinster. It contains the greater part of the town of BALLYMAHON; which see. Length, westward, 44 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,922 acres, 1 road, 87 perches,—of which 176 acres, 2 roads, 5 perches are in Lough Ree, and 62 acres, 3 roads, 15 perches are in the river Inny. Pop., in 1831, 3,848; in 1841, 3,671. Houses 625. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,546. Houses 446. The number of townlands is 30. Between two-thirds and three-fourths of the surface is arable land, of a limestone quality; and most of the remainder is bog or low pasture and meadow land. Two considerable rising grounds or hills, Mullavorna and Tirlicken, diversify the surface, and are highly improved. A fine old grove exists at Ballymulvey; and some handsome plantations occur at Tirlicken, Ledwithstown, Drinacore, and Clonkeen, opposite Newcastle, the seat of the late Earl of Rosse. The river Inny traces the whole of the southern boundary, to the head of the large bay of Lough Ree, called Lough Killymore; and its stream and its banks combine with the adjacent country, to form a stretch of very pleasant scenery. "The river winds with a full deep stream till it passes through the demesne of Newcastle, when it falls through broken rocks for about a quarter of a mile; at Ballymulvey it grows deep and tranquil again till impeded by the rocky islands, eel-weir, and mills of Ballymahon, where it falls a considerable number of feet into a deep bed through which it flows by the townlands of Castlecor to the ruined church of Shruel, where a bridge crosses it, from which it is navigable to Loughree and the Shannon. The views are particularly fine from Clonkeen, Ballymahon-bridge, and the house of Castlecor. The superficial appearance of this parish is injured by a want of timber, except at Ballymulvey, where the trees are beginning to decay by age. The town-parks of Ballymahon are kept in high order, but the general appearance of the parish is that of a light rocky soil. Lime-stone, for manurial purposes, is found in great abundance; and probably some sufficiently fine and indurated to be dressed as marble might be quarried near the bed of the Inny. The Royal Canal makes a long sweep within the parochial limits. Ballybranegan is the only hamlet of noticeable bulk. Ballymulvey, long and anciently the residence of the proprietors of the principal estate in the parish, is beautifully situated on the Inny, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile above Ballymahon, and is surrounded by a majestic grove. In 1609, Sir Robert Dillon, successively Second Justice of the Queen's Bench, and Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, obtained from Queen Elizabeth a grant of the estates of Ballymulvey and the monastery of Abbey-shruel; his eldest son, Sir Lucas Dillon, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, was the father of the first Earl of Roscommon, and the maternal grandfather of Oliver Plunket, titular archbishop of Armagh, who was executed at London in 1681, some think unjustly, on a charge of high treason; and Sir James Dillon, who was proprietor and occupant of Ballymulvey in 1641, became so deeply implicated in the rebellion of that year as to suffer expulsion from the House of Commons, and the forfeiture of his landed property. The estate of Ballymulvey now passed into the possession of the Molyneux family; and, in consequence of a failure of male issue, it afterwards passed to the family of Shulldham. Tirlickeen-house, situated 2 miles north-west of Ballymahon, and on the right side of the road thence to Roscommon, was built by the second Lord Annaly, a colonel in the army, during the life of his brother, the first Lord Annaly; and it was for some time the residence of the episcopal predecessor of the present bishop of Meath. The ancient mansion of Tirlickeen, now a ruin, and situated near Ballymahon, was the property and residence of Sir Connel O'Farrel, who was restored to his estates by the acts of settlement in 1602, in consideration of his having served under King Charles abroad, during the usurpation of Cromwell. "Traces of the old garden and orchard," says the Rev. John Graham, "remain near the old mansion-house of Tirlickeen; and when Oliver Goldsmith lived with his mother at Ballymahon, and was one of the pupils of the Rev. Mr. Hughes, the vicar of Shruel, who kept a classical school there, he got into a scrape by being detected with some of his school-fellows robbing this orchard." Castlecor-house, the residence of Mr. Hussey, situated on elevated ground, about a mile west of Ballymahon, was built by the very Rev. Cutts Harman, Dean of Waterford, and was designed by him to be a miniature copy of Windsor-castle. "The principal room, which is circular, and for which the chief part of the house has been sacrificed, commands delightful views of the river Inny, and different parts of this interesting neighbourhood, which are reflected by four large mirrors over each of the fire-places in the centre of the room. The floor is of marble, which renders this fine room very agreeable in the heat of summer, but cold, damp, and uncomfortable in winter. Four small but pleasant boarded-rooms, branch forward at equal intervals, from the great room in the centre of this house, which has an underground story containing a large kitchen and several other apartments." Ledwithstown, the seat of Mr. Ledwith, is situated $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Ballymahon, immediately beyond the parochial boundary-line of Shruel; but a chief part of its demesne is within the parish. Drumnacor-house was built by the late John Sandys, Esq., is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of Ballymahon, and commands a fine view of Lough Ree. The other seats are Moygh-house, Darogehouse, Rockfield-house, and Ardoghill-house. The ruins of three old castles stand at respectively Ballymahon, Castlecor, and Barnacor. The burying-ground, surrounding the ruins of the old parish-church at Shruel, is one of the most popular places of interment in the county, and was the cemetery of the Molyneux, the Ledwiths, the Ashes, and other chief families of the neighbourhood.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial tithe composition, £123 16s. 2d.; glebe, £45 9s. 8d. Gross income, £169 5s. 11d.; nett, £150 14s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also a canonry in the cathedral of Kildare; but is resident in Shruel. A curate receives a salary of £75. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £194 10s. 4d., and are inappropriate in the vicars choral of the two cathedrals of Dublin. The church was built about 108 years ago, at a cost now unknown; and was enlarged in 1824, by means of a loan of £1,052 6s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 30 to 180. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,350 to 1,620; in 1834, the Protestants amounted to 229, and the Roman Catholics to 3,407; a Protestant Sunday school was usually attended by about 40 scholars; a Roman Catholic Sunday school was usually attended by about 120 scholars; and 9 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £7 a-year from the Association for Discourteasing Vice, £6 from the Ardagh Association, and £2 from the vicar, and one with £6 from the Roman Catholic bishop, £1 10s. from the Roman Catholic parochial clergyman, and £12 10s. from subscription—had on their books 250 boys and 132 girls. In 1843, a National school at Ballymahon was salaried with £15 from the Board, and had on its books 105 boys and 140 girls.

SHRUEL, or SHRULE, a parish on the eastern verge of the barony of Slievemargy and of Queen's county, Leinster. It lies on the right bank of the Barrow, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Carlow. Length, southward, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; extreme breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; area, 982 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches,—of which 7 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches are in the river Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 183; in 1841, 165. Houses 25. The surface consists of good land; contains a large proportion of villa and demesne ground; and is traversed by the road from Athy to Carlow. The principal residences are Annville-cottage, Cherryville-house, and Hollymount-house,—the last the seat of W. Fishbourne, Esq. The chief antiquity is the ruin of Shruel castle—a massive and once important structure, erected in the reign of Elizabeth by Sir Robert Hartpole, constable of Carlow castle, and governor of Queen's county.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £46 3s. 1d. The rectories of Shruel and SLATY (see that article) constitute the benefice of Shruel. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 372. Gross income, £112 3s. 1d.; nett, £105 15s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent holds also the stipendiary curacy of Carlow. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 158; the Protestants of the union to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 396; and there was a pay daily school in Slaty.

SHRUEL, or SHRUELE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the southern verge of the barony of Kilmain, and of the county of Mayo, Connaught. Length, south-westward, 7 miles; breadth, from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 11,600 acres, 2 roads, 32 perches, —of which 151 acres, 1 rood, 32 perches lie detached, 738 acres, 3 roads, 20 perches are in Lough Corrib, and 143 acres, 3 roads, 20 perches are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,167; in 1841, 5,087. Houses 869. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,660; in 1841, 4,358. Houses 747. The surface is preëminently bleak and of uninviting aspect, yet consists, for the most part, of good land. The Black river runs on the boundary with co. Galway, but is, for a considerable distance, subterranean. Dalgan-park, a large, commodious edifice, the seat of P. Kirwan, Esq., adorns the north-eastern district; and is surrounded by a wooded and pleasant demesne. The other seats of any consequence are Moyne-lodge, Ballycurrin-house, Glencorrib-lodge, and Laketield-house. Loughnakeill lake lies on the northern boundary, and has a surface-elevation of 93 feet above sea-level. Polbeg turlough lies in the western district. The portion of Lough Corrib belonging to the parish, contains the islet called Red-Island. The highest ground in the parish is Kilroe-hill, and has an altitude above sea-level of 238 feet. The principal antiquities, exclusive of those at the village, are the ruins of Moyne church, Moyne castle, and Moeorbin castle. The roads from Headford to Cong, Kilmain, and Ballinrobe pass across the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice and wardenship or peculiar jurisdiction of GALWAY: which see. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £183 17s. 5d., and the quarter-parts tithes for £61 5s. 9d.; and the latter are payable to the immediate incumbent of the parish, and are in the gift of the bishop of Tuam. The parochial Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,500 to 2,000; and the chapel attached to a friary, and presided over by two friars, has an attendance of about 600. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 4,450; and 3 pay daily schools were usually attended by about 130 scholars. In 1843, a National school in the village was salaried with £24 a-year from the Board, and had on its books 149 boys and 100 girls.

SHRUEL, or SHRUELE, a village in the parish of Shruel, barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the Black river, and on the road from Ballinrobe to Galway, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south by east of Kilmain, $\frac{3}{4}$ north by east of Headford, 9 south-south-east of Ballinrobe, and 17 north of Galway. It is a poor secluded and repulsive place; and is remarkable only for its stone bridge across the Black river, its ruins of an old monastery, and especially its ruins of a castle which belonged to the Marquis of Clanricarde, and was the scene or centre in 1641 of a cold-blooded and memorable massacre. Sir Henry Bingham, the ancestor of the Earl of Lucan, was, with the bishop of Killalla, 14 other Protestant clergymen, and a great number of respectable Protestant gentry, obliged, for want of provisions, to surrender his stronghold of Castlebar, to Viscount Mayo, and his son Sir Theobald Bourke; and he capitulated on the condition that he and the whole garrison should be safely conveyed to Galway. "The besieged had not only the assurance of Lord Mayo, the great leader of the Mayo Bourkes, but they had the promise of the Roman Catholic archbishop of Tuam, who assured them of a safe delivery at the fort of Galway; and this was not all—Lord Mayo, the night the convoy arrived at Shruel, made the bishop of Killalla sleep with him in his own bed." But on Monday, two days after their arrival at Shruel, the convoy were delivered up by Lord Mayo to a ferocious relative of his own, Edmund Bourke; and when they were resuming their journey to Galway, and were in the vicinity of Shruel bridge, they were subjected by that monster to indiscriminate slaughter. "Some were shot, others were piked, others cast into the river—even the ladies were stabbed then while lying on the wounded bodies of their husbands and trying to protect them. Sixty-five persons were slaughtered, among whom were two women great with child, and all the clergymen, except the bishop, who was severely wounded, and a Mr. Crowd, who was so beaten on the feet with cudgels, that he died shortly after. It is but just to state, that numbers of the Roman Catholic gentry, on hearing of the horrid act, came to the assistance of the survivors, drove off the ferocious murderers, and carried the sufferers to their houses, and took care of them. Amongst others who exerted themselves in this humane labour, it is pleasant to have to mention that the old abbot of Ross Reilly, Brian Kilkelly, hastened to the spot, did all he could for the wounded, brought the bishop's wife and children to his abbey, and for several days entertained them to the best of his means, until they were removed to a more convenient retreat." The Earl of Clanricarde says, in a letter dated Feb. 19, "I received yesterday a large relation of the inhuman and barbarous massacre of the poor English, from Pierce Lynch, my tenant of Shruel, who was an eye-witness of that cruelty being done upon and on each side of the bridge before the castle; the number of the English one hundred. He affirms it was done by those in the county of Mayo, and who, being before with my Lord of Mayo, would fain have lodged within my castle, but neither entreaties nor threats could prevail." Fairs are held at Shruel on Easter Monday, July 26, and Nov. 11. Area of the village, 38 acres. Pop., in 1831, 507; in 1841, 729. Houses 122. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 55; in manufactures and trade, 51; in other pursuits, 30. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 53; on their own manual labour, 64; on means not specified, 11.

SHYANE, a parish in the barony of Elogurty, $\frac{2}{3}$ miles north-north-east of Thurles, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, southward, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile; extreme breadth, 1; area, 909 acres, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 313; in 1841, 359. Houses 55. The land is good, and brings a high rent. The only noticeable objects are the hamlet of Rossestown, the ruins of Shyane church or Templeshyane, and the site of an old castle.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of THURLES [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £31 3s. 6d., and the rectorial for £13 11s. 6d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the representatives of Nath. Taylor, Esq., of Noon. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school had on its books 30 boys and 20 girls.

SIERKRYAN. See SIRIKRYAN.

SILLAN (LOUGH), a lake in the parishes of Shercock and Knockbride, barony of Clonkee, co. Cavan, Ulster. It extends $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north-westward, has a mean breadth of not more than 3 furlongs, sends forth the nascent stream of the Annalee river, possesses considerable picturesqueness, commences a few perches north of the village of Shercock, and is skirted along its east side by the road from Dublin to Clones.

SILLERMORE, a great moorland tract of country, partly in the barony of Galway, but chiefly in that of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It comprehends the greater part of the parishes of Rahoon, Moycullen, and Killanin, and a considerable part of the parish of Kilcummin, and is, in its southern part, identical with the northern sea-board of the bay of Galway, from the immediate vicinity of the town of Galway to the bay of Casleh or Costello. "The greater part of this great tract of moor and bog," said Mr. Nimmo, in his official report of 1814, "is known by the name of the Sillermore mountain; it is in fact, however, a flat country, which, although rocky and uneven, does not exhibit any mountains, and very few hills, except toward the northern corner. The shape is nearly an isosceles triangle, having Galway at the vertex; and the sides extending to Leam on the north-west, and to Cortle bay on the south-west, and each about 15 Irish miles, with 11 miles of base, the contents being somewhat more than 50,000 Irish acres. The interior of this great moor is inaccessible but to a person on foot, and is nearly uninhabited—one road scarcely passable for carriages, runs along the shore from Galway to Costello bay, and a bridle road has been begun from near Oughterland to the same place; one or two other bridle roads enter a little way on the north-east side. The moor has been cleared and cultivated with success for somewhat more than a mile from Galway, and there is a stripe of cultivation along the shore, all of it, however, much roughened by naked blocks of granite; there are also a few patches along the north-east side, upon the hills overhanging the limestone field, which show tolerable cultivation; in the interior there are some pieces of scrubby wood, as upon the Ferbagh and Spiddal rivers. In order to open up this tract, I should propose to lay out a great road through the centre of it into Conamara, with branches on one side towards the sea, and on the other the limestone field, but these must be designed with more attention than the present attempts at bridle roads, which seem only calculated to perpetuate the present sterility."

SILLIES (THE), a river of the western division of the county of Fermanagh, Ulster. It rises among the uplands of the parish of Innismacaint, at nearly equal distances from Belleek and Church-hill, carries off the superfluous waters of several small lakes among these uplands, runs eastward and south-eastward in such a manner as never to be at a greater distance than 3½ miles from Lower Lough Erne, and, without including a countless number of minor sinuosities, has a course of about 19 miles to the river Erne at a point 1 mile above Enniskillen. It rises within, or on the boundaries of, the parishes of Innismacaint, Devenish, Boho, Cleenish, and Rossory, in the baronies of Magheraboy and Glenawley; and it traverses a series of close scenes of considerable beauty.

SILVERHILL, a mountain in the parish of Killynord, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated 6½ miles north by west of the town of Donegal, and lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,967 feet above sea-level.

SILVERMINES, a village in the parish of Kilmore, barony of Upper Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the road from Toomavara to Newport-Tip., or direct road from Roscrea to Limerick, 4½ miles south-south-west of Nenagh, 7½ south-west by west of Toomavara, 9 north-east of Newport-Tip., and 74½ south-west by west of Dublin. A mountainous country which immediately surrounds it, is popularly called the Silvermines mountains, forms part of the great Keeper or Slievekimalta congeries, and is separated from the central height of that congeries, the Keeper mountain itself, only by Glen-Colloo, which extends from east to west within less than 2 miles of the south side of the village. The principal height of the Silvermines portion of the congeries rises 1½ mile south-west of the village, and lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,607 feet above sea-level. The mountains, as their name implies, are very rich in minerals; and they, at the same time, present noble features and combinations of romantic and powerful scenery. "The hills," said Mr. Holmes in 1801, "bear all the outward marks of internal wealth. I never saw finer studies for the painter; the various stains, the effects of mineral water dropping from them, and oozing through their jagged sides, the shattered fragments split from the mountain's sides, where the dark gashes, torn and blackened by the explosion of the powder in mining, a few blasted stumps and burnt herbage, give it all the character of Salvator's savagely-picturesque pencil; it wanted but a few of his condottori to give the finish, and these it was easy for the mind to furnish. From the innumerable shafts and levels, with other works overgrown with creeping briars and weeds, it appears that those mines have been worked with vigour even some centuries back. The present inhabitants do not remember them ever to have been productive of silver; yet few places obtain a name that does not originate from their properties, appearances, &c. And as those mines even give their names to a large district, it is more than probable that our ancestors worked them as silver mines, though now they are dwindled into insignificance, through want of enterprise and capital." The mines were worked, during the first half of the 17th century, under the direction of Lord William Russell and Sir Charles Brook, who held them from the Crown; but, during the rebellion of 1641, the works were destroyed, and many of the workmen massacred, by a body of rebels. These rebels, "not content to lay waste the mine, and to demolish all the works thereunto belonging, did accompany this their barbarousness with bloody cruelty against the poor workmen, such as were employed about the melting and refining of the ore, and in all offices thereunto belonging; the which some of them being English, and the rest Dutch (because the Irish have no skill at all in any of those things, had never been employed in this mine otherwise than to dig it and to do other labours), were all put to the sword by them, except a very few who by flight escaped their hands." Dr. Boate describes the silver of the mines as "very fine, so as the farmers sold it at Dublin for 5s. 2d. sterling the ounce; as for the lead, that they sold on the place for £11 sterling the ton, and for £12 at the city of Limerick. The king had the sixth part of the silver for his share, and the tenth part of the lead, the rest remaining to the farmers, whose clear profit was estimated to be worth £2,000 sterling yearly." The lead ore was exceedingly pure, and contained a larger proportion of silver than any other Irish ore except that of Bangor. The mines are now the property of Lord Dunally; and have been leased from his lordship, and recently brought into extensive operation by an English Mining company. Shellee, the locality of other lead mines [see SHELEE], is situated 2 miles to the west; and Kilboy-house, the residence of Lord Dunally, is situated 1½ mile to the east-north-east. This mansion is spacious; the home-grounds are chaste and beautiful; and the park extends to the base of the hills, and blends there with most imposing mountain-scenery. The demesne contains the richest land in the fertile valley of Silvermines, and is adorned with some of the largest ash and oak trees in the luxuriant district of Ormond. Within a mile of the village are the residences of Silvermines-cottage, Sragh-cottage, and Garryard-house. Fairs are held in the village on May 1, June 8. and Sept. 8. The Silvermines dispensary is within the Nenagh Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 6,358; and, in 1839-40, it expended £117 12s. 5d., and administered to 850 patients. Area of the village, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 791; in 1841, 682. Houses 122. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 66; in manufactures and trade, 34; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 8; on the directing of labour, 52; on their own manual labour, 68; on means not specified, 1.

SILVER RIVER (THE), a rivulet of the western district of King's county, Leinster. It rises in the barony of Ballybrit, among the Slievebloom mountains, near the Wolf-Trap Gap, and pursues a course of about 15 miles, prevailing north-north-westward, to the river Brosna, at a point about 2 miles above Ferbane. It drains a large extent of boggy country. Its principal affluent is the stream which flows westward from Lough Annagh.

SILVER STREAM. See ARIGADEEN.

SIMONSTOWN, a quondam parish in the barony of Killea and Moore, 1 mile south-south-west of Ballymore, co. Kildare, Leinster. It was a curacy in the dio. of Dublin, but is now incorporated with Tinolin.

SINGLAND, a chapelry in the parish of St. Patrick's, and within the limits of the quondam county of the city of Limerick, 2 miles south-south-east of the centre of the city, co. Limerick, Munster. It forms part of the benefice of St. Patrick, and corps of the treasury of Limerick cathedral. See LIMERICK. The hamlet of Singland formerly had fairs on Easter-Tuesday and Dec. 11.

SINGLE-STREET, a village in the parish of Innismacint, and vicinity of the town of Ballyshannon, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 314. Houses 63.

SION-HILL, a hill on the north border of the parish of Killucan, 2 miles north of the village of Killucan, barony of Farbill, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Though lifting its summit to the altitude of only 497 feet above sea-level, it makes a conspicuous figure in the midst of a great expanse of low and flat country, and arrests the attention of the traveller both on the road from Dublin to Mullingar, and on that from Dublin to Granard.

SION-MILLS, a large linen-yarn factory on the river Mourne, about 3 miles south of Strabane, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Mr. and Mrs. Hall say, "This is one of the most interesting establishments it has ever been our good fortune to visit in any country. We have inspected manufactories of much greater extent than the Sion-Mills, but have never witnessed with greater gratification the practical and efficient working of a fine moral system. The Mills are situated on the river Mourne, which rushes along with a rapid and continued current, and is about one of the best water-powers in Great Britain, the supply being not only large, but constant. About 80 horse-power is now employed to drive 8,000 spindles; yet but a small portion of the water is necessary for the purpose. Instead of the hot furnace, long chimneys, and dense smoke, rendering still more unhealthy the necessarily close atmosphere of manufactories devoted exclusively to the spinning of flax and tow into linen yarn, there is a clean, handsome, well-ventilated building, where nearly 700 of a peasantry, which, before the establishment of this manufactory, were starving and idle—not from choice, but necessity—are now constantly employed, and the air is as pure and as fresh as on the borders of the wildest prairie or the boldest coast. The bare fact of such a population being taught industrious habits, and receiving full remuneration for their time and labour, is a blessing, but not the only one enjoyed by this favoured peasantry; agricultural labour is not neglected, because five out of the 700 are women and girls—creatures who, but for the spirit and enterprise of the Messrs. Herdman (to whom, and the Mulhollands of Belfast, Tyrone, is indebted for this establishment), would be found cowering over the embers of their turf fires, or begging along the way-sides for morsels of food. But this system of social order and social industry is not, as we have said, the only advantage enjoyed at Sion-Mills. Cottages of simple construction, but sound and comfortable, have been built for the workmen and their families; a school is established, and to the Sunday school the Messrs. Herdman themselves attend, taking the greatest interest in the educational progress of their workpeople, and distributing motives to improvement, lavishly and judiciously. Nor are they behind London in the idea that the people may derive benefit from the introduction of more refined tastes into the business of every-day life. The traveller's ear is refreshed, if he pass along during the long evenings of winter, or the bright cheerful ones of summer, by the music of a full band; and instead of the saddened hearts and saddened features, he has been led to suppose inseparable from the crowded factory, he hears a chorus of cheerful noises, or the echoes of dancing feet. The Messrs. Herdman are also anxious that the minds of their operatives should not only be softened, but expanded, and have purchased for their instruction a splendid apparatus for the exhibition of astronomical diagrams. We visited several of the factory dwellings, and found that, in many instances, they combined the small comforts of town rooms, with the peculiar advantages of country cottages. We never saw a more healthy population, and the watchful care of the proprietors has effectually prevented the growth of immorality, supposed to be inseparable from the factory system."

SIX-MILE-BRIDGE, a small market and post town in the parish of Kilfinaghta, barony of Lower Bunratty, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the river Ougarnce, and on the east road from Limerick to Ennes, 4½ miles east-south-east of Newmarket-on-Fergus, 8 north-north-west of Limerick, 11 south-east of Ennes, and 10½ south-west by west of Dublin. It was formerly a place of note; but has, for upwards of half-a-century, been in a rapidly declining condition. It has a church, two Roman Catholic chapels, a bridewell, a small court-house, the skeleton of a beautiful market-house, an extensive flour-mill, and the ruins of an oil-mill; and it is a constabulary station, and the seat of the Roman Catholic diocese of Killaloe. Courts of quarter and petty sessions are held in the town,—the latter on the second Tuesday of every month. A fair is held on Dec. 6. Within about a mile of the town are the seats of Castlecrine, Henry Butler, Esq.; Castlecrine-cottage; Ballysheen-house; Streamstown-house; Castle-villa; Cappagh-lodge; Rossmannagher-house; Ballintine-lodge; Heathmount-lodge; Elderberry-house; and Mount-Ivera, Mr. Ivera. Area of the town, 39 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,491; in 1841, 848. Houses 152. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 64; in manufactures and trade, 72; in other pursuits, 36. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 6; on the directing of labour, 74; on their own manual labour, 87; on means not specified, 5.

SIX-MILE-BRIDGE, a village in the parish of Monasterenagh, barony of Small County, co. Limerick.

* The Census of 1861 returns 130 of the population as in the parish of Kilfinaghta, on the opposite bank of the Ougarnce.

erick, Münster. It stands on the river Connogue, and on the road from Limerick to Bruff, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-west of the romantic Lough Gur, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north of Bruff, and $\frac{7}{8}$ south-south-east of Limerick. In its vicinity are the seats of Grange, Rawlinstown, Cahir, Scule-hill, and Rockstown. A dispensary in the village is within the Limerick Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 4,768; and, in 1839-40, it expended £91 17s., and administered to 840 patients. Area of the village, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 174. Houses 28.

SIX-MILE-CROSS, a village in the parish of Termonmaguirk, barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the Cloghfin rivulet, and on the roads from Dungannon to Omagh, and from Pomeroy to Fintona, $\frac{6}{8}$ miles north-north-west of Ballygawley, $\frac{7}{8}$ west-south-west of Pomeroy, and $\frac{7}{8}$ south-east by east of Omagh. It has a meeting-house and a Hibernian Society's schoolhouse. A fair is held on the 19th of every month. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 275; in 1841, 355. Houses 68.

SIX-MILE-WATER, (THE) a rivulet of the central district of the county of Antrim, Ulster. It rises near the junction-point of the baronies of Upper Antrim, Upper Glenarn, and Lower Belfast; and flows $\frac{9}{16}$ miles south-westward, and $\frac{3}{4}$ west-north-westward, on the boundary between the barony of Upper Antrim on the right, and the baronies of Lower Belfast and Lower Massarene on the left, to the head of Antrim bay or the north-east corner of Lough Neagh, immediately below the town of Antrim. On the banks of this clear and beautiful stream are the very extensive and interesting bleaching-grounds and warehouses of W. Chaine, Esq. "We have never," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "seen pastoral beauty so happily combined with the beauty of industry as in this prosperous and picturesque establishment, a series of factories which, as it were, dot the banks of the gushing river. The highroad traveller, much as he may admire the wide-spreading bleaching-grounds, the taste and elegance of the various residences in their immediate neighbourhood,—the clean, well-dressed, homely, and happy appearance of the inhabitants,—can form no idea whatever of the graceful recesses of this sylvan spot. It is unrivalled in its way—trees, rocks, banks, and paths, screened from the sun, and terminating in vistas, revealing the fine country beyond; while at your feet the waters rush to their trained courses, and set at work the machinery of those mighty mills—mills which owe their existence to the clear, vigorous, and benevolent mind, and steady persevering industry of one of Ireland's truest friends—a man who, in truth, answers to the character of the Man of Ross, in all things but his poverty."—

The young who labour and the old who rest."

It would be impossible to describe the varied, yet continued beauty of this scene; the river twists in the most fantastic manner; and Mr. Chaine has availed himself not only of the best water-power, but has erected his bleaching machinery where it least disturbs the aspect of the whole. In general, manufacturers care little or nothing for the picturesque; as long as the mechanism that enriches proceeds prosperously; they are heedless of injury inflicted on river or mountain; but this good man venerates Nature, and instead of outraging either her form or her laws, he wiles her into partnership with what is useful and beneficial in art and manufacture."

SKEA, a hamlet in the parish of Cleenish, barony of Glenawley, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-south-west of Enniskillen, on the road thence to Swanlinbar. It has a constabulary barrack, a schoolhouse, and a Roman Catholic chapel; and in its vicinity are the demesnes of Skea-house and Fairwood-park. Skea was formerly a chapelry in the dio. of Clogher; but its parochial character is now merged in Cleenish.

SKEA, a hill on the mutual boundary of the baronies of Kinnalmeaky and East Carbery, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-west of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. It forms part of the southern screen of the valley of the Bandon river.

SKEAGH, a hill in the parish and barony of Rathconrath, 8 miles west of Mullingar, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It adjoins the north side of the road from Dublin to Ballymahon and Lanesborough; and its summit commands a view of a large portion of the counties of Westmeath and Longford.

SKEAN, or SKEEN, a lake, partly in the parish of Kilmactranny and barony of Tiraghilla, co. Sligo, and partly in the parishes of Boyle and Ardara, barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It measures about a mile in length, and 3 furlongs in breadth, and has a surface-elevation of 164 feet above the level of the sea. Only $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile east of it, lies Lough Meelagh in the parish of Kilronan.

SKEHEERINKY. See MITCHELLSTOWN CAVES.

SKEIRKE, or SKIRK, a parish in the barony of Clandonagh, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-south-west of Borris-in-Ossory, Queen's co.; Leinster. Length, westward, 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; extreme breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 3,337 acres, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 911; in 1841, 1,056. Houses 172. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and is traversed by the cross road from Borris-in-Ossory to Errill. A height at the church has an altitude above sea-level of 516 feet; and another on the southern border has an altitude of 646 feet. The only seat is Ballymeelish-house. In the south-western district is a ruined old castle. The height at the church commands an extensive view, as is intimated by the name Cl-Eirk, contracted into Skeirke; and is surmounted by a pagan temple. "Its area is surrounded with a deep intrenchment; and within it is a pyramidal stone, 6 feet high, with the stumps of others which made the temple. Towards the east is a cromlech, and to the north an high keep or exploratory fort, and contiguous is the parochial church."—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £45; glebe, £344 7s. 10d. Gross income, £389 7s. 10d.; nett, £352 14s. 1d. Patron, the Crown. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Gowran, in the dio. of Ossory; and is non-resident in Skeirke. A curate receives a salary of £83. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £90; and are inappropriate in the corporation of the city of Kilkenny. The church was built in 1831, by means of a loan of £461 10s. 9d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 50. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 896; and 2 daily schools—one of which was salaried with £3 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and £5 from the vicar—had on their books 94 boys and 49 girls.

SKELLIGS (THE), three insular rocks in the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. The smallest, called the Lemon Rock, lies $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of the extremity of Puffin Island, and $\frac{1}{4}$ south by west of Bray Head; the middle one, called the Little Skellig, lies $\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west of the Lemon Rock; and the largest, called the Great Skellig, lies $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of the Little Skellig. The Lemon Rock is a low, round rock, always above water, and too near the land to be dangerous to ships; but it exhibits nothing remarkable, except a great profusion of different species of sea-fowl. The Little Skellig has a cliffy and very singular outline, and possesses the curious and interesting property of being the only land in the kingdom on which gannets nestle and breed. "In the spring and beginning of summer," says Dr. Smith, "the country people resort hither in small boats, when the sea is calm, to catch these birds; they eat the flesh, which is fishy and rank; but the principal profit is made by the feathers. The birds are exceeding fat, and the persons who take them, carry on a kind of traffic with them, by exchanging two salted puffins for a peck of meal." The Great Skellig is an enormous and precipitous mass of rock, soaring sheer up from the water in two pinnacles,—the loftier 710 feet in altitude; and it is usually lashed round the base by a tumbling, roaring, and tremendous sea. The soundings of the ocean in the immediate vicinity are said to be deeper than in any part of the English Channel, or of the portion of the German ocean lying between Great Britain and Holland; the unbroken and horrific roll of the Atlantic runs right against the rock in all winds except those from the east; and in stormy weather, or even when the ocean is but a little disturbed, any attempt to land upon the rock is either dangerous or altogether futile. A tiny sort of creek on the south-west side, and a small spot on the south side, are the only possible landing-places even during a calm; and either of these is used which happens, at the time of a stranger's visit, to be the better sheltered from the prevailing ocean-swell. The central division of the island has an altitude of only about 150 feet above the level of the sea, is flat and plain, and comprises about three acres of ground, formerly under cultivation; but the two end divisions consist of almost perpendicular rocks, which shoot aloft nearly in the manner of the sublime and terrific "stacks" of the Shetland Islands in the extreme north of Scotland, and which, in a beetling and dreadful manner, overhang the sea. Two lighthouses have been erected upon the island, the loftiest at the height of between 300 and 400 feet above the level of the sea; and the maintenance of them cost during the year 1840, £1,417 2s. 6d.,—and during the year 1843, £1,197 16s. 9d. A road was also, at great expense, made up the island to the lighthouses. Four families connected with the lighthouses reside on the island; and are regularly provisioned for several months. Wells of fresh water—or at least of water only a little brackish—exist on the island, several yards above the level of the sea; and as they evidently spring up as fountains from the ocean, they are justly regarded as a great natural curiosity. An ancient ecclesiastical establishment, said to have been an abbey of canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, anciently stood on the central or flat part of the island; but, on account of the extreme wildness and inaccessibility of the site, it was removed to the continent. Several cells, alleged to have been chapels, still stand on the island; and are built, in the ancient Roman manner, of stone curiously closed and jointed, without either mortar or cement, are impervious to the air, and terminate at the top in circular arches of stone. These cells or chapels, and the two wells of water, are dedicated to St. Michael the archangel; and, together with some stone crosses and other objects of reputed sanctity, were, for a long period, a sufficiently powerful attraction to draw to the island crowds of superstitious pilgrims and devotees. "The soil," says Dr. Smith, "is but thin, and yet the herbage is short and sweet; the ridges where corn had formerly been sown are still visible. Here are several stone crosses erected, at which the pilgrims perform certain stationary prayers, and have peculiar orisons to perform at each station. When they have visited the cells and chapels, they ascend the top of the rock, part of which is performed by squeezing through a hollow part, resembling the funnel or shaft of a chimney, which they term the Needle's Eye. This ascent (although there are holes and steps cut into the rock to climb by) is far from being gained without trouble; but when this obstacle is surmounted, the pilgrim arrives at a small flat place, about a yard broad, which slopes away down both sides of the rock to the ocean. On the further side of this flat, which, from its narrowness on the top, is a kind of isthmus, the ascent is gained by climbing up a smooth sloping rock, that only leans out a very little, and this they call the stone of pain, from the difficulty of its ascent; there are a few shallow holes cut into it, where they fix their hands and feet, and by which they scramble up. This kind of a sloping wall is about 12 feet high, and the danger of mounting it seems terrible; for if a person should slip, he might tumble on either side of the isthmus, down a precipice, headlong, many fathoms into the sea: when this difficult passage is surmounted, the remaining part of the way up to the highest summit of the rock is much less difficult. On the top are two stations to visit, where there are also some stone crosses. The first is called the Eagle's Nest, probably from its extreme height, for here a person seems to have got into the superior region of the air; and it is ascended, by the help of some steps cut into the rock, without much difficulty. If the reader can conceive a person poised, as it were, or rather perched, on the summit of this pinnacle, beholding the vast expanse of the ocean all around him, except towards the east, where the lofty mountains on the shore appear like so many low houses overlooked from the lofty dome of some cathedral, he may be able to form some idea of the tremendousness and awfulness of such a prospect. The second station which the devotees have to visit on this height, and which is attended with the utmost horror and peril, is by some called the Spindle, and others the Spit, which is a long narrow fragment of the rock, projecting from the summit of this frightful place, over a raging sea, and this is walked to by a narrow path of only two feet in width, and several steps in length. Here the devotees, women as well as men, get astride on this rock, and so edge forward, until they arrive at a stone cross, which some bold adventurer cut formerly on its extreme end; and here having repeated a paternoster, returning from thence concludes the penance. To get back down the stone of pain is attended with some address, in order to land safe on the neck of rock which I called an isthmus. Many persons, about 20 years ago, came from the remotest parts of Ireland to perform these penances, but the zeal of such adventurous devotees hath been very much cooled of late."

SKENER-ISLAND. See SKENICK.

SKERRIES, a fishing town in the parish of Holmpatrick, barony of East Balrothery, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on a little headland, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile east of the nearest part of the Dublin and Drogheda railway, 3 miles south-east of Balbriggan, $\frac{3}{4}$ north by west of Rush, 8 north-north-east of Swords, and 15 north-east by north of Dublin. It is the largest fishing town between Howth and Drogheda, and presents a clean and cheerful appearance. Its principal street is wide, and nearly a mile in length, but is irregularly built. The town has a church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a small Methodist meeting-house, a dispensary, a small inn, and several public-houses. The dispensary is within the Balrothery Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 3,688; and, in 1839-40, it expended £107 17s. 7d., and administered to 1,966 patients. Fairs are held on April 28 and Aug. 10. At the point of a little peninsula adjoining the site of the town is a harbour, which sufficiently accommodates the fishing vessels belonging to the town, and occasionally affords shelter to those of the neighbouring small ports; and opposite the town, at the distance of from 3 furlongs to 2 miles from the shore, are the four islets of Red-Island, Colt-Island, St. Patrick's Island, and Shenick's Island, aggregately called the Skerries, and imposing that name upon the town. "Skerries," said the late Mr. Nimmo, in the report of his Coast Survey, "is the most considerable fishing village on the east coast. There is a good pier of 420 feet long, which was built in 1755, partly at the public expense, parliament having granted at that time £2,000, and in 1767, £1,500 towards the work; and it was proposed to extend this pier into 10 feet water at low water. Since that time, the pier having fallen into decay, the present proprietor, Hans Hamilton, Esq., has had it effectually repaired and somewhat extended; it is now in good order, though rather small for the trade. The round form of the head also is complained of, as permitting the sea to tumble in along the pier; this could be corrected by a jetty, at an expense of £400 or £500. The bay or road of Skerries is clean, of easy access, and affords good shelter in southerly or westerly winds. It would be very possible to convert it into an excellent safety-harbour for this coast, by a mole on the ledge, called the Cross, and turning off to the westward, or by prolonging the pier into deep water. For a mile to the south of Skerries, we have a low sandy shore, the beach extending at low water off to Shenick's Island; the limestone country then commences near Hacketstown; the shore is a cliff for one mile farther, to the little bay of Lough Shiunny." The surface of the country immediately around the town has a very fertile soil, and is beautifully diversified. Within about a mile, are the mansions of Milverton and Hacketstown, the seats respectively of Mr. Woods and Mr. Johnstown. A charming road leads along the cliffy shore, and nearly parallel with the Dublin and Drogheda railway, to Balbriggan. Many of the inhabitants of Skerries divide their labour between fishing in the deep sea, and tilling little pendicles of land which are attached to their houses; and numbers of the females, as in Balbriggan and its neighbourhood, embroider muslins for the manufacturers of Belfast and Glasgow. In Sept. 1575, Sir Henry Sydney landed at Skerries, immediately after having been appointed by Queen Elizabeth to the Lord-deputyship of Ireland. A Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Dublin takes designation from Skerrie, and has chapels here and at Milverton. Area of the town, 81 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,556; in 1841, 2,417. Houses 498. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 134; in manufactures and trade, 327; in other pursuits, 57. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 9; on the directing of labour, 132; on their own manual labour, 355; on means not specified, 22.

SKERRIES (THE), three small rocky islets about a mile north-east of Portrush, parish of Ballywellan, barony of Lower Dunluce, co. Antrim, Ulster.

SKERRY, a parish in the barony of Lower Antrim, 3 miles east-north-east of Broughshane, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, south-westward, 7 miles; extreme breadth, 4½; area, 26,176 acres, 9 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 4,459, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 4,405; in 1841, 5,349. Houses 929. All the central and western districts are part of the great upland region of the interior of the county. The heights of the central district are called the Lile Mountains, and possess a romantic and highly picturesque character. The loftiest height in the east is Collon-Top mountain, situated on the boundary, and lifting its summit to the altitude of 1,419 feet above sea-level. The western district, and a belt along the south, constituting the north side of the valley of the Braid rivulet, are low and arable land, yet have, for the most part, a light and gravelly soil. Tullamore-lodge, a seat of Lord O'Neill, is situated on the margin of the parish, in the northern vicinity of Broughshane, and contributes to the landscape a large and pleasing expanse of wood. The other principal seats are Knockboy, Whitehall, Bushyfield, and Oakfield. The chief antiquity is the ruin of the old church. The roads from Ballymena to Cushendall, and from Broughshane to Ballymoney, pass through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £399 7s. 8d. The rectories of Skerry and RACAVAN [see that article] constitute the benefice of Skerry. Area, 44,739 acres, 1 rood, 5 perches. Pop., in 1831, 8,684. Gross income, £716 3s. 9d.; nett, £507 18s. 5d. Patron, the Marquis of Donegal. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is in Racavan. A schoolhouse in Skerry is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of from 40 to 60. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses in the benefice have an attendance of respectively 800 and 500. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Donaghly. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish of Skerry consisted of 146 Churchmen, 3,398 Presbyterians, and 1,073 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 288 Churchmen, 7,223 Presbyterians, 4 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,824 Roman Catholics; 9 Sunday schools in the union—7 of which were at Ballycloughan, Loughconnelly, Corene, Broughshane, Racavan, Teeloy, and Lisnamurgan—were usually attended by about 306 scholars; 12 daily schools in the parish—one of which was salaried with £11 a-year from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society, and £5 from Lord Mountcashel, one with £2 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; and a sum not reported from the rector, and one with £6 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 271 boys and 317 girls; and 17 daily schools in the union had on their books 482 boys and 439 girls.

SKIBBEREEN, a post and market town in the parishes of Creagh and Abbeystrawry, eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the river Ilan, and on the south or coast road from Cork to Bantry, 10 miles west-south-west of Roscarbery, 14 south-east by south of Bantry, 16½ west-south-west of Clonkilly, 42 south-west of Cork, and 168 south-west of Dublin; The Abbeystrawry section is usually called Bridge-town; and the Creagh section was originally called Stapleton, and was part of the domain of the castle of Gortnacloagh belonging to MacCarty Rensh. The whole town, though brisk and thriving, is ugly and disagreeable. The old parts, which even 20 years ago comprised much the larger divisions, are extremely miserable, and exhibit a disgusting specimen of the excessive penury which prevails throughout the bulk of the small and second-rate towns of Ireland. Mr. Weld, when noticing the town about 40 years ago, says that "this place called to his recollection the old story of an Irish servant who, being asked, on arriving in London, what he thought of that city, replied that London appeared a mighty good sort of a place, but was nothing at all to Skibbereen; and, indeed, Skibbereen, in some respects, stands unparalleled; for we find whole streets in it formed of cabins without chimneys, situated at the bottom of a deep trench or ditch.^a The town, however, has, in all respects, been much improved under the impulses of trade, without assistance from either family patronage or parliamentary influence; and it now boasts all the importance arising from its being the remotest coast town of any consequence between the city of Cork and the vast mountainous district of the counties of Cork and Kerry. Its public buildings are a church, a Methodist meeting-house, a large Roman Catholic chapel, several school-houses, a sessions-house, a bridewell, a market-house, a stone bridge, a workhouse, and a dispensary. In the vicinity are a ruined church of the old monastery of Abbeystrowry, and the sites of the ancient castles of Gortnacloagh and Lettertilis, both old strengths of MacCarthy Reagh. In the vicinity also are the villas of Lakelands, Coronea, Cloverhill, and Abbeyville; about 3 miles toward Bantry, is Hollybrook, the seat of Richard H. Beecher, Esq.; about 2 miles below the town, charmingly situated on the Ilan, is Newcourt, the seat of Beecher Fleming, Esq.; at 3 miles, is Creagh, the seat of Sir William Wrixon Beecher, Bart.; at the same distance, but more to the east, is Affadown, the seat of Henry Beecher, Esq.; and in the vicinity of Affadown and of Roaring-Water bay, is Whitehall, the seat of Samuel Townsend, Esq. The lands immediately around the town have a clay soil, sometimes red, but generally grey, and preëminently superincumbent upon slaty strata; and, so far back as about the middle of last century, they were well cultivated, were usually manured with sea-sand, and produced heavy crops of corn and flax. The clothing trade, and the linen manufactory, particularly the making of striped linens and handkerchiefs, were common in the town when Dr. Smith wrote; but the principal trade at present is the retail supply of British manufactures and colonial produce to an extensive circumjacent district. Yet great quantities of yarns and coarse linens are still sold at the fairs; several large flour-mills and breweries are in operation; and considerable sales are effected in wheat, barley, oats, and other agricultural produce. The port of the town for sea-borne vessels is 2 miles down the river, and does not admit larger vessels than those of 200 tons burthen; but, in consequence of the voyage being often rendered dangerous and tedious by the prevalence of westerly winds, the principal intercourse with Cork is maintained by land carriage. Fairs are held on July 10 and Dec. 11. The town has a loan fund, a savings' bank, and an office of the Provincial Bank of Ireland. In 1843, the loan fund had a capital of £498, circulated £2,496 in 1,298 loans, cleared a nett profit of £57 19s. 7d., and had 7 depositors or proprietors of its capital. In 1838, the only public conveyance was the mail-coach in transit between Cork and Bantry. A court of quarter-sessions is held in the town once a-year; and a court of petty-sessions is held on every Wednesday. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 4,429; in 1841, 4,715. Houses 672. Area of the Creagh section, 26 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,594; in 1841, 2,848. Houses 404. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 155; in manufactures and trade, 298; in other pursuits, 113. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 22; on the directing of labour, 283; on their own manual labour, 240; on means not specified, 21. Area of the Abbeystrowry section, 62 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,835; in 1841, 1,867. Houses 268. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 106; in manufactures and trade, 217; in other pursuits, 76.

Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 28; on the directing of labour, 109; on their own manual labour, 159; on means not specified, 13.

The Skibbereen Poor-law union ranks as the 12th, and was declared on Jan. 31, 1839. It lies wholly in co. Cork, and comprehends an area of 236,308 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 94,736. Its electoral divisions, together with the number of valued tenements in each, are Abbeystrowry, 588; Creagh, 806; Castle-Haven, 574; Myross, 354; Aghadown, 311; Dromdaleague, 319; Tullagh, 487; Kilcoe, 171; Caharragh, 305; Kilmoe, 632; East Skull, 483; West Skull, 445; Killaughnabeg, 214; Drinagh, 211; Kilmacabea, 393; Roscarbery, 873; Ardfield, 216; Rathbarry, 183; Kilkerranmore, 183; and Castrum-Ventry, 132. The number of elected guardians is 27; and of ex-officio guardians is 9. The divisions of Abbeystrowry, Creagh, Castle-Haven, Myross, Aghadown, and Dromdaleague, lie in the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery; the divisions of Kilcoe, Caharragh, Kilmoe, East Skull, and West Skull, lie in the western division of the barony of West Carbery; the division of Killaughnabeg lies in the western division of the barony of East Carbery; the divisions of Drinagh and Kilmacabea lie partly in the western division of the barony of East Carbery, and partly in the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery; the division of Roscarbery lies in the western division of the barony of East Carbery; and the divisions of Ardfield, Rathbarry, Kilkerranmore, and Castrum-Ventry lie in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe. The number of valued tenements in the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery districts is 3,748,—in the western division of the barony of East Carbery districts, 1,382; in the western division of the barony of West Carbery districts, 2,036,—in the barony of Ibane and Barryroe districts, 714,—in the entire union, 7,880; and of this total, 2,551 were valued under £5,—1,902, under £10,—1,187, under £15,—815, under £20,—468, under £25,—313, under £30,—304, under £40,—143, under £50,—and 197, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £97,905; the total number of persons rated is 7,943; and of these, 885 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—606, not exceeding £2,—401, not exceeding £3,—376, not exceeding £4,—and 369, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Aug. 12, 1839,—to be completed in June 1841,—to cost £7,083 for building and completion, and £1,217 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £9,—and to contain accommodation for 800 paupers. The workhouse was opened for the admission of paupers on March 19, 1842; and it had 265 pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843. The medical charities within the union are dispensaries at Skibbereen, Baltimore, Castletownsend, Glandore, Roscarbery, and Skull; and, in 1839-40, they received £330 3s. 6d. from subscription, £316 11s. 6d. from public grants, and £42 16s. 7d. from other sources, and expended £483 10s. in salaries to medical officers, £146 19s. 6d. for medicines, and £65 18s. 4½d. for contingencies. The Skibbereen dispensary serves for a district containing a pop. of 21,588; and, in 1839-40, it expended £144 8s. 7½d., and administered to 4,606 patients.

SKIRK. See SKIRKE.

SKIRTS, or SKEIR, a parish in the barony of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the town of CASTLE-DERG: which see. Length, southward, 6½ miles; breadth, from 1¼ to 3¼; area, 14,286 acres, 22 perches,—of which 76 acres, 3 rods, 21 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,671; in 1841, 5,790.

Houses 990. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,090; in 1841, 5,323. Houses 925. The civil parish was constituted out of portions of the parishes of Urney and Ardstraw, and is properly designated "Skirts of Urney and Ardstraw." The ecclesiastical parish, however, is co-extensive with only the Urney portion of the civil parish, and is properly designated Derg. Pop. of the ecclesiastical parish, in 1831, 3,113. The surface is bisected eastward through the middle by the river Derg; and hence consists principally of part of the low grounds and hill screes of that river's valley. The small lake Lee lies on the southern boundary; and the rivulet Fairy runs along part of the eastern boundary. The principal rural residences are Mount-Bernard, Foggyhill, and Blackhill; and the chief antiquity is a Druidical altar. The roads from Strabane to Pettigo and Donegal traverse the interior.—The parish of Derg is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £258 9s. 2½d.; glebe, £30. Gross income, £288 9s. 2½d.; nett, £265 5s. 6½d. Patron, the incumbent of Urney. The church was built by subscription in the year 1732. Sittings 280; attendance, from 160 to 240. The Presbyterian meeting-house formerly belonged to the Secession Synod, and has an attendance of from 180 to 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in the benefice of Urney. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 867 Churchmen, 949 Presbyterians, and 1,192 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools at Killeen, Troughlaugh, and Castle-Derg were usually attended by about 295 scholars; and 7 daily schools at Castle-Derg, Ganvaghan, Killeen, Mount-Bernard, Troughlaugh, Ganvaghan, and Pollyarnon, had on their books 258 boys and 147 girls. The daily school at Castle-Derg was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board, and £2 from Sir R. Ferguson; one of the two at Ganvaghan, with £8 from the National Board; that at Killeen, with £8 from the National Board; and that at Mount-Bernard, with £5 from the National Board, and some advantages from Sir R. Ferguson.

SKREEN, or SKRYNE, a barony in the county of Meath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the barony of Lower Navan; on the north, by the barony of Upper Slane; on the east, by the baronies of Lower Duleek and Upper Duleek; and by the county of Dublin; on the south, by the baronies of Rathoath and Lower Deere; and on the west, by the baronies of Lower Deere and Lower Navan. Its length, northward, is 9½ miles; its extreme breadth is 7½; and its area is 40,891 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches,—of which 78 acres, 2 roods, 30 perches are in the river Boyne, which runs for 64 miles along the western and north-western boundaries. The most conspicuous natural feature, as well as most interesting locality for antiquities and curious associations, is the hill of TARA: which see. "The soil of Skreen," says Mr. Thompson, in his Statistical Survey of the County of Meath, published in 1802, "is, generally speaking, a deep rich earth upon a fine limestone gravel, and in some parts over marl, that inexhaustible mine of wealth to the farmer, which until of late years remained almost totally neglected. The surface is uneven, and may be termed rather hilly. The soil is not the best for barley, yet it throws up an uncommon quantity of fine rich feeding grass. Those parts that are tilled give excellent crops of oats, here, and in some places fine red wheat; but in general, it is more fit for the purposes of grazing than of tillage, and is considered for so much as the best feeding ground in the county.

Though the lands of Diamore, and its vicinity, are considered as capable of fattening quicker, yet taking the whole of the two baronies into our consideration, that of Skreen seems to take precedence of any other in the county. * * Not quite two-thirds of this barony are occupied in grazing and meadow. In this barony, on part of the lands of Walterstown, the estate of Nathaniel Preston, Esq., of Swainstown, there are miners working a copper ore, which, from some specimens, is very rich in metallic particles. The ore has an admixture of quartz, consisting of hexagonal prisms, many of which are nearly transparent, others opaque, and some of a brownish yellow. * * This vein of copper ore runs from Walterstown in a north-east direction towards the Boyne, and has been worked with various success upon the estate of Sir Marcus Sommerville, Bart.; and on that of Gustavus Lambert, Esq., in Duleek barony, by miners, who, it is supposed, did not do justice to their employers; and hence, though the quality of the ore was found equal to any in Great Britain, and superior to many, yet from some fatality, ever attendant on the generality of works of this nature in Ireland, it has lain neglected, when perhaps immense treasures might be derived therefrom." The act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the parishes of Brownstown and Kilmoon, containing, in 1841, a pop. of 1,060, from the barony of Upper Duleek to Skreen.—The barony of Skreen, as at present constituted, contains part of the parishes of Danestown and Trevet, and the whole of the parishes of Ard-mulchan, Athlumney, Brownstown, Cushenstown, Dowdstown, Dunsany, Follistown, Kilcarr, Killeen, Kilmoon, Lismullen, Macetown, Monkstown, Rathfeigh, Skreen, Staffordstown, Tara, Templekeeran, and Timcole. The towns and chief villages are Factory, Little Furze, Skreen, Tara, and a small part of Navan. Pop., in 1831, 8,683; in 1841, 9,456. Houses 1,576. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,193; in manufactures and trade, 284; in other pursuits, 162. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 34; on the directing of labour, 473; on their own manual labour, 1,003; on means not specified, 37. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,579; who could read but not write, 751; who could neither read nor write, 1,837. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 812; who could read but not write, 1,038; who could neither read nor write, 2,411.—Skreen barony lies within the Poor-law union of Navan and Dunshaughlin. The total number of tenements valued is 1,345; and of these, 697 were valued under £5,—138, under £10,—92, under £15,—56, under £20,—43, under £25,—31, under £30,—45, under £40,—26, under £50,—and 217, at and above £50. The annual value of the property rated is £41,124 9s. 7d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, was £1,132 16s. 9d.

SKREEN, or SKRYNE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Skreen, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-westward, 3½ miles; breadth, from ½ to 2½; area, 4,521 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches. Pop., in 1831, according to the Census, 1,326, but according to the Ecclesiastical Authorities, 1,279; in 1841, 1,156. Houses 208. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 931. Houses 165. The surface consists of good land, and is traversed by the roads from Rathoath and Dunshaughlin to Navan. Skreen Hill, whose summit has an altitude of 507 feet above sea-level, is not only the most conspicuous natural feature within the parish, but also shares with Tara Hill, in the adjoining parish, the honour of imparting variety to a great extent of circumjacent rich low country; and it is rendered peculiarly striking by the church ruins and the straggling village, which surmount its summit. The seats are Belvin-hall and Corbaltou-hall,—the latter the handsome residence of M. E. Corbally, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £280; glebe, £44 8s. The rectory of Skreen, the vicarage of DOWTHSTOWN, the impropriate curacy of KILCARN, and the chapelries of RATHFEIGH, TEMPLECARNE, and LISMULLEN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Skreen. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6. Pop., in 1831, 2,993. Gross income, £660 1s. 4d.; nett, £527 14s. 1½d. Patron, the Crown. The church is in Lisnullen. The Roman Catholic chapels of Skreen and Rathfeigh have an attendance of respectively 500 and 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish consisted of 76 Churchmen, 3 Presbyterians, and 1,245 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 136 Churchmen, 6 Presbyterians, and 3,090 Roman Catholics; and 4 daily schools in the union—3 of which were in the parish—were usually attended by about 175 scholars. One of the schools in the parish was salaried with as much money from the rector as secured a total income to the teacher of £21 10s.; one, with £10 Irish from a legacy; and one, with £2 10s. from Lord Ludlow.

SKREEN, or SKRYNE, a village in the parish and barony of Skreen, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the summit and skirts of the fertile hill noticed in the preceding article, away from any thoroughfare, yet near the roads from Dunshaughlin and Ratoath to Navan, 4½ miles north by west of Dunshaughlin, and 6 south-east of Navan. A Culdean establishment existed at this place, and occasioned it to be called Scrinium St. Columbe: hence the modern name Skreen. But Archdall alleges that the old name arose from the circumstance of the shrine of St. Columbo being brought hither in 875 from Great Britain to prevent its falling into the hands of the Danes. The ecclesiastical establishment was called by monastic historians of a subsequent period an abbey of regular canons; in 1027, it was plundered by the Ostmen; in the 12th century, it fell into decay; and in 1341, it was superseded by a monastery of eremite friars of the order of St. Augustine, founded by the family of De Feipo. Some ruins of the latter structure still exist in the vicinity of the ruins of the church. A perpetual chantry was also founded at Skreen by the same party, and about the same period, as the Augustinian friary. The family of De Feipo, who received from Hugh De Lacy grants of large possessions in Meath, built a castle at Skreen, and adopted it as their residence. The ruins of the castle still exist. In the 15th century and till the reign of Elizabeth, the family of Marward were palatine barons of Skreen; but during the reign of Elizabeth, Janet, the daughter and heiress of the last baron, carried the estate by marriage to William Nugent, Esq. A dispensary in Skreen is within the Dunshaughlin Poor-law union, and serves for a district of 25,954 acres, with a pop. of 6,233; and, in 1839-40, it expended £160 13s., and administered to 1,897 patients. In 1843, the Skreen Loan Fund had a capital of £336, circulated £1,906 in 608 loans, realized a nett profit of £4 18s. 9d., expended for charitable purposes £3, and had 10 depositors or proprietors of its capital. Fairs are held at Skreen on March 17, June 20, and Oct. 12. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop., 1841, 225. Houses 43.

SKREEN, a parish in the barony of Tyreragh, 5 miles east of Dunmore-West, co. Sligo, Connaught, Length, north-north-eastward, 6½ miles; breadth, from 1½ to 3; area, 13,237 acres, 5 roads, 39 perches, —of which 36 acres, 24 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 4,567; in 1841, 4,103. Houses 725. The surface extends from a line 1½ mile south of the water-shed of the Ox mountains away to the coast of the Atlantic; and in consequence, its southern and central districts are part of the moorish, wild, and bleak Ox mountains, and its northern district is lowland sea-board. The soil of the latter district is aggregately good, and has been much improved by the free use of sea-manure,—the facility of obtaining which is both a stimulus and a bonus to agricultural industry and well-conducted tillage. Most of the coast is bluff, rocky, and unindented; but a portion in the west is part of Dunmorran Strand. The loftiest summit of the Ox mountains within the parish has an altitude above sea-level of 1,778 feet. The small lake Carrowloughan lies on the sea-board; and the loughlets Achree and Minnaun lie among the uplands. The principal residences are Leek-field, the seat of D. W. Weber, Esq., surrounded by a fine pastoral tract of country; Highpark-house; Seaforth-house; and Toberpatrick-house. The road from Sligo to Ballina passes across the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Killalla. Tithe composition, £480; glebe, £32 10s. Gross income, £532 10s.; nett, £453 14s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1819, by means of a loan of £1,107 13s. 10½d. Sittings 150; attendance 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 610, and the Roman Catholics to 4,175; and 9 daily schools had on their books 288 boys and 197 girls. Two of the schools were salaried with £12 a-year each from the Baptist Society; one, with £3 through the Rev. Mr. Weber, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £4 from subscription, through the rector, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £10 from the Rev. Mr. Weber, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; and one, with £2 from the rector, and £8 from the London Hibernian Society. In 1843, 2 National schools at Carrowcastle and Carnree were salaried with respectively £11 and £8 from the Board, and had on their books 192 and 105 girls.

SKREEN, a parish in the baronies of Ballaghkeen and East Shelmallee, 5½ miles north by east of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, south-south-westward, 2 miles; extreme breadth, 1. Area of the Ballaghkeen section, 836 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch; of the East Shelmallee section, 530 acres, 26 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 382; in 1841, 438. Houses 77. Pop. of the Ballaghkeen section, in 1841, 235. Houses 40. The surface is low and level, and consists of rather light land. A rivulet which traces the western boundary, has, while there, a mean elevation of about 36 feet above sea-level. The principal residence is Ballinroan-lodge, the seat of R. S. Guinness, Esq. The road from Wexford to Oulart passes across the north-west corner.—This parish is an impropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of ARDCOLME [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition belonging to the incumbent, £33 14s. 6½d.; glebe, £20. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £40 9s. 4½d., and are impropriate in Lord Portsmouth. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Castle-Bridge and St. Margaret's. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 19, and the Roman Catholics to 370; and there was no school.

SKULL, a parish in the western division of the barony of West Carbery, 10 miles west of Skibhereon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 16 miles; breadth, 6; area, 37,923 acres. It contains the villages of Skull and Ballydeob. See BALLYDEOB. Pop., in 1831, 15,255; in 1841, 17,314. Houses 2,941. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 14,269; in 1841, 16,226. Houses 2,746. The surface comprises the central and north-eastern portions of the peninsula between Dunmanus bay and Roaring-Water bay, and several of the islands in the latter bay; and it is prevailingly mountainous, rocky, wild, and waste; yet it possesses a large aggregate of fertile arable land,—presents numerous glens, ravines, and dells,—and exhibits, in the intricacy of its interior grounds, in the labyrinthine intermixture of land and water upon its coast and among its islands, in the grandeur and savageness of its mountains, and in the romance and beauty of its defiles, a very large amount of most interesting and powerful scenery. Mount Gabriel is its loftiest and most imposing mountain; and nearly all the north-east side of Roaring-Water bay, and the south-east side of Dunmanus bay, are identified with its coasts. See MOUNT-GABRIEL, ROARING-WATER, and DUNMANUS. The little harbour or bay of Skull opens on the north-west side of Roaring-Water bay, penetrates the land nearly a mile northward, has a mean width of between 4 and 5 furlongs, is overhanging on the north by the magnificent Mount-Gabriel, and has on its east side the ruin of Skull-castle, at its head the village of Skull, and on its west side the beautiful and ornate glebe of Skull. Castle Island and Long Island lie immediately outside of the harbour, and leave a sort of continuation of it in the sound by which they are separated. The harbour is a tolerably good roadstead, with from 2 to 6 fathoms of water; and, though enumbered with some snnk rocks toward the entrance, is well defended by the islands outside from the tremendous fury of the Atlantic. Half a league south-west of Skull is the mouth or tiny estuary of the rivulet Gubeene, forming a cove; and a little farther to the south-west is Lemcon, a long stripe of land, running eastward from the mainland, and screening a sea-ground of from 6 to 18 feet of depth at low tides. A vein or mine of copper ore of considerable extent and of good produce, was discovered near the surface of the ground, in the immediate vicinity of the village of Ballydeob; and, during about 4 years, it was worked with activity, affording employment to about 200 persons, and sending many thousand tons of copper ore to Swansea in Wales. But in proportion as the mine descended from the surface, it became impoverished in its lodes, and it was eventually abandoned as unprofitable; yet it is said to have been recently examined by parties who still think favourably of its productiveness, and are about to give it a new trial. The natural fastnesses on the shores, in the defiles, and among the mountains of the parish, are so great and commanding as to have rendered the possession of the district a matter of grand importance on the part of the belligerent tribes of early times; and we, in consequence, find here a much larger number of ruins and vestiges of military strengths than in most other mountainous districts of equal extent,—among others, the castles of Skull, Roshrine, Ardtenant, Quolagh, Glansallagh, Cappaghmore, Ardowney, Dunbeacon, Derryfurstan, Gubeene, and Lemcon. The scenery of the parish—far too rich to be disposed of by a passing remark—is so graphically touched by the late Rev. Cesar Otway, in his 'Sketches in Ireland,' that we cannot notice it better than in one or two extracts from that work. "A well-found boat, four springing oars, set in motion by as elastic backs, soon brought us out into the middle of the bay of Skull; not a breath was on the ocean; the grey mist of the morning had risen, and was dissolved in the clear, cold atmosphere; the sun walked above in its pride of light, the harbour had become a looking-glass for the hills and headlands to dress themselves in, and assume a softer and sweeter countenance, as (Calm Nature's image on its watery breast.

The bold and cave-cut promontory, the lofty light-house, the ruined castle, the green island, the sable rock, with all its gulls and cormorants, round which the tide growled, danced, and boiled: all these were reflected and prolonged in westward lines upon the bosom of the deep; and above, towering as the lord paramount of the mountain-range, stood Mount-Gabriel. Reader, if you have never been in the south-western district of Ireland; if you have not seen these great bulwarks, that stand as redoubts to the continent of Europe against the force of the great ocean, you cannot form, from seeing English hills, or even Welsh or Wicklow mountains, an idea of these out-works of Ireland. They look as if Noah's deluge here first operated, and the windows of heaven had opened here particularly, and washed them bare to the very bone. No bog, no soil, no verdure on them—all grey and rugged in the anatomy of their stratification. Amidst these everlasting hills arose in peculiar prominence Mount-Gabriel. * * We passed two long islands that sheltered the entrance of the bay of Skull; and now we were abroad on what appeared to a poor landsman like me, to be the great Western Ocean; and, oh! what a noble expanse, as east and west we ran our eye coastward. To the right, Baltimore; to the extreme left, Crookhaven, and the Mizen-Head, and studded along rose

Sea-girt isles,
That, like to rich and various gems, inlay
The unadorned bosom of the deep.

And here and there this bold coast had its high headlands, and cave-cut promontories, relieved with fortresses of other times, pleasing to the eye from their picturesque forms and positions—interesting the mind from the associations connecting us with days gone by, of romance, enterprise, and peril. Eastward the dark Roshrine, the fortress of Felimey O'Mahony, the pirate and the poppling, under the shelter of whose stronghold the Spanish Jesuits from Valladolid and Salamanca landed, and diffused their deadly animosity against Elizabeth and the Reformation. Here Archers, Sanders, and Allen, concocted the furious insurrections of Tyrone and Desmond; and hither came Carew, the lord-president, with all the power of Munster, to quell the pride, and lay low the bulwarks of the bishop of Rome. And where is now the psalter of Roshrine, the rhyming record of all the pious practices and criminal achievements of these sea-lords? Nearer again, Ardtenant-castle, another cliffnest of these Mahonys, and in the western offing, look at the Black-castle out there, like a solitary cormorant watching all day long its prey on her rock perch. And westward still, the hold and high Ballydivelin—see how it cuts the clear blue sky with its embattled loftiness. "The glebe-house, situated on the west side of Skull bay, is an ancient mansion, " sheltered down on the shore, in a sunny nook, half-way between the church and the village. It is under the guardianship of a protecting hill, and some old sycamore trees in solitary magnificence and unimpaired luxuriance, their long branches sweeping the lawn, seem to say we are here to show that no one should be comfortable as a good minister. Here also the myrtle, the hydrangia, and many a tender plant, grow, adorning the pastor's garden; altogether it was a happy, quiet, close, and secluded spot, and the contrast it presented to the serrated mountains, to the black sea-beaten rocks, to the bold promontories, and boiling ocean, reminded me how in lapse of time, and succession of its dwellers, this quiet glebe might give shelter to some delicate mind, some intellect, luxuriant and gifted with high and Christian imaginings—a lively contrast to the rugged mountaineer and rude seaman with whom it was his fate to mingle, but not coalesce." The parish-church is an unadorned yet neat building, situated on a high elevation over the sea; "and when its modest little belfry and white-washed walls send their bright shadows over the water on a calm and sunny Sabbath-day, when all is still, when even the sea-birds are silent in the rocks, and the toll of the church-going bell circulates solemnly over the bay—the sacred sounds reverberating from cliff, and castle, and cave—it must be a tranquil and blessed scene, as sun, earth, and ocean, harmonize with that peace which religious worship communicates, and which worldliness with all its pretences and promises cannot give, and cannot take away." The village of Skull stands at the head of Skull bay, at the base of Mount-Gabriel, and on the road from Cork to Crookhaven, 3 miles south-west of Ballydehob, $7\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Bantry, $8\frac{1}{2}$ north-east by east of Crookhaven, and 10 west of Skibbereen. It was anciently called Sancta Maria de Scholia, 'St. Mary of the Schools,' and is traditionally alleged to have been, for some time, the chief seat of learning in south-western Munster. The 'Scholia' in its ancient name is easily recognised in its present designation of Skull. Fairs are held on Jan. 6, Feb. 12, March 25, May 10, June 24, Aug. 12, Sept. 29, Nov. 1, and Dec. 9. A dispensary in the village is within the Skibbereen Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing a pop. of 19,990; and, in 1839-40, it received £131 7s., and expended £133 14s. 9½d. Area of the village, 34 acres. Pop., in 1831, 385; in 1841, 452. Houses 88. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 22; in manufactures and trade, 46; in other pursuits, 20. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 1; on the directing of labour, 46; on their own manual labour, 27; on means not specified, 14.—Skull parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £850; glebe, £100. Gross income, £950; nett, £856 14s. 4d. Patron, alternately the Crown and the diocesan. Two curates for respectively the eastern and the western divisions of the parish, have each a salary of £80. The church, situated at Skull, and serving for the western division, was built in 1721, at a cost now unknown. Sittings 250; attendance 160. The chapel-of-ease, situated in the vicinity of Ballydehob, and serving for the eastern division, was built in 1829, by means of a gift of £650 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 180; attendance 130. Three schoolhouses in different parts of the parish are also used as parochial places of worship, and have aggregated an attendance of 240. The Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house has an attendance of 70. The Roman Catholic chapels at Skull and Ballydehob have an attendance of respectively 900 and 1,700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are mutually united. The Roman Catholic chapel at Ardunna has an attendance of 950; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmoe. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 1,898, and the Roman Catholics to 13,912; 2 Protestant Sunday schools were usually attended by about 80 scholars; 7 hedge-schools were usually attended in summer by about 243 scholars; and 9 other daily schools—2 of which were supported wholly by fees—had on their books

212 boys and 173 girls. One of the daily schools was salaried with £8 a-year from the Association for Discourteasing Vice, and £5 from local subscription; one with £8 from subscription; one, with £10 from subscription; one, with £10 from the rector; one, with £5 from the rector; one, with £25 from the rector; and one, with £26 from the Wesleyan Methodist Society. In 1843, the National Board had two schools at Skull, and one at Dunbeacon.

SLADE (THE), a rivulet of the southern district of the county of Dublin, Leinster. It rises on the south side of Slievebane, on the southern margin of the county, and in the parish of Tallaght, at an elevation of between 800 and 900 feet above sea-level; and it flows 12 miles westward, northward, and north-eastward, through the parishes of Tallaght, Saggart, Rathroole, Kilbride, Clondalkin, Ballyfermot, Drimmagh, and St. James, to the river Liffey, under the Royal Hospital of Kilmainham. The upper part of its course, among the Dublin mountains, and along Glen Saggart, is romantic and imposingly picturesque; and the lower part of its course is past the village of Clondalkin, and through one of the richest sections of the luxuriant plain which surrounds the metropolis. The stream turns several large mills.

SLADE, a fishing village in the parish of Hook, barony of Shelburne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is situated at the head of a cove or tiny bay, 3 furlongs east of Churchtown, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east by east of Hook Head, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Fethard. The cove is an asylum for fishing-boats on the whole of the east side of Hook; and it has a pier which is nearly dry at low water, but which possesses a depth of about 15 feet at high water. A castle, which still stands at the village, belonged, for many generations, to the family of Hay. This family is one of the most respectable and ancient in the county; and is descended from Richard De Hay, Lord of Hay, in Wales, who accompanied his kinsman, Herve De Montmorency, into Ireland, in 1169, and obtained grants of land in the baronies of Forth and Bargie. Since the general forfeitures of property during the civil troubles of the 16th century, the family have resided at Ballinukeele. Edward Hay, Esq., Secretary to the General Committee of the Catholics of Ireland, and author of the History of the Insurrection in Wexford in 1798, was a member of this family. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 164; in 1841, 184. Houses 31.

SLANE (LOWER), a barony in the extreme north-east of the county of Meath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the county of Monaghan; on the north-east and east, by the county of Louth; on the south, by the barony of Upper Slane; and on the west, by the barony of Morgallion. Its length, south-eastward, is 10 miles; its breadth is from $\frac{1}{2}$ to $4\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 26,224 acres, 19 perches,—of which 189 acres, 2 roods, 8 perches are water. Mr. Thompson, who wrote a Statistical Survey of the county of Meath in 1802, and who then required to treat Lower Slane and Upper Slane as one barony, says respecting this district in his work: "This barony is one of the most hilly in the county; its soil is a light earth, upon a stiff clay bottom, under which, in many places, a vein of limestone gravel, of irregular depth, is frequently discovered; but where this is not to be found, an impervious stratum of ochreous clay runs to a considerable depth, extremely retentive of water, difficult to be worked in dry, and still more difficult in wet seasons. When the limestone gravel is to be met with at any inconsiderable distance from the surface, by using it as a manure, the quantity and quality of the winter crops are considerably improved; and where this practice is judiciously managed, a double purpose is answered; first, by striking at the source of the springs, which, in those situations, are the cause of surface-water; and, secondly, in altering the texture of the soil, by mixing the gravel so raised in proper quantities with the cold stiff clay, thereby rendering it considerably less impervious to those vegetative qualities derived from the sun and atmosphere. In the hilly parts of this barony, viz., between Collon and Kells, and towards Ardee, there is scarcely any, or a very inconsiderable quantity, of limestone gravel to be met with. The soil here is chiefly what is termed a rye soil, and in many places a strong gravel is found, yet not of that kind which commonly goes by the name of blue limestone-gravel; its power of correcting the natural bad qualities of the soil, warming, enriching, pulverizing, and increasing the quantity of the natural earth, is comparatively weak; of course it seldom repays the farmer the expense of raising, putting out, &c.

In its present state, we must certainly consider this middle part of Slane barony, a few improved farms excepted, as by far the worst and most unprofitable part of the county. Wherever the impervious clay approaches near the surface, which in some places it does within four inches, we see the bluish hard rush flourishing in great luxuriance; and the substratum being impervious to water, it is subject to be poached by cattle in the winter season, and of a dry summer it opens into chinks to a considerable depth, so that either in summer or winter it is worked with difficulty, and, except in a dropping summer, or a dry winter, yields but poorly. Oats are chiefly cultivated on this sort of ground throughout the barony; a few crops of wheat and bere, but scarcely any barley are sown. I think about half the district is under tillage, and half under grazing. Fuel here is very scarce, there being very little bog in the vicinity, so that turf is brought at some considerable distance, and coal from Drogheda or Slane. In some grounds in the upper half barony, between the different strata and at the edges of streams, where the land has been washed away, and shows, as it were, a section of the earth—coal smut is found in abundance; and though there is every assurance, from the experiments hitherto made by order of the Company formed by Lord Cunningham, that coal can be procured in the barony, yet the circumstances of the mine are such, as to damp that laudable spirit of exertion from an idea that the profits would not be equivalent to the expense. In this barony is a fine quarry of vitrescent stone, which makes excellent flagging, of a more porous nature than Ardracran, and not so subject to retain damp on its surface; at the same time, Ardracran exceeds it in the beauty of its colour, and in the polish it is capable of receiving." The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townlands of Ballinacuran, Cordovey, Mallaghboy, Newcastle, and Ralaghan, in the parish of Emiskeen, and the townland of Rath, in the parish of Nobber, unitedly containing, in 1841, a pop. of 500, from the barony of Lower Slane to that of Morgallion.—The barony of Lower Slane, as at present constituted, contains part of the parish of Ardagh, and the whole of the parishes of Drumcondra, Innishmot, Killyar, Loughbracran, Mitchellstown, and Syddan. The principal villages are Syddan and Drumcondra. Pop., in 1831, 9,647; in 1841, 9,956. Houses 1,736. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,377; in manufactures and trade, 299; in other pursuits, 123. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 19; on the directing of labour, 438; on their own manual labour, 1,251; on means not specified, 91. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write,

1,220; who could read but not write, 691; who could neither read nor write, 2,455. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 464; who could read but not write, 680; who could neither read nor write, 3,202.—Lower Slane lies within the Poor-law unions of Ardee and Bailieborough. The total number of tenements valued is 991; and of these, 344 were valued under £5,—222, under £10,—111, under £15,—58, under £20,—39, under £25,—37, under £30,—38, under £40,—19, under £50,—and 123, at and above £50. The total annual value of the property rated is £22,935 19s. 11d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, was £1,162 6s. 1d.

SLANE (UPPER), a barony on the eastern border of the county of Meath, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Lower Slane and the county of Louth; on the east, by the county of Louth; on the south-east and south, by the barony of Lower Duleek; on the south-west, by the baronies of Skreen and Lower Navan; and on the west and north-west, by the barony of Morgallion. Its length, eastward, is 8½ miles; its greatest breadth is 4; and its area is 29,211 acres, 3 roods, 4 perches,—of which 135 acres, 2 roods, 11 perches are in the river Boyne. The character of the surface, the soil, and the husbandry, is glanced at in the preceding article on SLANE (LOWER). The highest ground, Slievebrigh, is situated on the boundary with Lower Slane, and has an altitude above sea-level of 753 feet. The rivulet Mattock traces the boundary with the county of Louth; and the river Boyne traces the boundary with the baronies of Skreen and Lower Duleek. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the parish of Rathkenny, containing, in 1841, a pop. of 2,177, from the barony of Lower Navan to that of Upper Slane.—The barony of Upper Slane, as at present constituted, contains part of the parishes of Collon and Tullyallen, and the whole of the parishes of Dowth, Gernonstown, Grangeveth, Monknewtown, Rathkenny, Slane, and Stackallen. The only town is Slane. Pop., in 1831, 7,265; in 1841, 9,626. Houses 1,660. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,310; in manufactures and trade, 299; in other pursuits, 121. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 24; on the directing of labour, 618; on their own manual labour, 1,000; on means not specified, 25. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,426; who could read but not write, 781; who could neither read nor write, 2,003. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 599; who could read but not write, 900; who could neither read nor write, 2,765.—Upper Slane is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Ardee, Drogheda, and Navan. The total number of tenements valued is 1,535; and of these, 759 were valued under £5,—229, under £10,—150, under £15,—81, under £20,—44, under £25,—33, under £30,—51, under £40,—33, under £50,—and 144, at and above £50.—The total annual value of the property rated is £24,842 1s. 9d.; and the sum levied under the grand warrant of summer 1841, was £726 12s. 3d.

SLANE, a parish, containing a small town of the same name, in the barony of Upper Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, south-eastward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 3¼; area, 5,947 acres, 1 rood, 1 perch,—of which 34 acres, 22 perches are in the river Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 2,516; in 1841, 2,510. Houses 421. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,620; in 1841, 1,955. Houses 346. The surface is low, and of pleasant appearance, but consists, in the aggregate, of rather indifferent land. The river Boyne flows along the whole of the southern boundary; and the Devlin rivulet traces much of the northern boundary. The scenery of the Boyne, for several miles above and below the town, is exquisitely beautiful. The principal hamlets within the parish are Harlinstown and Mooretown; and the principal rural residences are Slane-castle, Mill-lodge, Mount-Charles-lodge, Harlinstown-house, and Janeville-cottage. The plantations of Slane-castle demesne blend with those of the rest of these residences, and especially with those of the superb and extensive demesne of Beaupark-house on the Duleek bank of the Boyne, to form a noble and most imposing expanse of fluviatile sylvan scenery. The mansion of Slane-castle is the seat of the Marquis of Conyngham, and is a large and splendid structure, occupying an elevated site on the banks of the Boyne, about 5 or 6 furlongs west of the village of Slane. "This mansion," says Mr. Brewer, "comprises parts of the castle built by the Flemings, lords of Slane, greatly altered and enlarged, at different periods, since the estate has been vested in the noble family to which it at present belongs. The most important alterations were made by the Right Hon. William Conyngham, in 1785, and several following years, after the designs of the late Mr. James Wyatt. The entrance to the castle, and considerable improvements of the interior, were executed at a more recent date, under the direction of Francis Johnston, Esq., architect of the Board of Works. The exterior features of the building are in the style termed modern Gothic, and the embattled parapets and aspiring turrets produce romantic and striking combinations at many points of view; but the boasted picturesque of architecture is here attained by the sacrifice of consistency. As a whole, the fabric is imposing, and, indeed, magnificent; but it does not, in its component parts, bear resemblance to the castle or other pile of building of any known ancient period in the history of our national architecture. The interior contains many spacious and superb apartments. The grounds by which this mansion is surrounded are extensive and extremely beautiful. They present much inequality of surface, and are richly clothed with wood. The river Boyne here winds through its most attractive shores. Devious in its course, its rocky and its partially wooded banks afford a lovely variety of scenery. Through several breaks of the noble woods and wide plantations, the neat village, and the ruins of the abbey, combine happily with the cultivated landscape.—It will be long remembered in the annals of this mansion, that his majesty, King George IV., honoured Slane-castle with his presence, in the month of August 1821." The abbey of Slane, situated within the demesne of Slane-castle, will be noticed in connection with the town. In 1781, six of the ancient instruments called corabansas, were found by persons digging in the park of Slane. The corabansa is described by Mr. Walker as a "chorus instrument of the ancient Irish, of a complex form, and consisting of two circular plates of brass, connected by a wire of the same metal, twisted in a worm-like manner, which jingled round the shanks when the plates were struck upon the fingers; and it was used for the purpose of keeping time." The interior of the parish is traversed by the road from Kells to Drogheda, and by that from Dunshaughlin to Ardee.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £407 15s. 6d.; glebe, £24. Gross income, £448 15s. 6d.; nett, £393 2s. 2½d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built about the year 1712, at a cost now unknown; and was enlarged in 1830, by means of a loan of £200 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 35 to 110. The Roman Catholic chapels at Slane and Rushwee have an attendance of respectively 2,000 and 1,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Rathkenny. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 180, and the Roman Catholics to 2,387; and 4 daily schools—one of which was supported chiefly by the marchioness of Conyngham, one was on the foundation of Erasmus Smith, and one was salaried with £8 a-year from the National Board—had on their books 210 boys and 109 girls.

SLANE, a small market and post town, and anciently a place of much importance, in the parish of Slane, barony of Upper Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the left bank of the river Boyne, and at the intersection of the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry, with the road from Kells to Drogheda, or north road from Navan to Drogheda, 4½ miles south by west of Collon, 6 west of Drogheda, 6 south-east of Navan, 10 south-south-east of Drumcondra, 11 east of Kells, 12 north-north-west of Ashbourne, and 22 north-north-west of Dublin. The houses of which it consists are chiefly modern, and of an ornamental character; and a considerable proportion of them, of uniform structure, form an elegant circus in the centre. The neat and respectable appearance of the houses, the natural beauty of the situation, the contiguity of the sumptuous demesne of the Marquis of Conyngham, and the richly sylvan and highly embellished scenery in the adjacent stretches of the Boyne, unite to render Slane one of the most attractive little towns in the east of Ireland. The town was early the chosen retreat of ecclesiastics; it became the seat of one of those small bishoprics which were consolidated into the one great see of Meath; and, soon after the period of the Anglo-Norman conquest, it was constituted a borough in the palatinate of Sir Hugh De Lacy. The family of Fleming, whose ancestor entered Ireland with De Lacy, and appears to have shared his fortunes, and received a territorial grant within his palatinate, built a castle on the site of the present mansion of the Marquis of Conyngham, used this place as their stated residence, and took from it the title of Lords of Slane; but the manor and its dependencies were forfeited by these proprietors in the unhappy year 1041; and they, soon after, passed into the possession of the ancestor of the present family of Conyngham, to whom they give the subordinate title of Viscount Slane. An ecclesiastical establishment, most probably of Culdean character, but usually termed by historians of the middle and modern ages an abbey, was very early founded at Slane, and is traditionally said to have been the retreat or asylum, during 20 years of the 7th century, of Dagobert, king of Austrasia. "Dagobert, king of Austrasia," says the story, "in 653, at the age of 7 years, was taken by Grimoald, mayor of the palace, and by his direction, shorn a monk, rendered nunt to hold the reins of government, and banished into Ireland. He was received into this abbey, where he obtained an education proper for the enjoyment of a throne, and continued here during the space of 20 years, when he was recalled into France, and replaced in his government." Repeatedly in the 9th and 10th centuries, the abbey was destroyed by the Danes; in 1170, in common with the town, it was burned and sacked by Earl Strongbow, and MacMurrough, king of Leinster; and in 1175, again, in common with the town, it was destroyed by a party of the English. In 1512, an abbey for friars of the third order of St. Francis was founded, on the site of the old structure, and was built on an extensive scale, and re-endowed, by Sir Christopher Fleming, Lord of Slane, and Elizabeth Stuckle his lady; and after the general dissolution of monasteries, it was granted to James, Lord of Slane, at the annual rent of one Irish penny. The ruins of this pile still surmount an eminence within the demesne of Slane-castle; they consist of a large chapel, and a lofty tower at the west end,—the latter pierced with a handsome ramified window; and they contribute an interesting feature to the rich and picturesque surrounding landscape. To the south of the town, and on the margin of the river, stands another but small ecclesiastical ruin, in the pointed style of architecture, popularly called the Hermitage of St. Eirc, and usually asserted to have been founded by a St. Eirc who resided in Slane abbey in the first half of the 6th century, but very obviously a building of comparatively modern date. This hermitage was the retreat of two friars at the period when the Franciscan abbey was founded; and it has served as the burying-place of several members of the Slane family. The church of Slane is a neat and well-preserved edifice, and is ornamented with a handsome steeple, much more modern than the church itself, and designed by the architect Mr. Francis Johnston. The Rev. Mervyn Archdall, to whom we have so often referred in the course of our Gazetteer as the credulous author of the Monasticon Hibernicum, and to whom, in spite of his credulity, we have been indebted for some information, was for some time rector of Slane, and made some figure in connection with the town. He was born at Dublin in April 1723; he enjoyed the friendship of Harris and Dr. Smith, and latterly that of Bishop Pococke; he prepared and published an enlarged edition of Lodge's Peerage of Ireland; and he accumulated materials for a Monasticon twice the bulk of the one he wrote, but was obliged to content himself with the publication of only one quarto on Irish monasteries, and had the mortification to know that even this fell almost still-born from the press. The Monasticon was published in 1786; and its author died in 1791. —A dispensary in Slane is within the Poor-law union of Navan, and serves for a district of 11,316 acres, with a pop. of 4,175; and, in 1839-40, it expended £124 16s., and administered to 625 patients. A court of petty-sessions is held on the second Friday of every month. Fairs are held on April 2, June 2, Sept. 2, and Nov. 8. The town enjoys all the facilities and advantages of the Boyne navigation, and the thoroughfare of two great lines of road. The celebrated battle of the Boyne was fought in the eastern vicinity of Slane; and the unique and singularly interesting antiquities of New Grange occur a short way down the river. See BOYNE and NEW GRANGE. Area of the town, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 806; in 1841, 555. Houses 75. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 23; in manufactures and trade, 43; in other pursuits, 29. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 5; on the directing of labour, 56; on their own manual labour, 27; on means not specified, 6.

SLANES, a parish on the east coast of the barony of Ardes, 3 miles north-east of Portaferry, co. Down, Ulster. Length, southward, 2 miles; breadth, exclusive of islands, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile; area 946 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 589; in 1841, 556. Houses 107. The surface consists of excellent land. The coast is bluff and rocky, and has, at the northern extremity, a tiny headland called Slanes Point. The rocky islets called Hem's Rock and South Rock, lie respectively $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile, and $1\frac{1}{4}$ from the shore; and the latter is surmounted by a lighthouse, the maintaining of which cost £437 5s. 6d. during the year 1840, and £391 2s. 1d. during the year 1843. The hamlets within the parish are Newcastle and Cloghy; and the other noticeable objects are a coastguard-station, a small fishing-quay, the ruins of White-house, and the vestiges of the old church. About 130 years ago, the bodies of 18 sailors who were wrecked and drowned at the North Rocks in the vicinity, were buried at one time within the church. About half-a-mile west of Slanes, are vestiges of an old building called Castlebay or Johnston, which was once a preceptory of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLYPHILIP [which see], in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition, £106 13s. 5 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 60 Churchmen, 254 Presbyterians, and 287 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, meeting-house, nor school.

SLANEY (THE), a river of the counties of Wicklow, Carlow, and Wexford, Leinster. It rises in three headstreams at the central watershed of the county of Wicklow, and on the eastern margin of the parish of Donaghmore, and barony of Upper Talbotstown. One of these headstreams issues from the deep dell called the North Prison, on the north side of the monarch mountain of Lugnaquilla; another issues from between two summits of 2,611 and 2,495 feet of altitude, $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile to the north of the former; and the third issues from the side of Table mountain, whose summit soars to the height of 2,311 feet above sea-level, at a point 3 miles north of the North Prison. The stream formed by the confluences of these headwaters between 2 and 3 miles to the west, traverses the whole of the glen of Imale, flowing 6 miles westward, through the parish of Donaghmore, to the southern vicinity of Stratford-on-Slaney, and receiving the tribute of the Little Slaney on the left, and that of the Carrigower on the right; it then runs 5 miles southward, through the parishes of Rathbran and Baltinglass, and past the town of Baltinglass, into the county of Carlow; it next flows 15 miles southward, through the baronies of Rathvilly and Forth, and past the towns of Rathvilly, Tullow, and Clonegall, to a confluence with the river Derry; it next runs 2 miles southward on the boundary between the county of Carlow and the county of Wexford, to the town of Newtownbarry; it next runs 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-eastward, through the barony of Scarewalsh, to a point $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile below the hamlet of Scarewalsh, and receives on the left the large tributary stream of the Bann; it next runs 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward, past the town of Enniscorthy, and along the boundary between the baronies of Ballaghkeen and East Shelmalier on the left, and the baronies of Scarewalsh, Bantry, and West Shelmalier on the right; and receives the tributary streams of the Urn and the Boro on the right; and it next describes a demi-circircle from a southerly to an easterly direction, along the boundary between the barony of East Shelmalier on the left, and the baronies of West Shelmalier and Forth on the right, to the town of Wexford, considerably expanding in its progress into estuarial width, sending off a tidal arm northward to the mouth of the river Sow, and finally expanding at the town of Wexford into the great estuarial lagoon of Wexford Harbour. The scenery of the early part of the river's course is alpine grand; the scenery in the vicinity of Stratford is romantic and imposing; the scenery in the vicinity of Clonegall and Newtownbarry is powerfully picturesque; the scenery in the windings through the rich pastoral valley of Scarewalsh is very beautiful; and the scenery from Scarewalsh down to Wexford is a continued series of lusciousness and loveliness; so that the river, as a whole, traverses a long, gorgeous, and finely diversified gallery of landscape. "The Slaney river," says an official report of Nov. 1836, "is navigable for any vessel that can come over the harbour bar to about six miles above Wexford; but scarcely any ever go beyond the drawbridge. It is a natural river, and no means are used either to maintain or improve it. The entire traffic is carried on by cots (flat-bottomed boats of 15 to 20 tons). These can go always loaded to within about four miles of Enniscorthy, generally to within about two miles, and sometimes the entire way. The tide flows up the river about 10 statute miles, so as to affect the water; but the level of the river is affected by back-water up to the town of Enniscorthy, which is about 18 statute miles from the town of Wexford by the river, and 14 by the mail-coach road. There is no source of ascertaining precisely the amount of traffic on the river; but a calculation has been made by persons well-acquainted with the matter, by which it would appear, that the traffic averages about 1,200 tons per week, or about 60,000 tons per year. Down the river almost exclusively grain, and up limestone, for manure, coals, timber, and imported ship goods. The boats vary from 15 to 20 tons, and draw from 3 feet 3 inches to 4 feet water. The boats are occasionally interrupted by a scour, at about 4 to 4½ miles from Enniscorthy; but this occurs only when the waters are very low, and at neap low water. The scours, where they are generally stopped, are about 2 to 2½ Irish miles from the town. "The right of fishing on the Slaney belongs to the proprietors of the lands along its banks; but it is almost never asserted to the exclusion of the public for ordinary angling; and, except in a few instances, it is not asserted in even the fishing of salmon. The decrease of salmon in the river, for 25 or 30 years past, has been very great; and is ascribed mainly to the destruction of fish going up to spawn, the destruction of fish on their way to the sea from spawning, and the catching of fish with nets during the months of winter. "Salmon fishing," said one witness in 1836, "has greatly diminished during the last 20 years in the river Slaney. At that time, I recollect purchasing 200 to 300 fish in a day, after the inhabitants of Enniscorthy were supplied, at 1½d. per pound; latterly, from 15 to 20 salmon in a market would be considered a great many, and 6d. to 8d. per pound a moderate price." "To any person visiting the river Slaney in the summer season," said another, "it must be a matter of surprise how salmon can get up the stream, from the number of nets cast out and drawn in without intermission. When two fisheries join, it is a common practice for the fishermen of each to bring their nets together, and keep up a constant hauling, one net thrown or cast out while the other is drawing, so that salmon cannot escape. Some set their nets across, from bank to bank, until the tide turns, and then cast out nets below, and draw them and the stop or stake-net together. These are most unfair means, and most destructive to the general fishery. I believe that there is not a mill either upon the Slaney or its tributaries, that has not in the mill-course either a net or basket set for the destruction of salmon, their fry, and every other kind of fish that may enter those courses."

SLATE (THE), a rivulet of the county of Kildare and King's county, Leinster. It rises in the vicinity of the village of Prosperous, in the parish of Killybegs and barony of Clane, co. Kildare, and runs about 11½ miles south-westward, chiefly through a boggy district, to a confluence with the Feagile river, one of the tributaries of the Barrow. Its course for 8 miles is through the parishes of Killybegs, Downings, Timahoe, Kilmeague, Cloncurry, and Rathangan, and baronies of Clane, Connell, and East Ophaly, co. Kildare; for 1½ mile on the boundary between co. Kildare and King's co.; and for 2 miles through the parish of Clonsast and barony of Coolestown, King's co. The chief seat of population on its banks is the village of Rathangan. The stream, over much the greater part of its course, runs near and parallel to the Grand Canal; and, almost everywhere, it serves as a great natural drain for a gloomy region of bogs.

SLATEY, SLEATY, or SLETTY, a parish on the eastern margin of the barony of Slievemargy and of Queen's county, Leinster. It lies along the right bank of the river Barrow, 1½ mile north by west of Carlow. Length, south by westward, 1½ mile; extreme breadth, ¾; area, 67½ acres, 11 perches,—of which 12 acres, 3 roods, 14 perches are in the Barrow. Pop., in 1831, 189; in 1841, 233. Houses 40. The surface consists of good land, and is traversed by the road from Carlow to Athy. The highest ground is in the centre, and has an altitude above sea-level of 244 feet. The sents are Slatey-house, Sleaty-cottage, and Knockbeg-house. The church of the parish—originally or uncorruptedly called Sliebitch, 'the house near the mountains,'—is alleged to have been coeval with the dawn of Christianity upon Ireland. The ruin which remains consists of three walls of one small building. An extensive college is traditionally alleged to have been connected with the church, and to have furnished a polite education to many youths, both native and foreign. A street also is said to have extended two miles from this place to the ancient but now extinct town of Killeslin. The burying-ground around the ruined church has been for centuries a favourite place of interment. An ancient tumulus, or arched receptacle for the ashes of the Danish dead, was, a number of years ago, discovered in the adjoining field, and was found to contain a number of earthen urns, arranged in rows, and each covered with a small round flag.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of SHREZZ [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £60; glebe, £6. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 5, and the Roman Catholics to 238; and a pay daily school had on its books 10 boys and 4 girls.

SLATYPORT, a small landing-place at the south-eastern extremity of the Big Copeland Island, 1½ mile north by east of Donaghadee, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It has its name from being in the vicinity of a slate quarry.

SLEAGUFF. See SLYGUFF.

SLEAMORE, a cape, forming the southern extremity of the island of Sherkin or Innisherkin, barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster.

SLEATY. See SLATEY.

SLEATYGRAIGUE, a village in the parish of Killeslin, barony of Slievemargy, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the road from Carlow to Athy, ¼ of a mile west of the river Barrow, and ¼ a mile north of Graigue or the western suburb of the town of Carlow. It seems to derive its name from standing about midway between Sleaty and Graigue. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 317. Houses 63.

SLEDY, an old castle in the parish of Modelligo, 2 miles north-east of the village of Modelligo, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It was built in 1618 by Philip MacGrath, a member of a family who were then extensive proprietors in Waterford.

SLEMISH, a mountain in the centre of the parish of Racavan, 3½ miles east by south of Broughshane, barony of Lower Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. The altitude of its summit above sea-level is 1,437 feet.

SLETTY. See SLATEY.

SLIDDERYFORD, a hamlet in the parish of Kilmegan, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the shore, 1½ mile south-south-west of Dundrum. A cromlech or Druidical altar here is noticed as follows by the author of the Chorographical Description of Down:—"It stands upon three large supporters, each 4 feet above the surface; the incumbent stone is flat at top, but bellying underneath, fills part of the empty space between the tripod. The upper stone is 10 yards in circumference, 3 yards broad on the flat surface, and between 4 and 5 feet thick in the centre, and has not above an inch dependence on two of the stones; but the third, which stands north, has a slope in it to receive the great stone."

SLIEVE-ALP, a mountain in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It overhangs the rivulet Sarsaghaunmore on the north, and the rivulet Owenduff on the west, and is situated 12 miles north-west by north of Newport-pratt. The altitude of its summit above sea-level is 1,084 feet.

SLIEVE-ALTOOEY, a mountain on the west coast of the parish of Glen-Collumkill, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,084 feet above sea-level; and is a twin mountain to that of Glenlough, whose summit has an altitude of 1,513 feet. The brief alpine range formed or stretched out upon the coast by these two mountains curves along the summit in a very beautiful sky-line, sends down upper escarpments of so shelving and curious a kind as to appear a series of rocky ridges, and then stoops precipitously to the sea in a line of most magnificent and stupendous cliffs, between 900 and 1,000 feet in mural altitude.

SLIEVE-AN-IERIN, a mountain in the parishes of Kiltogher and Kiltubrid, barony and county of Leitrim, Connaught. Its summit is situated within the former parish, 2 miles east of Lough Allen, and $3\frac{1}{4}$ north-east by north of Drumshambo, and has an altitude of 1,922 feet above sea-level. The name is sometimes so spelt by topographers as to bear the meaning of the 'mountain of Ireland,'—a meaning as undistinctive as it is arrogant; but it originally meant, and ought always to be so spelt as to appear to mean, 'the mountain of iron;' and, in this sense, it is not only apt but descriptive. The mountain forms a chief part of the great mineral field of CONNAUGHT [see that article]: it abounds with iron ore; and, up to a time when all the timber on and near it was consumed in the iron works, it yielded up a large quantity of its ore for the local manufactures of Ireland. Its name is often applied to the whole of the group of mountains in the central district of the county, and upon the east flank of Lough Allen; and its own summit and that of Bencroy are the loftiest heights of the group,—the latter having an altitude of 1,707 feet.

SLIEVE-AN-IERIN, or SLIEVE-AN-ORRA, a mountain on the mutual border of the baronies of Upper Dunluce and Lower Glenarm, 5 miles west by south of Cushendall, co. Antrim, Ulster. It lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,676 feet above the level of the sea; and it overhangs and almost clothes the early course of the Bush river,—that stream making its escape to an opener channel about 2 miles north of Lissanore-castle. Its name is also sometimes written Slieve-Na-Aura, and in that form is associated with an interesting passage of old story. See SLIEVE-NA-AURA.

SLIEVE-AN-NEE, a mountain on the mutual border of the baronies of Kilconway and Lower Glenarm, 5 miles south-west of Cushendall, co. Antrim, Ulster. The altitude of its summit above sea-level is 1,782 feet.

SLIEVE-AN-ORRA. See SLIEVE-AN-IERIN, co. Antrim.

SLIEVE-ARDAGH, a barony in the eastern district of co. Tipperary, Munster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by the barony of Eliogurty; on the north-east and east, by the county of Kilkenny; on the south, by the barony of East Iffa and Offa; and, on the west, by the barony of Middlethird. Its length, south by eastward, is $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its breadth is from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $11\frac{1}{2}$; and its area is 90,772 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches,—of which 10 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches are water. A portion of the southern district consists of part of the south-eastern mountain congeries of the county; a large portion of the northern district consists of the Slieve-Ardagh or Tipperary coalfield district; and the remainder of the surface is of very various character as to both soil and contour. The principal summits in the south, whether on the boundary or in the interior, are Knocklumna, 1,654 feet in altitude, and two other heights of respectively 1,088 and 852 feet in altitude. The Slieve-Ardagh coal district is similar, in its general circumstances, to the Leinster coal district. "It forms a ridge of hill-country of considerable elevation above the limestone which surrounds it, and on which it rests. Generally speaking, the strata of this district dip at a steeper angle from the horizon than those of the Leinster district, and they form frequent undulations; hence the coal occurs in deep troughs, and for that reason, in the best regulated collieries, the engine pit has been sunk in the centre of the trough, and the coal wrought by working upwards on both sides of it. This district, as far as it is at present known, appears to contain but three beds of coal, the lowest of which is but nine inches in thickness, and the second and third are each two feet thick. The coal is of good quality, but not so dense as the three feet coal of the Leinster district. The principal collieries are situated at Colebrook, and at Coolquil in the neighbourhood of Killeenale. The latter is conducted with judgment and considerable success by the Mining Company of Ireland. The large coal of this, as well as of the Leinster district, is used for domestic purposes and for malting, and the small coal and culm for burning lime."—"The produce of these collieries," says another recent statement, "is of a superior quality; the coal (anthracite) containing 96 per cent. of carbon, and the ton of culm producing 70 barrels of lime, which is extensively used as manure in a widely extended district where this coal and culm are almost the only fuel, even for domestic purposes, and their use is chiefly limited by the very imperfect means of transit which at present exist. From the extent and character of the coal-fields recently opened by the Mining Company, and the facilities erected for working them, the produce of these collieries may be increased to almost any extent to which the means of transport by railways or canals shall extend the circuit of consumption. Supplies of timber conveyed on cars from Clonmel, or woods in the district; the steam-engines landed at Waterford sent by boat to Clonmel, and from thence on cars; iron and other supplies sent from Dublin on cars." The coal and the culm of the collieries are conveyed on cars to Limerick, Clare, Galway, Waterford, Kilkenny, Dublin, and intermediate places. In 1836, the collieries employed 5 engines, and between 200 and 300 workmen, and annually produced 30,000 tons, worth 10s. per ton. In 1843, a loan fund, which takes name from Slieve-Ardagh, had a capital of £1,219, circulated £4,737 in 1,508 loans, realized a net profit of £18, expended for charitable purposes £18, and had 24 depositors or proprietors of its capital.—Slieve-Ardagh contains part of the parishes of Clooneen, Garrangibbon, Graystown, Kilcooley, Newtownlennan, and St. John Baptist, and the whole of the parishes of Ballingarry, Buolick, Crohane, Fen-nor, Grangemoekler, Isertkieran, Killeenale, Kil-vernon, Lickfinn, Lismalin, Modeshill, Mowney, and Templemichael. The towns and chief villages are Killeaule, Mullinahone, Ballingarry, New Birmingham, Nine-Mile-House, and Marradyke. Pop., in 1831, 32,765; in 1841, 36,456. Houses 5,686. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,556; in manufactures and trade, 1,146; in other pursuits, 527. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 83; on the directing of labour, 2,274; on their own manual labour, 3,628; on means not specified, 244. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 6,298; who could read but not write, 2,547; who could neither read nor write, 6,804. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,793; who could read but not write, 3,957; who could neither read nor write, 9,276.—Slieve-Ardagh is distributed among the Poor-law unions of Callan, Carrick-on-Suir, Cashel, and Thurles. The total number of tenements valued is 4,159; and of these, 2,034 were valued under £5,—667, under £10,—397, under £15,—264, under £20,—185, under £25,—131, under £30,—141, under £40,—87, under £50,—and 253, at and above £50.

SLIEVE-AUGHTY. See SLIEVE-BAUGHTA.

SLIEVE-BANE, a mountain in the parish of Kilbroney, barony of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on the southern frontier of the great Mourne group of mountains, and on the north screen of Lough Carlingford, in the immediate vicinity of the village of Rostrevor. On its side, at a great height, is the huge and curiously-situated block of stone called Cloughmore; and both that spot and its summit—the latter having an altitude of 1,595 feet above sea-level—command one of the most brilliant and diversified prospects in the three kingdoms. See CLOUGHMORE and ROSTREVOR.

SLIEVE-BAUGHT. See SLIEVE-BEAGH.

SLIEVE-BAUGHTA, or SLIEVE-AUGHTY, a broad, compact, and elongated congeries of mountains, on the mutual border of co. Galway, Connaught, and co. Clare, Munster. It extends 14 miles south-eastward, from a point 5 miles south-west of Loughrea, to the immediate vicinity of the bay of Scariff, and has a breadth of 5½ miles within co. Galway, and 3½ within co. Clare. It occupies more or less of the parishes of Tynagh, Ballinakill, Clonrush, Kiltesskill, and Inniscitra, in the barony of Leitrim.—Killeenacadeema, Killinan, Ardahan, and Kiltomas, in the barony of Loughrea,—and Moynoe, Tomgraney, and Feacle, in the barony of Upper Tulla. The principal summits are four of respectively 602, 562, 508, and 692 feet of altitude within the barony of Leitrim; the Scalp, 1,074 feet of altitude on the boundary between the baronies of Leitrim and Upper Tulla,—four of respectively 977, 1,207, 793, and 1,080 feet of altitude within the barony of Loughrea,—and seven of respectively 1,064, 1,312, 448, 589, 724, 944, and 765 feet of altitude within the barony of Upper Tulla. The mountains are, for the most part, of the old red sandstone formation; and, though not strictly picturesque in themselves, or among their interior defiles, they contribute features of great interest and considerable power and beauty to the west side of Lough Derg, and to the great extent of flat country in the central districts of the eastern division of the county of Galway.

SLIEVE-BAWN—vulgarly SLEERON—a mountain, partly in the barony of South Ballintober, but chiefly in that of Roscommon, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It has an elongated outline in the form of a ridge; and extends southward, somewhat parallel with the course of the Shannon, from a point about 2 miles south of Strokestown; but its summit, which has an altitude of 857 feet above sea-level, and belongs to the parish of Cloonfinlough, is situated 3¼ miles west of the Shannon, and 3¼ south of Strokestown. It forms a very conspicuous feature in the great expanse of flat country, which spreads away from it athwart the counties of Roscommon and Longford, and up and down the Shannon; and affords relief and even interest to extensive views which, but for its presence, would be exceedingly irksome. Its name means 'the White mountain,' and was probably suggested by the whiteness of the silicious sandstone rock of which the mountain is composed. "At a distance, however, little appearance of whiteness is observable, as the surface towards the summit is covered with bog, heath, and coarse herbage, and elsewhere is cultivated. It is only where quarries have been opened, or where the soil has been washed away by floods, that the rock is seen. There are no cliffs or precipices at all remarkable on this mountain; and, on the east side towards the Shannon, a gradual slope extends nearly from the crest of the ridge, down to the edge of the flat bogs which stretch along the base, where cultivation is annually increasing, promising in time to reach to the very top of the mountain. On the verge of the deep bog, towards the base, several hamlets appear, and Mount Dillon, on an insulated hill, with some trees, forms a conspicuous object. The western side of the mountain is more broken than the opposite one, and the pastures by nature seem to be of a better description. Some groves are scattered along the base near the habitations."

SLIEVE-BEAGH, or SLIEVE-BAUGHT—vulgarly SLABAY—an elongated congeries of mountains in the baronies of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Trough and Monaghan, co. Monaghan, and Magherastephana and Clonkelly, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It extends from the Mountain river, in the western vicinity of the village of Ennyvale, 13½ miles south-westward, to the hamlet of Donagh, 2½ south-south-east of Lisnaskea; and it has an extreme breadth of about 7½. Its loftiest summits are Carnmore, in the barony of Clonkelly, and Slieve-Beagh proper, at the junction point of the three counties; and these have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,084 and 1,254 feet. Sir Charles Coote, in his Statistical Survey of the County of Monaghan, says, "The Slieve-Baught or Slabay mountains are one great uninterrupted ridge of high land, the most considerable part of which has nothing to recommend it, not possessing a fruitful soil, or scarce any of those natural beauties which are peculiar to mountains; neither the dusky glen, the bold precipice, the towering cliff, the cascade, nor scarcely one beautiful view to be seen throughout; the whole is but an uninteresting waste, gradually vanishing into the lowlands, where the soil is moory. They are almost always wet, but yet not without capability, and have in partial spots beds of the richest limestone, and abundance of marl. A peculiarly fine manure also appears near the surface, consisting of banks of decayed limestone which turns up in slaty stuff, but so soft that it can be worked to a consistency like putty; it is highly calcareous, and will strongly effervesce with acids. * * * Carnmore is famous for its millstone quarry. On the eastern side of this ascent, a large tract of land, I think, lies admirably well for improvement, and could be capitally reclaimed at a small expense; for contiguous to it is a fine limestone quarry, running for a considerable distance, and forming the bed of a shallow though rapid stream, and pointing south-east."

SLIEVE-BEG, a mountain on the mutual border of the baronies of Mourne and Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is one of the great Mourne group; it occurs in the western vicinity of Slieve-Donard, and among most sublime and romantic scenery, 2½ miles south-west by west of Newcastle; and it lifts its summit to an altitude of 2,384 feet above sea-level.

SLIEVE-BERNAGH, a congeries of mountains, partly in the barony of Upper Tulla, but chiefly in that of Lower Tulla, co. Clare, Munster. It occupies more or less of the parishes of Tomgraney, Kilnoe, O'Gonelloe, Killaloe, O'Brien's-Brigge, and Killokenedy; it extends 5½ miles south-south-eastward, and 5 in the opposite direction; it soars gradually up in the western vicinity of the city of Killaloe, and along the western shore of the termination of Lough Derg; and it contributes noble and imposing features to the magnificent landscape of the Shannon throughout all the environs of Killaloe, O'Brien's-Brigge, Doonas, and Castle-Connell. Its principal summits, with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Knockglass, in the parish of Kilnoe, 541 feet; Knockmalecka, in the parish of Kilnoe, 818 feet; a height, on the boundary between the parishes of Tomgraney and O'Gonelloe, 1,019 feet; Clennagalliagh, in the parish of Killaloe, 1,746 feet; a height, in the parish of Killaloe, 2 miles west of the city of Killaloe, 1,353 feet; a height on the boundary between the parishes of O'Brien's-Brigge and Killokenedy, 3 miles west-south-west of the city of Killaloe, 1,181 feet; and Glenagalliagh and Cragnamurragh, on the boundary between the parishes of O'Brien's-Brigge and Killokenedy, and to the north of the preceding height, respectively 1,458 and 1,729 feet.

SLIEVE-BINGIAN, a mountain-summit near the centre of the great Mourne group of mountains, barony of Mourne, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated 3 miles south-south-west of Slieve-Donard, and 4½ north by east of Kilkeel; and it has an altitude above sea-level of 2,449 feet.

SLIEVE-BLOOM, a range of mountains on the mutual boundary and border of King's and Queen's counties, Leinster. It extends from the southern vicinity of the village of Clonslee, in the barony of Tinnehinch, Queen's county, 13½ miles south-south-westward, to the northern vicinity of the town of Roscrea, at the northern extremity of co. Tipperary; it belongs partly to the barony of Ballybrit, King's county, but chiefly to the baronies of Tinnehinch, Upperwoods, and Clandonagh, Queen's co.; and it occupies more or less of the parishes of Letterluna, Kinnetty, Roscomroe, and Roscrea in King's county, and the parishes of Kilmanman, Rearymore, Rosenallis, Offerlane, and Kyle, in Queen's county. Its principal summits, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Spink, in the parish of Letterluna, 1,087 feet; Carroll's-Hill, in the parish of Kinnetty, 1,584 feet; a height, in the parish of Roscrea, 757 feet; a height, on the boundary between the parishes of Letterluna and Offerlane, 1,602 feet; Ardarin and another height, on the boundary between the parishes of Kinnetty and Offerlane, 1,733 and 1,691 feet; Farbrugue, on the boundary between the parishes of Roscomroe and Offerlane, 1,411 feet; a height, at the junction-part of the parishes of Roscomroe, Roscrea, and Offerlane, 1,332 feet; Knocknastumba and another height, in the parish of Rearymore, respectively 1,359 and 1,261 feet; Antonian, in the parish of Rosenallis, 1,114 feet; Bawnreaghcong, on the boundary between the parishes of Rearymore and Offerlane, 1,676 feet; a height, in the centre of the parish of Kilmanman, 1,034 feet; a height, on the boundary between the parishes of Offerlane and Kyle, 1,007 feet. Two elongated summits, called the Cones and the Ridge of Cappard, extend respectively eastward along the boundary between the parishes of Rearymore and Offerlane, and north-eastward between the parishes of Rearymore and Rosenallis; and the highest points in these ridgy summits are respectively Bawnreaghcong and Antonian. The Slieve-Bloom mountains are generally of the sandstone formation; they constitute so continuous a range as to be traversed or crossed by only two roads,—both at lofty elevations or through lofty gaps; they constitute a series of striking features and noble backgrounds in the otherwise tame country which stretches far away from their base; they are easy of ascent from Mountrath, and from various other points in their vicinity; and from the Cones, the summit of Ardarin, and many other vantage-grounds, they command extensive and minute views of the champaign country in the midst of which they are situated. The Gap of Glendine immediately north of Ardarin, is the principal defile across them; and even this is difficult of approach, steep, craggy, and not five feet wide upon the path. "The soil of Slieve-Bloom mountain at this side," says Sir Charles Coote in his View of the Agriculture of King's County, "is at the extremity a cold grit, and takes a great deal of lime to render it arable; its quality is argillaceous, and interspersed thickly with rocks of freestone. This upper stratum is pretty deep, in few places less than two spades from the surface, and a siliceous substratum covers the whole range of the summit. The centre parallel has various soils, being of a light sandy loam, a stiff yellow clay, or gritty shallow gravel, and a deep brown earth, which is far the best of it; and the bottom line is always a cold, spongy, deep clay, only productive where the loam is so dry as to check the springs above at the foot, where the declivity vanishes, is a deep irreclaimable bog, approachable only in very dry seasons. This will be found to be the general description of this side of the Slieve-Bloom, but does not universally hold good; for, towards the centre of this range, the land is very fertile in pasture, and grazed the whole year throughout with numerous flocks of sheep and young cattle; the soil being of a limestone quality, and large rocks of that mineral thickly interspersed; neither is the bottom range boggy, but a stiff clay where abundant crops of corn are yielded; on the mountain of Knocknahan this is the case, and also the range of Castle-town, Cumber down to Lettybrook, which latter is some of the best in the county. * * On this side of the mountain, the land is far less productive than that of the Queen's county, and its occupation is of very little moment, being in most places only tenable to cattle in very dry seasons; but from their extent and great height, the leading features of this country are constituted, and they are possessed of every natural beauty peculiar to mountains, and in the variety of their wilds are calculated to excite admiration, and well worth attention of the natural philosopher."

SLIEVE-BOY, a mountain in the barony of Scarewalsh, 3½ miles north of Ferns, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is situated at the junction-point of the three parishes of Ferns, Kilcomb, and Carnew; it lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,385 feet above sea-level; it has a conical outline; and it forms a conspicuous feature in the landscapes of about one-half of the county.

SLIEVE-BOY, a hill in the barony of Tyrkeeran, 1½ mile south of the village of Clady, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It screens part of the left side of the upper part of the glen of the Faghan; and lifts its summit to the altitude of 854 feet above sea-level.

SLIEVE-BREGH, a hill on the mutual border of the parishes of Grangegeeth and Killery, and of the baronies of Upper Slane and Lower Slane, 3½ miles north by west of the town of Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. In consequence of the prevailing flatness of the surrounding country within the periphery of the visible horizon, this hill and those of Mount-Iver and Bellpatrick, 563 and 789 feet high, in its vicinity, make a vastly more conspicuous figure in a great and rich landscape than many mountains of thrice their altitude in upland districts.

SLIEVE-BUCK, a mountain in the barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It makes a prominent figure in the tableau scenery around the village of Roundwood, and is one of two mountains which form the eastern boundary of Lough Dan.

SLIEVE-BUCK, a hill in the barony of Tyrkeeran, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Muff, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ east-south-east of Londonderry, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It is one of the northern frontier heights of the county; and lifts its summit to the altitude of 823 feet above sea-level.

SLIEVE-BUNN, a hill in the parish of Kilnehue, barony of Gorey, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of the town of Gorey, co. Wexford, Munster. Altitude, 879 feet.

SLIEVE-CALTIA, a hill in the parish of Whitechurch, barony of Shelburne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is situated 2 miles east of the river Barrow, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ south of the town of New Ross; it forms an isolated height in the midst of a great and beautiful champaign country; it attains an altitude of 888 feet above the level of the sea; it possesses a tabular summit of comparatively large extent; and it constitutes a remarkable feature in the scenery immediately traversed by the Barrow, and a magnificent background of the landscapes on the Wexford side of the river. The summit of this hill formed, for a short period, one of the posts of the rebel force of 1798. See WEXFORD (COUNTY OF).

SLIEVE-CALLAN, a mountain $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Milltown-Malbay, and on the mutual border of the parishes of Inagh and Kilmurry, and of the baronies of Inchiquin and Ibrickane, co. Clare, Munster. Its summit has an altitude above sea-level of 1,282 feet; and overlooks a great expanse of bleak, moorish, and dreary country. So exceedingly gloomy is the region around it, that the mountain, in spite of its loftiness and its spreading base, affords but slender relief to the oppressive cheerlessness. On the sides of the mountain are some interesting Druidical remains, and a remarkable sepulchral stone,—the latter bearing an inscription in the ancient Ogham character; and past the base of the mountain runs the new road from Ennis to Milltown-Malbay.

SLIEVE-CAR, a mountain in the barony of Erris, nearly midway between Lough Conn and Blacksod bay, co. Mayo, Connaught. It has an altitude of 2,368 feet above sea-level; and forms the north-eastern termination of a semicircular sweep of mountains, about 18 miles in extent, enclosing a comparatively champaign sea-board, and terminating at the south-west in Slieve-More in the island of Achill.

SLIEVE-CARNA, a hill in the parish of Killeadan, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Kiltainagh, barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It has an altitude of 855 feet above sea-level; and though isolated from other hills, may be regarded as an advanced guard of the vast assemblage of mountains which divide the fertile plains of eastern Mayo from the dreary and moorish wilds of Erris.

SLIEVE-CORRAGH, a hill and a hamlet in the parish of Hollywood, barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The hill connects with Slieve-Gadoue, and in common with it, is skirted by the road from the village of Hollywood to Glendalough; and the hamlet stands on that road at the base of the hill, 1 mile south-east of Hollywood.

SLIEVE-CRADOE. See SLIEVE-GADOE.

SLIEVE-CROGHAN. See CROGHAN.

SLIEVE-CROOB, a mountain $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Ballinahinch, and on the mutual border of the parishes of Drumgooland and Dromara, and of the baronies of Kinelearty and Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is the central and chief summit of a group of hills, which often share with it the rather magniloquent name of the Slieve-Croob mountains; it attains an altitude above sea-level of 1,755 feet; it pours from its northern acclivities the sources of the river Lagan; and it commands an extensive and magnificent view of the rich and populous undulated country to the north and east, and of the picturesque and imposing declivities and summits of the Mourne mountains to the south.

SLIEVE-CURKAGH, a mountain at the northern extremity of the parish of Kilonan, the barony of Boyle and the county of Roscommon, Connaught. It overhangs the west shore of Lough Allen, screens the north side of the vale or glen of the Arigna river, lies within the coal district or great mineral field of Connaught, and, though lifting its summit to the altitude of only 1,068 feet above the level of the sea, forms a conspicuous and soaring feature or rather back-ground of most of the scenery in the northern parts of the county,—it and Brahlieve, on the south side of the glen of the Arigna, being the loftiest mountains in Roscommon. Slieve-Curkagh possesses much interest for the mineralogist and the metallurgist, and shares in the general importance of ARIGNA: which see.

SLIEVE-DAENE, a mountain $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Sligo, and on the mutual border of the parishes of Kilross and St. John's, and of the baronies of Tiraghroll and Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It screens the south-western part of the exquisitely beautiful Lough Gill, attains an altitude above sea-level of 900 feet, rises abruptly up from the edge of the water, consists of gneiss, and has a rugged outline, and considerable sternness of character.

SLIEVE-DONARD, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Kilkeel and Kilcoo, and of the baronies of Mourne and Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Its summit is the loftiest of the great Mourne group of mountains; it is situated 2 miles west of the nearest part of the Irish sea, and about the same distance south-west of the romantic village of Newcastle; has an altitude above sea-level of 2,796 feet; and consists of a beautifully outlined conical dome. The ascent of the mountain from base to summit is about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; the eastern escarpments form a most imposing alpine sea-wall to the Irish Channel; and the northern declivities sublimely bleud with the superb scenes of Tullamore-park, and the gorgeous landscape northward to Slieve-Croob. "From the northern brow of the mountain," says a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, "issues an exuberant fountain, which emits more than half-a-foot of water exceedingly rapid and pure. This stream, and many others, meet in their descent, and form a river, which running through a channel of white stone, by ten thousand different breaks and windings, makes in summer a prospect of waterfalls, cascades, jets-d'eau, ponds, &c., the most various and delightful; but in winter floods, the roar and impetuosity of this fall are terrible in the extreme. From the top down to the rocks hanging over the sea is one continued descent, and the lower parts, though craggy and rude enough, are covered with hazel, holly, &c., those next to the sea cliffs being old, bowed, stunted, and languishing; while it is worthy of notice, that those most remote though situated higher, are flourishing and healthy; and all this on the face of a mountain exposed to a wide, open, eastern sea. In the de-scant southward, near the bottom, one is forced to slide down a sort of thatch, composed of furze, long grass, and juniper. St. Donard, a disciple of St. Patrick, is said to have spent the life of a hermit on this mountain, and built a cell or oratory on the top of it towards the close of the fifth century." A deep narrow vale or glen divides Slieve-Donard from the Creeping mountain or SLIEVE-SNAVAN: which see. On July 25, the patron day of St. Donard or Domangart, the alleged disciple of St. Patrick, the Roman Catholics used to climb Slieve-Donard, in performance of penance and pilgrimage; and near the summit of the mountain are the remains of two rude edifices, the ground around which formed the central place of their superstitious devotions.

SLIEVE-FYAGH, a mountain in the parish of Kilcommon, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is situated 3½ miles east of Lough Carrowmore, and has an altitude of 1,000 feet above sea-level.

SLIEVE-GADDOE, or CHURCH-MOUNTAIN, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Hollywood and Donard, 2½ miles south by east of the village of Hollywood, barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It has an altitude of 1,701 feet above sea-level, and extends from the valley of the King's river to the glen of Innail. Its south side is verdant, but its north side is coated with shallow bog, of such quality as to be used for fuel by the neighbouring peasantry. "On the summit of this mountain," says Mr. Brewer, "is a rude work of stone, enclosing an area in which is a well, still frequented by pilgrims. The outworks, twelve feet in height in the most elevated part, approach towards an oval form, and consist of rough stones, the extreme length being 117 feet, and the width 101 feet. In the northern and widest part of the area, are some traces of the rude walls of an oblong building, said to have been designed for a church, the greatest length of which is thirty-six feet. In Gough's additions to Camden's Britannia, vol. iv., are a view and plan of this ancient work, together with the following remarks from the pen of the late Mr. Beaupré. 'Tradition asserts, that these stones were collected some time in the twelfth century to build a church, and to pave a way over this mountain from Old Kilcullen, in the county of Kildare, to Glendaloch; part of which road was executed from Glendaloch to Glendasann for some miles along the valley, and still remains perfect; but the work, on some account, was discontinued, and the materials for the church remain to this day in their pristine state.'

SLIEVE-GALLION, a mountain in the parish of Lissan, 3½ miles north-west of Moneymore, barony of Loughinsholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It attains an altitude above sea-level of 1,730 feet; and is both the commencement and the highest ground of the chain of heights which extends north by westward to the sea at Magilligan Point.

SLIEVE-GAMPH. See LUGGAN HILLS.

SLIEVE-GAULDRY, a prolonged or ridgy sandstone hill in the barony of Moydoo, co. Longford, Leinster. Its summit or highest ground is situated 1½ mile west-south-west of the town of Ardagh, and on the boundary between the parishes of Ardagh and Kilglass; and it possesses an altitude of 650 feet above the level of the sea, and commands an extensive view of the surrounding flat country, with its great sheets and expanses of marsh and bog.

SLIEVE-GIRKIN. See ARMAGH (COUNTY OF).

SLIEVE-GLAGH, or SLIEVE-GLAGOW, a mountain in the parish of Donn, barony of Upper Loughree, 3 miles south-east by south of Cavan, co. Cavan, Ulster. It has an altitude of 1,050 feet above sea-level, boasts a considerable extent of sylvan dress, is a conspicuous and pleasant feature in a series of landscapes, and challenges the special attention of a traveller upon the mail-road from Dublin to Enniskillen.

SLIEVE-GLORE, a mountain in the barony of Erris, 10 miles north-west by north of Newport-pratt, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is one of the Nephinbeg group, situated to the west of Nephinbeg proper; and has an altitude above sea-level of 937 feet.

SLIEVE-GOE, or SLIEVE-GUE, a Roman Catholic parish in the county of Waterford, and in the dio. of Waterford and Lismore, Munster. Its post-town is Dungarvan; and it has chapels at Pournema and Neir.

SLIEVE-GRIAN, an alias name of the elongated, broad-based, lumpish, ridgy mountain of Drum, in co. Waterford, Munster. See DRUM.

SLIEVE-GUE. See SLIEVE-GOE.

SLIEVE-GULLION, a magnificent mountain, 4½ miles south-west of Newry, and on the mutual border of the parishes of Forkhill and Killeevy, barony of Upper Orier, co. Armagh, Ulster. It consists principally of an enormous greenstone protrusion, and attains an altitude above sea-level of 1,833 feet. The ascent of it extends upwards of two miles from base to summit, and is in some parts very steep and even abrupt. "Before the main point is gained, another pinnacle, which very much resembles it, is presented to view; from hence, to the main point, is a range of elevated grounds in a circular direction, serving as a barrier to a small amphitheatre, within which is a lake of tolerably good water; its shore clearly proves that it is subject to swells of some feet in perpendicular height above the usual level. . . .

The pinnacle or capital point of Slieve-Gullion, is a cairn of stones, which form the roof of a cavern, that, at first view, appears to be natural, but, on minute examination, has very evident testimonies of the work of art; perhaps it is indebted to both for its appearance. The cairn is rather convex at top; in the centre is the mouth of the cavern; the roof is formed by large flat stones, regularly placed to support the incumbent weight, and in the descent lapped over each other with a sufficient bearing. I have been told that within is a spacious apartment, and that but a few years ago, it was easily entered; but there are now such huge blocks rolled in, and the entrance is so very narrow, that they could not be removed but by mechanic powers. From the mouth of the cave there extends a wide and regular range of flagging, to the edge of the lake, evidently the work of hands. . . . From the many invincible obstacles to its being ever reclaimed, Slieve-Gullion is only to be admired for its natural beauty; it covers a great and extensive area, and is the estate of several proprietors, though not a shilling of rent is paid for any part of it, being enjoyed in common by the peasants, who live in the vicinity. Perhaps a bolder prospect is not presented in our island than from its summit, comprising a great extent of country; the lakes and streams, the several towns and well-cultivated demesnes, together with the bay of Dundalk, where the declivity is terminated; these, with a thousand other natural beauties which are presented to view, will repay the fatigue of the ascent, and an awful and impressing pleasure is afforded in contemplating the bold promontories and rugged cliffs bared by the tempest, and arresting the floating meteors, affording ample resources for the contemplative philosopher."

SLIEVE-KIELTER, or THE SHORN MOUNTAIN. See SLIEVE-COILTIA.

SLIEVE-KIRK, a mountain, 4½ miles south by east of Londonderry, and on the mutual border of the baronies of Tyrkeeran and Strabane, and of the counties of Londonderry and Tyrone, Ulster. It is the loftiest of a closely-packed group of summits; and has an altitude of 1,225 feet above sea-level.

SLIEVE-LAUGHER. See SLIEVE-LOGHER.

SLIEVE-LEAGUE, a mountain on the south coast of the parish of Glencolumbkille, 2 miles north-west of Carrigan Head, and 8½ west of Killybegs, barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It soars steeply up from the edge of the sea to an altitude of 1,964 feet, and forms one of the most stupendous sea-cliffs in the British empire; yet it constitutes only the culminating point of a range of sublime and mural cliffs, 6 miles in length of sweep, and extending from Carrigan Head to Teelin Head, whose altitudes above sea-level are respectively 745 and 1,415 feet. "Some idea of the grandeur of this range," says Mr. Fraser, "may be formed, when it is stated that the termination at the southern end, Carrigan Head, from which point the ground rises for two miles and a half, to the summit of Slieve-League, is a strictly vertical or mural cliff, 765 feet high, or about 100 feet more than the cliffs of Moher. Slieve-League, like its great rival in Achil Island, is a precipitous rocky mountain, rising from the water at the same angle, namely, 45 degrees; it is, perhaps, the more striking of the two, and is a stupendous object. Before reaching the highest point a ridge must be crossed, called the One Man's Pass, which is a mere edge; the sloping to the sea on the one side is near 2,000 feet, at an angle which looks almost perpendicular; and on the other, down into a valley, at an inclination scarcely less steep. The view from the summit, of course, is most extensive."

SLIEVE-LOGH, a range of hills in the baronies of Stradhally and Ballyadams, Queen's co., Leinster. It extends southward from the immediate vicinity of the town of Stradhally, to a point about 3½ miles to the south; and its loftiest summit is in the parish of Timogue, and has an altitude above sea-level of 783 feet.

SLIEVE-LOGHER, an elongated congeries of broad-based or spreading mountains, on the mutual border of the baronies of Maguonihy and West Muskerri, and of the counties of Kerry and Cork, Munster. It extends south-westward from the glen of the Blackwater, in the vicinity of Mill-street, to the glen of the Ruaghty near the sources of the river Sullane; and it bears also the name of the Derrynasagart mountains; and is continued south-westward beyond the glen of the Ruaghty, by the Priest's Leap and the Cahra series of mountains. It is, in a general view, a great upland region of boggy moors; and it figures conspicuously in the official reports made 32 years ago upon the Bogs of Ireland. See section 'Bogs,' in our GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

SLIEVE-MAHANAGH, a hill in the parish of Aghagower, 5½ miles south by west of Westport, barony of Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It has an altitude of 785 feet above sea-level; and overhangs the road from Westport to Clifden.

SLIEVE-MAIN, a mountain in the parish of Lower Fahan, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated immediately south of Slieve-Snought, and 4 miles north-east by north of Bunrana; and has an altitude above sea-level of 1,557 feet.

SLIEVE-MARGIE, a barony in the extreme south-east of Queen's co., Leinster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by the barony of Ballyadams; on the east and south, by the county of Carlow; on the south-west, by the county of Kilkenny; and on the west, by the county of Kilkenny and the barony of Cullinagh. Its greatest length, south-eastward, is 8 miles; its greatest breadth, south-westward, is 6½; and its area is 35,490 acres, 2 roods, 25 perches,—of which 52 acres, 2 roods, 39 perches are in the river Barrow. The eastern district is a rich and beautiful portion of the valley of the Barrow, and the parallel vale of the rivulet Fishoge; but the middle and the western districts are a series of uplands, so fused into one another's bases as to make a tumulated tableau of from 500 to 830 feet of elevation above sea-level; yet the highest grounds on the western border are two heights of respectively 885 and 895 feet of altitude, and on the southern border is one of 1,102 feet of altitude. Most of the uplands are of the coal-formation, and have seams and beds of coal of such situation and thickness as to be profitably mined, and constitute an important part of the great coalfield of LEINSTER: which see. The Slieve-Margie coal-mines, however—in even the modern use of the name—extend 1½ mile into the adjoining barony of Ballyadams, including there the coal-pits of Mullaghmore; and they altogether range 5½ miles south-south-eastward, from Mullaghmore into the central districts of the barony of Slieve-Margie. The mines belong to various proprietors; and some are worked by the proprietors themselves,—some by the Irish Mining Company as lessees; and they were formerly mined in a very irregular and fitful manner, but are now worked upon an improved and comparatively judicious system. Slieve-Margie, in a use of the word which was common till quite a recent period, formerly included the adjoining upland and coal-formation district in the county of Kilkenny [See CASTLE-CORNER]; and, in this sense—as denoting the coal-field congeries of uplands rather than any specific political district—it is used in the following interesting extract from the Anthologia Hibernica, published in 1793: "These mountains, denominated Maraghagh or Marghie, are situated in the south of the Queen's county, and east of the county of Kilkenny, comprehending the ancient districts of Dunan, Clogh, Sean, Oghragh, Maraghagh, and Brenan. They are rather hills than mountains, having no great elevation; but from three distinct ridges, enclosing, in the northern extremities, a kind of plain considerably below the vertex of the hills, but much above the level parts of the adjacent countries. The northern ridge, called anciently the Shean Oghragh, seems to be composed of calcareous stone towards the vertex, on which is a moorish soil, producing rushes and turf. Somewhat lower, towards the south, the soil changes to a vegetable earth, fruitful in grass, meadow, and corn, intermixed with watery bog producing rushes, but no great quantity of good turf. On this part stood an ancient forest called Choille Oghragh, now no more, and distinguished only by its ruins. Between the site of this forest and the moory land called Carragh, appears a kind of slate stratum, indicating coals at no great depth; the coal stratum being actually found about 6 feet beneath the surface, running in the direction of the declivity of the hill, about 16 inches deep, but not of good quality. Beyond the site of the wood, the slates disappear, and the stratum of coal dips from 6 feet to 5 and 8 fathoms, and is in thickness from 12 to 20 inches, covered with the following strata, that is, soil, argillaceous earth, a kind of argillaceous rockstone, black slate, earth, &c. On entering the lands of Clogh and Doonan, the ground is fertile, and the coal dips to 20 or 28 fathom, being from 20 inches to 3½ feet in thickness, running in a direction nearly parallel to the horizon. Here, at about 12 fathom beneath the surface, is found a rock of whinstone, resting on a stratum of columnar basalts, perpendicular to the horizon. The columns are from 2 to 6 feet in length, the articulations from 3 to 2 inches, forming both convex and concave joints of an irregular pentagonal figure, whose sides, in different joints, are plain convex and concave. These columns, in several places, rest on a light grey ferruginous rock or whinstone on a slaty rock, beneath which is a vein of rich iron ore, parallel to the horizon, from 1 to 3 inches thick. Under the iron is a stratum of slate, and then the bed of coal. Beneath the bed of coal is a soft micaceous slate stratum, 10 or 12 fathom deep; and under that a hard rock through which no one has yet bored. The miners think that the great and principal bed of coal lies beneath this rock, at about 50 fathom from the surface. In the eastern ridge, called Brennan, run a number of rich copious iron mines. From the remains of various shafts, it is evident these mines have been wrought in some, perhaps, remote period, as no tradition is now remaining of their having ever been open. When wrought, it is probable the ore was not smelted on the spot, but removed to some distant part, as there are no remains of any furnace ever having been erected. From the quantity and quality of the ore, these mines seem to merit the attention of the mineralogist; and if the neighbouring turf and coal could not be charred to answer the purpose of smelting, a branch of the Grand Canal extends within six miles of the place, whereby an easy conveyance might be had, not only for the produce of the mines, but for such materials as would be necessary for their manufacture. On the eastern declivity of this ridge are a number of coal mines from 27 feet to 12 fathoms below the surface, and covered by argillaceous and yellow ferruginous rock, on a bed of black micaceous slate. In the southern ridge from Doonan no coals have yet been discovered, but on the western or Margie ridge, belonging to the lordship of Castlecomer, coals are found from 6 feet to 4 fathoms. From what has at present been discovered of these hills, they seem to be composed of moory soil, argillaceous earth, argillaceous and ferruginous stone-slate, basalts, iron-ore, and coals, in different strata at various depths, in irregular and broken masses; the whole resting on a hard rocky base, not improbably granite.—The barony of Slieve-Margie contains part of the parishes of Cloydagh, Killabin, and Rathaspeck, and the whole of the parishes of Killeslin, Shruel, and Sleaty. The only town is Graigue; and the chief villages are Arles, Ballickmoyler, and Sleaty-Graigue. Pop., in 1831, 15,804; in 1841, 17,014. Houses 2,920. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,108; in manufactures and trade, 676; in other pursuits, 300. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 64; on the directing of labour, 876; on their own manual labour, 2,088; on means not specified, 56. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,650; who could read but not write, 1,771; who could neither read nor write, 2,997. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,459; who could read but not write, 2,313; who could neither read nor write, 3,694.—Slieve-Margie barony lies wholly within the Poor-law union of Carlow. The total number of valued tenements is 1,926; and of these, 778 were valued under £5,—483, under £10,—206, under £15,—126, under £20,—66, under £25,—55, under £30,—50, under £40,—41, under £50,—and 121, at and above £50.

SLIEVE-MISH, a range of mountains in the baronies of Trughenackmy and Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It extends 13 miles due westward, from the valley of the Maine, in the western vicinity of Castle-Island, to the defile which is traversed by the road from Tralee to Dingle by way of Annascully; it has a mean breadth of about 3½ miles; it is separated only by the defile of the Tralee and Dingle road from the great congeries of alpine upland which occupies the greater part of central and western Corkaguiney; it is crossed, about 4½ miles from its east end, by the road from Tralee to Milltown; and it consists principally of the summits of Slieve-Mish proper, to the east of the Tralee and Milltown road,—Cahirconree, to the west of that road,—Bautregau, on the boundary between Trughenackmy and Corkaguiney,—and Ballyvaldar, within Corkaguiney, and immediately east of the Tralee and Dingle road. Bautregau is the loftiest of these summits, and has an altitude above sea-level of 2,796 feet. Both Bautregau and the summits to the east of it command noble views of the neighbouring valleys and marine expanses, and of the vast congeries of mountains situated to the south of Dingle bay.

SLIEVE-MISK, or SLIEVE-MISKISK, a chain of mountains in the south-western district of the barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. It forms the backbone, and fills the greater portion of the area of all the south-western part of the great peninsula which divides the bay of Bantry from the Kenmare estuary, and extends 13 miles north-eastward from the termination of that peninsula to the boundary-line with co. Kerry,—there to be continued north-eastward, in the upper part of the peninsula, by the Caha chain of mountains. Hungry Hill, the terminating mountain on the north-east, is the highest ground, and lifts its summit to the altitude of 2,249 feet above sea-level (see HUNGRY HILL); and the other principal summits are Knockahog, Dumbnee, Caule, Knockoura, and Loughanmore.

SLIEVE-MORE, a mountain in the parish of Upper Badoney, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It is situated 6 miles east-north-east of Newtown-Stewart; it screens part of Glenelly on the north and part of the glen of the Munterlony river on the south; it forms a picturesque portion of the highlands of the north-western district of the county; and it attains an altitude above sea-level of 1,262 feet.

SLIEVE-MORE, a mountain on the mutual boundary of the parishes of Kilkeel and Kilcoo, and of the baronies of Mourne and Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated on the northern frontier of the great Mourne group of mountains, between Slieve-Donard and Slieve-Beg, 2 miles west-south-west of Newcastle; and it lifts its summit to the altitude of 2,443 feet above the level of the sea.

SLIEVE-MORE, a mountain on the north coast of the island of Achill, 7 miles east-north-east of Achill Head, barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It overhangs the village of Doogort on the east, stoops precipitously down to the sea on the north, attains an altitude of 2,217 feet above sea-level, contributes a grand and imposing feature to the sublime scenery of Achill and its vicinity, and constitutes the south-eastern termination of the great semicircular sweep of mountains which encloses the plains around Tullaghan bay.

SLIEVE-MORE, a hill in the parish of Kilmore-Erris, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is the highest ground in the double peninsula of the Mullet, has an altitude of 439 feet above sea-level, and is situated midway between Erris Head and the village of Belmullet.

SLIEVE-MORE, a hamlet in the island of Achill, barony of Burrishoole, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is situated at the south base of Slieve-More mountain, 2 miles north of Keel, and 3 south-west of Doogort.

SLIEVE-MUCK, a mountain on the mutual border of the baronies of Mourne and Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It is one of the Mourne mountains, has an altitude of 2,108 feet above sea-level, and is situated 2 miles west of Slieve-Bingian, and 5½ in a straight line south-west of Newcastle.

SLIEVE-NA-AURA, a beautiful and majestic mountain to the south of Knockade, co. Antrim, Ulster. Its name is also, and in a more modern form, written SLIEVE-AN-IERIN: which see. "It was here," says the author of the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "that the MacDonnells and MacQuillans fought the decisive battle, which established the title of the one, more powerfully than the laws could then have done, and the total extinction of the splendour of the other. About the middle of the 15th century, the famous battle of Aura was fought, between Sorley Boy of Dunluce, and the M^cQuillans, in which many of the latter were slain, and their army totally routed. This defeat was the result both of bravery and artifice combined. Sorley Boy resolved to procure, by stratagem, what he feared the alliance of the O'Neills with the MacQuillans might prevent courage alone from accomplishing; and, observing a dangerous bog between the enemy and himself, he caused a number of rushes to be cut in the night-time, and strewn over the surface of the bog, to form a safe path across: in the morning sending a party to the brave O'Neills; in their very camp their fiery chief immediately ordered out his cavalry; but the challengers, with real Parthian courage, now fled towards their own camp, by the rush-path they had laid, while O'Neill's cavalry pursuing, were ingulfed in the treacherous road. In attempting to retreat, O'Neill and his followers were cut off by Hugh MacIlveal, to whom the unhappy chieftain offered as a ransom all the young horses and all the fair damsels of Claneboy. 'Sir,' said MacIlveal, 'if all the horses in Ireland were Sorley Boy's, I would rather go on foot;' and straightway clove his helmet in two. Near the summit of Aura mountain two cairns are pointed out, as the burying-place of O'Neill and one of his followers. After the battle of Aura, Sorley Boy withdrew to the vicinity of Trostan, a lofty and conspicuous mountain over Cushendall, where he was entertained by Macaulay, lord of the glens, and where a cairn was erected to commemorate the place of festivity. 'After this conflict,' says the manuscript, 'MacQuillan leaped across the river Devnog, and so left the rout for ever.' Sorley Boy enjoyed it for 11 years, and dying, was buried at Bona-Margy. In one of the feigned retreats made by Sorley Boy to deceive O'Neill, the party was retarded by the inactivity of an officer named Dool-Oge, many years a follower of the MacDonalds. Upon being chid for loitering by Sorley Boy, he replied, 'Sir, it is impossible for me to run with you, and with your father before you.' The immense estates, the right to which had here been decided by force of arms as belonging to the MacDonalds, were shortly after about to be contended for by two brothers of the same family, Randall and Eneas, but this dispute was terminated by the aid of superstition, whose reign evidently was not yet extinct, as the following fact evinces:—When the two armies were drawn out, and ready to engage, O'Dornan, the clerk of St. Patrick, stepping in between, and ringing a bell, denounced the curse of the great patron saint of Ireland upon the unjust claimant. The effect was immediate; the brothers became reconciled, and the right of primogeniture acknowledged."

SLIEVE-NA-CALLEAGH, a ridgy hill, partly in the barony of Upper Kells, but chiefly in that of Demifore, co. Meath, Leinster. It extends 2½ miles eastward from the east side of the superb demesne of Loughcrew; and lifts its highest ground to the altitude of 904 feet above the level of the sea.

SLIEVE-NA-GLOGH, a mountain in the barony of Lower Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Its summit is a principal eastern frontier height of the Carlingford mountains, has an altitude of 1,024 feet above the level of the sea, and is situated 1½ mile north-west of the shore of Dundalk bay, and 2½ miles west-south-west of the town of Carlingford.

SLIEVE-NA-GLORY, a mountain in the barony of Mourne, co. Down, Ulster. Its summit is one of the central heights of the great Mourne group of mountains, has an altitude of 1,450 feet above the level of the sea, and is situated 1½ mile south-west of the summit of Slieve-Bingan.

SLIEVE-NA-GRIDDLE, a hill in the parish of Ballee, barony of Lecale, 2½ miles east-north-east of Downpatrick, co. Down, Ulster. Though possessing a summit-altitude of only 414 feet above sea-level, it forms a conspicuous and pleasant feature in a broad sea-board of low country, and commands a charming panoramic view, including the town and environs of Downpatrick on the west, the waters, islands, and shores of Lough Strangford on the north, the shores of the Irish sea on the east, and the grand and diversified perspective of the Mourne mountains on the south. At its south base are the notorious holy wells of STRUEL [which see]; on its south side is a Druidical ring; and on its summit is a cromlech, shaped like a griddle, giving to the hill its name of Slieve-Na-Griddle, and noticed as follows by the author of the Chorographical Description of Down:—"It is composed of a huge, flat, unhewn rock, of the lapis molaris or grit kind, interspersed with a mixture of red and white flint, in shape something like a lozenge in heraldry, or a diamond on the cards, 11 feet 2 inches long from point to point, 8½ feet broad in the greatest dimension, and 1½ foot thick in most places, though in some not more than a foot. It is raised on two rude supporters of the same kind of stone, placed edgewise, one of which is 8 feet long, 3 feet broad, and 1 foot thick; the other is not above 3 feet long, and seems to be a natural rock, standing in its original position, but by the advantage of the ground, the upper or table-stone stands pretty near on a level, though with a small inclination. The cavity underneath is such, that a middle-sized man, by stooping a little, can pass through it, and the stratum upon which the supporting stone stands is a solid rock."

SLIEVE-NA-KELLA, a mountain on the mutual border of co. Cavan, Ulster, and co. Leitrim, Connaught. Its summit is situated 3½ miles south-south-west of the source of the river Shannon, and at the junction-point of the parishes of Templeport and Killenagh, in the barony of Tullaghagh; and has an altitude of 1,793 feet above the level of the sea.

SLIEVE-NA-MAN, a mountain in the parish of Kilcoo, barony of Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Its summit is situated 4 miles west of Newcastle, and has an altitude above sea-level of 1,035 feet. The mountain groups with the great Mourne congeries, yet is rather an advanced outpost than an integral portion, being separated from the northern frontier heights by the glen of the romantic rivulet which falls into the sea at Newcastle.

SLIEVE-NA-MAN, a magnificent mountain in the mutual border of the baronies of Middlethird, and East Iffa and Offa, and at the meeting-point of the parishes of Clonene, Garrongibbon, Kilcask, and Temple-Etna, co. Tipperary, Munster. Its summit has an altitude of 2,364 feet above sea-level, and is situated 5½ miles east-south-east of Fethard, 6½ north-east of Clonmel, and 7 north-west of Carrick-on-Suir. The mountain soars almost sheer up from the rich expanse of the low and level 'Golden Vale,' on the north-west, the south, and the east; but is prolonged 1½ mile westward, and 3½ north-eastward by spurs and offsets, which very frequently share in its name. The principal summits of the western offset are Carrickabrock and another height, respectively 1,850 and 1,589 feet in altitude; and the principal summits of the north-eastern off-set are Knockanagh and two other heights, respectively 1,654, 1,088, and 852 feet in altitude. But, except for its being connected through the north-eastern off-set with the Booley mountains, or hills, in the county of Kilkenny, Slieve-na-Man, even when understood to mean the whole group, rises on all sides precipitously and stupendously up from the plain, and, in consequence, presents to spectators both near and at a distance, and all round a great periphery of country, a sublime and most impressive appearance. Its loftiest summit, or that of Slieve-na-Man proper, too, is a beautifully outlined dome, and commands one of the richest, most varied, and most extensive panoramic views in Ireland. The mail-road from Dublin to Cork, by way of Clonmel, passes along the eastern bases of the whole group, or rather across the table-land of connection between it and the Booley-hills; and is overhung by lofty and precipitous acclivities, by steep cultivated ascents, and by a series of varied and picturesque escarpments,—on one of which the noble Ormonde's old military keep of Kilcash-castle still makes a curious and conspicuous figure. "From Fethard, and the country around," says Mr. Fraser, "the neighbouring mountain of Slievenaman is a great object; its sides are here more precipitous than on the south and east, and the plain from which it springs, by its lonely character, serves to augment the general effect. This mountain, however, is seen in its best points of view from the demesnes of Grove and Kiltinan, with the plantations of these places in the foreground." "This mountain," say Mr. and Mrs. Hall, "may be emphatically termed an Ossianic locality, being associated in tradition with the deeds of that celebrated bard and his father, Fin Mac-Comhal (Cual), the Fingal of MacPherson. Until a very recent period, many of the poems of Ossian (in Irish Oisín) were repeated by several of the inhabitants, and some of them have been, which possess considerable merit, particularly in the pleasing descriptions which they give of rural scenery. Slieve-na-man is called in Irish 'Sliaibh-na-mban, Fionn-na-Heirin,' i. e., 'the mountain of the fair women of Ireland,' for which appellation tradition assigns the following whimsical origin. Fin Mac-Cual wishing to take a wife, and being puzzled whom to choose among the fair daughters of his land, caused all the beautiful women of Ireland to assemble at the foot of this mountain, declaring that whoever first reached the summit should be his bride. Fin then proceeded to the top of the mountain, and having taken his seat on the Druid's Altar that crowns it, made a signal to the group of anxious fair ones that waited his signal below. Away, away, they went, through wood, and heath, and furze, over crag, mountain, and stream; all obstacles appeared nought with such a prize in view. But only one was designed to win. Grainne, the daughter of Cormac, monarch of Ireland, arriving first at the summit, claimed the hand of the Fenian chief, to whom she was accordingly united. Such is the romantic origin of the name of this mountain. Slieve-na-Man is also celebrated in tradition as having been the scene of the most celebrated hunting-match of the Fenians, the best description of which is contained in an ancient poem in the possession of Mr. Wright, ascribed to Ossian, and taken from a collection made in the neighbourhood of the very mountain referred to in it."

SLIEVE-NA-MOW, a mountain in the barony of South Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Its summit has an altitude of 1,478 feet above the level of the sea, and is situated $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Rathangan, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ south by east of Lugnaquilla.

SLIEVE-NA-MUCK, a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Bruiis and Clonbeg, barony of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. Its summit is situated $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of the town of Tipperary, and has an altitude of 1,215 feet above the level of the sea; yet it is only the loftiest ground of an upland range, which is sometimes called the Slieve-na-Muck hills, and sometimes the Hills of Tipperary. This range has a mean breadth of about 1½ mile; extends 6 miles east-north-eastward; screens the north side of the beautiful vale of Aberlow; flanks the south side of the portion of the Golden Vale which lies immediately west of Tipperary; and though variable in character and loftiness, possesses enough of both of these properties to give distinctness and strength to the landscapes with which it mingles. The loftiest summit of the range, next to Slieve-na-Muck proper, is Moanour, and has an altitude above sea-level of 1,103 feet.

SLIEVE-O'FLYN, a hill in the parish of Kiltulagh, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Castlereagh, barony of Castlereagh, co. Roscommon, Connaught. At its north base is Caslieve-lodge, the seat of Mr. Willis; and a little to the west are Lough O'Flynn and the village of Ballinlough. The summit of the hill has an altitude above sea-level of only 497 feet, yet commands an extensive view of the circumjacent plain.

SLIEVE-PARTRY, a short range of mountains in the baronies of Curra, Burrischoole, and Morisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It extends 6½ miles north-north-eastward, has a breadth of about 4 miles, flanks the west side of the upper part of Lough Mask, contains the head of the glen of the Ayle river, forms a frontier or outpost to the vast and alpine mountain systems of Morisk and Joyce-Country, presents a noble and imposing perspective to the plains of Mayo and Ellistrit, and commands superb views of part of Lough Corrib, the whole of Loughs Mask and Curra, and so far expanding a region of chequered yet prevalently beautiful lowlands, to the east, that the eye follows them into a blending with the horizon. The two chief summits of the Slieve-Partry mountains are Toneyvall and Slieve-Bohann, whose altitudes above sea-level are respectively 1,270 and 1,204 feet.

SLIEVE-PHELIM, a range of mountains in the barony of Ownenbeg, co. Limerick, Munster. It occupies a large proportion of the barony; extends about 10 miles eastward, with a mean breadth of about 3; is separated only by a narrow defile, or the boundary-line of the county, from the magnificent Keeper mountains in the county of Tipperary; is nearly connected also with the mountains of Kilmennagh on the east; has a beautiful outline, and finely featured contour; and forms a charming background to the rich landscapes of the northern campaign country of Limerick. About 2 miles from the village of Cappaghmore, on an elevated site among the acclivities of the range, is Bilboa, the lodge of the Earl of Stradbroke, the proprietor of a large tract of the mountains,—which, therefore, is often called the Bilboa mountains. A new road from Thurles to Tipperary, passes along the base of the east end of the Slieve-Phelim range.

SLIEVE-REAGH, a mountain in the barony of Coshlea, 6½ miles east-south-east of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. It is one of the terminating heights, or further offsets, at the west end of the Galtee range of mountains.

SLIEVE-ROE, a mountain 1½ mile west of Blessington, and on the mutual border of the barony of North Naas, co. Kildare, and the barony of Lower Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is fused on the north into the lofty hill of Coreen, and on the south into a ridge of high and finely outlined undulating grounds; and its summit has an altitude of 1,093 feet above the level of the sea, and commands a map-like view of the plains of Kildare, spreading away westward from its base.

SLIEVE-RUAGH, or CARNACROW, a bog of two denominations in the parish of Killursa, 3½ miles west of Headfort, barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies at the north-western extremity of the eastern division of the county, and is washed by Lough Corrib on the west, and the Black River on the north. It is a firm brown bog, greatly indented and intersected by headlands and eskers of excellent limestone gravel; and it has a good declination for drainage, toward both the lake and the river. Its area is 1,659 acres; and the estimated cost of reclaiming it is £2,048. The hill or rising ground of Slieve-Ruagh is nearly in the centre of the bog.

SLIEVE-RUAGH, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ossory, and on the southern border of co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Its post-town is Waterford; and it has chapels at Slieve-Ruagh, Glenmore, and Slip.

SLIEVE-RUSSELL. See LIGAVEGRA.

SLIEVE-SNAUGHT (EAST), a mountain on the mutual border of the parishes of Donagh and Lower Fahan, 5½ miles north-east of Buncrana, barony of Inishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. Its summit is the central and loftiest height of the congeries of uplands which occupy a large proportion of the barony; and it has an altitude above sea-level of 2,019 feet, and commands an interesting view of the interior of the barony, and of the marine waters by which it is peninsulated.

SLIEVE-SNAUGHT (WEST), a mountain on the mutual border of the baronies of Boylagh and Kilmacrean, 8 miles east of Dungloe, co. Donegal, Ulster. Its sides present rocky cliffs, bold acclivities, picturesque dells, and other elements of magnificent scenery; and its summit has an altitude of 2,232 feet above the level of the sea; and jointly with those of Doohish and Crockettartoe, whose altitudes are 2,103 and 1,627 feet, it overhangs the north side of the most interesting part of Glendowan.

SLIEVE-SNAVAN, or THE CREEPING MOUNTAIN, one of the Mourne mountains, immediately adjacent to Slieve-Donard, co. Down, Ulster. "A deep and narrow vale," says the author of the Chorographical Description of Down, "divides Slieve-Donard from Slieve-Snavan, or the Creeping Mountain, so called because it must be climbed in a creeping posture; and through this vale winds a pretty serpentine stream, which discharges itself into the sea to the eastward of the mountains. The Creeping Mountain stands to the south-west of this stream, and presents to the view a huge rock, resembling, at a distance, an old fortification, very high, overhanging, and detached, as it were, from the eastern side of the mountain. After rain, a stream rushes from the west side of the rock, which, shooting from the top, falls in a large cascade; to the east of which is a vast natural cave, affording an entrance as wide as the cave itself. This frightful chamber is lined with fern, grass, and several other mountain plants, and inhabited by a vast number of hawks, jackdaws, owls, &c.; and at the further end of it the light breaks in through natural crevices. To the left of this, you climb up through a very narrow passage to the top of the rock, and arrive at one of the most beautiful, most magnificent, and romantic spots that can well be conceived. You there find that the rock mentioned is only the advanced part of a large shelf which projects at about half the height of the mountain with a sweep, and leaves the space of about two acres on the top; round the north-west, the west, and the south of this area, the mountain rises to a great height, and stands like a vast wall. The area itself is almost round, and slopes gently from all sides towards the middle, where is formed a beautiful circular lake, as clear as crystal. As the soil of this spot seems tolerably good, if nature were a little helped, and it were cut into circular terraces and slopes, and embellished with flowers, it would make, for so much, perhaps one of the most grand and beautiful improvements in the world; from whence you have in full view many majestic objects, as well as natural beauties of woods, cascades, green slopes, and huge rocks, seeming ready to tumble. To the west, you see the rocky top of Slieve-Bingian, to the east Slieve-Donard's stately cone, and in front the ocean, the Isle of Man, and in a clear day the shores of England, and a part of the south of Scotland."

SLIEVE-THOUL, or SAGGART-HILL, a mountain on the southern border of the parish of Rathcoole, barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. Its summit has an altitude of 1,308 feet above sea-level, and is situated in the immediate vicinity of the junction point of the counties of Dublin, Wicklow, and Kildare. The mountain screens the west side of the picturesque vale of Glen-Saggart, and unites with the lower hills of Coreen and Slieve-Roe, to the south, in separating the upper valley or mountain-course of the Liffey from the great plain of Kildare.

SLIEVE-TRUE, a mountain-summit, 3½ miles west-north-west of the town of Carrickfergus, and on the western margin of the parish and liberties of Carrickfergus, co. Antrim, Ulster. It has an altitude above sea-level of 1,025 feet, and is the highest ground of the upland range which extends along the frontier of Carrickfergus liberties. The view from this summit is remarkably fine, and includes the whole expanse and shores of Belfast Lough, a large tract of the interior of co. Antrim, a part of Lough Neagh, several hills in the counties of Tyrone and Londonderry, and some lofty grounds in Scotland and the Isle of Man.

SLIEVE-TURK, a mountain in the barony of Burrischoole, 5½ miles north-north-west of Newport-pratt, co. Mayo, Connaught. Its summit has an altitude of 1,322 feet above the level of the sea.

SLIGO,

A maritime county in the north of the province of Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, by the Atlantic ocean and the bay of Donegal; on the east, by the county of Leitrim; on the south-east, by the county of Roscommon; on the south, by the counties of Roscommon and Mayo; on the south-west, by the county of Mayo; and on the west, by the county of Mayo and the bay of Killalla. Its outline is exceedingly irregular; and is deeply indented by the sea on the north, and by intersections of the contiguous counties on the south-east, the south, and the south-west. The north-western district, consisting of the barony of Carbery, is almost wholly projected beyond the rest of the county, between Donegal bay and co. Leitrim; and the extreme southern district, consisting of the barony of Coolavin, is also almost wholly projected beyond the remainder of the county, between co. Mayo, and co. Roscommon. The Duff or Bnroes rivulet traces the eastern boundary over a few miles to Donegal bay; and the river Moy traces the western boundary from a point 2½ miles above Ballina to the head of Killalla bay; but the rest of the landward boundaries, though partially consisting, at fitful intervals, of lakes and streams and water-sheds, are, in a general view, capriciously artificial. The greatest length of the county, southward from Mullaghmore Head and along a line near the eastern boundary, is 39 miles; and its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 36½; but the distance southward, along a line commencing 1½ mile from the east side of the entrance of Killalla bay, is only 7½ miles; the distance south-south-eastward, from the mouth of the Bellawaddy rivulet near the head of Killalla bay, is 3½ miles; the distance eastward from the head of Killalla bay is 24 miles; and the distance eastward across the narrowest parts of the projecting districts of Carbery and Coolavin is respectively 2 miles and 3½ miles. The area of the county comprises 290,696 acres of arable land, 151,723 of uncultivated land, 6,134 of plantations, 460 of towns, and 12,740 of water,—in all, 461,753 acres.

Coast.—The coast of Killalla bay trends north-eastward; is but slightly diversified with tiny headlands and coves; has two coast-guard stations, the harbour of Pollacheeny, and the Points Cloghagh, Lackacurry, Rathlee, and Kinnastragh; and terminates in the headland or small cape of Lenadoon. The coast of the Atlantic, or of the wide and westward part of Donegal bay from Lenadoon Head to Coanmore Point, trends eastward; measures 4 miles in a straight line; and is feebly diversified with the bay of Coanmore, the mouths of the rivulets Finned, Ballybeg, and Easkey, and the little headlands of Carrowmush, Carrickadda, and Pollnagat. The coast from Coanmore Point to Pollbrian coast-guard station, trends south-eastward; measures 4 miles in a straight line; and is slightly diversified with the mouth of the Dunneill rivulet, and the tiny headlands of Carranabinnia, Lackaverna, and Donagh. The coast from Pollbrian coast-guard station to Aughris Head, trends north-eastward, measures 2½ miles, and is nearly a straight line. The coasts from Aughris Head, eastward to the town of Sligo, northward from the town of Sligo to the hamlet of Drumliff, and westward from the hamlet of Drumliff to the headland of Roskeeragh, belong to the exterior expanse and the three interior ramifications of Sligo bay, and will be noticed in our next article. A straight line from Aughris Head to Roskeeragh Point, across the entrance of Sligo bay, measures 4½ miles, and extends in the direction of north-east by north. The coast from Roskeeragh Point to Mullaghmore Head, trends north-eastward, measures 8½ miles, and is diversified with the little marine sweep of Milk-Haven, the strands of Trawanavogge, and Trawatua, and the tiny headlands of Lackmeeltaun, Rinnadoolish, Streedagh, and North Roskeeragh. The coast from Mullaghmore Head to the mouth of the Duff or Bunroos rivulet, makes a semi-circular sweep, with a chord extending east-south-eastward, and measuring 24 miles. The shore may, in a general view, be described as a strand at the head of Killalla bay,—a line of bluff rock all the way from the mouth of the Bellawaddy rivulet down the bay of Killalla, and eastward to Aughris Head,—and a series of strands and drifted sands, diversified in two places with bluff rock, from Roskeeragh Point to the mouth of the Duff rivulet. The islands, islets, and skerries, exclusive of those within the ramifications or three interior sweeps of Sligo bay, are Clashnagall islet, off the east side of Aughris Head; Innisulclohy or Coney Island, across the mouth of the middle ramification of Sligo bay; the islets of Maguin and Killaspug, south-west of Coney Island; Black rock islet, near the head of the outer expanse of Sligo bay; Bird's rock and Carricknarinagh or Wheat rock, on the north side of the outer expanse of Sligo bay; the islets and rocks of Seal, Ardboline, Portanagh, and Horse, at the north side of the entrance of the outer expanse of Sligo bay; Innismurray—an inhabited island of unique and curious character, as to its social condition—3 miles north-west of Streedagh Point; the islets of Bomore and Shaddan, 1½ mile north of Innismurray; the islands of Dernish and Connors, and the islets of Carricknaneane, Taghuashallog, Innisnagor, Carricknaspane, Carrickfadda, and Beltra, close to the shore, and in some instances almost confounded with the strands, between the headlands of Streedagh and Mullochmore; and the islets of Dunlevy's and Hugh's, immediately north of Mullaghmore Head.

Surface.—The district, situated north of a line drawn eastward through the town of Sligo, measures 11 miles in length northward, and from 1½ mile to 9½ miles in breadth; and, in a general view, it consists of a narrow belt of beautiful low country across the south, a sinuous belt of sandhills and poor ground along the western shore, a district of very various breadth and character within the preceding belt, a small tumulated district terminating in Mullaghmore cape, 200 feet high, in the north, and a stupendous, romantic, and most picturesque bulwark of hills and mountains, arranged along the east, and connected with the congeries of mountains which fills a great proportion of northern Leitrim and Fermanagh. The principal summits in this section, together with their respective altitudes above sea-level, are Truskmore, 2,072 feet, on the boundary, 7 miles north-east by north of Sligo,—Gullogenboy, 1,430 feet, on the boundary, 4½ miles east-north-east of Sligo,—King's mountain, 1,527 feet, in the interior, 4½ miles north-north-west of Sligo,—and Benbulbin, 1,722 feet, in the interior, 5 miles north by west of Sligo. These summits soar steeply up from the low country at their base; and not only form a magnificent background to the scenery of Sligo bay, but combine in a general landscape with the hills and mountains around Lough Gill to render Sligo one of the most superbly situated towns in the three kingdoms. The isolated mountain, Knocknave, situated on the tongue of the peninsula between the central and the southern ramifications of Sligo bay, lifts its summit to the altitude of 1,078 feet above sea-level, at a point 3½ miles west of the town of Sligo; and Slieve-Daeane and Sliah mountains, situated on the south shore of Lough Gill, lift their summits to the altitudes of 900 and 967 feet, at points 2½ miles south-south-east and 3½ miles south-east of the town of Sligo; and these three mountains, as well as those to the north of the town, combine, in an exquisite manner, with the intermediate sheets of both fresh and marine water, with the intricate shore-line, with the beautiful enclosed plain or valley, and with the urban scenery of the town's own architecture and immediate environs. A great and compact range of uplands, called the Ox mountains, commences in the south-western vicinity of the village of Ballysadere, or 3½ miles south-west of Slieve-Daeane, and extends west-south-westward, with a mean breadth of about 5½ miles, quite across the county to the boundary with Mayo, there to be continued, under the name of the Lurgan hills or the Slieve-Gamph mountains, to the vicinity of the town of Foxford. The principal summits are a height of 651 feet, 1½ mile south-west of Ballysadere; a height of 903 feet, 5½ miles west-south-west of Ballysadere; a height of 654 feet, 6 miles west of Ballysadere; Carrowmurry, 1,238 feet of altitude, 8½ miles south-west of Ballysadere; Knockarongy, 1,778 feet of altitude, 4½ miles south-east of Dromore-West; a height of 1,516 feet, 1½ mile west-north-west of Carrowmurry; a height of 1,604 feet, 1½ mile west-south-west of Knockalony; Long Hill, 811 feet of altitude, 5½ miles south-south-east of Dromore-West; a height of 1,078 feet, 3 miles west by south of Long Hill; Knocknashee, 453 feet of altitude, 4½ miles north by east of Tobercurry; a height of 1,404 feet, 5½ miles north-north-west of Tobercurry; Millan, 1,446 feet of altitude, 5½ miles north-west by north of Tobercurry; Serebo, 1,208 feet of altitude, 4½ miles north-west of Tobercurry; Sessugarry, 1,047 feet of altitude, 4 miles west-north-west of Tobercurry; Knocknashegaun, 1,168 feet of altitude, 3½ miles west of Sessugarry; Knockwarda, 1,338 feet of altitude, on the boundary with co. Mayo, 3½ miles west-south-west of Millan; and a height of 1,321 feet, on the boundary with co. Mayo, 3 miles south-south-west of Knockwarda. The whole range possesses, in a general view, a moorish, bleak, and hoyden character, and is sufficiently broad-backed, or at least sufficiently slow in the higher parts of the southern declivities, to spread out to the clouds a comparatively great expanse of cold and lofty tableland, fit only for the most ordinary purposes of poor and coarse pasture. The northern face, however, is topped by a series of horned or acuminated peaks, exhibits many rocky and otherwise bold escarpments, descends with comparatively rapid gradient to the base, is furrowed by various well-defined, though not deep ravines, and forms a rather grand, yet too near and too monotonous background to the scenery on the south side of the western or wide part of the bay of Donegal. The district, which lies between the Ox mountains and either the sea on the north, Killalla bay on the north-west, or the river Moy on the west, varies in breadth from about 2 to 5½ miles; and though somewhat diversified in outline, and beautified with a few gems of scenery both natural and artificial, it prevalently displays a champaign surface, destitute of character, impoverished in dress, and encumbered with broad and heavy drawbacks upon good landscape. The western part of the district on the south side of the Ox mountains increases in breadth eastward from a mere point to about 5 miles, and consists principally of the upper part of the vale of the Moy; and the eastern part of that district increases in breadth eastward from about 5 to 15½ miles,—the latter distance being measured from the village of Ballysadere up the valley of the Uncion, to the southern extremity of the barony of Coolavin,—and consists of a series of vales and tumulated grounds, the west side of the basin of the Uncion, a considerable portion of the west side of the basin of Lough Gara, and the whole of the heights which form the west screen or flank of Loughs Gara and Arrow, and the river Uncion. Though almost the whole eastern frontier of this district, or the band of country along the lakes and the Uncion, is enriched with a tolerably fair amount of second-rate scenery; yet the district, as a whole, even in spite of the great extent of its area, and the profuse diversity of its surface, is exceedingly cold and cheerless. The principal of the numerous hills which diversify it are a height of 717 feet, 2 miles north-east of Tobercurry; a height of 306 feet, 3½ miles south-south-west of Ballymote; a height of 334 feet, 3 miles south-south-east of Ballymote; Keshcorran, 1,163 feet of altitude, on the west flank of the Uncion, and 2½ miles south-east of Ballymote; Carrowkeel, 1,062 feet of altitude, on the west flank of the Uncion, and 2½ miles east-south-east of Keshcorran; a summit of the Curlew mountains, 863 feet of altitude, on the boundary with co. Roscommon, and 4 miles south by west of Carrowkeel; and Dooin, 574 feet of altitude, 4 miles north-west of Lough Gara, and 7 south-south-west of Ballymote. The south-eastern district of the county, or that lying to the east of the river Uncion, and the south of the Lough Gill hills, is of comparatively small extent, and aggregately bleak or moorish character; and it is occupied, over a large proportion of its area, by the main part of the Brehive mountains, which are connected with the mountains of the Arigna mineral field in co. Roscommon, and whose principal summits belonging to co. Sligo are Slieve-Curkagh, 1,098 feet of altitude, on the boundary with co. Roscommon,—Carrow, 1,396 feet of altitude, 4½ miles north-north-west of Slieve-Curkagh,—Dromore, 650 feet of altitude, 4 miles south-west by south of Carrow,—and Mulrath, 740 feet of altitude, 1½ mile west-north-west of Dromore.

Waters.—The three large lakes of Gill, Arrow, and Gara, though all lying partly in other counties, belong principally to Sligo, and make large contributions to the beauty of its interior. Lough Gill has a surface-elevation of 20 feet above sea-level, and lies partly in co. Leitrim, but chiefly in the Sligo baronies of Carbery and Tiraghrill; Lough Arrow has a surface-elevation of 102 feet above sea-level, and lies partly in co. Roscommon, but chiefly in the Sligo barony of Tiraghrill; and Lough Gara has a surface-elevation of 222 feet above sea-level, and lies partly in the counties of Roscommon and Mayo, but chiefly in the Sligo barony of Coolavin. Loughs Glencar and Skean lie also on the boundaries; the former with Leitrim north of Lough Gill, and the latter with Roscommon east of Lough Arrow; and they have surface-elevations above sea-level of respectively 97 and 164 feet. The principal lakes in the interior, together with the elevation of some above sea level, are Easkey, 607 feet, among the Ox mountains, in the barony of Leney; Talt, 455 feet, among the Ox mountains, in the barony of Leney; Templehouse, 386 feet, in the course of the Owenmore, in the baronies of Leney and Corran; Cloonacbeigha, a little south of Lough Templehouse, and in the barony of Corran; Tobercanavan, in the barony of Tiraghrill; Ballygawley, between Ballysadere and Slieve-Daeane, in the barony of Tiraghrill; and Coolgagh, a little north of Lough Gill, and in the barony of Carbery. The Moy, the principal river of the west, rises in the interior among the Ox mountains, drains the western district to the south of these mountains, passes away for a long distance into co. Mayo, and returns to trace the boundary-line with that county from a point 2½ miles above Ballina or Ardarae, to the head of Killalla bay. The principal tributaries of the Moy within co. Sligo, are the Mad river, the Owenaber, the Mullaghanoë, and the Bunree. The principal rivulets which run from the northern declivities to Killalla bay, are the Bellawaddy and the Leafanny, and, to the ocean, are the Finnid, the Ballybeg, the Easkey, and the Dunneill. The Uncion, the next river of note after the Moy, issues from Lough Arrow, runs northward to the head of the southern ramification of Sligo bay, drains a very large proportional district of the county, and contributes some highly romantic features of scenery in the vicinity of Ballysadere. The Owenmore, the chief tributary of the Uncion, runs in a course to the west of that river, is nearly equal to it in every element of importance, and does not effect a confluence with it till a point about 2 miles above the commencement of their united expansion into estuary. The Arigna river, famous in the history of modern mining operations, and distinguished as one of the earliest important tributaries of the Shannon, drains the south-eastern or Brehive district. The Bonnet river runs 1½ mile on the boundary with co. Leitrim to Lough Gill; and the Sligo river makes a brief but magnificent run from Lough Gill, past the town of Sligo, to the head of the middle ramification of Sligo bay. The principal streams north of Sligo, are the Drumcliffe rivulet westward to the head of the northern ramification of Sligo bay, and the Duff or Bunroos rivulet northward along the boundary with co. Leitrim to Donegal bay.

Climate.—The county of Sligo closely resembles the sea-board portions of the counties of Mayo and Galway in nearly all the circumstances of climate; and, excepting parts of Kerry and the south-west uplands of Cork, it suffers the scourge of more rainy and windy inhospitable weather than probably any other district of Ireland. Yet its temperatures are averagely very mild, and its rains are remarkable quite as much for their fitfulness as for their quantity. "As to rain," says Dr. MacParlan, "it is very changeable; so much so, that the best barometers prognosticate very uncertainly as to the event of wet or dry weather."

Minerals.—A singularly varied and ample series of primitive, metamorphic, and volcanic rocks, flanked by secondary sandstone, and surrounded by a low country of doets limestone, occurs from end to end of the Ox mountains, and, after being interrupted by the valley of the Union, reappears in the two hills which screen the south side of Lough Gill. Mica slate, frequently passing into hornblende slate, constitutes the greater part of the main body of these mountains, and generally has a rapid dip to the south. Quartz rock constitutes a considerable mass in the part of the mountains toward Ballysader, and elsewhere occurs in comparatively small nodules. Gneiss appears in Slieve-Dacane, occurs in the north-east of the Ox mountains at a place due west of Ballysader, and constitutes the south-western end of these mountains, previously to its stretching away into co. Mayo as the principal rock of the Lurgan hills. A large protrusion of crystalline greenstone occurs near the east end of the Ox mountains; and trap dykes of very unusual magnitude traverse other parts of the county. Old red sandstone, with its peculiar conglomerate, forms a skirt along both sides of the Ox mountains, constitutes most of the Sligo portion of the Curlew mountains, forms a considerable pendicle of country on the west side of Lough Arrow, and is seen in the headland on the north-east side of the entrance of Sligo bay; and though its strata are in general very distinct, yet in some places, particularly on the south skirt of the Ox mountains, the conglomerate graduates insensibly into the subjacent quartz rock. Yellow sandstone, with its accompanying conglomerate, constitutes two considerable districts respectively in the extreme north of Carbery, and around the shores of Lough Gara. The lower limestone formation, the geognostic member next to the yellow sandstone, occurs at the base of the Curlew mountains, in the vicinity of Lough Arrow, and thence yields grey and dove-coloured marble. The calp and shale formation, lying next in order above the lower limestone, constitutes part of the mountains and adjoining country north of Sligo; and is there closely similar in character to the mountain limestone of Derbyshire, Cumberland, and the north-west of Yorkshire. The upper limestone forms the remainder of the district north of Sligo, and occurs, in particular, to the thickness of 500 feet in Benbulbin; and its upper strata in that mountain are frequently accompanied with irregular beds of semi-crystalline brown spar rock, whose disintegrated surfaces present such an appearance as has often occasioned the whole formation to be mistaken for ordinary grey sandstone. The doets limestone, in general, constitutes far the greater portion of the lowlands of the county, particularly the shores and sea-board all round from the head of Killalla bay to the northern district of Carbery, the whole or most of the valleys of the Union and the Owenmore, and the whole of the low grounds westward from these valleys to the sandstone at the base of the Ox mountains. Millstone grit, including white sandstone and shale, with thin beds of limestone and coal, constitutes the greater part of the Brablieve mountain district; and is there connected with the coal-fields and mining districts of Arigna and Lough Allen, in the counties of Leitrim and Roscommon. Trachyte, a formation not elsewhere observed in the British islands, occurs on the shore of Killalla bay. Copper and lead mines were formerly worked among the metamorphic rocks of the Ox mountain district, but they have been abandoned. Iron was manufactured at the mountain of Kilmacley, till all the available woods of the circumjacent country were consumed. Iron ores are observable in the beds and on the banks of several of the streams. Manganese has been observed in the mountains south-west of Lough Gill. Garnets are found near Lough Easkey; and asbestos occurs to the east. Brick clay, comparatively fine, and very suitable for coarse pottery, occurs in various places near Lough Gill on the road from Sligo to Ballintogher. "On the north-west side of Magherow," says Dr. MacParlan, "lies the serpent rock, so called from the great variety of its curious petrifactions, representing fishes, serpents, &c., of different sizes, and beautiful shells."

Soils.—"From Bunduff to Grange," says the agricultural statist of the county, "the soil is either a thin turf-moss, on a freestone gravelly bottom, or a thin, sandy, gravelly loam, mixed with roundish white stones; cold and infertile, skirted with considerable tracts of bog. From Grange to Drumcliffe, the soil is in general light, sandy, gravelly, and moory in most parts, mixed with round stones on a strong gravelly bottom. It proves tolerably productive of potatoes, barley, and oats. All round Magherow, the soil and surface is the same as last described, but less moory, deeper, and richer; which depth and richness increase in proportion as one approaches the vicinity of Sligo, where in general the soil is good on limestone rocks and gravel. But all through the most parts of the county of Sligo, is to be found the stratum called here leacles, which is corrupted Irish for a grey flag; most commonly it is met within from 10 to 12 inches of the surface, sometimes more and seldom less. It is perfectly impervious to, and retentive of water. Siliceous marl seems to be a principal ingredient of this concretion; it effervesces (but faintly) with acids; colour, a leaden grey; and when dug up, and exposed to the air and rain, resolves into friable stuff. This is a great bar to vegetation and tillage, but, where dug up and well incorporated with the soil, it improves it considerably, and becomes perfectly permeable to surface water. * * South of Sligo some of the lands in the baronies of Tyrerril, Loney, and Corran, are of prime quality, but agreeably interspersed with bogs and mountains. The soil of Mercury, Nymphsfield, and all round to Ballintogher, and to the west as far as Knockmucely, and from Ballymote to the Curlews, and many adjoining parts of the county of Mayo, forming a scope of about 140 square miles, is, with very little exception, a deep, rich, productive soil, fit for every species of tillage or fattening sheep and the heaviest oxen. Still southward of this scope, lies the barony of Coolavin, not less conspicuous for wide tracts of rocky uncultivable and cultivable mountain, on a white freestone gravel and rocks, than for some lands of prime quality, such as Killarrat, Mr. O'Flannikan's estate, and some other grounds on the banks of Lough Gara, and elsewhere, fit for tillage in all its branches, and pasture for cows and bullocks of any weight." The soil of the barony of Tyreragh, or of the district between the Ox mountains and the sea, is prevailingly light and gravelly, and to a great extent sheer bog. The arable lands were originally moors, substrated with the leaclea; but most of them, in consequence of a long course of tillage, now exhibit the leaclea in combination with mould and the original soil, so as to be rendered pervious and useful. The strata of vegetative gravelly soil and leaclea are superincumbent sometimes on clay or sandstone gravel, but more frequently on limestone; and, in many parts, they are rocky or strewed with stones.

Agriculture.—The barony of Carbery is, in all respects, a favourable or at least a perfectly fair specimen of the agricultural condition of the county, whether as respects natural capabilities, georgic improvements, or existing practices of husbandry; and, therefore, the following extracts from an official report upon that barony in 1836, may be regarded as a distinct and sufficiently minute exhibition of the agriculture of the county. "Draining is, in general, very little known and practised in this district, except at the expense of the proprietors. Fallowing is another operation in agriculture which is totally unknown here. The farmers are not aware of the best modes of eradicating the root-weeds and grasses; and accordingly they bestow but little pains to effect that purpose. The crop which receives the greatest attention, in preparing for it by tillage, is that of flax; this, however, occupies a very small portion of the farm, and is seldom more than sufficient to provide clothing for the family. When applied to that purpose, three ploughings are given to the land, but it does not receive the first of them till the month of March, having remained undisturbed from the previous harvest; and, as the seed is sown in the month of April, the two others must follow in rapid succession. The same observation may be made with regard to the land intended for potatoes, which is not stirred till a short time prior to the planting of the crop, and then is very inadequately ploughed with a shallow furrow, from the great imperfection of the implements in use. Some attention is paid to weeding the corn, but in the potatoes it is mostly deferred to too late a period, and frequently until the weeds exceed the crop in height. No care in this respect is bestowed on the pastures; those, and the borders of the tillage fields, are covered with rag-weed, thistles, and docks, which are allowed to perfect their seed, and to produce an abundant stock of plants for a succeeding year. In some pastures it would be difficult to find a square yard of surface free from either one or other of these weeds. Wherever sea-weed can be easily and conveniently procured, it will be found that a great inattention on the part of the farmers to their home manure generally prevails, however desirous they may be of obtaining the former; the observation certainly holds good with regard to this district, as little attention is paid to the manure. The proper state in which it should be used appears to be little understood, some of it being applied in too recent a state, and some when decomposition has taken place to too great a degree; sufficient care also is not bestowed in making additions of mould, ashes, weeds, &c., to the heap, which is generally scattered over a wide surface, and exposed to the deteriorating influence of the sun and rain; a large portion of the straw is either given to the cattle during winter, used for the frequent thatching of the cabin, or sold in the market, and from the quantity applied to these purposes the manure is greatly diminished. Although lime may be obtained at any place in the barony with a short carriage (the greatest distance being four miles), it is made but little use of as a manure, the prevailing opinion being, that it is not necessary on a limestone soil. It is seldom used even in the shape of a compost with bog-mould to assist in decomposing the pent. Shell-sand is the favourite application for reclaiming land, whether it is intended to be converted into tillage, or retained in a state of pasture. With the advantages arising from the use of green crops, and the adoption of a proper succession of them, and corn, the farmers are at present entirely unacquainted. An attempt, however, is in progress to remedy this ignorance by instructing them in these particulars. The frequent recurrence of the oat crop, which takes place in the course of tillage pursued in the barony, has rendered the potato out greatly liable to failure; at first it presents a fine braid till it attains the height of 8 or 9 inches, and then dies off almost entirely, and this can be accounted for in no other way than by supposing that the land is quite tired of that grain. No grass seeds are sown when the land is allowed to rest, but the natural grasses and weeds are suffered to spring up, and it is generally three years before it becomes even an ordinary pasture. The farmers usually retain the cattle in the meadows intended to be saved for hay till a very late period, frequently till the latter end of May, and on this account the season for making hay is greatly deferred, and with the long time which it is allowed to remain in the train cocks, the meadows are often not cleared till the month of October. The implements which are used in the barony are very deficient, although some of the proprietors have introduced those of an improved description. The plough common in this district has a wooden breast and slide, and the only portions of it which are made of iron are the coulter, a small long share, and a narrow strip on the land side of the slide. And it may be asserted generally of all the implements, including also those of a smaller description, as the loys, shovels, forks, rakes, &c., that they are far inferior to those used for similar purposes in England. The dray carts, which are reckoned an improvement on the car formerly in use, are yet very inconvenient for agricultural purposes. The fences are very bad and insecure; the gateway is generally built up with loose stones, and of course forms a part of the fence which the cattle can easily knock down."—In 1841, there were, within the rural districts of the county, 11,291 farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 6,190 of from 5 to 15 acres, 705 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 306 of upwards of 30 acres; and, within the civic districts, 41 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 23 of from 5 to 15 acres, 4 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 5 of upwards of 30 acres. In the same year, there were, in the entire county, 12,976 male farmers, 194 female farmers, 25,259 male servants and labourers of 15 years and upwards, 1,192 female servants and labourers of 15 years and upwards, 3,236 male servants and labourers under 15 years, 375 female servants and labourers under 15 years, 24 ploughmen, 111 gardeners, 7 graziers, 483 male herds, 55 female herds, 19 male care-takers, 3 female care-takers, 58 land-stewards, and 4 game-keepers.

Live Stock.—So far back as the year 1802, the Leicestershire breed of sheep had been introduced, and was generally appreciated and in request; and in that year, Dr. MacParlan reported concerning black cattle, "They are very much improved, and improving every day. There are some very large and very handsome heifers and oxen at Mercury; and throughout the county, the gentlemen and opulent farmers have a long time had excellent cattle; but those among the mountains and among the poor are wretchedly bad, and, until the mountains and the state of the poor are first improved, not capable of much improvement."—In 1841, there were, within the rural districts of the county, on farms or holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 504 horses and mules,

1,035 asses, 3,131 cattle, 1,758 sheep, 5,338 pigs, and 36,181 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 2,601 horses and mules, 1,869 asses, 14,423 cattle, 7,470 sheep, 8,557 pigs, and 63,153 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 2,932 horses and mules, 784 asses, 16,623 cattle, 10,412 sheep, 6,298 pigs, and 49,238 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 778 horses and mules, 104 asses, 4,316 cattle, 3,831 sheep, 939 pigs, and 9,175 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 957 horses and mules, 40 asses, 7,122 cattle, 8,920 sheep, 636 pigs, and 5,132 poultry. The totals of these classes of live stock, together with their respective estimated value, were 7,772 horses and mules, £62,170; 3,832 asses, £3,832; 45,615 cattle, £296,498; 32,391 sheep, £35,630; 21,768 pigs, £27,210; and 162,809 poultry, £4,072. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the rural districts, £429,418. In the same year, the totals of the classes of live stock within the civic districts, together with their respective estimated value, were 197 horses and mules, £1,576; 14 asses, £14; 234 cattle, £1,456; 317 sheep, £349; 1,037 pigs, £1,296; and 1,473 poultry, £37. Grand total of estimated value of live stock in the civic districts, £4,728.

Woods.—Except on demesnes, the surface of the county is almost totally destitute of wood. The demesnes which figure most prominently, for extent and beauty of timber, are those of Hazelwood, around Lough Gill; Fortland, on the river Easkey; Templehouse, on the river Owenmore; Annaghmore, in the parishes of Kilvarnet and Ballysadere; Markree castle, in the parishes of Ballysadere, Kilross, and Drumcolumb; Ballysadere, in the parish of Ballysadere; Castle-Dargon, in the parish of Kilross; Castle-Neynoe, in the parish of Ballysumnaghan; Willowbrook, Wellsborough, and Doonally, in the parishes of Calry and Drumcliffe; and Lissadill, in the parish of Drumcliffe. In 1841, the plantations within the county consisted of 591 acres and 1,604 detached trees of oak, 178 acres and 63,875 detached trees of ash, 11 acres and 2,560 detached trees of elm, 53 acres and 6,747 detached trees of beech, 192 acres and 8,580 detached trees of fir, 4,832 acres and 109,887 detached trees of mixed plantations, and 277 acres and 2,887 detached trees of orchards,—in all, 6,134 acres of continuous woods, and 196,140 detached trees,—the latter equivalent to 1,229 acres, and the two classes making a grand total of 7,360 acres of plantations. Of the continuous woods, there were planted previous to 1791, 431 acres of oak, 74 of ash, 20 of beech, 68 of fir, 1,356 of mixed plantations, and 77 of orchards.

Fisheries.—At Mullaghmore, and thence across the bay of Donegal, all sorts of fish may be caught in from 4 to 30 fathoms water. At Milk-Haven, on the west coast of the barony of Carbery, and about 2½ miles from the shore, is a turbot bank in about 20 fathoms water. In every part of Sligo bay, and on the ledge between Aughris Head and Haulbowline Island, is good cod fishing, in about 15 fathoms water. Near Portavad, about 1½ mile from shore, is a good turbot bank, in 10 or 12 fathoms water. In Killalla bay, about 2 miles from Inniscrone, is a turbot bank, ½ mile in extent, bearing about south-west and north-east, in 10 or 12 fathoms water. In general, along the whole coast of the county, including the bays of Killalla, Sligo, and Donegal, all kinds of fish may be taken in from 10 to 30 fathoms water. The principal fishing-stations, or landing-places for boats, whether with or without piers or other artificial aids, are, north of Sligo, Mullaghmore, Innismurray, Milk-Haven, Lissadill, and Raughley; and, west of Sligo, Ballysadere, Portavad, Dunmoran, Aughris, Pullendivá, Ballymimney, Killenduff, Easkey, Castletown, Pullocheny, and Inniscrone. In 1836, the coast-guard stations were Mullaghmore, Raughley, Pullendivá, Pullocheny, and Inniscrone; and the numbers of fishing craft and fishermen, within the districts of these stations, as returned by the officers of the coast-guard, were,—in Mullaghmore district, 9 open sail-boats, 40 row-boats, and 347 men,—in Raughley district, 99 row-boats, and 495 men,—in Pullendivá district, 1 open sail-boat, 15 row-boats, and 92 men,—in Pullocheny district, 6 row-boats, and 300 men (270 of the men not having boats),—and in Inniscrone district, 12 row-boats, and 60 men,—making a total of 10 open sail-boats, 172 row-boats, and 1,294 men. But the numbers of the fishing craft and fishermen, within the county, in the year ending April 5, 1830, were, as set forth in the 11th Report of the late Commissioners of Irish Fisheries, 4 decked vessels and 25 men, 8 half-decked vessels and 40 men, 43 open sail-boats and 256 men, and 556 row-boats and 3,353 men,—making a total of 3,677 fishermen.

Manufactures and Trade.—As the best means of exhibiting the classification, kinds, and comparative amount of productive industry, we subjoin a digest of the statistics of occupations as returned in the Census of 1841: Fishermen, 100; millers, 75; maltster, 1; brewers, 5; distiller, 1; bakers, 64; confectioners, 23; soda-water maker, 1; tobacco-twisters, 8; fishermen, 23; egg-dealers, 84; fruiterers, 3; cattle-dealers, 7; pig-jobbers, 3; corn-dealers, 16; seedsmen, 1; butter-merchants, 5; huxters and provision dealers, 80; butchers, 120; poulterers, 2; victuallers, 71; grocers, 11; tobacconists, 9; flax-dressers, 52; carders, 97; spinners of flax, 4,557; spinners of wool, 2,335; spinners of unspecified classes, 8,647; winders and warpers, 32; factory-worker, 1; weavers of linen, 259; weavers of woollen, 70; weavers of unspecified classes, 771; bleachers, 12; dyers, 12; clothiers, 20; cloth-finishers, 3; curriers, 5; tanner, 1; brogue-makers, 131; boot and shoe makers, 828; tailors, 785; sempstresses, 648; dress-makers, 664; milliners, 30; lace-workers, 4; stay-makers, 6; comb-makers, 4; knitters, 448; hatters, 31; bonnet-makers, 18; cap-makers, 2; gloves, 4; hair-dressers and barbers, 6; blacking-maker, 1; leather-dealer, 1; hosier, 1; haberdashers, 12; drapers, 13; linen-drappers, 5; woollen-drappers, 2; silk-mercer, 1; venders of soft goods, 22; dealers in old clothes, 4; rag and bone dealers, 3; architects, 4; builders, 3; brick-maker, 1; potter, 1; stone-cutters, 59; lime-burners, 3; brick-layers, 4; stone-masons, 312; slaters, 19; thatchers, 20; plasterers, 23; quarrymen, 3; sawyers, 68; carpenters, 301; cart-makers, 64; cabinet-makers, 27; coopers, 362; turners, 4; mill-wrights, 19; wheel-wrights, 83; ship-wrights, 18; clock-makers, 2; boot-tree and last maker, 1; reed-makers, 2; card-makers, 2; brush-maker, 1; basket-maker, 1; broom-makers, 2; iron-founder, 1; blacksmiths, 415; farrier, 1; white-smiths, 10; nailers, 95; cutlers, 10; gun-smiths, 5; braziers and copper-smiths, 12; gas-fitters, 2; plumbers, 3; tin-plate workers, 22; tinkers, 46; machine-makers, 2; watch-makers, 3; coach and car makers, 2; saddlers, 27; whip-makers, 6; rope-makers, 13; letter-press printers, 18; hook-binder, 1; chandlers and soap-boilers, 14; painters and glaziers, 42; net-makers, 3; sail-makers, 3; sieve-makers, 9; tobacco-pipe makers, 11; bellows-maker, 1; stationer, 1; booksellers and stationers, 6; timber-merchant, 1; turf-dealers, 2; ironmongers, 12; merchants of unspecified classes, 49; dealers of unspecified classes, 353; shopkeepers of unspecified classes, 153; shop-assistants, 77; tradesmen of unspecified classes, 5; and apprentices of unspecified classes, 3.

Fairs.—The following are the principal fairs held within the county:—Ardnaglass, June 21, Aug. 17, and Sept. 23; Ardnaree, June 20, Oct. 10, and Dec. 13; Banada, Jan. 6, May 31, June 29, July 26, Aug. 30, and Oct. 18; Ballinacarrow, May 14, June 14, Aug. 14, and Dec. 14; Ballintogher, Jan. 22, June 8, July 28, Oct. 17, and Dec. 8; Ballysadere, Nov. 12 and Dec. 15; Ballymote, Jan. 27, April 19, May 11, June 15, Sept. 3, Nov. 18, and Dec. 23; Bateau, the Monday before Ash-Wednesday, May 21, and Aug. 28; Bellaghy, Feb. 15, March 15, April 12, June 9, July 9, Aug. 14, Sept. 18, Nov. 15, and Dec. 21; Carney, May 26 and June 24; Carriknagut, Feb. 1; Castle-Baldwin, June 4 and Nov. 3; Collooney, Nov. 21; Coolaney, May 29, July 11, Aug. 29, Sept. 20, and Dec. 5; Curry, May 5 and 26; Dromore-West, April 6, June 6, Aug. 14, Oct. 15, and Dec. 21; Eskay, March 17, June 3, and Nov. 18; Inniscrone, June 11, Sept. 18, and Dec. 14; Farnaharpy, Feb. 27, May 27, Aug. 27, and Nov. 27; Grange, June 2 and 29, July 25, Aug. 25, Sept. 29, Oct. 28, and Dec. 10; Roslee, Feb. 23, May 19, July 9, Aug. 28, and Dec. 23; Skreen, Easter Monday, Dec. 21, and Feb. 20; Sligo, March 27, May 7, July 4, Aug. 11, and Oct. 9; Templehouse, May 24, July 30, and Nov. 7; Tobbercurry, Feb. 8, March 25, May 24, June 28, July 27, Aug. 16, Sept. 15, Oct. 4, and Nov. 29; and Tobberscanavan, May 17, June 30, Sept. 18, and Oct. 31.

Communications.—The only navigations are the brief ones of the Sligo river to the town of Sligo, and the river Moy to within a mile of Ardnaree. A survey was submitted to the Public Commissioners on Railways of a proposed line of railway, to connect Sligo with Dublin, and to proceed by Ballysadere up the valley of the Union and up the east bank of Lough Arrow, and afterwards to pass the towns of Carrick-on-Shannon, Longford, and Mullingar. A railway has been projected to form a trunk line to connect the northern and eastern portions of Ireland with the western and north-western, and, by means of the Ulster railway, and the Ulster Extension, Dublin and Belfast Junction, Londonderry and Enniskillen, Dundalk and Enniskillen, Newry and Enniskillen, and Dublin and Drogheda railways, to bring the ports of Sligo and Ballyshannon in direct communication with the ports of Belfast, Derry, Newry, Dundalk, Drogheda, and Dublin. The principal roads within the county, are the mail-road from Sligo to Dublin, by Ballysadere up the valley of the Union and up the west bank of Lough Arrow; the mail-road from Sligo to Ballina and Castlebar, by Ballysadere and Dromore-West; the mail-road from Sligo to Enniskillen, eastward from Sligo, afterwards to pass the town of Manor-Hamilton; and the mail-road from Sligo to Londonderry, northward through the barony of Carbery, afterwards to pass the towns of Ballyshannon and Donegal. From 1836 till 1842, 27 miles of new road were made; and in the latter year, the county surveyor had under his charge 584 miles of road.

Divisions and Towns.—The county of Sligo is divided into the six baronies of Carbery in the north-east, Tiraghmill in the south-east, Coolavin in the extreme south, Corran in the centre, Leney in the south-west, and Tyreragh in the north-west. Carbery contains 6 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Tiraghmill contains 11 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Coolavin contains 2 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Corran contains 6 whole parishes, and part of another parish; Leney contains 4 whole parishes, and part of another parish; and Tyreragh contains 7 whole parishes, and part of another parish. The county is ecclesiastically distributed among the four dioceses of Elphin, Achonry, Killalla, and Ardagh. Dr. Beaufort states the total number of parishes and churches at respectively 39 and 16; and assigns 16 parishes and 3 churches to the dio. of Elphin, 14 parishes and 6 churches to the dio. of Achonry, 8 parishes and 6 churches to the dio. of Killalla, and 1 parish and 1 church to the dio. of Ardagh. The towns and principal villages, are, in the barony of Carbery, Sligo, Ballintempe, Grange, Kilkilgole, Ballyterran, Newtown-Anderson, Ballyconnel, Carney, Raughley, Rosses, and Magheraboy; in the barony of Tiraghmill, Collooney, Ballinacarrow, Tobberscanavan, Ballintogher, Riverstown, and part of Ballysadere; in the barony of Coolavin, Gorteen; in the barony of Corran, Ballymote; in the barony of Leney, Bellaghy, Curry, Tobbercurry, Coolany, Aclare, and part of Ballysadere; and in the barony of Tyreragh, Ardnaree, Eskay, Bunree, Corbally, Crockettstown, and Dromore-West.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in the county was 220, of scholars 10,423, of male scholars 6,516, of female scholars 3,686, of scholars whose sex was not specified 221, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,558, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 86, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 104, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 7,493, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 180; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 226, of scholars 10,666, of male scholars 6,513, of female scholars 3,808, of scholars whose sex was not specified 345, of scholars connected with the Established church 2,689, of scholars connected with Presbyterian communities 100, of scholars connected with other communities of Protestant dissenters 97, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 7,626, of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 154. The statistics of education and of ecclesiastical matters for 1834 are returned according to the diocesan divisions; and may be proximately judged of with respect to Sligo, by reference to the articles ELPHIN and ACHONRY. In 1843, the National Board had in full operation within the county 57 schools, conducted by 44 male and 16 female teachers, attended by 3,848 male and 2,740 female scholars, and aided, during the year, with £596 16s. 8d. of salaries, £47 15s. of free stock, and £70 6s. 8d. of school requisites at half-price.—During the year 1843, the number of persons committed on charges of felony was 477, the number of criminal cases before magistrates and petty-sessions was 236, and the number of persons committed for drunkenness under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 38, was 32. Of the 477 persons committed on charges of felony, 318 were charged with offences against the person, 24 with offences against property committed with violence, 66 with offences against property committed without violence, 10 with malicious offences against property, 1 with offence against the currency, and 58 with offences not included in the above categories; 7 were sentenced to transportation, 84 were sentenced to imprisonment, 9 were sentenced to pay fines, 133 were found not guilty on trial, 157 had no bill found against them, and 87 were not prosecuted. On Jan. 1, 1844, the constabulary force of the county consisted of 1 second-rate county-inspector, 2 first-rate sub-inspectors, 2 second-rate sub-inspectors, 1 third-rate sub-inspector, 1 first-rate head-constable, 5 second-rate head-constables, 31 constables, 130 first-rate sub-constables, 24 second-rate sub-constables, and 7 mounted police; and the cost of maintaining this force during the year 1843 was £9,094 6s. 6d. The constabulary have their head-quarters at Sligo; and they are distributed through 30 stations in the 5 districts of Sligo, Tobercurry, Ballymote, Easkey, and Riverstown. The head-quarters of the county militia are at Sligo. A stipendiary magistrate resides at Ballymote. The county gaol is at Sligo; a bridewell is at Ballymote; and the district lunatic asylum, to which the county of Sligo may send 46 patients, is at Ballinasloe. The assizes are held at Sligo; quarter-sessions are held at Sligo, Easkey, and Ballymote; and petty-sessions are held at Ardnaglass, Ballydoogan, Ballymote, Collooney, Comcull, Coolaney, Inniscrone, Mullaghroe, Riverstown, Sligo, Sooley, Teeson, and Tobercurry. A savings' bank is at Sligo; loan funds are at Ballysadere and Tobercurry; a workhouse is at Sligo; the county infirmary is at Sligo; a fever hospital is at Sligo; and dispensaries are at Ballymote, Carney, Castle-Connor, Cliffoey, Collooney, Collony, Dromore-West, Riverstown, and Tobercurry. The county contains the whole of the Poor-law union of Sligo, and part of the Poor-law unions of Boyle, Swineford, and Ballina. The total number of tenements valued is 27,254; and of these, 15,699 were valued under £5,—7,405, under £10,—2,058, under £15,—733, under £20,—373, under £25,—205, under £30,—270, under £40,—134, under £50,—and 377, at and above £50. The annual amount of property valued for the poor-rate is £145,959; the annual amount of property valued under the Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, is £190,752; and the amount of grand-jury presentments for 1842 was £22,290. The members sent to the Irish parliament were two from the county at large, and two from the borough of Sligo; and those sent to the imperial parliament are two from the county and one from the borough. County constituency, in 1841, 1,093; of whom 1,035 were freeholders, 40 were leaseholders, and 18 were rent-chargers. Constituency, in 1844, 1,166; of whom 324 were in the barony of Carbery, 128 in Corran, 96 in Coolavin, 222 in Leney, 264 in Tiraghbrill, and 132 in Tyreragh.

Pop., in 1792, about 60,000; in 1831, 171,765; in 1841, 180,886. Houses, in 1792, 11,509; in 1831, 29,588; in 1841, 31,443. The following statistics are all of the year 1841. Males, 89,563; females, 91,323; families, 32,837. Inhabited houses, 31,443; uninhabited built houses, 750; houses in the course of erection, 46. First-class inhabited houses, 277; second-class, 3,704; third-class, 12,885; fourth-class, 14,577. Antiquities.—Cromlechs and other supposed Druidical monuments are numerous. Several remarkable caverns occur, the origin and use of which are unknown. Rath or hill-forts everywhere abound. Part of a pillar-tower stands at Drumcliffe. The principal castles which figure either in historical record or in their own surviving ruins, are those of Castle-Connor, Rallee, Lackan, Roslee, Ardnaglass, Ballymote, Sligo, Bally, Newtown, Ballinasfad, Lough Gara, and Memleek. The principal monastic or old ecclesiastical structures, whether extant or extinct, are the priory of Agharais, Akeris, or Kilmantin, in Tyreragh; the abbey and the cathedral of the old episcopal village of Achonry; the Augustinian monastery of Ardnaree; the nunnery of Ardsceinlis, near Slieve-Bagna in Tyreragh; the Premonstratensian church at Athmoy; the Dominican nunnery of Ballindown, on Lough Arrow; the abbey of Ballinley, on the Ballinley rivulet, in Tyreragh; the Franciscan friary of Ballymote; the abbey of Ballysadere; the Augustinian friary of Banada, on the river Moy, in Leney; the abbey, afterwards the parish-church, of Bile in Leney; the two monasteries of Caille and Cailleavinde, in Carbery; the church and alleged cathedral of Cachel, in Corran; the nunnery of Cloghernmore, in Carbery; the Dominican friary of Clonmeggan, in Corran; the Franciscan monastery of Court, in Leney; the monastery of Drumderdaloch, in Tiraghbrill; the monastery, and the alleged cathedral, of Drumcliffe; the church of Drumcolumb, in Tiraghbrill; the abbey of Drumrat, near Ballysadere, in Leney; the church of Kilmacoe, near Sligo; the abbey of Emlaghfad; the monastery of Glendallain, in Carbery; the church of Innismore, in Lough Gill; the abbey and two chapels of Innismurray; the church of Kilchairfoe, adjacent to the river Moy; the nunnery of Killaraght, on Lough Gara, in Coolavin; the abbey, afterwards the parish-church, of Kilnemanagh, in Leney; the Premonstratensian church of Kilrassee, in Tiraghbrill; the Dominican friary of Knockmore, in Tiraghbrill; the monastery, afterwards the parish-church, of Skreen, in Tyreragh; the Dominican friary of Sligo; the abbey of Snelruther, in Carbery; and the establishment of Knights Templars at Templehouse.

History.—Some antiquaries think that the people called Nagnata, Magnata, or Magnati, by Ptolemy, were the original inhabitants of the territory which now constitutes the county of Sligo; that their polis eminentior or 'eminent city' of Nagnata or Magnata, stood on or near the site of the present town of Sligo; and that the river Libnius or Lebrus, which watered their capital, was the Sligo or Lough Gill river. Sir James Ware is one of the antiquaries who hold these opinions; but Baxter and others assign the honours of the Nagmate to the town of Galway and the river Corrib. The territorial divisions, both before and long after the entry of the English, of the district which now constitutes the county, were Gregaria, nearly coincident with the present barony of Coolavin; Luigne, nearly coincident with the present barony of Lenev; Coranna, nearly coincident with the present barony of Corran; Criche-Cairbré, afterwards Siol-Morey, part of the present barony of Carbery, forming the county of O'Connor-Sligo; Kinel-Cairbré, also part of the present barony of Carbery; Dartrigia, part of Carbery, near Lough Gill; and Calruide or Calrigia, the part of Carbery nearly coincident with the parish of Calry;—and the modern names may, in most instances, be easily recognised as mere corruptions of the ancient ones,—Lenev of Luigne, Corran of Coranna, Carbery of Cairbré, and Calry of Calruide. The family and descendants of Roderic O'Connor, the last native monarch of Ireland, in their struggles to retain or reacquire possession of the province of Connaught, made the territory of Sligo the seat of the chief portion of their wars. In 1200, after Cathal Croobhderg, or Cathal of the Bloody Hand, had been dethroned by his kinsman Carrach, who was supported by the Anglo-Normans under De Burgo, Hugh O'Neill, chieftain of Tyrone, made an attempt to reinstate Cathal, and suffered defeat in the vicinity of Ballysadere. During the general rebellion in the latter part of the reign of Elizabeth, the English army under Sir Conyers Clifford, president of Connaught, were surprised and numerous slaughtered, within the county of Sligo, by the Irish under O'Ruarc or O'Rourke, chieftain of Breffney. In the rebellion of 1641, the insurgents held possession of the county; and though, in 1645, they were driven out of the town of Sligo, and afterwards repulsed by Sir C. Coote, in an attack upon it, they eventually recovered it, and continued to hold it till near the conclusion of the war. In the war of the Revolution, the county was held by the adherents of James; and the only reverse or annoyance of any consequence which they endured, was the temporary repulse of a body of them on their first advance to the town of Sligo, by the Protestants of Enniskillen. In 1798, a smart skirmish was fought in the parish of Ballysadere, and near the village of Collooney, between the small army of French invaders under General Humbert, and a body of the Limerick militia, under Col. Vereker.

SLIGO (THE), a river, also called GARROGUE or GARVOGUE, in the barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is formed by the superfluous waters of Lough Gill, or rather by the waters of the streams which flow into that lake; and it runs 1 mile northward, and 2 north-westward, along the boundary between the parishes of Calry and St. John's of Sligo, to the head of Sligo bay. It washes the town of Sligo $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile above its embouchure; and it is navigable to the town by sea-borne vessels. In consequence of being dammed across, near its outlet for the use of a distillery and large flour-mills, it presents the appearance, even in summer, of a deep, broad river. The streams which form it, by emptying themselves into Lough Gill, are the Bonnet, the Glenboy, the Benbo, and the Shanvoe. The rights of fishing in the river are private property, held by a grant from the Crown; but, in consequence chiefly of the increase of population on the river's banks, and of the great quantity of deleterious matter poured into the stream from the town of Sligo, the supply of salmon has, for 25 or 30 years past, been greatly on the decrease.

SLIGO, a bay, chiefly in the barony of Carbery, but partly between that barony and the baronies of Lenev and Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It consists of an exterior expanse, or the bay proper, and three interior ramifications, or the harbours of Drumcliffe, Sligo, and Ardnaglass. The exterior expanse opens between Aughris Head, on the south, in the barony of Tyreragh, and Roskeeragh Point, called also Knocklave Point and Gessigo Point, north-east by north, in the barony of Carbery; and it measures 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles across the entrance, and penetrates the land 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-eastward, with a mean breadth of about 4 miles. The three ramifications or harbours project respectively eastward from the north-east corner of the bay, eastward from the middle of the head of the bay, and south-eastward from the south-east corner of the bay; and they are somewhat similar to one another both in extent and in interior character. The first, called Drumcliffe or Lissadill harbour, and the second, called Ardnaglass or Ballysadere harbour, have already been noticed under the words DRUMCLIFFE and ARDNAGLASS: which see. The third or middle ramification, called Sligo harbour, presents to the outer bay a commencing width of about 2 miles, but is so nearly closed up by Coney Island lying lengthwise across its mouth as to be instantly reduced to two channels, of each about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile in width, past the ends of that island; and, though penetrating the land 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles eastward with a maximum interior width of nearly 2 miles, it is so completely occupied athwart all the south and the centre by Cummeen Strand, as to have a channel available for navigation only along the north side, and of inconsiderable mean width; and even this channel is, for some distance, split into two straits, by Oyster Island, measuring half-a-mile in length, and lying a few perches east of the north end of Coney Island.—"Sligo bay," says Mr. Nimmo, in an official report too important to be either omitted or abridged, "is situated between the point of Knocklave, improperly named Gessigo on the charts, on the north side, and Aughris Head on the south. The exterior bay is nearly a square of four Irish miles, and there are three arms, each extending about three miles farther inland, but which are barred across the mouth, and each mostly dry at low water. These are the harbours of Lissadill or Drumcliffe, Sligo, and Ballysadere. Across the mouth of Sligo bay, from Aughris to Raghy and Knocklave, runs a reef of rocks, below water, called the ledge, on which there is a heavy breaking sea, with westerly winds; but it forms no obstruction to the navigation, as there are seven fathoms water across it. Outside there are from twenty to fifty fathoms, and within not more than ten. The north end of this ledge appears above water in the islets called Haulbowline and Little Island, in the peninsula of Raghy and point of Knocklave, and also on the Seal Rock, one mile south-west of that point. The south extremity of the ledge appears in the middle of the strand east of Aughris Point, forming the broad reef called Carrickfadda, or the Long Rock. This rock is sandstone, that of Aughris Head is limestone, but beyond it is slate, and those within it along the coast to Ballysadere, are limestone. As this is the usual position of the sandstone rock, viz., between the limestone which lies over it, and the slate or other primary rock which is under it, as may be seen about the lower part of the mountain of Benbulbin, we may probably, in the breaking up of this sandstone, account in some way for the great mass of sand that has filled so much of these inlets, and occupied most of the eastern shores of the bays of Sligo and Donegal. On the north side, Brown's bay, between Raghy Head and the islet of Haulbowline, though quite open to westerly winds, has a bottom of clean firm sand, and in easterly winds is used by vessels to stop in for a favourable tide to go over Sligo bar. The usual anchorage is abreast of Raghly rock, in ten fathoms. The Seal rock is always above water; within this is the small peninsula of Raghly, where there is a fishing village, in which pilots for Sligo bar reside. Between it and the bar is a good roadstead, where a vessel may stop on three fathoms clean fine sand; in making for which; observe the following dangers:—south-west of Raghly Head, one cable length is a ledge called the Wheaten Rock, only seen at low spring ebbs; and south of the Point, the Bird Rock, or Carrigean, the north-west end of which dries at half-tide, but a sunk ledge runs off to south-east near a quarter of a mile. These rocks are laid down on the fishery chart in their proper places, with the necessary directions for avoiding them. They have been incorrectly named by Mackenzie in his Survey; and are so in the common charts. In rounding Raghly Head, you avoid the Wheaten Rock by keeping the tower of the Black Rock south-east by south on the high-house in Sligo (Mr. King's), or to the eastward until you open the old castle of Ardarnon north-east, well out of the point of Raghly; and to avoid the tail of Carrigean, keep the Seal Rock in view outside of Raghly, until you bring the same castle north-east by north; you may then stand to the eastward, and anchor in three fathoms half-a-mile south-east of Raghly Point. From the Wheaten Rock to Raghly is all foul; there is a boat sound between Carrigean and the land, about six feet at low water. This anchorage will now be of much greater importance to the port of Sligo since the pier has been built on the shore of Raghly near the point, as this pier will not only shelter and afford a safe landing-place for the pilot and fishing-boats; but small vessels may run in and take the ground within it, when the bar appears too much broken to go on to Oyster Island. South by east from Raghly Point, and half-way to the Coney Island, lies the Black Rock, on which there is a round tower of stone. This rock dries for a cable length east and west of the tower, and is in fact the extremity of a rocky shoal called Bank Gar, which runs from hence all the way to the north end of Coney Island; on which, at low spring ebbs, there are also three or four feet water. On the north side of this shoal is Sligo bar, a broad flat sand, with ten feet at low water; when over it, we have deep water up to Oyster Island. The only other rock in the bay is that called the Blind Rock, off the south end of Coney Island; it has two fathoms water, but must be avoided by a vessel waiting for tide, on the south of Black Rock. The marks for this rock are also shown on the chart. Within the mouth of Sligo river, at Oyster Island, are the remains of a small pier, built by parliament about 1750. It had 13 feet at the end at low water, 100 feet long; but, being injured by a storm, it is now in total ruin for want of care; many of the stones were carried away for ballast. It was useful for vessels wintering, and for the fishery, but would be better at the mainland side, under Mr. Black's. The old one cost £1,000. Three lighthouses for aiding the navigation of Sligo harbour, were built in 1840,—one on Black Rock, and two on Oyster Island; and the maintaining of them during the year 1843, cost £589 15s. 11d.

SLIGO, or ST. JOHN'S OF SLIGO, a parish. See JOHN'S (ST.).

SLIGO,

A port, market, and sea-port town, a parliamentary borough, and the capital of the county of Sligo, and of the northern half of Connaught, partly in the parish of Calry, but chiefly in that of St. John's of Sligo, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands on the Sligo or Garroge river, and at the intersection of the road from Ballyshannon to Boyle, with that from Enniskillen to Ballina, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile south-east of the head of Sligo harbour, $\frac{3}{4}$ north-east of Ballysadere, $\frac{5}{8}$ north by east of Collooney, $\frac{1}{4}$ west of Manor-Hamilton, $\frac{1}{4}$ east by north of Dromore-West, 20 north by west of Boyle, $21\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west of Ballyshannon, $27\frac{1}{2}$ north-north-west of Carrick-on-Shannon, $29\frac{1}{2}$ east-north-east of Ballina, $30\frac{1}{2}$ west by south of Enniskillen, 69 south-west by south of Londonderry, 75 west by south of Armagh, 104 north-west by west of Dublin, and 107 west-south-west of Belfast.

Enviros.—The environs of Sligo possess great diversity of character, most of the elements of first-rate landscape, several styles of scenic power and beauty, and a large aggregate amount of loveliness, brilliance, and magnificence. Some of their best portions and richest groupings will be found noticed in our articles on LOUGH GILL, HAZLEWOOD, BALLYADERE, KNOCKNAREE, CALRY, JOHN'S (ST.), and the section "Surface" of the article on the county of Sligo; yet, that the reader may understand how invariably they arrest the attention and evoke the delight of observers, the phlegmatic as well as the sensitive, we may here cull a few brief general specimens in which they are currently noticed by topographers. "The town of Sligo, the bay, mountains, and a well-improved neighbourhood," says Dr. MacParlan, "look in different views extremely pretty; for instance, in approaching that town from Drumahair; but, in coming from Manor-Hamilton, somewhere near Mr. Gilmer's, there is a point where, after emerging from the mountains, the whole scene opens at once upon the view, and is indeed magnificent." "The town," says Mr. Fraser, "is rather romantically situated; and from a hill a little above the new church, on which the remains of an ancient fortification can still be traced, the traveller can, at a glance, command the general outline of the town, its public buildings, suburbs, and highly interesting environs. Perhaps no town in the kingdom enjoys a more diversified or more picturesque vicinage than Sligo." "The situation of Sligo," says Mr. Inglis, "is beautiful; it stands in a rich, highly cultivated, and finely-wooded country. A magnificent bay, with lofty banks, lies to the west; a fine river flows through the town; and towards the east, the banks of the river upwards are redolent of every kind of beauty, and soon expanded into Lough Gilly,—one of the most lovely of the Irish lakes. * * The environs of Sligo are beautiful. The day after I reached Sligo, I ascended an inconsiderable hill called 'the Cairns,' at a short distance from the town, and enjoyed a prospect from it which is not often commanded from higher elevations,—a beautiful lake, dotted with islands, fringed with wood, and its banks adorned by fine country-seats, and extensive lawns; a broad river, running from the lake through a rich, green, shaded, and picturesque country; a bay of the sea, with magnificent mountain boundaries; and beyond the great ocean itself; a town, with its mass of buildings, and ancient remains; and a wide, undulating, richly wooded, and picturesque country, with many villages, seats, and cottages,—such is the assemblage of objects which form the prospect from the elevation called the Cairns." "The country around Sligo," says a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, "is very beautiful—highly cultivated fields and bright green pasturage, wild picturesque mountains and luxuriant planting, mighty ocean and lovely lake—all that is wanting to form scenery, over which the eye wanders with intense delight." "The avenues to this town," says a writer in the Irish Penny Magazine, "are very beautiful and picturesque. The Dublin road approaches it by the sweetly situated village of Collooney, with its fine bridge and winding river, overshadowed by the groves of Union-Wood, thence following the direction of the stream, overlooks its more agitated current and foamy progress, through long ledges of descending rocks, and beside the ruins of the ancient abbey of Ballysadere. Presently Sligo appears with all its houses, spires, and public buildings, as on a plain, in the centre of an amphitheatre, of which the broad back of Benbulbin forms the boundary at right, while Knocknaree, with its singular cairn, more gracefully terminates the left. An excursion to the summit of this hill, through the glen of Knocknaree, will reward the tourist who visits Sligo, with the most magnificent prospects over sea and land."

Interior of the Town.—The town itself, though contributing to form some beautiful landscapes, and though presenting one or two pleasant groupings of public edifices with the immediate environs, occupies too low and undiversified a site, and possesses too uniform a surface of urban architecture, to be entitled to even the epithet of pretty. Previous to its being paved, cleansed, and lighted, it was a comparatively filthy and unhealthy town; and even yet, it exhibits a general character not more superior to most of the towns of Connaught, than inferior to many of the towns of Ulster and Leinster, and the great majority of the towns of England and Scotland. The streets of the older districts are ill-paved, narrow, dirty thoroughfares, badly suited to the bustle of a seat of trade, and not a little disagreeable to persons of any nicely of feeling; yet some of the newer streets are clean, spacious, and tolerably well edificed, several airy and regularly built streets are in progress, convenient markets and large stores have been erected, and, in general, improvements in at once alignment, architecture, and police, are comparatively great in extent, rapid in execution, and sanguine in promise of coming good. The Sligo river enters the environs, and penetrates to the centre of the town, in a westerly direction; and it then makes a sudden bend, runs 280 yards to the north, and there deflects to the north-west, and begins somewhat to expand. Two bridges span the river within the town; a newer bridge 170 yards above the river's sudden bend, and an older one 150 yards below that bend. The Calry section of the town, or the part upon the right bank of the river, consists principally of a street of 500 yards in length, extending eastward from the end of the old bridge, along the road to Enniskillen; a street of 100 or 110 yards in length, going off at right angles from the preceding, and extending southward to the end of the new bridge; two streets, east of the former, parallel to it, and also going down at right angles to the river; an irregular and somewhat curved street, extending 630 yards north-north-eastward, from the end of the old bridge along the road to Carnesh; and a partially edificed thoroughfare, deflecting at an acute angle from the preceding, and extending northward along the road to Ballinac. But all the parts of this section of the town, excepting those between the south side of the Enniskillen road and the river, are poor, and consist, in general, of mere cabins. The chief streets of the St. John's or principal section of the town, situated on the left bank of the river, are a line of buildings, partly street but chiefly terrace, extending 350 yards westward, along the side of the river, to the end of the new bridge; some cabin-built outskirts, to the south of this terrace, and around what is called the Abbey quarter; a straight and airy street, extending 280 yards southward, from the end of the new bridge; Radcliffe-street, commencing 90 yards east of the former and 90 yards south of the river, intersecting the former at right angles, extending 500 yards westward in a straight line, and with respectable character, and then proceeding 630 yards west-south-westward in a straggling, irregular, and cabin-built suburb; Market-street, High-street, and Pond-street—one street in alignment, through three in name—commencing nearly at the middle of the regular part of Radcliffe-street, extending 400 yards south by eastward and south-south-eastward in tolerably good though irregular edifying, and then forking off into two short lines of poor cabin-built outskirts; a group of lanes, alleys, and short streets, covering an area of about 400 square yards, and winging the west side of Market-street and south side of Radcliffe-street; Knox-street, going off at right angles from the north side of Radcliffe-street, about 100 yards west of the commencement of Market-street, and extending 220 yards northward in airiness of width and comparative goodness of character; Old Bridge-street and Wine-street—one in alignment, though two in name—extending 350 yards squeezedly and sinuously westward, from the end of the old bridge and across the south end of Knox-street, and then curving off into an outskirt of cabins; three or four straight but narrow alleys, extending from Radcliffe-street and Knox-street to the river; and a group of alleys, lanes, and short streets, partly packed and partly straggling, partly endurable but chiefly uninteresting or poor, occupying a space of about 350 yards by 240, northward of Wine-street, and adjacent to the river and the quay.

The Abbey.—The ruins of the Dominican abbey of Sligo, founded in 1252, are extensive, well-preserved, and of extraordinary artistic interest. Three sides of a spacious square of cloisters still remain, each side covered with an arched roof, and presenting to the interior a series of beautifully carved little arches, about 4 feet in height. Almost all the little pillars between these arches are peculiarly ornamented; and one, in particular, is very unique, having a human head cut on the inside of the arch. The great east window of the church is beautifully formed and carved; the high altar is adorned with reliefs in the pointed style, but, when Dr. MacParlan wrote, was so overwhelmed with an enormous mass of bones and skulls, that it could not be minutely seen; the nave is spacious, and has round it a passage of the character of a gallery, supported by pillars of stone at intervals of about 4 feet; and the tower is still entire, with the exception of the battlements, and rests upon a carved arch or cupola, the inside of which is also carved. In the church are two ancient monuments, the one bearing date 1616, and the other belonging to one of the O'Connor kings; in various parts of the ruins are vaults containing the remains of coffins, bones, and skulls; and both the interior of the abbey and the circumjacent yard are still used as a burying-ground. The O'Connor monument in the church is in good preservation; and its figures and inscriptions continue to be distinct. At the top is a representation of our Saviour on the cross; and in separate compartments below, are the figures of O'Connor and his wife, in a kneeling posture, with their hands lifted up in prayer.—The founding of the abbey is sometimes ascribed to O'Connor-Sligo, but was really the work of Maurice Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare, who held the office of Lord-justice of Ireland during the years 1229–1245. In 1414, when about 20 friars were resident on the foundation, the abbey was wholly destroyed by accidental fire; but a bull of Pope John XXIII., dated January 17, in the following year, granted many indulgences to persons visiting the abbey on certain festivals, and to persons who contributed to refund it; and to this period must be assigned the building of the edifices whose ruins we have noticed. In 1454, Brian MacDonagh, king or toparch of Tiraghill, was buried in the abbey; in 1562, the prior, Eugene O'Hart, was made bishop of Achonry; and in the following year, this bishop assisted at the Council of Trent. At the general suppression of monasteries, the abbey of Sligo was granted to Sir William Taaffe.

Other Public Buildings.—In 1245, a castle was built at Sligo, by Maurice, Earl of Kildare; in 1271, this castle was destroyed; in 1310, another castle was built by Richard, Earl of Ulster; and, in the civil wars of the 17th century, this pile made a considerable figure. The existing public buildings are two handsome and commodious churches; a large Roman Catholic chapel; three meeting-houses for two different Presbyterians, Independents, and Methodists; two bridges across the river; the county court-house; a spacious and well-arranged county gaol; the county infirmary; an infantry barracks; a fever hospital; and a poor-law workhouse. "All these buildings standing considerably apart, and occupying prominent situations in and around the town, contribute much to its general appearance." The prison inspector says officially respecting the gaol in 1843, "In a comparative view of the merits of the different prisons I have this year visited, I would assign a leading place to this gaol. The local authorities evince a laudable anxiety to consider any suggestions which Major Palmer and myself may consider it our duty to propose. The average number daily in confinement during this year, has exhibited a considerable increase on that returned for the preceding one, when it was only 88. It has amounted this year to over 105; there having been at one period as many as 157 prisoners in the gaol. For the reception of these numbers, there are 84 single cells, and 20 rooms with beds in them, exclusive of the day-rooms, work-rooms, and solitary cells, &c., so that, except on unusual occasions, the accommodation is sufficient to provide each prisoner with a separate sleeping apartment. In fact, I should say that the prison has never been so crowded as to require that more than one criminal prisoner should sleep in the same cell." The total expense of the gaol during the year 1843 was £1,894 10s. 10½d.

Poor-law Union.—The Sligo Poor-law union ranks as the 55th, and was declared on July 17, 1839. It lies wholly in co. Sligo, and comprehends an area of 254,995 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 109,561. Its electoral divisions, together with their respective pop., in 1831, are Sligo, 15,518; Knocknaree, 3,886; Kilmacoe, 4,449; Calry, 2,597; Drumcliffe, 4,622; Carney, 3,994; Lissadill, 6,682; Rossinver, 2,025; Cliffoney, 3,125; Ballysadere, 4,425; Coolaney, 6,331; Collooney, 4,344; Ballintogher, 4,199; Ballinakill, 4,241; Riverstown, 4,284; Drumfin, 4,913; Ballymote, 4,652; Cloonoghilly, 2,241; Tobbercurry, 6,705; Cloonacool, 3,532; Templeboy, 3,616; Skreen, 4,567; and Dromard, 2,613. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 13 and 39; and of the latter, 6 are elected by the division of Sligo, 3 by the division of Tobbercurry, 2 each by the divisions of Drumcliffe, Lissadill, Cliffoney, Ballysadere, Coolaney, Collooney, Drumfin, Ballymote, and Skreen, and one by each of the other divisions. The Sligo division is identical in extent with the parliamentary borough of Sligo; the divisions of Knocknaree, Kilmacoe, Calry, Drumcliffe, Carney, Lissadill, Rossinver, and Cliffoney, lie in the barony of Carbery; the divisions of Ballintogher, Ballinakill, and Riverstown, lie in the barony of Tiraghhill; the divisions of Drumfin and Collooney lie in the baronies of Tiraghill and Corran; the divisions of Ballymote and Cloonoghilly lie in the barony of Corran; the divisions of Coolaney and Ballysadere lie in the baronies of Tiraghill and Leney; the divisions of Tobbercurry and Cloonacool lie in the barony of Leney; and the divisions of Templeboy, Skreen, and Dromard, lie in the barony of Tyreragh. The number of valued tenements within the municipal borough of Sligo is 2,224,—within the portion of the parliamentary borough of Sligo, not included in the municipal borough, 348,—within the barony of Carbery districts, exclusive of the portion within the parliamentary borough of Sligo, 4,661,—within the Corran districts, 1,832,—within the Leney districts, 3,665,—within the Tyreragh districts, 1,775,—within the Tiraghill districts, 3,205,—in the entire union, 17,710; and, of this total, 9,259 were valued under £5,—4,916, under £10,—1,651, under £15,—611, under £20,—378, under £25,—203, under £30,—262, under £40,—125, under £50,—and 305, at and above £50. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £145,959; the total number of persons rated is 17,774; and of these, 3,356 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—2,336, not exceeding £2,—1,757, not exceeding £3,—1,628, not exceeding £4,—and 1,653, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Jan. 11, 1840,—to be completed in Sept. 1841,—to cost £9,100 for building and completion, and £1,900 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 9 acres, obtained for an annual rent of £50,—and to contain accommodation for 1,200 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Dec. 17, 1841; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £3,214 15s. 6½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,196 10s. 6½d. The number of pauper inmates on Dec. 2, 1843, was 312. The medical charities within the union are the county infirmary, a fever hospital, and two dispensaries at Sligo, and eight dispensaries at respectively Ballymote, Carney, Cliffoney, Collooney, Coolaney, Dromore-West, Riverstown, and Tobbercurry; and, in 1839-40, they received £821 6s. from subscription, £2,466 11s. 8d. from public grants, and £85 10s. from other sources, and expended £1,270 9s. 9½d. in salaries to medical officers, £651 16s. 6d. for medicines, and £1,429 5s. for contingencies. The infirmary contains 50 beds, and is one of the best institutions of its class in the kingdom; and, in 1839-40, it received £1,164 5s. 5d., expended £989 15s. 5d., and admitted 451 patients. The fever hospital admits and receives patients from a distance,—so that, in one year, 53 out of 82 of its patients were from the counties of Leitrim, Donegal, Fermanagh, Mayo, Roscommon, and Tipperary; and, in 1839-40, it received £500, expended £716 15s. 11d., and admitted 839 patients. The two dispensaries of Sligo serve for a district of 27,937 acres, with a pop. of 26,233; and, in 1839-40, one of them expended £321 11s. 2d., and administered to 3,845 patients,—and the other expended £290 7s. 11½d., and administered to 3,807 patients.

Trade.—The port of Sligo is under the management of the Commissioners of Town-police. The harbour is sadly marred by the bar across the entrance, the narrowness and sinuosity of the channel, and the confinedness and encumberedness of the interior; but it has of late years been greatly improved, and it now admits vessels of 12 feet draught to discharge at the quay. Both the export and the import trade is the largest in Connaght, and is still increasing. In 1835, the exports amounted in estimated value to £369,490; and their principal items were £185,414 of corn, meal, and flour, £180,830 of provisions, £1,736 of linen yarn, £312 of linen, and £140 of flax and tow. In the same year, the imports amounted in estimated value to £124,692; and their principal items were £18,800 of sugar, £16,450 of tobacco, £11,472 of British refined sugar, £11,000 of British spirits, £8,430 of wines, £8,000 of flax-seed, £7,251 of miscellaneous goods, £7,203 of unwrought iron, £6,798 of salt, £5,000 of coals, culm, and cinders, £4,037 of tea, £3,700 of corn, meal, and flour, £3,400 of glass and earthenware, £2,580 of slates and stores, £2,412 of tallow, £1,500 of herrings and other fish, £1,415 of hops, £1,617 of cast-iron, £1,000 of iron, £1,008 of barilla, £705 of tinned plates, £200 of rum, £170 of pepper, £158 of woollen yarn, £125 of coffee, and £103 of woollen manufactures. The vessels registered at the port in Dec. 1843, consisted of 9 sailing vessels of aggregate 229 tons, 18 sailing vessels of aggregate 2,875 tons, and 1 steam-vessel of 44 tons. During the year 1843, the vessels which entered coastwise consisted of 304 sailing vessels of aggregate 23,764 tons, and 41 steam-vessels of aggregate 7,642 tons; those which departed coastwise consisted of 430 sailing vessels of aggregate 32,659 tons, and 42 steam-vessels of aggregate 7,685 tons; those which entered from the colonies were 17 sailing vessels of aggregate 3,376 tons; those which departed from the colonies were 22 sailing vessels of aggregate 4,659 tons; those which entered from foreign parts were 3 sailing vessels of aggregate 435 tons; and those which departed for foreign parts were 2 sailing vessels of jointly 252 tons. The estimated amount of inland traffic consists, to the town, of 25,000 tons for exportation, 13,500 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, 1,950 tons of agricultural produce for the local use of breweries and distilleries, 1,000 tons of excisable material not received by direct importation, and 51,000 tons of stone, lime, turf, and other bulky and heavy commodities; and, from the town, 5,200 tons of imported goods, 1,400 tons of the produce of breweries and distilleries, and 3,690 tons of coals, manure, and other heavy and bulky articles. The town has a large distillery, and several small breweries; it conducts some business in the linen trade; it is the scene of much traffic in connection with the flour-mills of Ballysadere, and other places in the vicinity; and it is the seat of a very extensive retail trade, for the supply of almost all sorts of goods to a large and populous district. "In streets, houses, bustle, and shops," remarks Mr. Inglis, "Sligo holds a respectable rank. The latter indeed are scarcely surpassed even by those of Cork or Limerick. The retail trade, too, is very extensive; for Sligo is the chief mart for the north-west of Ireland; and without a due consideration of the geographical situation of Sligo, one might feel surprised at the very extensive warehouses of groceries, cloths, cottons, cutlery, &c." Fairs are held on March 27, May 7, July 4, Aug. 11, and Oct. 9. Markets are held on Tuesdays and Saturdays. The town has a savings' bank, and branch affairs of the Bank of Ireland, the Provincial Bank of Ireland, and the National Bank of Ireland. In 1842, the savings' bank had 645 depositors. The principal inns are Davis's, Ross's, and the Nelson inn; and the last has a posting establishment. The public conveyances in 1838 were a coach and a mail-coach to Dublin, a mail-coach to Londonderry, a mail-coach to Ballina and Castlebar, a mail-car to Enniskillen, a car to Ballyshannon, and a car to Collooney and Ballinacarem. Two weekly newspapers are published in the town,—the Sligo Journal on Friday, and the Sligo Champion on Saturday.

Social Condition.—“Sligo,” says Mr. Inglis,

“is a decidedly improving town. With the exception of two or three months in the year, there is employment for the people; and I did not observe many symptoms in the town of a pauper population. In the general aspect of the population, I perceived an improvement. I saw fewer tatters than I had been accustomed to; and fewer bare feet on market day, when all wear shoes and stockings who can. I observed also that a large proportion of the men wore clean linen shirts. The poor of Sligo are not increased in numbers by ejections in the country. This is not the practice of the landlords here. They do not drive for rent, or eject. They excuse the arrear, and allow the tenant to quit. This has the appearance, at first sight, of generosity; but it is, in fact, matter of necessity. Exorbitant rents are irrecoverable by driving, or by any other means. How much more rational it would be to lower rents, and actually to receive the amounts of one's rent-roll! I found at Sligo a considerable change in the dress and manners of people. Here I could not discover any traces of Spanish origin. The women were no longer seen with the hoods of their cloaks thrown over their heads, nor were the men seen with huge top-coats, as in the more south-western parts. The women wore caps and bonnets; and the girls nothing on their heads. There appeared to be much love of dress among all ranks; and among the lower classes, singular discrepancies. A well-dressed woman might be seen carrying in her arms a baby decked out in muslin, lace, and ribbons, and by her side a boy running with bare feet and ragged clothes; or a girl with tattered gown, and without shoes and stockings, might display a fine shawl or a handsome frill. Sligo is a cheap town. Besides the regular markets, every kind of meat is carried from door to door; mutton so bought, averages 4d. per pound, beef 6d., pork 2d.; flour was 2s. 6d. the first quality, and 1s. 10d. second quality, when I visited Sligo. Potatoes were 3½d. per stone; butter was 7d. per pound; a pair of fowls, 10d.; a good turkey, in the season, costs 2s.; a green goose, 10d. Potheen whisky might be purchased 2s. 6d. under the price of parliament whisky. * * The inhabitants of Sligo did not appear to me a healthy race; I thought I never saw so many sickly, pale-faced people. It is possible that fancy may have assisted this conclusion, having heard so much of the extraordinary visitation of cholera which two years before threatened to depopulate the town.” Sligo, we would summarily say, is in most respects a much better conditioned place than any other town of Connaught; and, as to at once education, literature, politics, manners, and religion, bears very considerably less resemblance to that province than to Ulster.

Municipal Affairs.—Sligo was made a borough by charter of 11 James I., and it has also a charter of 4 James II. The limits of the borough were not defined by charter, but were eventually understood—on what authority is not certainly known—to describe a circle upon a radius of 1 mile from the market cross. The modern municipal borough is much less extensive than the parliamentary one, and is divided into three wards, northern, eastern, and western. The corporation, according to charter, was entitled, “The provost and free burgesses of the Borough of Sligo;” and consisted of a provost, 12 free burgesses, and a commonalty. The present corporation is styled “The provost, free burgesses, and commonalty of the Borough of Sligo;” and consists of 6 aldermen and 18 councillors, elected in equal numbers by the three wards. Under the charter, a borough court and a court of record were held, and the corporation sustained the character of a guild mercatory. Under the authority of letters-patent of 27 Charles II., in favour of William Earl of Stafford and Thomas Radcliffe, manorial courts were also at one time held; but they passed long ago into desuetude. The town is at present the seat of the assizes for the county, and of district courts, of quarter-sessions and petty-sessions; and it is the residence of the county constabulary inspector, and the headquarters of a constabulary district which comprises the 6 stations of Sligo, Ballysadere, Cliffoey, Collooney, Drumcliffe, and Mount-Edward. The only property belonging to the corporation consists of about 19½ acres of land, which was formerly a common; and a plot of about a rood in area, formerly the site of a pound, and now occupied by houses. The lands are let at rents amounting to £98 3s. 4d. a-year; and the site of the pound is let for £10. The borough formerly sent two members to the Irish parliament; and it now sends one to the imperial parliament. Constituency in 1841, 821; of whom 813 were householders, and 8 were free burgesses.

Statistics.—Pop. of the town, in 1831, 15,152; in 1841, 12,272. Houses 1,996. Area of the St. John's section, 308 acres. Pop., in 1831, 11,411; in 1841, 9,710. Houses 1,577. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 434; in manufactures and trade, 1,022; in other pursuits, 509. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 135; on the directing of labour, 1,047; on their own manual labour, 599; on means not specified, 184. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,941; who could read but not write, 555; who could neither read nor write, 1,418. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,311; who could read but not write, 871; who could neither read nor write, 2,412.—Area of the Calry section, 109 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,741; in 1841, 2,562. Houses 419. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 134; in manufactures and trade, 260; in other pursuits, 127. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 45; on the directing of labour, 252; on their own manual labour, 189; on means not specified, 35. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 512; who could read but not write, 136; who could neither read nor write, 388. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 370; who could read but not write, 238; who could neither read nor write, 633.—Area of the parliamentary borough, 2,584 acres. Annual value of the property rated under the poor-law, £145,959. Total number of tenements valued, 2,572; of which 1,475 were valued under £5,—403, under £10,—262, under £15,—91, under £20,—127, under £25,—45, under £30,—65, under £40,—37, under £50,—and 67, at and above £50. Area of the municipal borough, 417 acres. Total number of tenements valued, 2,224; of which 1,272 were valued under £5,—368, under £10,—230, under £15,—75, under £20,—110, under £25,—38, under £30,—51, under £40,—38, under £50,—and 50, at and above £50.

History.—Some brief historical notices of the town of Sligo, have already been given in the article on the county, and in the remarks of this article on the abbey and other public buildings. In 1270, the town and its castle were burned by O'Donnell. In 1360, the town was again destroyed by fire. In 1394, the town was spoiled and burned by MacWilliam De Burgo. In 1424, the Lord-deputy of Ireland was empowered to levy out of the harbour customs of Sligo and Galway, the sums of £40 and 20 marks, to be paid to respectively Sir William De Burgo and his brother, for aiding to repel the Irish of Ulster. In 1588, three ships of the Spanish armada were stranded in Sligo bay. In 1645, an army of Irish insurgents, consisting of 2,000 foot and 300 horse, surrounded the town, and were, with great slaughter, repelled and defeated by the royalists. During the general visitation of Asiatic cholera in Great Britain and Ireland, Sligo suffered more dreadfully than any other town, and seemed for a few days as if doomed to speedy and utter desolation. Almost all families who were able fled; all communication with the surrounding country was cut off; and the greater part of not only the immediate neighbourhood but the whole province was seized with a panic.

SLIGUFF. See SLYGUFFE.

SLISII, a hill in the parish of Killerry, barony of Tiraghrill, co. Sligo, Connaught. It screens the eastern part of the south side of Lough Gill, rises abruptly from the water's edge, is separated by a romantic dell or ravine from Slieve-Daeanne; and consists of a rugged mass of clay-slate and gneiss.

SLYGUFFE, or SLYGUFF, a parish in the barony of East Idronne, 3½ miles north-east of Borris, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length of the main body, north-westward, 3½ miles; extreme breadth, 2; area, 6,755 acres, 3 roads, 14 perches,—of which 21 acres, 17 perches are in the river Barrow, and 1,513 acres, 3 roads, 34 perches. The detached district lies along the Barrow, a little south of Bagnalstown; and, at its eastern extremity, is ½ a mile west of the north-west end of the main body. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,092; in 1841, 2,072. Houses 348. A large proportion of the surface is either mountainous ground or comparatively poor land. Tomduff summit, on the south-eastern boundary, has an altitude above sea-level of 1,308 feet. The only seat is Ballinree-house. The principal antiquities are the ruins of White-chapel, Temple-Molasha, Ballinree-castle, and Ballyloughin-castles. The road from Borris to Tullow traverses the main body; and that from Borris to Bagnalstown traverses the detached district.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of LORUM [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £98 1s. 6½d., and the rectorial for £221 10s. 9½d.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Leighlin cathedral. A schoolhouse is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 173, and the Roman Catholics to 2,108; and two daily schools at Ballinree and Killoughternane were salaried with respectively £25 from subscription and £10 from the National Board, and had on their books 76 boys and 66 girls.

SLYNE-HEAD, a reputed cape, but really the outermost of a chain of islets, extending 2 miles west-south-westward from the extremity of a peninsula, or of the most westerly mainland ground, of the parish of Ballindoon, barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. Excepting the islet called High Island, lying 8 miles to the north and a few perches to the east, Slyne-Head is the most westerly ground in Connaught; and, excepting peninsula and islands in co. Kerry and the barony of Bere, it is the most westerly ground in Ireland. It forms the apex of the great triangular projection of country into the Atlantic between Clew bay and Galway bay; and previous to the recent erection upon it of two lighthouses, it not only was itself a perilous spot to vessels falling in with the middle of the western coast of Ireland, but formed the advance-ground of a whole vast labyrinth of dangers. The islet which constitutes the headland is about ½ a mile in length; and the chief of the islets, in the chain between it and the mainland, are Carriekullia, Mullanahona, Rapel, Duck, and Doonawaul. The two lighthouses were built in 1840; and the cost of maintaining them during the year 1843 was £1,381 17s. 11d.

SMALL COUNTY, a barony of the county of Limerick, Munster. It is bounded on the north, by the barony of Clanwilliam; on the east, by the barony of Cooagh and the county of Tipperary; on the south, by the baronies of Coshlea and Coshma; and on the west, by the barony of Poblehrien. Its length, westward, is 10 miles; its greatest breadth, is 6½; and its area is 44,425 acres. The surface is a rich and beautiful portion of the county, watered by Lough Gur and the rivers Camogue and Morning-Star, and singularly opulent in the number, variety, and diffusion of its antiquities. The Act 6 and 7 William IV., cap. 84, transferred the townland of Tullabracky in the parish of Tullabracky, the townlands of Cappanafaraha, Cooleen, East Dromacummer, West Dromacummer, Hardingsgrove, North Howardstown, South Howardstown, Kilbreedy, Knock-anacreeva, and Lackanogrower in the parish of Bruree, and the townland of Ballincolly in the parish of Hackmys, from the barony of Small County to that of Coshma. Pop. of these townlands in 1841, 674. Small County, as now constituted, contains part of the parishes of Athensay, Ballycubane, Fedamore, Kilbreedy-Major, Kilpencon, Kilteely, Monasternagh, Tullabracky, and Uregare, and the whole of the parishes of Ballinard, Ballinlough, Ballinamena, Cahircorney, Glenogra, Hospital, Kilcollane, Kilfrash, and Knockeney. The principal villages are Hospital, Herbertstown, Fedamore, Knockany, and Six-Mile-Bridge. Pop., in 1831, 22,674; in 1841, 21,527. Houses 3,166. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,776; in manufactures and trade, 485; in other pursuits, 210. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions, 52; on the directing of labour, 1,114; on their own manual labour, 2,211; on means not specified, 94. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,970; who could read but not write, 958; who could neither read nor write, 4,442. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,985; who could read but not write, 1,062; who could neither read nor write, 6,459.—This barony lies partly in the Poor-law union of Kilmallock, and partly in that of Limerick. The total number of tenements valued is 2,942; and of these, 1,557 were valued under £5,—291, under £10,—173, under £15,—141, under £20,—127, under £25,—92, under £30,—164, under £40,—103, under £50,—and 294, at and above £50.

SMARMORE, a parish in the barony of Ardee, 2½ miles south-south-west of the town of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. It lies at the south-western extremity of the barony, and on the western margin of the county. Length, southward, 2½ miles; extreme breadth, 1 mile; area, 1,595 acres, 3 roads, 27 perches. Pop., in 1831, 444; in 1841, 439. Houses 70. The surface consists, in general, of good land; and it is extensively adorned with the park and plantations of Smarmore-castle, the beautiful seat of George Taaffe, Esq.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ARDEE [which see], in the dio. of Armagh. The whole of the tithes belong to the representatives of the late Lord Carlingford, who are the proprietors of the land, and who demise the tithes and land together, without any distinction. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

SMERLAGH (THE), a rivulet of co. Kerry, Munster. It rises in the barony of Trughenackmy, at a point 2½ miles north-north-west of Castle-Island, and runs between 10 and 11 miles northward, chiefly among the Clannuderry mountains, and within the barony of Clannmaurice, to a confluence with the river Feale, at a point 1½ mile above Listowel.

SMERWICK-HARBOUR, a bay on the north coast and near the western extremity of the peninsula and barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It opens between Dunourlin Head on the west and Ballydavid Head on the east, measures 1½ mile across the entrance, penetrates the land to the extent of 3 miles southward, and is overhung on the east by the stupendous mountain of Brandon. The bay is exposed to north and north-west winds, yet contains tolerably well-sheltered anchoring-ground, on a bottom of turf or bog; and it may be entered with perfect safety, being all deep and free from foul ground. Toward the coast is a rock called Black Rock; but it is always above water, and the ground around it is clean. In the vicinity of the bay is the Cyclopean fort of Cahirdoragan.
